

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2007 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

PR

5841

. W7

F2

1850

SMR

FABIOLA;

OR

THE CHURCH OF THE CATACOMBS.

PART FIRST—PEACE.

CHAPTER I.

THE CHRISTIAN HOUSE.

IT is on an afternoon in September of the year 302, that we invite our reader to accompany us through the streets of Rome. The sun has declined, and is about two hours from his setting; the day is cloudless, and its heat has cooled, so that multitudes are issuing from their houses, and making their way towards Cæsar's gardens on one side, or Sallust's on the other, to enjoy their evening walk, and learn the news of the day.

But the part of the city to which we wish to conduct our friendly reader is that known by the name of the Campus Martius. It comprised the flat alluvial plain between the seven hills of older Rome and the Tiber. Before the close of the republican period, this field, once left bare for the athletic and warlike exercises of the people, had begun to be encroached upon by public buildings. Pompey had erected in it his theatre; soon after, Agrippa raised the Pantheon and its adjoining baths. But gradually it became occupied by private dwellings; while the hills, in the early empire the aristocratic portion of the city, were seized upon for greater edifices. Thus the Palatine, after Nero's fire, became almost too small for the imperial residence and its adjoining Circus Maximus. The Esquiline was usurped by Titus's baths, built on the ruins of the Golden House, the Aventine by Caracalla's; and at the period of which we write, the Emperor Dioclesian was covering the space sufficient for many lordly dwellings, by the erection of his Thermæ* on the Quirinal, not far from Sallust's garden just alluded to.

The particular spot in the Campus Martius to which we will direct our steps, is one whose situation is so definite, that we can accurately describe it to any one acquainted with the topography of ancient or modern Rome. In republican times there was a large square space in the Campus Martius, surrounded by boarding, and divided into pens, in which the Comitia, or meeting of the tribes of the people, were held, for giving their votes. This was called the Septa, or Ovile, from its resemblance to a sheepfold. Augustus carried out a plan, described by Cicero in a letter to Atticus,† of transforming this homely contrivance into a magnificent and solid structure. The Septa Julia, as it was thenceforth called, was a splendid portico of 1000 by 500 feet, supported by columns and adorned with paintings. Its ruins are clearly traceable; and it occupied the space now covered by the Doria and Verospi palaces (running thus along the present Corso), the Roman College, the Church of St. Ignatius, and the Oratory of the Caravita.

The house to which we invite our reader is exactly opposite, and on the east side of this edifice, including in its area, the present church of St. Marcellus, whence it extended back towards the foot of the Quirinal hill. It is thus found to cover, as noble Roman houses did, a considerable extent of ground. From the outside it presents but a blank and dead appearance. The walls are plain, without architectural ornament, not high, and scarcely broken by windows. In the middle of one side of this quadrangle is a door, in antis, that is, merely relieved by a tympanum or triangular cornice, resting on two half columns. Using our privilege as "artists of fiction," of invisible ubiquity, we will enter in with our friend, or "shadow," as he would have been anciently called. Passing through the porch, on the pavement of which we read, with pleasure, in Mosaic, the greeting SALVE, or WELCOME, we find ourselves in the atrium, or first court of the house, surrounded by a portico or colonnade.*

In the centre of the marble pavement a softly warbling jet of pure water, brought by the Claudian aqueduct from the Tusculan hills, springs into the air, now higher, now lower, and falls into an elevated basin of red marble, over the sides of which it flows in downy waves; and before reaching its lower and wider recipient, scatters a gentle shower on the rare and brilliant flowers placed in elegant vases around. Under the portico we see furniture disposed, of a rich and sometimes rare character; couches inlaid with ivory, and even silver; tables of oriental woods, bearing candelabra, lamps, and other household implements of bronze or silver; delicately chased busts, vases, tripods, and objects of mere art. On the walls are paintings evidently of a former period, still, however, retaining all their brightness of color and freshness of execution. These are separated by niches with statues, representing, indeed, like the pictures, mythological and historical subjects; but we cannot help observing, that nothing meets the eye which could offend the most delicate mind. Here and there an empty niche, or a covered painting, proves that this is not the result of accident.

As outside the columns, the coving roof leaves a large square opening in the centre, called the impluvium, there is drawn across it a curtain, or veil of dark canvas, which keeps out the sun and rain. An artificial twilight therefore alone enables us to see all that we have described; but it gives greater effect to what is beyond. Through an arch, opposite to the one whereby we have entered, we catch a glimpse of an inner and still richer court, paved with variegated marbles, and adorned with bright gilding. The veil of the opening above, which, however, here is closed with thick glass or talc (lapis specularis), has been partly withdrawn, and admits a bright but softened ray from the evening sun on to the place, where we see, for the first time, that we are in no enchanted hall, but in an inhabited house.

Beside a table, just outside the columns of Phrygian marble, sits a matron not beyond the middle of life, whose features, noble yet mild, show traces of having passed through sorrow at some earlier period. But a powerful influence has subdued the recollection of it, or blended it with a sweeter thought; and the two always come together, and have long dwelt united in her heart. The simplicity of her appearance strangely contrasts with the richness of all around her; her hair, streaked with silver, is left uncovered, and unconcealed by any artifice; her robes are of the plainest color and texture, without embroidery, except the purple ribbon sewed on, and called the segmentum, which denotes the state of widowhood; and not a jewel or precious ornament, of which the Roman ladies were so lavish, is to be seen upon her person. The only thing approaching to this is a slight gold cord or chain round her neck, from which apparently hangs some object, carefully concealed within the upper hem of her dress.

At the time that we discover her she is busily engaged over a piece of work, which evidently has no personal use. Upon a long rich strip of gold cloth, she is embroidering with still richer gold thread; and occasionally she has recourse to one or another of several elegant caskets upon the table, from which she takes out a pearl, or a gem set in gold, and introduces it into the design. It looks as if the precious ornaments of earlier days were being devoted to some higher purpose.

* The Pompeian Court in the Crystal Palace will have familiarized many readers with the forms of an ancient house.

* Hot-baths.

† Lib. iv. ep. 16.

But as time goes on, some little uneasiness may be observed to come over her calm thoughts, hitherto absorbed, to all appearance, in her work. She now occasionally raises her eyes from it towards the entrance; sometimes she listens for footsteps, and seems disappointed. She looks up towards the sun; then perhaps turns her glance towards a clepsydra or water-clock, on a bracket near her; but just as a feeling of more serious anxiety begins to make an impression on her countenance, a cheerful rap strikes the house-door, and she bends forward with a radiant look to meet the welcome visitor.

CHAPTER II.

THE MARTYR'S BOY.

It is a youth full of grace, and sprightliness, and candor, that comes forward with light and buoyant steps across the atrium, towards the inner hall; and we shall hardly find time to sketch him before he reaches it. He is about fourteen years old, but tall for that age, with elegance of form and manliness of bearing. His bare neck and limbs are well developed by healthy exercise; his features display an open and warm heart, while his lofty forehead, round which his brown hair naturally curls, beams with a bright intelligence. He wears the usual youth's garment, the short prætexta, reaching below the knee, and a golden bullæ, or hollow spheroid of gold suspended round his neck. A bundle of papers and vellum rolls fastened together, and carried by an old servant behind him, shows us that he is just returning home from school.*

While we have been thus noting him, he has received his mother's embrace, and has set himself low by her feet. She gazes upon him for some time in silence, as if to discover in his countenance the cause of his unusual delay, for he is an hour late in his return. But he meets her glance with so frank a look, and with such a smile of innocence, that every cloud of doubt is in a moment dispelled, and she addresses him as follows:

"What has detained you to-day, my dearest boy? No accident, I trust, has happened to you on the way?"

"Oh, none, I assure you, sweetest mother; on the contrary, all has been delightful,—so much so, that I can scarcely venture to tell you."

A look of smiling expostulation drew from the open-hearted boy a delicious laugh, as he continued,

"Well, I suppose I must. You know I am never happy, and cannot sleep, if I have failed to tell you all the bad and the good of the day about myself." (The mother smiled again, wondering what the bad was.) "I was reading the other day that the Scythians each evening cast into an urn a white or a black stone, according as the day had been happy or unhappy; if I had to do so, it would serve to mark, in white or black, the days on which I have, or have not, an opportunity of relating to you all that I have done. But to-day, for the first time, I have a doubt, a fear of conscience, whether I ought to tell you all."

Did the mother's heart flutter more than usual, as from a first anxiety, or was there a softer solicitude dimming her eye, that the youth should seize her hand and put it tenderly to his lips, while he thus replied?

"Fear nothing, mother most beloved, your son has done nothing that may give you pain. Only say, do you wish to hear all that has befallen me to-day, or only the cause of my late return home?"

"Tell me all, dear Paneratius," she answered; "nothing that concerns you can be indifferent to me."

"Well, then," he began, "this last day of my frequenting school appears to me to have been singularly blessed, and yet full of strange occurrences. First, I was crowned as the successful competitor in a declamation, which our good master Cassianus set us for our work during the morning hours; and this led, as you will hear, to some singular discoveries. The subject was, 'That the real philosopher should be ever ready to die for truth.' I never heard anything so cold or insipid (I hope it is not wrong to say so,) as the compositions read by my companions. It was not their fault, poor fellows! what truth can they possess, and what inducements can they have to die for any of their vain opinions? But to a Christian, what charming suggestions such a theme naturally makes! And so I felt it. My heart glowed, and all my thoughts seemed to burn, as I wrote my essay, full of the lessons you have taught me, and of the domestic examples that are before me. The son of a martyr could not feel otherwise. But when my turn came to read my declamation, I found that my feelings had nearly fatally betrayed me. In the warmth of my recitation, the word 'Christian' escaped my lips instead of 'philosophy,' and 'faith' instead of 'truth.' At the first mistake, I saw Cassianus start; at the second, I saw a tear glisten in his eye, as bending affectionately towards me, he said, in a whisper, 'Beware, my child; there are sharp ears listening.'"

"What, then," interrupted the mother, "is Cassianus a Christian? I chose his school for you because it was in the highest repute for learning and for morality, and now indeed I thank God that I did so. But in these days of danger and apprehension we are obliged to live as strangers in our own land, scarcely knowing the faces of our brethren. Certainly, had Cassianus proclaimed his faith, his school would soon have been deserted. But go on, my dear boy. Were his apprehensions well grounded?"

"I fear so; for while the great body of my school-fellows, not noticing these slips, vehemently applauded my hearty declamation, I saw the dark eyes of Corvinus bent scowlingly upon me, as he bit his lip in manifest anger."

"And who is he, my child, that was so displeased, and wherefore?"

"He is the oldest and strongest, but, unfortunately, the dullest boy in the school. But this, you know, is not his fault. Only, I know not why, he seems ever to have had an ill-will and grudge against me, the cause of which I cannot understand."

"Did he say aught to you, or do?"

"Yes, and was the cause of my delay. For when we went forth from school into the field by the river, he addressed me insultingly in the presence of our companions, and said, 'Come Paneratius, this, I understand is the last time we meet her' (he laid a particular emphasis on the word); but I have a long score to demand payment of from you. You have loved to show your superiority in school over me and others older and better than yourself; I saw your supercilious looks at me as you spouted your high-flown declamation to-day aye, and I caught expressions in it which you may live to rue and that very soon; for my father, you well know, is prefect of the city" (the mother slightly started); "and something preparing which may nearly concern you. Before you leave I must have my revenge. If you are worthy of your name, as it is not an empty word,* let us fairly contend in more manly strife than that of the style and tables.† Wrestle with me, try the cestus‡ against me. I burn to humble you as you do serve, before these witnesses of your insolent triumphs."

The anxious mother bent eagerly forward as she listened

* The pancratium was the exercise which combined all other personal contests—wrestling, boxing, etc.

† The implements of writing in schools, the tablets being covered with wax, which the letters were traced by the sharp point, and effaced by the flat tip of the style.

* This custom suggests to St. Augustine the beautiful idea, that the Jews were forbidden to cut their hair, because for it the heathen which they themselves and scarcely breathed. "And what," she exclaimed, "did you answer, my dear son?"

"I told him gently that he was quite mistaken; for never had I consciously done anything that could give pain to him or any of my school-fellows; nor did I ever dream of claiming superiority over them. 'And as to what you propose,' I added, 'you know, Corvinus, that I have always refused to indulge in personal combats, which, beginning in a cool trial of skill, end in an angry strife, hatred, and wish for revenge. How much less could I think of entering on them now, when you avow that you are anxious to begin them with those evil feelings which are usually their bad end?' Our schoolmates had now formed a circle around us; and I clearly saw that they were all against me, for they had hoped to enjoy some of the delights of their cruel games; I therefore cheerfully added, 'And now, my comrades, good-bye, and may all happiness attend you. I part from you, as I have lived with you, in peace.' 'Not so,' replied Corvinus, now purple in the face with fury; 'but.'"

The boy's countenance became crimsoned, his voice quivered, his body trembled, and, half choked, he sobbed out, "I cannot go on; I dare not tell the rest!"

"I entreat you, for God's sake, and for the love you bear your father's memory," said the mother, placing her hand upon her son's head, "conceal nothing from me. I shall never again have rest if you tell me not all. What further said or did Corvinus?"

The boy recovered himself by a moment's pause and a silent prayer, and then proceeded:

"'Not so!' exclaimed Corvinus, 'not so do you depart, cowardly worshipper of an ass's head!* You have concealed your abode from us, but I will find you out; till then bear this token of my determined purpose to be revenged!' So saying he dealt me a furious blow upon the face, which made me reel and stagger, while a shout of savage delight broke forth from the boys around us."

He burst into tears, which relieved him, and then went on.

"Oh, how I felt my blood boil at that moment! how my heart seemed bursting within me; and a voice appeared to whisper in my ear scornfully the name of 'coward!' It surely was an evil spirit. I felt that I was strong enough—my rising anger made me so—to seize my unjust assailant by the throat, and cast him gasping on the ground. I heard already the shout of applause that would have hailed my victory and turned the tables against him. It was the hardest struggle of my life; never were flesh and blood so strong within me. O God! may they never be again so tremendously powerful!"

"And what did you do, then, my darling boy?" gasped forth the trembling matron.

He replied, "My good angel conquered the demon at my side. I thought of my blessed Lord in the house of Caiphas, surrounded by scoffing enemies, and struck ignominiously on the cheek, yet meek and forgiving. Could I wish to be otherwise?† I stretched forth my hand to Corvinus, and said, 'May God forgive you, as I freely and fully do; and may he bless you abundantly.' Cassianus came up at that moment, having seen all from a distance, and the youthful crowd quickly dispersed. I entreated him, by our common faith, now acknowledged between us, not to pursue Corvinus for what he had done; and I obtained his promise. And now, sweet mother," murmured the boy, in soft, gentle accents, into his parent's bosom, "do you not think I may call this a happy day?"

CHAPTER III.

THE DEDICATION.

WHILE the foregoing conversation was held, the day had fast declined. An aged female servant now entered unnoticed, and lighted the lamps placed on marble and bronze candelabra, and quietly retired. A bright light beamed upon the unconscious group of mother and son, as they remained silent after the holy matron Lucina had answered Panerati's last question only by kissing his glowing brow. It was not merely a maternal emotion that was agitating her bosom; it was not even the happy feeling of a mother who, having trained her child to certain high and difficult principles, sees them put to their hardest test, and nobly stand it. Neither was it the joy of having for her son one, in her estimation, so heroically virtuous at such an age; for surely, with much greater justice than the mother of the Gracchi showed her boys to the astonished matrons of republican Rome as her only jewels, could that Christian mother have boasted to the Church of the son she had brought up.

But to her this was an hour of still deeper, or shall we say, sublimer feeling. It was a period looked forward to anxiously for years; a moment prayed for with all the fervor of a mother's supplication. Many a pious parent has devoted her infant son from the cradle to the holiest and noblest state that earth possesses; has prayed and longed to see him grow up to be, first a spotless Levite, and then a holy priest at the altar; and has watched eagerly each growing inclination, and tried gently to bend the tender thought towards the sanctuary of the Lord of Hosts. And if this was an only child, as Samuel was to Anna, that dedication of all that is dear to her keenest affection, may justly be considered as an act of maternal heroism. What then must be said of ancient matrons—Felicitas, Symphorosa, or the unnamed mother of the Maccabees—who gave up or offered their children, not one, but many, yea all, to be victims whole-burnt, rather than priests, to God?

It was some such thought as this which filled the heart of Lucina in that hour; while with closed eyes; she raised it high to heaven, and prayed for strength. She felt as though called to make a generous sacrifice of what was dearest to her on earth; and though she had long foreseen it and desired it, it was not without a maternal throe that its merit could be gained. And what was passing in that boy's mind, as he too remained silent and abstracted? Not any thought of a high destiny awaiting him. No vision of a venerable Basilica, eagerly visited 1600 years later by the sacred antiquary and the devout pilgrim, and giving his name, which it shall bear, to the neighboring gate of Rome.* No anticipation of a church in his honor to rise in faithful ages on the banks of the distant Thames, which, even after desecration, should be loved and eagerly sought as their last resting-place, by hearts faithful still to his dear Rome.† No forethought of a silver canopy or ciborium, weighing 287 lbs., to be placed over the porphyry urn that should contain his ashes, by Pope Honorius I.‡ No idea that his name would be enrolled in every martyrology, his picture, crowned with rays, hung over many altars, as the boy-martyr of the early Church. He was only the simple-hearted Christian youth, who looked upon it as a matter of course that he must always obey God's law and His Gospel; and only felt happy that he had that day performed his duty, when it came under circumstances of more than usual trial. There was no pride, no self-admiration in the reflection; otherwise there would have been no heroism in his act.

When he raised again his eyes, after his calm reverie of peaceful thoughts, in the new light which brightly filled the hall, they met his mother's countenance gazing anew upon him, radiant with a majesty and tenderness such as he never recollected to have seen before. It was a look almost of inspiration; her face was as that of a vision; her eyes what he would have imagined an angel's to be. Silently, and almost unknowingly he had changed his position, and was kneeling before her; and well he might; for was she not to him as a guardian spirit, who had shielded him ever from evil; or might he not well see in her the living saint whose virtues had been his model from childhood? Lucina broke the silence, in a tone full of grave emotion.

*Church and gate of San Panerazio

†Old St. Paneraz's, the favorite burial-place of Catholics, till they had come.

"The time is at length come, my dear child," she said, "which has long been the subject of my earnest prayer, which I have yearned for in the exuberance of maternal love. Eagerly have I watched in thee the opening germ of each Christian virtue, and thanked God as it appeared. I have noted thy docility, thy gentleness, thy diligence, thy piety, and thy love of God and man. I have seen with joy thy lively faith, and thy indifference to worldly things, and thy tenderness to the poor. But I have been waiting with anxiety for the hour which should decisively show me, whether thou wouldst be content with the poor legacy of thy mother's weakly virtue, or art the true inheritor of thy martyred father's nobler gifts. That hour thank God, has come to-day!"

"What have I done, then, that should thus have changed or raised thy opinion of me?" asked Paneratius.

"Listen to me, my son. This day which was to be, the last of thy school education, methinks that our merciful Lord has been pleased to give thee a lesson worth it all; and to prove that thou has put off the things of a child, and must be treated henceforth as a man; for thou canst think and speak, yea, and act as one."

"How dost thou mean, dear mother."

"What thou hast told me of thy declamation this morning," she replied, "proves to me how full thy heart must have been of noble and generous thoughts; thou art too sincere and honest to have written, and fervently expressed, that it was a glorious duty to die for the faith, if thou hadst not believed it, and felt it."

"And truly I do believe and feel it," interrupted the boy.

"What greater happiness can a Christian desire on earth?"

"Yes, my child, thou sayest most truly," continued Lucina. "But I should not have been satisfied with words. What followed afterwards has proved to me that thou canst bear intrepidly and patiently, not merely pain, but what I know it must have been harder for thy young patrician blood to stand, the stinging ignominy of a disgraceful blow, and the scornful words and glances of an unpitying multitude. Nay more; thou hast proved thyself strong enough to forgive and to pray for thine enemy. This day thou hast trodden the higher paths of the mountain, with the cross upon thy shoulders; one step more, and thou wilt plant it on its summit. Thou hast proved thyself the genuine son of the martyr Quintinus. Dost thou wish to be like him?"

"Mother, mother! dearest, sweetest mother!" broke out the panting youth; "could I be his genuine son, and not wish to resemble him? Though I never enjoyed the happiness of knowing him, has not his image been ever before my mind? Has he not been the very pride of my thoughts? When each year the solemn commemoration has been made of him, as of one of the white-robed army that surrounds the Lamb, in whose blood he washed his garments, how have my heart and my flesh exulted in his glory; and how have I prayed to him, in the warmth of filial piety, that he would obtain for me, not fame, not distinction, not riches, not earthly joy, but what he valued more than all these: nay, that the only thing which he has left on earth may be applied, as I know he now considers it would most usefully and most nobly be."

"What is that, my son?"

"It is his blood," replied the youth, "which yet remains flowing in my veins, and in these only. I know he must wish that it too, like what he held in his own, may be poured out in love of his Redeemer, and in testimony of his faith."

"Enough, enough, my child!" exclaimed the mother, thrilling with a holy emotion; "take from thy neck the badge of childhood, I have a better token to give thee."

He obeyed, and put away the golden bulla.

"Thou hast inherited from thy father," spoke the mother, with still deeper solemnity of tone, "a noble name, a high station, ample riches, every worldly advantage. But there is one treasure which I have reserved for thee from his inheritance.

till thou shouldst prove thyself worthy of it. I have concealed it from thee till now; though I valued it more than gold and jewels. It is now time that I make it over to thee."

With trembling hands she drew from her neck the golden chain which hung round it; and for the first time her son saw that it supported a small bag or purse richly embroidered, and set with gems. She opened it, and drew from it a sponge, dry indeed, but deeply stained.

"This, too, is thy father's blood, Paneratius," she said, with faltering voice and streaming eyes. "I gathered it myself from his death-wound, as disguised, I stood by his side, and saw him die from the wounds he had received for Christ."

She gazed upon it fondly, and kissed it fervently; and her gushing tears fell upon it, and moistened it once more. And thus liquefied again, its color glowed bright and warm, as if it had only just left the martyr's heart.

The holy matron put it to her son's quivering lips, and they were empurpled with its sanctifying touch. He venerated the sacred relic with the deepest emotions of a Christian and a son; and felt as if his father's spirit had descended into him, and stirred to its depths the full vessel of his heart, that its waters might be ready freely to flow. The whole family thus seemed to him once more united. Lucina replaced her treasure in the shrine, and hung it round the neck of her son, saying: "When next it is moistened, may it be from a nobler stream than that which gushes from a weak woman's eyes!" But heaven thought not so; and the future combatant was anointed, and the future martyr was consecrated, by the blood of his father mingled with his mother's tears.

CHAPTER IV.

THE HEATHEN HOUSEHOLD.

WHILE the scenes described in the three last chapters were taking place, a very different one presented itself in another house, situated in the valley between the Quirinal and the Esquiline hills. It was that of Fabius, a man of the equestrian order, whose family, by farming the revenues of Asiatic provinces, had amassed immense wealth. His house was larger and more splendid than the one we have just visited. It contained a third large peristyle, or court, surrounded by immense apartments; and besides possessing many treasures of European art, it abounded with the rarest productions of the East. Carpets from Persia were laid on the ground, silks from China, many-colored stuffs from Babylon, and gold embroidery from India and Phrygia covered the furniture; while curious works in ivory and in metals, scattered about, were attributed to the inhabitants of the islands beyond the Indian ocean, of monstrous form and fabulous descent.

Fabius himself, the owner of all this treasure and of large estates, was a true specimen of an easy-going Roman, who was determined thoroughly to enjoy this life. In fact, he never dreamt of any other. Believing in nothing, yet worshipping, as a matter of course, on all proper occasions, whatever deity happened to have its turn, he passed for a man as good as his neighbors; and no one had a right to exact more. The greater part of his day was passed at one or other of the great baths, which, besides the purposes implied in their name, comprised in their many adjuncts the equivalents of clubs, reading-rooms, gambling-houses, tennis-courts, and gymnasiums. There he took his bath, gossiped, read, and whiled away his hours; or sauntered for a time into the Forum to hear some orator speaking, or some advocate pleading, or into one of the many public gardens, whither the fashionable world of Rome repaired. He returned home to an elegant supper, not later than our dinner; where he had daily guests, either previously invited, or picked up during the day, among the many parasites on the look-out for good fare.

At home he was a kind and indulgent master. His house was well kept for him by an abundance of slaves: and as trouble was what most he dreaded, so long as every thing was comfortable, handsome, and well-served about him, he let things go on quietly, under the direction of his freedmen.

It is not, however, so much to him that we wish to introduce our reader, as to another inmate of his house, the sharer of its splendid luxury, and the sole heiress of his wealth. This is his daughter, who, according to Roman usage, bears the father's name, softened, however, into the diminutive Fabiola.* As we have done before, we will conduct the reader at once into her apartment. A marble staircase leads to it from the second court, over the sides of which extends a suite of rooms, opening upon a terrace, refreshed and adorned by a graceful fountain, and covered with a profusion of the rarest exotic plants. In these chambers is concentrated whatever is most exquisite and curious, in native and foreign art. A refined taste directing ample means, and peculiar opportunities, has evidently presided over the collection and arrangement of all around. At this moment, the hour of the evening repast is approaching; and we discover the mistress of this dainty abode engaged in preparing herself, to appear with becoming splendor.

She is reclining on a couch of Athenian workmanship, inlaid with silver, in a room of Cyclic form; that is, having glass windows to the ground, and so opening on to the flowery terrace. Against the wall opposite to her hangs a mirror of polished silver, sufficient to reflect a whole standing figure; on a porphyry-table beside it is a collection of the innumerable rare cosmetics and perfumes, of which the Roman ladies had become so fond, and on which they lavished immense sums.† On another, of Indian sandal-wood, was a rich display of jewels and trinkets in their precious caskets, from which to select for the day's use.

It is by no means our intention, nor our gift, to describe persons or features; we wish more to deal with minds. We will, therefore, content ourselves with saying, that Fabiola, now at the age of twenty, was not considered inferior in appearance to other ladies of her rank, age, and fortune, and had many aspirants for her hand. But she was a contrast to her father in temper and in character. Proud, haughty, impatient, and irritable, she ruled like an empress all that surrounded her, with one or two exceptions, and exacted humble homage from all that approached her. An only child, whose mother had died in giving her birth, she had been nursed and brought up in indulgence by her careless, good-natured father; she had been provided with the best masters, had been adorned with every accomplishment, and allowed to gratify every extravagant wish. She had never known what it was to deny herself a desire.

Having been left so much to herself, she had read much, and especially in profounder books. She had thus become a complete philosopher of the refined, that is, the infidel and intellectual, epicureanism, which had been long fashionable in Rome. Of Christianity she knew nothing, except that she understood it to be something very low, material, and vulgar. She despised it, in fact, too much to think of inquiring into it. And as to paganism, with its gods, its vices, its fables, and its idolatry, she merely scorned it, though outwardly she followed it. In fact, she believed in nothing beyond the present life, and thought of nothing except its refined enjoyment. But her very pride threw a shield over her virtue; she loathed the wickedness of heathen society, as she despised the frivolous youths who paid her jealously exacted attention, for she found amusement in their follies. She was considered cold and selfish, but she was morally irreproachable.

If at the beginning we seem to indulge in long descriptions, we trust that our reader will believe that they are requisite, to put him in possession of the state of material and social Rome at the period of our narrative; and will make this the more intelligible. And should he be tempted to think that we describe things as over splendid and refined for an age of decline in arts and good taste, we beg to remind him, that the year we are supposed to visit Rome is not as remote from the better periods of Roman art, for example, that of the Antonines, as our age is from that of Cellini, Raffaele, or Donatello. Yet in how many Italian palaces are still preserved works by these great artists, fully prized, though no longer imitated? So, no doubt, it was with the houses belonging to the old and wealthy families of Rome.

We find, then, Fabiola reclining on her couch, holding in her left hand a silver mirror with a handle, and in the other a strange instrument for so fair a hand. It is a sharp-pointed stiletto, with a delicately carved ivory handle, and a gold ring, to hold it by. This was the favorite weapon with which Roman ladies punished their slaves, or vented their passion on them, upon suffering the least annoyance, or when irritated by pettish anger. Three female slaves are now engaged about their mistress. They belong to different races, and have been purchased at high prices, not merely on account of their appearance, but for some rare accomplishment they are supposed to possess. One is a black; not of the degraded negro stock, but from one of those races, such as the Abyssinians and Numidians, in whom the features are as regular as in the Asiatic people. She is supposed to have great skill in herbs, and their cosmetic and healing properties, perhaps also in more dangerous uses—in compounding philtres, charms, and possibly poisons. She is merely known by her national designation as Afra. A Greek comes next, selected for her taste in dress, and for the elegance and purity of her accent; she is therefore called Graia. The name which the third bears, Syra, tells us that she comes from Asia; and she is distinguished for her exquisite embroidery, and for her assiduous diligence. She is quiet, silent, but completely engaged with the duties which now devolve upon her. The other two are garrulous, light, and make great pretence about any little thing they do. Every moment they address the most extravagant flattery to their young mistress, or try to promote the suit of one or other of the profligate candidates for her hand, who has best or last bribed them.

"How delighted I should be, most noble mistress," said the black slave, "if I could only be in the triclinium* this evening as you enter in, to observe the brilliant effect of this new stibium† on your guests! It has cost me many trials before I could obtain it so perfect: I am sure nothing like it has been ever seen in Rome."

"As for me," interrupted the wily Greek, "I should not presume to aspire to so high an honor. I should be satisfied to look from outside the door, and see the magnificent effect of this wonderful silk tunic, which came with the last remittance of gold from Asia. Nothing can equal its beauty; nor, I may add, is its arrangement, the result of my study, unworthy of the materials."

"And you, Syra," interposed the mistress, with a contemptuous smile, "what would you desire? and what have you to praise of your own doing?"

"Nothing to desire, noble lady, but that you may be ever happy; nothing to praise of my own doing, for I am not conscious of having done more than my duty," was the modest and sincere reply.

It did not please the haughty lady, who said, "Methinks, slave, that you are not over given to praise. One seldom hears a soft word from your mouth."

"And what worth would it be from me," answered Syra; "from a poor servant to a noble dame, accustomed to hear it all day long from elegant and polished lips? Do you believe it when you hear it from them? Do you not despise it when you receive it from us?"

A look of spite was darted at her from her two companions. Fabiola too was angry at what she thought a reproof. A lofty sentiment in a slave!

"Have you yet to learn then," she answered haughtily, "that you are mine, and have been bought by me at a high price, that you might serve me as I please? I have as good a right to the service of your tongue as of your arms; and if it please me to be praised, and flattered, and sung to, by you, do * Pronounced with the accent on the i.

† The milk of 500 asses per day was required to furnish Poppæa, Nero's wife, with one cosmetic.

* The dining-hall.

† Black antimony applied on the eyelids.

it you shall, whether you like it or not. A new idea, indeed, that a slave has to have any will but that of her mistress, when her very life belongs to her!"

"True," replied the handmaid, calmly, but with dignity, "my life belongs to you, and so does all else that ends with life,—time, health, vigor, body, and breath. All this you have bought with your gold, and it has become your property. But I still hold as my own what no emperor's wealth can purchase, no chains of slavery fetter, no limit of life contain."

"And pray what is that?"

"A soul!"

"A soul!" re-echoed the astonished Fabiola, who had never before heard a slave claim ownership of such a property. "And pray, let me ask you, what you mean by the word?"

"I cannot speak philosophical sentences," answered the servant, "but I mean that inward living consciousness within me, which makes me feel to have an existence with, and among, better things than surround me, which shrinks sensitively from destruction, and instinctively from what is allied to it, as disease is to death. And therefore it abhors all flattery, and it detests a lie. While I possess that unseen gift, and die it cannot, either is impossible to me."

The other two could understand but little of all this; so they stood in stupid amazement at the presumption of their companion. Fabiola too was startled; but her pride soon rose again, and she spoke with visible impatience.

"Where did you learn all this folly? Who has taught you to prate in this manner? For my part I have studied for many years, and have come to the conclusion, that all ideas of spiritual existences are the dreams of poets, or sophists; and as such I despise them. Do you, an ignorant, uneducated slave pretend to know better than your mistress? Or do you really fancy that when, after death, your corpse will be thrown on the heap of slaves who have drunk themselves, or have been scourged to death, to be burnt in one ignominious pile, and when the mingled ashes have been buried in a common pit, you will survive as a conscious being, and have still a life of joy and freedom to be lived?"

"Non omnis moriar,"* as one of your poets says," replied modestly, but with a fervent look that astonished her mistress, the foreign slave; "yes, I hope, nay, I intend to survive all this. And more yet; I believe and know that out of that charnel-pit which you have so vividly described, there is a hand that will pick out each charred fragment of my frame. And there is a power that will call to reckoning the four winds of heaven, and make each give back every grain of my dust that it has scattered; and I shall be built up once more in this my body, not as yours, or any one's bondswoman, but free, and joyful, and glorious, loving forever and beloved. This certain hope is laid up in my bosom."†

"What wild visions of an eastern fancy are these, unfitting you for every duty? You must be cured of them. In what school did you learn all this nonsense? I never read of it in any Greek or Latin author."

"In one belonging to my own land, a school in which there is no distinction known or admitted between Greek or barbarian, freeman or slave."

"What!" exclaimed, with strong excitement, the haughty lady, "without waiting even for that future ideal existence after death; already, even now, you presume to claim equality with me? Nay, who knows, perhaps superiority over me. Come, tell me at once, and without daring to equivocate or disguise, if you do so or not?" And she sat up in an attitude of eager expectation. At every word of the calm reply her agitation increased, and violent passions seemed to contend within her, as Syra said:

"Most noble mistress, far superior are you to me in place, and power, and learning, and genius, and in all that enriches and embellishes life; and in every grace of form and lineament, and in every charm of act and speech, high are you raised above all rivalry, and far removed from envious thoughts, from one so lowly and so insignificant as I. But if I must answer simple truth to your authoritative question"—she paused, as faltering; but an imperious gesture from her mistress bade her continue—"then I put it to your own judgment, whether a poor slave, who holds an unquenchable consciousness of possessing within her a spiritual and living intelligence, whose measure of existence is immortality, whose only true place of dwelling is above the skies, whose only rightful prototype is the Deity, can hold herself inferior in moral dignity, or lower in greatness of thought than one who, however gifted, owns that she claims no higher destiny, recognizes in herself no sublimer end than what awaits the pretty irrational songsters that beat without hope of liberty against the gilded bars of that cage."*

Fabiola's eyes flashed with fury; she felt herself for the first time in her life, rebuked, humbled by a slave. She grasped the style in her right hand, and made an almost blind thrust at the unflinching handmaid. Syra instinctively put forward her arm to save her person, and received the point, which, aimed upwards from the couch, inflicted a deeper gash than she had ever before suffered. The tears started into her eyes through the smart of the wound, from which the blood gushed in a stream. Fabiola was in a moment ashamed of her cruel, though unintentional act, and felt still more humbled before her servants.

"Go, go," she said to Syra, who was stanching the blood with her handkerchief, "go to Euphrosyne, and have the wound dressed. I did not mean to hurt you so grievously. But stay a moment, I must make you some compensation." Then, after turning over her trinkets on the table, she continued, "Take this ring; and you need not return here again this evening."

Fabiola's conscience was quite satisfied; she had made what she considered ample atonement for the injury she had inflicted, on the shape of a costly present to a merial dependant. And on the following Sunday, in the title of St. Pastor, not far from her house, among the alms collected for the poor was found a valuable emerald ring, which the good priest Polycarp thought must have been the offering of some very rich Roman lady; but which He who watched, with beaming eye, the almshouses of Jerusalem, and noted the widow's mite, alone saw dropped into the chest, by the bandaged arm of a foreign female slave.

CHAPTER V.

THE VISIT.

DURING the latter part of the dialogue just recorded, and the catastrophe which closed it, there took place an apparition in Fabiola's room, which, if seen by her, would probably have cut short the one, and prevented the other. The interior chambers in a Rome house were more frequently divided by curtains across their entrances, than by doors; and thus it was easy, especially during such an excited scene as had just taken place, to enter unobserved. This was the case now; and when Syra turned to leave the room, she was almost startled at seeing standing, in bright relief before the deep crimson door-curtain, a figure, which she immediately recognized, but which we must briefly describe.

It was that of a lady, or rather a child not more than twelve or thirteen years old, dressed in pure and spotless white, without a single ornament about her person. In her countenance might be seen united the simplicity of childhood with the intelligence of a maturer age. There not merely dwelt in her eyes that dove-like innocence which the sacred poet describes,† but often there beamed from them rather an intensity of pure affection, as though they were looking beyond all surrounding objects, and rested upon one, unseen by all else, but to her really present, and exquisitely dear. Her forehead was the very seat of candor, open and bright with undisguising truthfulness; a kindly smile played about the lips, and the fresh, youthful features, varied their sensitive expression with guileless earnestness, passing rapidly from one feeling to the other, as her warm and tender heart received it. Those who knew her believed that she never thought of herself, but was divided entirely between kindness to those about her, and affection for her unseen love.

* See the noble answer of Evalpistus, an imperial slave, to the judge, in the Acts of St. Justin, ap. Ruitart, tom. 1. † Church.

† "Thy eyes are those of doves."—Cantic, l. 14.

* Not all of me will die. † Job xix. 27.

When Syra saw this beautiful vision, like that of an angel, before her, she paused for a moment. But the child took her hand, and reverently kissed it, saying; "I have seen all; meet me in the small chamber near the entrance, when I go out."

She then advanced; and as Fabiola saw her, a crimson blush mantled in her cheek; for she feared the child had been witness of her undignified burst of passion. With a cold wave of her hand she dismissed her slaves, and then greeted her kinswoman, for such she was, with cordial affection. We have said that Fabiola's temper made a few exceptions in its haughty exercise. One of these was her old nurse and freedwoman Euphrosyne, who directed all her private household; and whose only creed was, that Fabiola was the most perfect of beings, the wisest, most accomplished, most admirable lady in Rome. Another was her young visitor, whom she loved, and ever treated with gentlest affection, and whose society she always coveted.

"This is really kind of you, dear Agnes," said the softened Fabiola, "to come at my sudden request, to join our table to-day. But the fact is, my father has called in one or two new people to dine, and I was anxious to have some one with whom I could have the excuse of a duty to converse. Yet I own I have some curiosity about one of our new guests. It is Fulvius, of whose grace, wealth, and accomplishments I hear so much; though nobody seems to know who or what he is, or whence he has sprung up."

"My dear Fabiola," replied Agnes, "you know I am always happy to visit you, and my kind parents willingly allow me; therefore, make no apologies about that."

"And so you have come to me as usual," said the other playfully, "in your own snow-white dress, without jewel or ornament, as if you were every day a bride. You always seem to me to be celebrating one eternal espousal. But, good heavens! what is this? Are you hurt? Or are you aware that there is, right on the bosom of your tunic, a large red spot—it looks like blood. If so let me change your dress at once."

"Not for the world, Fabiola; it is the jewel, the only ornament I mean to wear this evening. It is blood, and that of a slave; but nobler in my eyes, and more generous than flows in your veins or mine."

The whole truth flashed upon Fabiola's mind. Agnes had seen all; and humbled almost to sickening, she said somewhat pettishly, "Do you then wish to exhibit proof to all the world of my hastiness of temper, in over-chastising a forward slave?"

"No, dear cousin, far from it. I only wish to preserve for myself a lesson of fortitude and of elevation of mind, learnt from a slave, such as few patrician philosophers can teach us."

"What a strange idea? Indeed, Agnes, I have often thought that you make too much of that class of people. After all, what are they?"

"Human beings as much as ourselves, endowed with the same reason, the same feeling, and the same organization. Thus far you will admit, at any rate, to go no higher. Then they form part of the same family; and if God, from whom comes our life, is thereby our Father, He is theirs as much, and consequently they are our brethren."

"A slave my brother or sister, Agnes? The gods forbid it! They are our property and our goods; and I have no notion of their being allowed to move, to act, to think, or to feel, except as it suits their masters, or is for their advantage."

"Come, come," said Agnes, with her sweetest tones, "do not let us get into a warm discussion. You are too candid and honorable not to feel, and to be ready to acknowledge, that today you have been outdone by a slave in all that you most admire—in mind, in reasoning, in truthfulness, and in heroic fortitude. Do not answer me; I see it in that tear. But, dearest cousin, I will save you from a repetition of your pain. Will you grant me my request?"

"Any in my power,"

"Then it is that you will allow me to purchase Syra—I think that is her name. You will not like to see her about you."

"You are mistaken, Agnes. I will master pride for once, and own, that I shall now esteem her, perhaps almost admire her. It is a new feeling in me towards one in her station."

"But I think, Fabiola, I could make her happier than she is."

"No doubt, dear Agnes; you have the power of making every body happy about you. I never saw such a household as yours. You seem to carry out in practice that strange philosophy which Syra alluded to, in which there is no distinction of freedmen and slave. Everybody in your house is always smiling, and cheerfully anxious to discharge his duty. And there seems to be no one who thinks of commanding. Come, tell me your secret." (Agnes smiled.) "I suspect, you little magician, that in that mysterious chamber, which you will never open for me, you keep your charms and potions by which you make everybody and everything love you. If you were a Christian, and were exposed in the amphitheatre, I am sure the very leopards would crouch and nestle at your feet. But why do you look so serious, child? You know I am only joking."

Agnes seemed absorbed; and bent forward that keen and tender look which we have mentioned, as though she saw before her, nay, as if she heard speaking to her, some one delicately beloved. It passed away, and she gaily said, "Well, well, Fabiola, stranger things have come to pass; and, at any rate, if aught so dreadful had to happen, Syra would just be the sort of person one would like to see near one; so you really must let me have her."

"For heaven's sake, Agnes, do not take my words so seriously. I assure you they were spoken in jest. I have too high an opinion of your good sense to believe such a calamity possible. But as to Syra's devotedness, you are right. When last summer you were away, and I was so dangerously ill of contagious fever, it required the lash to make the other slaves approach me; while that poor thing would hardly leave me, but watched by me, and nursed me day and night, and I really believe greatly promoted my recovery."

"And did you not love her for this?"

"Love her! Love a slave, child! Of course, I took care to reward her generously; though I cannot make out what she does with what I give her. The others tell me she has nothing put by, and she certainly spends nothing on herself. Nay, I have even heard that she foolishly shares her daily allowance of food with a blind beggar-girl. What a strange fancy, to be sure!"

"Dearest Fabiola," exclaimed Agnes, "she must be mine! You promised me my request. Name your price, and let me take her home this evening."

"Well, be it so, you most irresistible of petitioners. But we will not bargain together. Send some one to-morrow, to see my father's steward, and all will be right. And now, this great piece of business being settled between us, let us go down to our guests."

"But you have forgotten to put on your jewels."

"Never mind them; I will do without them for once. I feel no taste for them to-day."

CHAPTER VI.

THE BANQUET.

THEY found, on descending, all the guests assembled in a hall below. It was not a state banquet which they were going to share, but the usual meal of a rich house, where preparation for a tableful of friends was always made. We will therefore content ourselves with saying that everything was elegant and exquisite in arrangement and material; and we will confine ourselves entirely to such incidents as may throw a light upon our story.

When the two ladies entered the exedra or hall, Fabius, after saluting his daughter, exclaimed: "Why, my child, you have come down, though late, still scarcely fittingly arranged! You have forgotten your usual trinkets."

Fabiola was confused. She knew not what answer to make: she was ashamed of her weakness about her angry display; and still more of what she now thought a silly way of punishing herself for it. Agnes stepped in to the rescue, and blushing said: "It is my fault, cousin Fabius, both that she is late, and that she is so plainly dressed. I detained her with my gossip; and no doubt she wishes to keep me in countenance by the simplicity of her attire."

"You, dear Agnes," replied the father, "are privileged to do as you please. But, seriously speaking, I must say that, even with you, this may have answered while you were a mere child; now that you are marriageable*, you must begin to make a little more display, and try to win the affections of some handsome and eligible youth. A beautiful necklace, for instance, such as you have plenty of at home, would not make you less attractive. But you are not attending to me. Come, come, I dare say you have some one already in view."

During most of this address, which was meant to be thoroughly good-natured, as it was perfectly worldly, Agnes appeared in one of her abstracted moods, her bewitched looks, as Fabiola called them, transfixed, in a smiling ecstasy, as if attending to some one else, but never losing the thread of the discourse, nor saying anything out of place. She therefore at once answered Fabius: "Oh, yes, most certainly, one who has already pledged me to him by his betrothal-ring, and has adorned me with immense jewels."†

"Really!" asked Fabius, "with what?"

"Why," answered Agnes, with a look of glowing earnestness, and in tones of artless simplicity, "he has girded my hand and neck with precious gems, and has set in my ears rings of peerless pearls."‡

"Goodness!" who can it be? Come, Agnes, some day you must tell me your secret. Your first love, no doubt: may it last long and make you happy!"

"Forever!" was her reply, as she turned to join Fabiola, and enter with her into the dining-room. It was well she had not overheard this dialogue, or she would have been hurt to the quick, at thinking that Agnes had concealed the most important thought of her age, as she would have considered it, from her most loving friend. But while Agnes was defending her, she had turned away from her father, and had been attending to the other guests. One was a heavy, thick-necked Roman sophist, or dealer in universal knowledge, named Calpurnius; another, Proculus, a mere lover of good fare, often at the house. Two more remain, deserving further notice. The first of them, evidently a favorite with both Fabiola and Agnes, was a tribune, a high officer of the imperial or prætorian guard. Though not above thirty years of age, he had already distinguished himself by his valor, and enjoyed the highest favors with the emperors Dioclesian in the East, and Maximian Herculeus in Rome. He was free from all affectation in manner or dress, though handsome in person; and though most engaging in conversation, he manifestly scorned the foolish topics which generally occupied society. In short, he was a perfect specimen of a noble-hearted youth, full of honor and generous thoughts; strong and brave, without a particle of pride or display in him.

Quite a contrast to him was the last guest, already †nded to by Fabiola, the new star of society, Fulvius. Young, and almost effeminate in look, dressed with most elaborate elegance, with brilliant rings on every finger, and jewels in his dress, affected in his speech, which had a slightly foreign accent, overstrained in his courtesy of manners, but apparently good-natured and obliging, he had in a short time quietly pushed his way into the highest society of Rome. This was, indeed, owing partly to his having been seen at the imperial court, and partly to the fascination of his manner. He had arrived in Rome accompanied by a single elderly attendant, evidently deeply attached to him; whether slave, freedman, or friend, nobody well knew. They spoke together always in a strange tongue, and the swarthy features, keen fiery eye, and unamiable expression of the domestic, inspired a certain degree of fear in his dependants; for Fulvius had taken an apartment in what was called an insula, or house let out in parts, had furnished it luxuriously, and had peopled it with a sufficient bachelor's establishment of slaves. Profusion rather than abundance distinguished all his domestic arrangements; and, in the corrupted and degraded circle of pagan Rome, the obscurity of his history, and the suddenness of his apparition, were soon forgotten in the evidence of his riches and the charm of his loose conversation. A shrewd observer of character, however, would soon notice a wandering restlessness of eye, and an eagerness of listening attention for all sights and sounds around him, which betrayed an insatiable curiosity; and, in moments of forgetfulness, a dark scowl, under his knit brows, from his flashing eyes, and a curling of the upper lip, which inspired a feeling of mistrust, and gave an idea that his exterior softness only clothed a character of feline malignity.

The guests were soon at table; and as ladies sat, while men reclined on couches during the repast, Fabiola and Agnes were together on one side, the two younger guests last described were opposite, and the master, with his two elder friends in the middle—if these terms can be used to describe their position about three parts of a round table; one side being left unencumbered by the sigma,* or semi-circular couch, for the convenience of serving. And we may observe, in passing, that a table-cloth, a luxury unknown in the times of Horace, was now in ordinary use.

When the first claims of hunger or the palate had been satisfied, conversation grew more general.

"What news to-day of the baths?" asked Calpurnius; "I have no leisure myself to look after such trifles."

"Very interesting news indeed," answered Proculus. "It seems quite certain that orders have been received from the divine Dioclesian to finish his Thermæ in three years."

"Impossible!" exclaimed Fabius. "I looked in at the works the other day, on my way to Sallust's gardens, and found them very little advanced in the last year. There is an immense deal of heavy work to be done, such as carving marbles and shaping columns."

"True," interposed Fulvius: "but I know that orders have been sent to all parts, to forward hither all prisoners, and all persons condemned to the mines in Spain, Sardinia, and even Chersonesus, who can possibly be spared, to come and labor at the Thermæ. A few thousand Christians, thus set to the work, will soon finish it."

"And why Christians better than other criminals?" asked, with some curiosity, Fabiola.

"Why, really," said Fulvius, with his most winning smile, "I can hardly give a reason for it; but the fact is so. Among fifty workmen so condemned, I would engage to pick out a single Christian."

"Indeed!" exclaimed several at once; "pray how?"

"Ordinary convicts," answered he, "naturally do not love their work, and they require the lash at every step to compel them to perform it; and when the overseer's eye is off them no work is done. And moreover, they are of course rude, sottish, quarrelsome and querulous. But the Christians, when condemned to these public works, seem, on the contrary, to be glad and are always cheerful and obedient. I have seen young patricians so engaged in Asia, whose hands had never before * Twelve was the age for marriage, according to the Roman law.

† Annullæ fidelis subarrhavit me, et immensis monilibus ornavit me.—Office of St. Agnes.

‡ Dexteram meam et collum meum cinxit lapidibus pretiosis, tradidit auribus meis inestimabiles margaritas.

* So called from its resemblance to the letter C, the old form of S.

handled a pickaxe, and whose weak shoulders had never borne a weight, yet working hard, and as happy, to all appearance, as when at home. Of course, for all that, the overseers apply the lash and the stick very freely to them, and most justly; because it is the will of the divine emperors that their lot should be made as hard as possible; but still they never complain."

"I cannot say that I admire this sort of justice," replied Fabiola; "but what a strange race they must be! I am most curious to know what can be the motive or cause of this stupidity, or unnatural insensibility, in these Christians?"

Proculus replied, with a facetious look: Calpurnius here no doubt can tell us; for he is a philosopher, and I hear could declaim for an hour on any topic, from the Alps to an ant-hill."

Calpurnius, thus challenged, and thinking himself highly complimented, solemnly gave mouth: "The Christians," said he, "are a foreign sect, the founder of which flourished many years ago in Chaldea. His doctrines were brought to Rome at the time of Vespasian by two brothers named Peter and Paul. Some maintain that these were the same twin brothers as the Jews call Moses and Aaron, the second of whom sold his birthright to his brother for a kid, the skin of which he wanted to make chirotheca* of. But this identity I do not admit, as it is recorded in the mystical books of the Jews that the second of these brothers, seeing the other's victims give better omens of the birds than his own, slew him, as our Romulus did Remus, but with the jaw-bone of an ass; for which he was hung by King Mardochæus of Macedon, upon a gibbet fifty cubits high, at the suit of their sister Judith. However, Peter and Paul coming, as I said, to Rome, the former was discovered to be a fugitive slave of Pontius Pilate, and was crucified by his master's orders on the Janiculum. Their followers, of whom they had many, made the cross their symbol and adore it, and they think it the greatest honor to suffer stripes, and even ignominious death as the best means of being like their teachers and, as they fancy, of going to them in a place somewhere among the clouds."†

This lucid explanation of the origin of Christianity was listened to with admiration by all except two. The young officer gave a piteous look toward Agnes, which seemed to say, "Shall I answer the goose, or shall I laugh outright?" But she put her fingers on her lips, and smiled imploringly for silence.

"Well, then, the upshot of it is," observed Proculus, "that the Thermæ will be finished soon, and we shall have glorious sport. Is it not said, Fulvius, that the divine Dioclesian will himself come to the dedication?"

"It is quite certain; and so will there be splendid festivals and glorious games. But we shall not have to wait so long; already, for other purposes, have orders been sent to Numidia for an unlimited supply of lions and leopards to be ready before winter." Then turning round sharp to his neighbors, he said, bending a keen eye upon his countenance: "A brave soldier like you, Sebastian, must be delighted with the noble spectacles of the amphitheatre, especially when directed against the enemies of the august emperors, and of the republic."

The officer raised himself upon his couch, looked on his interrogator with an unmoved, majestic countenance, and answered calmly:

"Fulvius, I should not deserve the title which you gave me, could I contemplate with pleasure, in cold blood, the struggle, if it deserve the name, between a brute beast and a helpless child or woman, for such are the spectacles which you call noble. No, I will draw my sword willingly against any enemy of the princes or the state; but I would as readily draw it against the lion or the leopard that should rush, even by imperial order, against the innocent and defenceless." Fulvius was starting up, but Sebastian placed his strong hand upon his arm, and continued: "Hear me out. I am not the first Roman, nor the noblest, who has thought thus before me. Remember the words of Cicero: 'Magnificent are these games, no doubt; but what delight can it be to a refined mind to see either a feeble man torn by a most powerful beast, or a noble animal pierced through by a javelin?*' I am not ashamed of agreeing with the greatest of Roman orators."

"Then shall we never see you in the amphitheatre, Sebastian?" asked Fulvius, with a bland but taunting tone.

"If you do," the soldier replied, "depend upon it, it will be on the side of the defenceless, not on that of the brutes that would destroy them."

"Sebastian is right," exclaimed Fabiola, clapping her hands, "and I close the discussion by my applause. I have never heard Sebastian speak except on the side of generous and high-minded sentiments."

Fulvius bit his lip in silence, and all rose to depart.

CHAPTER VII.

POOR AND RICH.

DURING the latter part of the conversation just recorded, Fabius had been quite abstracted, speculating upon his conversation with Agnes. How quietly she had kept her secret to herself! But who could this favored person be, who had already won her heart? He thought over many, but could find no answer. The gift of rich jewels particularly perplexed him. He knew no young Roman nobleman likely to possess them; and sauntering, as he did, every day into the great shops, he was sure to have heard if any such costly order had been given. Suddenly the bright idea flashed through his mind that Fulvius, who daily exhibited new and splendid gems, brought from abroad, could be the only person able to make her such presents. He, moreover, noticed such occasional looks darted towards his cousin by the handsome foreigner, as left him no doubt that he was deeply enamored of her; and if Agnes did not seem conscious of the admiration, this, of course, was part of the plan. Once convinced of this important conclusion, he determined to favor the wishes of the two, and astonish his daughter one day by the sagacity he had displayed.

But we must leave our nobler guests for more humble scenes, and follow Syra from the time that she left her young mistress's apartment. When she presented herself to Euphrosyne, the good-natured nurse was shocked at the cruel wound, and uttered an exclamation of pity. But immediately recognizing in it the work of Fabiola, she was divided between two contending feelings. "Poor thing!" she said, as she went on first washing, then closing and dressing, the gash; "it is a dreadful cut! What did you do to deserve it? How it must have hurt you, my poor girl! But how wicked you must have been to bring it upon yourself! It is a savage wound, yet inflicted by the gentlest of creatures! (You must be faint from loss of blood; take this cordial to support you): and no doubt she found herself obliged to strike."

"No doubt," said Syra, amused, "it was all my fault: I had no business to argue with my mistress."

"Argue with her!—argue!—O ye gods! who ever heard before of a slave arguing with a noble mistress, and such a learned one! Why, Calpurnius himself would be afraid of disputing with her. No wonder, indeed, she was so—so agitated, as not to know that she was hurting you. But this must be concealed; it must not be known that you have been so wrong. Have you no scarf or nice veil that we could throw round the arm, as if for ornament? All the others, I know, have plenty given or bought; but you never seem to care for these pretty things. Let us look."

She went into the maid-slaves' dormitory, which was within her room, opened Syra's capsa or box, and after turning over in vain its scanty contents, she drew forth from the bottom a square kerchief of richest stuff, magnificently embroidered, and even adorned with pearls. Syra blushed deeply, and entreated not to be obliged to wear this most disproportionate piece of dress, especially as it was a token of better days, long and painfully preserved. But Euphrosyne, anxious to hide her mistress's fault, was inexorable; and the rich scarf was gracefully fastened round the wounded arm.

* Gloves.

† Lucian: De Morte Peregrinæ.

* "Magnificè nemo negat; sed quæ potest esse homini polito delectatio, quam aut homo imbecillus a valentissima bestia lanatur, aut præclara bestia venabulo transverberatur?"—Ep. ad Fam. lib. vii. ep. 1.

This operation performed, Syra proceeded to the little parlor opposite the porter's room, where the higher slaves could see their friends. She held in her hand a basket covered with a napkin. The moment she entered the door, a light step came bounding across the room to meet her. It was that of a girl of about sixteen or seventeen, dressed in the poorest attire, but clean and neat, who threw her arms round Syra's neck with such a bright countenance and such hearty glee that a bystander would hardly have supposed that her sightless eyes had never communed with the outer world.

"Sit down, dear Cæcilia," said Syra, with a most affectionate tone, and leading her to a seat; "to-day I have brought you a famous feast: you will fare sumptuously."

"How so? I think I do every day."

"No, but to-day my mistress has kindly sent me out a dainty dish from her table, and I have brought it here for you."

"How kind of her; yet how much kinder of you, my sister! But why have you not partaken of it yourself? It was meant for you, and not for me."

"Why, to tell the truth, it is a greater treat to me to see you enjoy anything than to enjoy it myself."

"No, dear Syra, no; it must not be. God has wished me to be poor, and I must try to do His will. I could no more think of eating the food than I could of wearing the dress, of the rich, so long as I can obtain that of the poor. I love to share with you your pulmentum*, which I know is given me in charity by one poor like myself. I procure for you the merit of alms-deeds; you give me the consolation of feeling that I am, before God, still only a poor blind thing. I think He will love me better thus, than if feeding on luxurious fare. I would rather be with Lazarus at the gate, than with Dives at the table."

"How much better and wiser you are than I, my good child! It shall be as you wish. I will give the dish to my companions, and, in the meantime, here I set before you your usual humble fare."

"Thanks, thanks, dear sister; I will await your return."

Syra went to the maids' apartment, and put before her jealous but greedy companions the silver dish. As their mistress occasionally showed them this little kindness, it did not much surprise them. But the poor servant was weak enough to be ashamed of appearing before her comrades with the rich scarf round her arm. She took it off before she entered; then, not to displease Euphrosyne, replaced it, as well as she could with one hand, on coming out. She was in the court below, returning to her blind friend, when she saw one of the noble guests of her mistress's table alone, and, with a mortified look, crossing towards the door, and she stepped behind a column to avoid any possible, and not uncommon, rudeness. It was Fulvius; and no sooner did she, unseen, catch a glimpse of him than she stood for a moment as nailed to the spot. Her heart beat against her bosom, then quivered as if about to cease its action; her knees struck against one another, a shiver ran through her frame, while perspiration started on her brow. Her eyes, wide open, were fascinated, like the bird's before the snake. She raised her hand to her breast, made upon it the sign of life, and the spell was broken. She fled in an instant, still unnoticed; and had hardly stepped noiselessly behind a curtain that closed the stairs, when Fulvius, with down-cast eyes, reached the spot on which she had stood. He started back a step, as if scared by something lying before him. He trembled violently; but recovering himself by a sudden effort, he looked around him, and saw that he was alone. There was no eye upon him—except One which he did not heed, but which read his evil heart in that hour. He gazed upon the object, and stooped to pick it up; but drew back his hand, and that more than once. At last he heard footsteps approaching, he recognized the martial tread of Sebastian; and hastily he snatched up from the ground the rich scarf which had dropped from Syra's arm. He shook as he folded it up; and when, to his horror, he found upon it spots of fresh blood, which had oozed through the bandages, he reeled, like a drunken man, to the door, and rushed to his lodgings.

Pale, sick, and staggering, he went into his chamber, repulsing roughly the officious advances of his slaves; and only beckoned to his faithful domestic to follow him, and then signed to him to bar the door. A lamp was burning brightly by the table, on which Fulvius threw the embroidered scarf in silence, and pointed to the stains of blood. That dark man said nothing; but his swarthy countenance was blanched, while his master's was ashy and livid.

"It is the same, no doubt," at length spoke the attendant, in their foreign tongue; "but she is certainly dead."

"Art thou quite sure, Eurotas?" asked the master, with the keenest of his hawk's looks.

"As sure as man can be of what he has not seen himself. Where didst thou find this? And whence this blood?"

"I will tell thee all to-morrow; I am too sick to-night. As to those stains, which were liquid when I found it, I know not whence they came, unless they are warnings of vengeance—arg, a vengeance themselves, deep as the Furies could meditate, fierce as they can launch. That blood has not been shed now."

"Tut, tut! this is no time for dreams or fancies. Did anyone see thee pick the—the thing up?"

"No one, I am sure."

"Then we are safe; better in our hands than in others. A good night's rest will give us better counsel."

"True, Eurotas; but do thou sleep this night in my chamber."

Both threw themselves on their couches: Fulvius on a rich bed, Eurotas on a lowly pallet; from which, raised upon his elbow, with dark but earnest eye, he long watched, by the lamp's light, the troubled slumbers of the youth—at once his devoted guardian and his evil genius. Fulvius tossed about, and moaned in his sleep, for his dreams were gloomy and heavy. First he sees before him a beautiful city in a distant land, with a river of crystal flowing through it. Upon it is a galley weighing anchor, with a figure on deck waving towards him, in farewell, an embroidered scarf. The scene changes; the ship is in the midst of the sea, battling with a furious storm, while on the summit of the mast the same scarf streams out, like a pennant, unruffled and uncrumpled by the breeze. The vessel is now dashed upon a rock, and all with a dreadful shriek are buried in the deep. But the topmast stands above the billows, with its calm and brilliant flag; till, amidst the sea-birds that shriek around, a form with a torch in her hand, and black flapping wings, flies by, snatches it from the staff, and with a look of stern anger displays it, as in her flight she pauses before him. He reads upon it, written in fiery letters, NEMESIS.*

But it is time to return to our other acquaintance in the house of Fabius.

After Syra had heard the door close on Fulvius, she paused to compose herself, offered up a secret prayer, and returned to her blind friend. She had finished her frugal meal, and was waiting patiently the slave's return. Syra then commenced her daily duties of kindness and hospitality; she brought water, washed her hands and feet, in obedience to Christian practice, and combed and dressed her hair, as if the poor creature had been her own child. Indeed, though not much older, her look was so tender as she hung over her poor friend, her tones were so soft, her whole action so motherly, that one would have thought it was a parent ministering to her daughter, rather than a slave serving a beggar. And this beggar too looked so happy, spoke so cheerily, and said such beautiful things, that Syra lingered over her work to listen to her and gaze on her.

It was at this moment that Agnes came for her appointed interview, and Fabiola insisted on accompanying her to the door.

*Forrage.

*Vengeance.

But when Agnes softly raised the curtain and caught a sight of the scene before her, she beckoned to Fabiola to look in, enjoining silence by her gesture. The blind girl was opposite, and her voluntary servant on one side, unconscious of witnesses. The heart of Fabiola was touched; she had never imagined that there was such a thing as disinterested love on earth between strangers; as to charity, it was a word unknown to Greece or Rome. She retreated quietly, with a tear in her eye, and said to Agnes as she took leave :

"I must retire; that girl, as you know, proved to me this afternoon that a slave may have a head; she has now shown me that she may have a heart. I was amazed, when, a few hours ago, you asked me if I did not love a slave. I think, now, I could almost love Syra. I half regret that I have agreed to part with her."

As she went back into the court, Agnes entered the room, and laughing, said,

"So, Cæcilia, I have found out your secret at last. This is the friend whose food you have always said was so much better than mine, that you would never eat at my house. Well, if the dinner is not better, at any rate I agree that you have fallen in with a better hostess."

"Oh, don't say so, sweet Lady Agnes," answered the blind girl; "It is the dinner indeed that is better. You have plenty of opportunities for exercising charity; but a poor slave can only do so by finding some one still poorer and helpless, like me. That thought makes her food by far the sweetest."

"Well, you are right," said Agnes, "and I am not sorry to have you present, to hear the good news I bring to Syra. It will make you happy too. Fabiola has allowed me to become your mistress, Syra, and to take you with me. To-morrow you shall be free, and a dear sister to me."

Cæcilia clapped her hands with joy, and throwing her arms round Syra's neck, exclaimed: "Oh, how good. How happy you will now be, dear Syra!"

But Syra was deeply troubled, and replied with faltering voice, "Oh good and gentle lady, you have been kind indeed, to think so much about one like me. But pardon me if I entreat you to remain as I am; I assure you, dear Cæcilia, I am quite happy here."

"But why wish to stay?" asked Agnes.

"Because," rejoined Syra, "it is most perfect to abide with God, in the state wherein we have been called.* I own this is not the one in which I was born; I have been brought to it by others." A burst of tears interrupted her for a moment, and then she went on. "But so much the more clear is it to me, that God has willed me to serve Him in this condition. How can I wish to leave it?"

"Well, then," said Agnes, still more eagerly, "we can easily manage it. I will not free you, and you shall be my bond-woman. That will be just the same."

"No, no," said Syra, smiling, "that will never do. Our great Apostle's instructions to us are: 'Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward.† I am far from saying that my mistress is one of these; but you, noble Lady Agnes, are too good and gentle for me. Where would be my cross, if I lived with you? You do not know how proud and headstrong I am by nature; and I should fear for myself, if I had not some pain and humiliation.'"

Agnes was almost overcome; but she was more eager than ever to possess such a treasure of virtue, and said, "I see, Syra, that no motive addressed to your own interest can move you, I must therefore use a more selfish plea. I want to have you with me, that I may improve by your advice and example. Come, you will not refuse such a request."

"Selfish," replied the slave, "you can never be. And therefore I will appeal to yourself from your request. You know Fabiola, and you love her. What a noble soul, and what a splendid intellect she possesses! What great qualities and high accomplishments, if they only reflected the light of truth!

And how jealously does she guard in herself that pearl of virtues, which only we know how to prize! What a truly great Christian she would make!"

"Go on, for God's sake, dear Syra," broke out Agnes, all eagerness. "And do you hope for it?"

"It is my prayer day and night; it is my chief thought and aim; it is the occupation of my life. I will try to win her by patience, by assiduity, even by such unusual discussions as we have held to-day. And when all is exhausted, I have one resource more."

"What is that?" both asked.

"To give my life for her conversion. I know that a poor slave like me has few chances of martyrdom. Still, a fiercer persecution is said to be approaching, and perhaps it will not disdain such humble victims. But be that as God pleases, my life for her soul is placed in His hands. And oh, dearest, best of ladies," she exclaimed, falling on her knees and bedewing Agnes's hand with tears, "do not come in thus between me and my prize."

"You have conquered, sister Syra (oh! never again call me lady)," said Agnes. "Remain at your post; such single-hearted, generous virtue must triumph. It is too sublime for so homely a sphere as my household."

"And I, for my part," subjoined Cæcilia, with a look of arch gravity, "say that she has said one very wicked thing, and told a great story, this evening."

"What is that, my pet?" asked Syra, laughing.

"Why, you said that I was wiser and better than you, because I declined eating some trumpery delicacy, which would have gratified my palate for a few minutes, at the expense of an act of greediness; while you have given up liberty, happiness, the free exercise of your religion, and have offered to give up life itself, for the salvation of one who is your tyrant and tormentor. Oh, fie! how could you tell me such a thing!"

The servant now announced that Agnes's litter was waiting at the door; and any one who could have seen the affectionate farewell of the three—the noble lady, the slave, and the beggar, would have justly exclaimed, as people had often done before, "See how these Christians love one another!"

CHAPTER VIII.

THE FIRST DAY'S CONCLUSION.

IF we linger a little time about the door, and see Agnes fairly off, and listen to the merry conversation between her and Cæcilia, in which Agnes asks her to allow herself to be accompanied home by one of her attendants, as it has grown dark, and the girl is amused at the lady's forgetfulness that day and night are the same to her, and that on this very account she is the appointed guide to thread the mazes of the catacombs, familiar to her as the streets of Rome, which she walks in safety at all hours; if thus we pass a little time before re-entering, to inquire how the mistress within fares after the day's adventures, we shall find the house turned topsyturvy. Slaves, with lamps and torches, are running about in every direction, looking for something or other that is lost, in every possible and impossible place. Euphrosyne insists it must be found; till at last the search is given up in despair. The reader will probably have anticipated the solution of the mystery. Syra had presented herself to have her wound re-dressed, according to orders, and the scarf which had bound it was no longer there. She could give no account of it, further than that she had taken it off, and put it on, certainly not so well as Euphrosyne had done it, and she gave the reason, for she scorned to tell a lie. Indeed, she had never missed it till now. The kind-hearted old nurse was much grieved at the loss, which she considered must be heavy to a poor slave-girl, as she probably reserved that object for the purchase of her liberty. And Syra too was sorry, but for reasons which she could not have made the good housekeeper comprehend.

Euphrosyne had all the servants interrogated, and many even searched, to Syra's great pain and confusion; and then ordered a grand general battue through every part of the house where Syra had been. Who for a moment could have dreamt of suspecting a noble guest at the master's table of purloining any article, valuable or not? The old lady therefore came to the conclusion, that the scarf had been spirited away by some magical process; and greatly suspected that the black slave Afra, who she knew could not bear Syra, had been using some spell to annoy the poor girl. For she believed the Moor to be a very Canidia,* being often obliged to let her go out alone at night, under pretence of gathering herbs at full moon for her cosmetics, as if plucked at any other time, they would not possess the same virtues; to procure deadly poisons Euphrosyne suspected, but in reality to join in the hideous orgies of Fetichism† with others of her race, or to hold interviews with such as consulted her imaginary art. It was not till all was given up, and Syra found herself alone, that on more coolly recollecting the incidents of the day, she remembered the pause in Fulvius's walk across the court, at the very spot where she had stood, and his hurried steps, after this, to the door. The conviction then flashed on her mind, that she must have dropped her kerchief, and that he must have picked it up. That he should have passed it with indifference she believed impossible. She was confident, therefore, that it was now in his possession. After attempting to speculate on the possible consequences of this misadventure, and coming to no satisfactory conclusion, she determined to commit the matter entirely to God, and sought that repose which a good conscience was sure to render balmy and sweet.

* 1 Cor. vii. 24.

† 1 Pet. ii. 14.

Fabiola, on parting with Agnes, retired to her apartment; and after the usual services had been rendered to her by her other two servants and Euphrosyne, she dismissed them with a gentler manner than ever she had shown before. As soon as they had retired, she went to recline upon the couch where first we found her; when, to her disgust, she discovered lying on it the style with which she had wounded Syra. She opened a chest, and threw it in with horror; nor did she ever again use any such weapon.

She took up the volume which she had last laid down, and which had greatly amused her; but it was quite insipid, and seemed most frivolous to her. She laid it down again, and gave free course to her thoughts on all that had happened. It struck her first what a wonderful child her cousin Agnes was,—how unselfish, how pure, how simple; how sensible, too, and even wise! She determined to be her protector, her elder sister in all things. She had observed, too, as well as her father, the frequent looks which Fulvius had fixed upon her; not, indeed, those libertine looks which she herself had often borne with scorn, but designing, cunning glances, such as she thought betrayed some scheme or art, of which Agnes might become the victim. She resolved to frustrate it, whatever it might be, and arrived at exactly the opposite conclusion to her father's about him. She made up her mind to prevent Fulvius having any access to Agnes, at least at her house; and then blamed herself for having brought one so young into the strange company which often met at her father's table, especially as she now found that her motives for doing so had been decidedly selfish. It was nearly at the same moment that Fulvius, tossing on his couch, had come to the determination never again, if possible, to go inside Fabius's door, and to resist or elude every invitation from him.

Fabiola had measured his character; had caught, with her penetrating eye, the affectation of his manner, and the cunning of his looks; and could not help contrasting him with the frank and generous Sebastian. "What a noble fellow that Sebastian is!" she said to herself. "How different from all the other youths that come here. Never a foolish word escapes his lips, never an unkind look darts from his bright and cheerful eye. How abstemious, as becomes a soldier, at the table; how modest, as befits a hero, about his own strength and bold actions in war, which others speak so much about. Oh! if he only felt towards me as others pretend to do—" She did not finish the sentence, but a deep melancholy seemed to steal over her own soul.

Then Syra's conversation, and all that had resulted from it, passed again through her mind; it was painful to her, yet she could not help dwelling on it; and she felt as if that day were a crisis in her life. Her pride had been humbled by a slave, and her mind softened, she knew not how. Had her eyes been opened in that hour; and had she been able to look up above this world, she would have seen a soft cloud like incense, but tinged with a rich carnation, rising from the bedside of a kneeling slave (prayer and willing sacrifice of life breathed upwards together), which, when it struck the crystal footstool of a mercy-seat in heaven, fell down again as a dew of gentlest grace upon her arid heart.

She could not indeed see this; yet it was no less true; and wearied, at length she sought repose. But she too had a distressing dream. She saw a bright spot as in a delicious garden, richly illuminated by a light like noon-day, but inexpressibly soft; while all around was dark. Beautiful flowers formed the sward, plants covered with richest bloom grew festooned from tree to tree, on each of which glowed golden fruit. In the midst of this space she saw the poor blind girl, with her look of happiness on her cheerful countenance, seated on the ground; while on one side, Agnes, with her sweetest simple looks, and on the other, Syra, with her quiet patient smile, hung over her and caressed her. Fabiola felt an irresistible desire to be with them; it seemed to her that they were enjoying some felicity which she had never known or witnessed; and she thought they even beckoned her to join them. She ran forward to do so, when to her horror she found a wide, and black, and deep ravine, at the bottom of which roared a torrent between herself and them. By degrees its waters rose, till they reached the upper margin of the dyke, and there flowed, though so deep, yet sparkling and brilliant, and most refreshing. Oh, for courage to plunge into this stream, through which alone the gorge could be crossed, and land in safety on the other side! and still they beckoned, urging her on to try it. But as she was standing on the brink, clasping her hands in despair, Calpurnius seemed to emerge from the dark air around, with a thick heavy curtain stretched out, on which were worked all sorts of monstrous and hideous chimeras, most curiously running into, and underwoven with, each other; and this dark veil grew and grew, till it shut out the beautiful vision from her sight. She felt disconsolate, till she seemed to see a bright genius (as she called him), in whose features she fancied she traced a spiritualized resemblance to Sebastian, and whom she had noticed standing sorrowful at a distance, now approach her, and, smiling on her, fan her fevered face with his gold and purple wing; when she lost her vision in a calm and refreshing sleep.

CHAPTER IX.

M E T I N G S.

Of all the Roman hills, the most distinctly traceable on every side is undoubtedly the Palatine. Augustus having chosen it for his residence, successive emperors followed his example; but gradually transformed his modest residence into a palace, which covered the entire hill. Nero, not satisfied with its dimensions, destroyed the neighborhood by fire, and then extended the imperial residence to the neighboring Esquiline, taking in the whole space now occupied between the two hills by the Coliseum. Vespasian threw down that "golden house," of which the magnificent vaults remain, covered with beautiful paintings; and built the amphitheatre just mentioned, and other edifices, with its materials. The entrance to the palace was made soon after this period, from the Via Sacra or Sacred Way, close to the arch of Titus. After passing through a vestibule, the visitor found himself in a magnificent court, the plan of which can be distinctly traced. Turning from this, on the left side, he entered into an immense square space, arranged and consecrated to Adonis by Domitian, and planted with trees, shrubs and flowers.

* A famous sorceress in Augustus's age.
† The worship of interior Africa.

Still keeping to the left, you would enter into sets of chambers, constructed by Alexander Severus in honor of his mother, Mammaea, whose name they bore. They looked out opposite to the Cœlian hill, just at the angle of it, which abuts upon the later triumphal arch of Constantine, and the fountain called the Meta Sudans.* Here was the apartment occupied by Sebastian as a tribune, or superior officer of the imperial guard. It consisted of a few rooms, most modestly furnished, as became a soldier and a Christian. His household was limited to a couple of freedmen, and a venerable matron, who had been his nurse, and loved him as a child. They were Christians, as were all the men in his cohort; partly by conversion, but chiefly by care in recruiting new soldiers.

It was a few evenings after the scenes described in the last chapter, that Sebastian, a couple of hours after dark, ascended the steps of the vestibule just described, in company with another youth, of whom we have already spoken. Pancratius admired and loved Sebastian with the sort of affection that an ardent young officer may be supposed to bear towards an older and gallant soldier, who receives him into his friendship. But it was not as to a soldier of Cæsar, but as to a champion of Christ, that the civilian boy looked up to the young tribune, whose generosity, noble-mindedness and valor were enshrouded in such a gentle, simple bearing, and were accompanied by such prudence and considerateness, as gave confidence and encouragement to all that dealt with him. And Sebastian loved Pancratius no less, on account of his single-hearted ardor, and the innocence and candor of his mind. But he well saw the dangers to which his youthful warmth and impetuosity might lead him; and he encouraged him to keep close to himself, that he might guide and perhaps sometimes restrain him.

As they were entering the palace, that part of which Sebastian's cohort guarded, he said to his companion, "Every time that I enter here, it strikes me how kind an act of Divine Providence it was, to plant almost at the very gate of Cæsar's palace, the arch which commemorates at once the downfall of the first great system that was antagonistic to Christianity, and the completion of the greatest prophecy of the Gospel—the destruction of Jerusalem by the Roman power.† I cannot but believe that another arch will one day arise to commemorate no less a victory over the second enemy of our religion, the heathen Roman empire itself."

"What! do you contemplate the overthrow of this vast empire, as the means of establishing Christianity?"

"God forbid! I would shed the last drop of my blood, as I shed my first, to maintain it. And depend upon it, when the empire is converted, it will not be by such gradual growth as we now witness, but by some means so unhuman, so divine, as we shall never, in our most sanguine longings, forecast; but all will exclaim: 'This is the change of the right hand of the Most High!'"

"No doubt; but your idea of a Christian triumphal arch supposes an earthly instrument; where do you imagine this to lie?"

"Why, Pancratius, my thoughts, I own, turn towards the family of one of the Augusti, as showing a slight germ of better thoughts: I mean Constantius Chlorus."

"But, Sebastian, how many of even our learned and good men will say, nay do say, if you speak thus to them, that similar hopes were entertained in the reigns of Alexander, Gordian, or Aurelian; yet ended in disappointment. Why, they ask, should we not expect the same results now?"

"I know it too well, my dear Pancratius, and bitterly have I often deplored those dark views which damp our energies; that lurking thought that vengeance is perpetual, and mercy temporary, that martyr's blood and virgin's prayer have no

* "The sweating goal." It was an obelisk of brick (which yet remains), cased with marble, from the top of which issued water, and flowed down like a sheet of glass, all round it, into a basin on the ground.

† The triumphal arch of Titus, on which are represented the spoils of the Temple.

power even to shorten times of visitation, and hasten hours of grace."

By this time they had reached Sebastian's apartment, the principal room of which was lighted and evidently prepared for some assembly. But opposite the door was a window open to the ground, and leading to a terrace that ran along that side of the building. The night looked so bright through it that they both instinctively walked across the room and stood upon the terrace. A lovely and splendid view presented itself to them. The moon was high in the heavens, swimming in them, as an Italian moon does; a round, full globe, not a flat surface, bathed all round in its own refulgent atmosphere. It dimmed indeed the stars near itself, but they seemed to have retired, in thicker and more brilliant clusters, into the distant corners of the azure sky. It was just such an evening as, years after, Monica and Augustine enjoyed from a window at Ostia, as they discoursed of heavenly things.

It is true, that below and around all was beautiful and grand. The Coliseum, or Flavian amphitheatre, rose at one side, in all its completeness; and the gentle murmur of the fountain, while its waters glistened in a silvery column, like the refluxing sea-wave gliding down a slanting rock, came soothingly on the ear. On the other side, the lofty building called the Septizonium of Severus, in front, towering above the Cœlian, the sumptuous baths of Caracalla reflected from their marble walls and stately pillars the radiance of the autumn moon. But all these massive monuments of earthly glory rose unheeded before the two Christian youths, as they stood silent; the elder with his right arm around his youthful companion's neck, and resting on his shoulder. After a long pause, he took up the thread of his last discourse, and said, in a softer tone, "I was going to show you, when we stepped out here, the very spot just below our feet, where I have often fancied the triumphal arch, to which I have alluded, would stand.* But who can think of such paltry things below, with the splendid vault above us, lighted up so brilliantly, as if on purpose to draw upwards our eyes and heart?"

"True, Sebastian; and I have sometimes thought that, if the under side of that firmament up to which the eye of man, however wretched and sinful, may look, be so beautiful and bright, what must that upper side be, down upon which the eye of boundless Glory deigns to glance? I imagine it to be like a richly-embroidered veil, through the texture of which a few points of golden thread may be allowed to pass; and these only reach us. How transcendently royal must be that upper surface, on which tread the lightsome feet of angels, and of the just made perfect."

"A graceful thought, Pancratius, and no less true. It makes the veil between us laborers here and the triumphal Church above, thin and easily to be passed."

"And pardon me, Sebastian," said the youth, with the same look up to his friend, as a few evenings before had met his mother's inspired gaze, "pardon me if, while you wisely speculate upon a future arch to record the triumph of Christianity, I see already before me, built and open, the arch through which we, feeble as we are, may lead the Church speedily to the triumph of glory, and ourselves to that of bliss."

"Where, my dear boy, where do you mean?"

Pancratius pointed steadily with his hand towards the left, and said: "There, my noble Sebastian; any of those open arches of the Flavian amphitheatre, which lead to its arena; over which, not denser than the outstretched canvas which shades our spectators, is that veil of which you spoke just now. But hark!"

"That was a lion's roar from beneath the Cœlian!" exclaimed Sebastian, surprised. "Wild beasts must have arrived at the vivarium† of the amphitheatre; for I know there were none there yesterday."

"Yes, hark!" continued Pancratius, not noticing the interruption. "These are the trumpet notes that summon us; that is the music that must accompany us to our triumph!"

* The arch of Constantine stands exactly under the spot where this scene is described.

† The place where live beasts were kept for the shows.

Both paused for a time, when Pancratius again broke the silence, saying, "This puts me in mind of a matter on which I want to take your advice, my faithful counsellor; will your company be soon arriving?"

"Not immediately; and they will drop in one by one; till they assemble, come into my chamber, where none will interrupt us."

They walked along the terrace, and entered the last room of the suite. It was at the corner of the hill, exactly opposite the fountain; and was lighted only by the rays of the moon, streaming through the open window on that side. The soldier stood near this, and Pancratius sat upon his small military couch.

"What is this great affair, Pancratius," said the officer, smiling, "upon which you wish to have my sage opinion?"

"Quite a trifle, I dare say," replied the youth, bashfully, "for a bold and generous man like you; but an important one to an unskilful and weak boy like me."

"A good and virtuous one, I doubt not; do let me hear it; and I promise you every assistance."

"Well, then, Sebastian—now don't think me foolish," proceeded Pancratius, hesitating and blushing at every word. "You are aware I have a quantity of useless plate at home—mere lumber, you know, in our plain way of living; and my dear mother, for anything I can say, won't wear the lots of old-fashioned trinkets, which are lying locked up, and of no use to anybody. I have no one to whom all this should descend. I am, and shall be, the last of my race. You have often told me, who in that case are a Christian's natural heirs,—the widow and the fatherless, the helpless and the indigent. Why should these wait my death, to have what by reversion is theirs? And if a persecution is coming, why run the risk of confiscation seizing them, or of plundering lictors stealing them, whenever our lives are wanted, to the utter loss of our rightful heirs?"

"Pancratius," said Sebastian, "I have listened without offering a remark to your noble suggestion. I wished you to have all the merit of uttering it yourself. Now, just tell me, what makes you doubt or hesitate about what I know you wish to do?"

"Why, to tell the truth, I feared it might be highly presumptuous and impertinent in one of my age to offer to do what people would be sure to imagine was something grand or generous; while I assure you, dear Sebastian, it is no such thing. For I shall not miss these things a bit; they are of no value to me whatever. But they will be to the poor, especially in the hard times coming."

"Of course Lucina consents?"

"Oh, no fear about that! I would not touch a grain of gold-dust without her even wishing it. But why I require your assistance is principally this. I should never be able to stand its being known that I presumed to do anything considered out of the way, especially in a boy. You understand me? So I want you, and beg of you, to get the distribution made at some other house; and as from a—say from one who needs much the prayers of the faithful, especially the poor, and desires to remain unknown."

"I will serve you with delight, my good and truly noble boy! Hush, did you not hear the Lady Fabiola's name just mentioned? There again, and with an epithet expressive of no good will."

Pancratius approached the window; two voices were conversing together so close under them that the cornice between them prevented their seeing the speakers, evidently a woman and a man. After a few minutes they walked out into the moonlight, almost as bright as day.

"I know that Moorish woman," said Sebastian; "it is Fabiola's black slave, Afra."

"And the man," added Pancratius, "is my late school-fellow, Corvinus."

They considered it their duty to catch, if possible, the thread of what seemed a plot; but, as the speakers walked up and down, they could only make out a sentence here and there. We will not, however, confine ourselves to these parts, but give the entire dialogue. Only, a word first about the interlocutors.

Of the slave we know enough for the present. Corvinus was son, as we have said, to Tertullus, originally prefect of the Prætorium. This office, unknown in the republic, and of imperial creation, had, from the reign of Tiberius, gradually absorbed almost all civil as well as military power; and he who held it often discharged the duties of chief criminal judge in Rome. It required no little strength of nerve to occupy this post to the satisfaction of despotic and unsparing masters. To sit all day in a tribunal, surrounded with hideous implements of torture, unmoved by the moans or the shrieks of old men, youths, or women, on whom they were tried; to direct a cool interrogatory to one stretched upon the rack, and quivering in agony on one side, while the last sentence of beating to death with bullet-laden scourges was being executed on the other; to sleep calmly after such scenes, and rise with appetite for their repetition, was not an occupation to which every member of the bar could be supposed to aspire. Tertullus had been brought from Sicily to fill the office, not because he was a cruel, but because he was a cold-hearted man, not susceptible of pity or partiality. His tribunal, however, was Corvinus's early school; he could sit, while quite a boy, for hours at his father's feet, thoroughly enjoying the cruel spectacles before him, and angry when any one got off. He grew up sottish, coarse, and brutal; and not yet arrived at man's estate, his bloated and freckled countenance and blear eyes, one of which was half closed, announced him to be already a dissolute and dissipated character. Without taste for anything refined, or ability for any learning, he united in himself a certain amount of animal courage and strength, and a considerable measure of low cunning. He had never experienced in himself a generous feeling, and he had never curbed an evil passion. No one had ever offended him, whom he did not hate, and pursue with vengeance. Two, above all, he had sworn never to forgive—the schoolmaster who had often chastised him for his sulky idleness, and the schoolfellow who had blessed him for his brutal contumely. Justice and mercy, good and evil done to him, were equally odious to him.

Tertullus had no fortune to give him, and he seemed to have little genius to make one. To become possessed of one, however, was all-important to his mind; for wealth, as the means of gratifying his desires, was synonymous with him to supreme felicity. A rich heiress, or rather her dower, seemed the object at which to aim. Too awkward, shy, and stupid to make himself a way in society, he sought other means, more kindred to his mind, for the attainment of his ambitious or avaricious desires. What these means were, his conversation with the black slave will best explain.

"I have come to meet you at the Meta Sudans again, for the fourth time, at this inconvenient hour. What news have you for me?"

"None, except that after to-morrow my mistress starts for her villa at Cajeta,* and of course I go with her. I shall want more money to carry on my operations in your favor."

"More still? You have had all I received from my father for months."

"Why, do you know what Fabiola is?"

"Yes, to be sure, the richest match in Rome."

"The haughty and cold-hearted Fabiola is not so easily to be won."

"But yet you promised me that your charms and potions would secure me her acceptance, at any rate her fortune. What expense can these things cause?"

"Very great indeed. The most precious ingredients are requisite, and must be paid for. And do you think I will go out at such an hour as this amidst the tombs of the Appian way, to gather my simples, without being properly rewarded? But how do you mean to second my efforts? I have told you this would hasten their success."

*Cajeta.

"And how can I? You know I am not cut out by nature, or fitted by accomplishments, to make much impression on any one's affections. I would rather trust to the power of your black art."

"Then let me give you one piece of advice; if you have no grace or gift by which you can gain Fabiola's heart——"

"Fortune, you mean."

"They cannot be separated;—depend upon it, there is one thing which you may bring with you that is irresistible."

"What is that?"

"Gold."

"And where am I to get it? it is that I seek."

The black slave smiled maliciously, and said:

"Why cannot you get it as Fulvius does?"

"How does he get it?"

"By blood!"

"How do you know it?"

"I have made acquaintance with an old attendant that he has, who, if not as dark as I am in skin, fully makes up for it in his heart. His language and mine are sufficiently allied for us to be able to converse. He has asked me many questions about poisons, and pretended he would purchase my liberty, and take me back home as his wife; but I have something better than that in prospect, I trust. However, I got all that I wanted out from him."

"And what was that?"

"Why, that Fulvius had discovered a great conspiracy against Dioclesian; and from the wink of the old man's awful eye, I understood he had hatched it first: and he had been sent with strong recommendations to Rome to be employed in the same line."

"But I have no ability either to make or to discover conspiracies, though I may have to punish them."

"One way, however, is easy."

"What is that?"

"In my country there are large birds, which you may attempt in vain to run down with the fleetest horses; but which, if you look about for them quietly, are the first to betray themselves, for they only hide their heads."

"What do you wish to represent by this?"

"The Christians. Is there not going to be a persecution of them soon?"

"Yes, and a most fierce one; such as has never been before."

"Then follow my advice. Do not tire yourself with hunting them down, and catching, after all, but mean prey; keep your eyes open and look about for one or two good fat ones, half trying to conceal themselves; pounce upon them, get a good share of their confiscation, and come with one good handful to get two in return."

"Thank you, thank you; I understand you. You are not fond of these Christians, then?"

"Fond of them? I hate the entire race. The spirits which I worship are the deadly enemies of their very name." And she grinned horrible a ghastly smile as she proceeded: "I suspect one of my fellow-servants is one. Oh, how I detest her!"

"What makes you think it?"

"In the first place, she would not tell a lie for any thing, and gets us all into dreadful scrapes by her absurd truthfulness."

"Good! what next?"

"Then she cares not for money or gifts; and so prevents our having them offered."

"Better!"

"And, moreover, she is——" the last word died in the ear of Corvinus, who replied:

"Well, indeed, I have to-day been out of the gate to meet a caravan of your countryfolk coming in; but you beat them all!"

"Indeed!" exclaimed Afra, with delight, "who were they?"

"Simply Africans,"* replied Corvinus, with a laugh, "lions, panthers, leopards."

"Wretch! do you insult me thus?"

"Come, come, be pacified. They are brought expressly to rid you of your hateful Christians: Let us part friends. Here is your money. But let it be the last; and let me know when the philtres begin to work. I will not forget your hint about Christian money. It is quite to my taste."

As he departed by the Sacred Way, she pretended to go along the Carinae, the street between the Palatine and the Cælian mounts; then turned back, and looking after him, exclaimed: "Fool! to think that I am going to try experiments for you on a person of Fabiola's character!"

She followed him at a distance; but as Sebastian, to his amazement, thought, turned into the vestibule of the palace. He determined at once to put Fabiola on her guard against this new plot; but this could not be done till her return from the country.

CHAPTER X.

OTHER MEETINGS.

WHEN the two youths returned to the room by which they had entered the apartment, they found the expected company assembled. A frugal repast was laid upon the table, principally as a blind to any intruder who might happen unexpectedly to enter. The assembly was large and varied, containing clergy and laity, men and women. The purpose of the meeting was to concert proper measures, in consequence of something which had lately occurred in the palace. This we must briefly explain.

Sebastian, enjoying the unbounded confidence of the emperor, employed all his influence in propagating the Christian faith within the palace. Numerous conversions had gradually been made; but shortly before this period there had been a wholesale one effected, the particulars of which are recorded in the genuine acts of this glorious soldier. In virtue of former laws many Christians were seized and brought to trial, which often ended in death. Two brothers, Marcus and Marcellianus, had been so accused, and were expecting execution; when their friends, admitted to see them, implored them with tears to save their lives by apostasy. They seemed to waver; they promised to deliberate. Sebastian heard of this, and rushed to save them. He was too well known to be refused admittance, and he entered into their gloomy prison like an angel of light. It consisted of a strong room in the house of the magistrate to whose care they had been entrusted. The place of confinement was generally left to that officer; and here Tranquillinus, the father of the two youths, had obtained a respite for them of thirty days to try to shake their constancy; and, to second his efforts, Nicostratus, the magistrate, had placed them in custody in his own house. Sebastian's was a bold and perilous office. Besides the two Christian captives, there were gathered in the place sixteen heathen prisoners; there were the parents of the unfortunate youths weeping over them, and caressing them, to allure them from their threatened doom; there was the gaoler, Claudius, and there was the magistrate, Nicostratus, with his wife, Zoë, drawn thither by the compassionate wish of seeing the youths snatched from their fate. Could Sebastian hope that of this crowd not one would be found whom a sense of official duty, or a hope of pardon, or hatred of Christianity, might impel to betray him if he avowed himself a Christian? And did he not know that such a betrayal involved his death?

He knew it well; but what cared he? If three victims would thus be offered to God instead of two, so much the better; all that he dreaded was, that there should be none. The room was a banqueting-hall, but seldom opened in the day, and consequently requiring very little light; what it had entered only, as in the Pantheon, by an opening in the roof; and Sebastian, anxious to be seen by all, stood in the ray which now darted through it, strong and brilliant where it beat, but leaving the rest of the apartment almost dark. It broke against the gold and jewels of his rich tribune's armor, and, as he moved, scattered itself in sparks of brilliant hues into the darkest recesses of that gloom; while it beamed with serene steadiness upon his uncovered head, and displayed his noble features, softened by an emotion of tender grief, as he looked upon the two vacillating confessors. It was some moments before he could give vent in words to the violence of his grief, till at length it broke forth in impassioned tones.

* The generic name for the wild beasts of that continent, as opposed to bears and others from the north.

"Holy and venerable brothers," he exclaimed, "who have borne witness to Christ; who are imprisoned for Him; whose limbs are marked by chains worn for His sake; who have tasted torments with Him,—I ought to fall at your feet and do you homage, and ask your prayers, instead of standing before you as your exhorter, still less as your reprover. Can this be true which I have heard, that while angels were putting the last flower to your crowns, you have bid them pause, and even thought of telling them to unweave them, and scatter their blossoms to the winds? Can I believe that you who have already your feet on the threshold of paradise, are thinking of drawing them back, to tread once more the valley of exile and of tears?"

The two youths hung down their heads and wept in humble confession of their weakness. Sebastian proceeded:

"You cannot meet the eye of a poor soldier like me, the least of Christ's servants: how then will you stand the angry glance of the Lord, whom you are about to deny before men (but cannot in your hearts deny), on that terrible day, when He, in return, will deny you before His angels? When, instead of standing manfully before Him, like good and faithful servants, as to-morrow ye might have done, you shall have to come into His presence after having crawled through a few more years of infamy, disowned by the Church, despised by its enemies, and, what is worse, gnawed by an undying worm, and victims of a sleepless remorse?"

"Cease; oh, in pity cease, young man, whoever thou art," exclaimed Tranquillinus, the father of the youths. "Speak not thus severely to my sons: it was, I assure thee, to their mother's tears and to my entreaties that they had begun to yield, and not to the tortures which they have endured with such fortitude. Why should they leave their wretched parents to misery and sorrow? Does thy religion command this, and dost thou call it holy?"

"Wait in patience, my good old man," said Sebastian, with the kindest look and accent, "and let me speak first with thy sons. They know what I mean, which thou canst not yet; but with God's grace, thou too shalt soon. Your father, indeed, is right in saying that for his sake and your mother's you have been deliberating whether you should not prefer them to Him who told you 'He that loveth father or mother more than Me, is not worthy of Me.' You cannot hope to purchase for these your aged parents eternal life by your own loss of it. Will you make them Christians by abandoning Christianity? Will you make them soldiers of the Cross by deserting its standard? Will you teach them that its doctrines are more precious than life, by preferring life to them? Do you want to gain for them, not the mortal life of the perishable body, but the eternal life of the soul? Then hasten yourselves to its acquisition; throw down at the feet of your Saviour the crowns you will receive, and entreat for your parents' salvation."

"Enough, enough, Sebastian, we are resolved," cried out together both the brothers.

"Claudius," said one, "put on me again the chains you have taken off."

"Nicostratus," added the other, "give orders for the sentence to be carried out."

Yet neither Claudius nor Nicostratus moved.

"Farewell, dear father; adieu, dearest mother," they in turns said, embracing their parents,

"No," replied the father, "we part no more. Nicostratus, go tell Chromatius that I am from this moment a Christian with my sons; I will die with them for a religion which can make heroes thus of boys." "And I," continued the mother, "will not be separated from my husband and children."

The scene which followed baffles description. All were moved; all wept; the prisoners joined in the tumult of these new affections; and Sebastian saw himself surrounded by a group of men and women smitten by grace, softened by its influences, and subdued by its power; yet all was lost if one remained behind. He saw the danger, not to himself, but to the Church, if a sudden discovery were made, and those souls fluttering upon the confines of life. Some hung upon his arms; some clasped his knees; some kissed his feet, as though he had been a spirit of peace, such as visited Peter in his dungeon at Jerusalem.

Two alone had expressed no thought. Nicostratus was indeed moved, but by no means conquered. His feelings were agitated, but his convictions unshaken. His wife, Zoë, knelt before Sebastian with a beseeching look and outstretched arms, but she spoke not a word.

"Come, Sebastian," said the keeper of the records, for such was Nicostratus's office; "it is time for thee to depart. I cannot but admire the sincerity of belief, and the generosity of heart, which can make thee act as thou hast done, and which impel these young men to death; but my duty is imperative, and must overweigh my private feelings."

"And dost not thou believe with the rest?"

"No, Sebastian, I yield not so easily; I must have stronger evidences than even thy virtue."

"Oh, speak to him then, thou!" said Sebastian to Zoë; "speak, faithful wife; speak to thy husband's heart; for I am mistaken indeed, if those looks of thine tell me not that thou at least believest."

Zoë covered her face with her hands, and burst into a passion of tears.

"Thou hast touched her to the quick, Sebastian," said her husband; "knowest thou not that she is dumb?"

"I knew it not, noble Nicostratus; for when last I saw her in Asia she could speak."

"For six years," replied the other, with a faltering voice, "her once eloquent tongue has been paralyzed, and she has not uttered a single word."

Sebastian was silent for a moment; then suddenly he threw out his arms, and stretched them forth, as the Christians always did in prayer, and raised his eyes to heaven; then burst forth in these words:

"O God! Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the beginning of this work is Thine; let its accomplishment be Thine alone. Put forth Thy power, for it is needed; intrust it for once to the weakest and poorest of instruments. Let me, though most unworthy, so wield the sword of Thy victorious Cross, as that the spirits of darkness may fly before it, and Thy salvation may embrace us all! Zoë look up once more to me."

All were hushed in silence, when Sebastian, after a moment's silent prayer, with his right hand made over her mouth the sign of the cross, saying: "Zoë, speak: dost thou believe?"

"I believe in the Lord Jesus Christ," she replied, in a clear and firm voice, and fell upon Sebastian's feet.

It was almost a shriek that Nicostratus uttered, as he threw himself on his knees, and bathed Sebastian's right hand with tears.

The victory was complete. Every one was gained; and immediate steps were taken to prevent discovery. The person responsible for the prisoners could take them where he wished; and Nicostratus transferred them all, with Tranquillinus and his wife, to the full liberty of his house. Sebastian lost no time in putting them under the care of the holy priest Polycarp, of the title of St. Pastor. It was a case so peculiar, and requiring such concealment, and the times were so threatening, and all new irritations had so much to be avoided, that the instruction was hurried, and continued night and day; so that baptism was quickly administered.

The new Christian flock was encouraged and consoled by a fresh wonder. Tranquillinus, who was suffering severely from the gout, was restored to instant and complete health by baptism. Chromatius was the prefect of the city, to whom Nicostratus was liable for his prisoners; and this officer could not long conceal from him what had happened. It was indeed a matter of life or death to them all; but, strengthened now by faith, they were prepared for either. Chromatius was a man of upright character, and not fond of persecution; and listened with interest to the account of what had occurred. But when he heard of Tranquillius's cure, he was greatly struck. He was himself a victim to the same disease, and suffered agonies of pain. "If," he said, "what you relate be true, and if I can have personal experience of this healing power, I certainly will not resist its evidence."

Sebastian was sent for. To have administered baptism without faith preceding, as an experiment of its healing virtue, would have been a superstition. Sebastian took another course, which will be later described, and Chromatius completely recovered. He received baptism soon after, with his son Tiburtinus.

It was clearly impossible for him to continue in his office, and he had accordingly resigned it to the emperor. Tertullus, the father of the hopeful Corvinus, and prefect of the Prætorium, had been named his successor; so the reader will perceive that the events, just related from the Acts of St. Sebastian, had occurred a little before our narrative begins; for, in an early chapter, we spoke of Corvinus's father as already prefect of the city.

Let us now come down again to the evening, in which Sebastian and Pancratius met most of the persons above enumerated in the officer's chamber. Many of them resided in, or about, the palace; and besides them were present Castulus, who held a high situation at court,* and his wife Irene. Several previous meetings had been held, to decide upon some plan for securing the completer instruction of the converts, and for withdrawing from observation so many persons, whose change of life and retirement from office would excite wonder and inquiry. Sebastian had obtained permission from the emperor for Chromatius to retire to a country-house in Campania; and it had been arranged that a considerable number of the neophytes should join him there, and, forming one household, should go on with religious instruction, and unite in common offices of piety. The season was come when everybody retired to the country, and the emperor himself was going to the coast of Naples, and thence would take a journey in southern Italy. It was therefore a favorable moment for carrying out the preconcerted plan. Indeed the Pope, we are told, on the Sunday following this conversion, celebrated the divine mysteries in the house of Nicostratus, and proposed this withdrawal from the city.

At this meeting all details were arranged; different parties were to start, in the course of the following days, by various roads—some direct by the Appian, some along the Latin, others round by Tibur and a mountain road, through Arpinum; but all were to meet at the villa, not far from Capua. Through the whole discussion of these somewhat tedious arrangements, Torquatus, one of the former prisoners, converted by Sebastian's visit, showed himself forward, impatient and impetuous. He found fault with every plan, seemed discontented with the directions given him, spoke almost contemptuously of this flight from danger, as he called it; and boasted that, for his part, he was ready to go into the Forum on the morrow, and overthrow any altar, or confront any judge, as a Christian. Everything was said and done to soothe, and even to cool him; and it was felt to be most important, that he should be taken with the rest into the country. He insisted, however, upon going his own way.

Only one more point remained to be decided: it was, who should head the little colony, and direct its operations. Here was renewed a contest of love between the holy priest Polycarp and Sebastian; each wishing to remain in Rome, and have the first chance of martyrdom. But now the difference was cut short by a letter brought in, from the Pope, addressed to his "Beloved son Polycarp, priest of the title of St. Pastor," in which he commanded him to accompany the converts, and leave Sebastian to the arduous duty of encouraging confessors, and protecting Christians in Rome. To hear was to obey; and the meeting broke up with a prayer of thanksgiving.

Sebastian, after bidding affectionate farewell to his friends, insisted upon accompanying Pancratius home. As they were leaving the room, the latter remarked, "Sebastian, I do not like that Torquatus. I fear he will give us trouble."

"To tell the truth," answered the soldier, "I would rather he were different; but we must remember, that he is a neophyte, and will improve in time, and by grace."

As they passed into the entrance-court of the palace, they heard a Babel of uncouth sounds, with coarse laughter and occasional yells, proceeding from the adjoining yard, in which were the quarters of the Mauritanian archers. A fire seemed to be blazing in the midst of it, for the smoke and sparks rose above the surrounding porticoes.

Sebastian accosted the sentinel in the court where they were, and asked: "Friend, what is going on there among our neighbors?"

"The black slave," he replied, "who is their priestess, and who is betrothed to their captain, if she can purchase her freedom, has come in for some midnight rites, and this horrid turmoil takes place every time she comes."

"Indeed!" said Pancratius, "and can you tell me what is the religion these Africans follow?"

"I do not know, sir," replied the legionary, "unless they be what are called Christians."

"What makes you think so?"

"Why, I have heard that the Christians meet by night, and sing detestable songs, and commit all sorts of crimes; and cook and eat the flesh of a child murdered for the purpose*—just what might seem to be going on here."

"Good night, comrade," said Sebastian; and then exclaimed, as they were issuing from the vestibule, "Is it not strange, Pancratius, that, in spite of all our efforts, we who are conscious that we worship the only One living God in spirit and truth, who know what care we take to keep ourselves undefiled by sin, and who would die rather than speak an unclean word, should yet, after 300 years, be confounded by the people with the followers of the most degraded superstitions, and have our worship ranked with the very idolatry, which above all things we abhor? 'How long, O Lord! how long?'"

"So long," said Pancratius, pausing on the steps outside the vestibule, and looking at the now-declining moon, "so long as we shall continue to walk in this pale light, and until the Sun of Justice shall rise upon our country in His beauty, and enrich it with His splendor. Sebastian, tell me, whence do you best like to see the sun rise?"

"The most lovely sunrise I have ever seen," replied the soldier, as if humoring his companion's fanciful question, "was from the top of the Latial mountain, † by the temple of Jupiter. The sun rose behind the mountain, and projected its huge shadow like a pyramid over the plain, and far upon the sea; then, as it rose higher, this lessened and withdrew; and every moment some new object caught the light, first the galleys and skiffs upon the water, then the shore with its dancing waves; and by degrees one white edifice after the other sparkled in the fresh beams, till at last majestic Rome itself, with its towering pinnacles, basked in the effulgence of day. It was a glorious sight, indeed; such as could not have been witnessed or imagined by those below."

"Just what I should have expected, Sebastian," observed Pancratius; "and so will it be, when that more brilliant sun rises fully upon this benighted country. How beautiful will it then be to behold the shades retiring, and each moment one and another of the charms, as yet concealed, of our holy faith and worship starting into light, till the imperial city itself shines forth a holy time of the city of God. Will they who live in those times see these beauties, and worthily value them? Or, will they look only at the narrow space around them, and hold their hands before their eyes, to shade them from the sudden glare? I know not, dear Sebastian, but I hope that you and I will look upon that grand spectacle, from where alone it can be duly appreciated, from a mountain higher than Jupiter's, be he Alban or be he Olympian,—dwelling on that holy mount, whereon stands the Lamb, from whose feet flow the streams of life.”*

* It is not mentioned what it precisely was.

* These were the popular ideas of Christian worship.
† Now Monte Cavallo, above Albano.

They continued their walk in silence through the brilliantly-lighted streets; † and when they had reached Lucina's house, and had affectionately bid one another good night, Paneratus seemed to hesitate a moment, and then said :

“Sebastian, you said something this evening, which I should much like to have explained.”

“What was it?”

“When you were contending with Polycarp, about going into Campania, or remaining in Rome, you promised that if you stayed you would be most cautious, and not expose yourself to unnecessary risks; then you added, that there was one purpose in your mind which would effectually restrain you; but when that was accomplished, you would find it difficult to check your longing ardor to give your life for Christ.”

“And why, Paneratus, do you desire so much to know this foolish thought of mine?”

“Because I own I am really curious to learn what can be the object, high enough to check you in your aspiration, after what I know you consider to be the very highest of a Christian's aim.”

“I am sorry, my dear boy, that it is not in my power to tell you now. But you shall know it sometime.”

“Do you promise me?”

“Yes, most solemnly. God bless you!”

CHAPTER XL

A TALK WITH THE READER.

WE will take advantage of the holiday which Rome is enjoying, sending out its inhabitants to the neighboring hills, or to the whole line of sea-coast from Genoa to Pæstum, for amusement on land and water: and, in a merely didactic way, endeavor to communicate to our reader some information, which may throw light on what we have already written, and prepare them for what will follow.

From the very compressed form in which the early history of the Church is generally studied, and from the unchronological arrangement of the saints' biographies, as we usually read them, we may easily be led to an erroneous idea of the state of our first Christian ancestors. This may happen in two different ways.

We may come to imagine, that during the first three centuries the Church was suffering unrespite, under active persecution; that the faithful worshipped in fear and trembling, and almost lived in the catacombs; that bare existence, with scarcely an opportunity for outward development or inward organization, none for splendor, was all that religion could enjoy; that, in fine, it was a period of conflict and of tribulation, without an interval of peace and consolation. On the other hand, we may suppose, that those three centuries were divided into epochs by ten distinct persecutions, some of longer and some of shorter duration, but definitely separated from one another by breathing times of complete rest.

Either of these views is erroneous; and we desire to state more accurately the real condition of the Christian Church, under the various circumstances of that most pregnant portion of her history.

When once persecution had broken loose upon the Church, it may be said never entirely to have relaxed its hold, till her final pacification under Constantine. An edict of persecution once issued by an emperor was seldom recalled; and though the rigor of its enforcement might gradually relax or cease, through the accession of a milder ruler, still it never became completely a dead letter, but was a dangerous weapon in the hands of a cruel or bigoted governor of a city or province. Hence, in the intervals between the greater general persecutions, ordered by a new decree, we find many martyrs who owed their crowns either to popular fury or to the hatred of Christianity in local rulers. Hence also we read of a bitter persecution being carried on in one part of the empire, while other portions enjoyed complete peace.

Perhaps a few examples of the various phases of persecution will illustrate the real relations of the primitive Church with the State, better than mere description; and the more learned reader can pass over this digression, or must have the patience to hear repeated what he is so familiar with, that it will seem commonplace.

Trajan was by no means one of the cruel emperors; on the contrary, he was habitually just and merciful. Yet, though he published no new edicts against the Christians, many noble martyrs—amongst them St. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch; at Rome, and St. Simeon at Jerusalem—glorified their Lord in his reign. Indeed, when Pliny the younger consulted him on the manner in which he should deal with Christians, who might be brought before him as governor of Bithynia, the emperor gave him a rule which exhibits the lowest standard of justice: that they were not to be sought out, but if accused, they were to be punished. Adrian, who issued no decree of persecution, gave a similar reply to a similar question from Serenius Gracianus, pro-consul of Asia. And under him, too, and even by his own orders, cruel martyrdom was suffered by the intrepid Synphorosa and her seven sons at Tibur, or Tivoli. A beautiful inscription found in the catacombs mentions Marius, a young officer, who shed his blood for Christ under this emperor.* Indeed, St. Justin Martyr, the great apologist of Christianity, informs us that he owed his conversion to the constancy of the martyrs under this emperor.

In like manner, before the Emperor Septimus Severus had published his persecuting edicts, many Christians had suffered torments and death. Such were the celebrated martyrs of Scillita in Africa, and SS. Perpetua and Felicitas, with their companions, the Acts of whose martyrdom, containing the diary of the first noble lady, twenty years of age, brought down by herself to the eve of her death, form one of the most touching and exquisitely beautiful documents preserved to us from the ancient Church.

From these historical facts it will be evident that while there was from time to time a more active, severe and general persecution of the Christian name all through the empire, there were partial and local cessations, and sometimes even a general suspension of its rigor. An occurrence of this sort has secured for us most interesting information, connected with our subject. When the persecution of Severus had relaxed in other parts, it happened that Scapula, pro-consul of Africa, prolonged it in his province with unrelenting cruelty. He had condemned, among others, Mavilus of Adrumetum to be devoured by beasts, when he was seized with a severe illness. Tertullian, the oldest Christian Latin writer, addressed a letter to him, in which he bids him take warning from this visitation, and repent of his crimes; reminding him of many judgments which had befallen cruel judges of the Christians in various parts of the world. Yet such was the charity of these holy men, that he tells him they were offering up earnest prayers for their enemy's recovery!

He then goes on to inform him that he may very well fulfil his duties without practising cruelty, by acting as other magistrates had done. For instance, Cincius Severus suggested to the accused the answers they should make, to be acquitted. Vespronius Candidus dismissed a Christian on the ground that his condemnation would encourage tumults. Asper, seeing one ready to yield upon the application of slight torments, would not press him further: and expressed regret that such a case should have been brought before him. Pudens, on reading an act of accusation, declared the title informal, because calumnious and tore it up.

* “Vidi supra montem Agnum stantem, de sub cuius pede fons vivus emanat.”—Office of St. Clement.

† Ammianus Marcellinus tells us that, at the decline of the empire, the streets at night were lighted so as to rival day. “Et hæc confidenter agebat (Gallus) ubi pernoctantium luminum claritudo dierum solet imitari fulgorem.” Lib. xiv. c. 1.

We thus see how much might depend upon the temper, and perhaps the tendencies, of governors and judges, in the enforcing even of imperial edicts of persecution. And St. Ambrose tells us that some governors boasted that they had brought back from their provinces their swords unstained with blood (incrucentos enses).

We can also easily understand how, at any particular time, a savage persecution might rage in Gaul, or Africa, or Asia, while the main part of the Church was enjoying peace. But Rome was undoubtedly the place most subject to frequent outbreaks of the hostile spirit; so that it might be considered as the privilege of its pontiffs, during the first three centuries, to bear the witness of blood to the faith which they taught. To be elected Pope was equivalent to being promoted to martyrdom.

At the period of our narrative, the Church was in one of those longer intervals of comparative peace, which gave opportunity for great development. From the death of Valerian, in 268, there had been no new formal persecution, though the interval is glorified by many noble martyrdoms. During such periods, the Christians were able to carry out their religious system with completeness, and even with splendor. The city was divided into districts or parishes, each having its title, or church, served by priests, deacons, and inferior ministers. The poor were supported, the sick visited, catechumens instructed; the Sacraments were administered, daily worship was practised, and the penitential canons were enforced by the clergy of each title; and collections were made for these purposes, and others connected with religious charity, and its consequence, hospitality.* It is recorded, that in 250, during the pontificate of Cornelius, there were in Rome forty-six priests, a hundred and fifty-four inferior ministers, who were supported by the alms of the faithful, together with fifteen hundred poor.* This number of the priests pretty nearly corresponds to that of the titles, which St. Optatus tells us there were in Rome.

Although the tombs of the martyrs in the catacombs continued to be objects of devotion in these more peaceful intervals, and these asylums of the persecuted were kept in order and repair, they did not then serve for the ordinary places of worship. The churches to which we have already alluded were often public, large, and even splendid; and heathens used to be present at the sermons delivered in them, and such portions of the liturgy as were open to catechumens. But generally they were in private houses, probably made out of the large halls, or triclinia, which the nobler mansions contained. Thus we know that many of the titles in Rome were originally of that character. Tertullian mentions Christian cemeteries under a name, and with circumstances, which show that they were above ground, for he compares them to "threshing-floors," which were necessarily exposed to the air.

A custom of ancient Roman life will remove an objection which may arise, as to how considerable multitudes could assemble in these places, without attracting attention, and consequently persecution. It was usual for what may be called a levée to be held every morning by the rich, attended by dependents, or clients, and messengers from their friends, either slaves or freedmen, some of whom were admitted into the inner court, to the master's presence, while others only presented themselves, and were dismissed. Hundreds might thus go in and out of a great house, in addition to the crowd of domestic slaves, tradespeople, and others who had access to it, through the principal or the back entrance, and little or no notice would be taken of the circumstance.

There is another important phenomenon in the social life of the early Christians, which one would hardly know how to believe, were not evidence of it brought before us in the most authentic Acts of the martyrs, and in ecclesiastical history. It is, the concealment which they contrived to practise. No doubt can be entertained, that persons were moving in the highest society, were occupying conspicuous public situations, were near the persons of the emperors, who were Christians; and yet were not suspected to be such by their most intimate heathen friends. Nay, cases occurred where the nearest relatives were kept in total ignorance on this subject. No lie, no dissembling, no action especially, inconsistent with Christian morality or Christian truth, was ever permitted to ensure such secrecy. But every precaution compatible with complete uprightness was taken to conceal Christianity from the public eye.*

However necessary this prudential course might be, to prevent any wanton persecution, its consequences fell often heavily upon those who held it. The heathen world, the world of power, of influence, and of state, the world which made laws as best suited it, and executed them, the world that loved earthly prosperity and hated faith, felt itself surrounded, filled, penetrated by a mysterious system, which spread, no one could see how, and exercised an influence derived no one knew whence. Families were startled at finding a son or daughter to have embraced this new law, with which they were not aware that they had been in contact, and which, in their heated fancies and popular views, they considered stupid, grovelling, and anti-social. Hence the hatred of Christianity was political as well as religious; the system was considered as un-Roman, as having an interest opposed to the extension and prosperity of the empire, and as obeying an unseen and spiritual power. The Christians were pronounced irreligiosi in Cæsares, "disloyal to the emperors," and that was enough. Hence their security and peace depended much upon the state of popular feeling; when any demagogue or fanatic could succeed in rousing this, neither their denial of the charges brought against them, nor their peaceful demeanor, nor the claims of civilized life, could suffice to screen them from such measure of persecution as could be safely urged against them.

After these digressive remarks, we will resume, and unite again, the broken thread of our narrative.

CHAPTER XII.

THE WOLF AND THE FOX.

THE hints of the African slave had not been thrown away upon the sordid mind of Corvinus. Her own hatred of Christianity arose from the circumstance, that a former mistress of hers had become a Christian, and had manumitted all her other slaves; but, feeling it wrong to turn so dangerous a character as Afra, or rather Jubala (her proper name), upon the world, had transferred her to another proprietor.

Corvinus had often seen Fulvius at the baths and other places of public resort, had admired and envied him, for his appearance, his dress, his conversation. But with his untoward shyness, or moroseness, he could never have found courage to address him, had he not now discovered, that though a more refined, he was not a less profound, villain than himself. Fulvius's wit and cleverness might supply the want of these qualities in his own sottish composition, while his own brute force, and unfeeling recklessness, might be valuable auxiliaries to those higher gifts. He had the young stranger in his power, by the discovery which he had made of his real character. He determined, therefore, to make an effort, and enter into an alliance with one who otherwise might prove a dangerous rival.

It was about ten days after the meeting last described, that Corvinus went to stroll in Pompey's gardens. These covered the space round his theatre, in the neighborhood of the present Piazza Farnese. A conflagration in the reign of Carinus had lately destroyed the scene, as it was called, of the edifice, and Dioclesian had repaired it with great magnificence. The gardens were distinguished from others by rows of plane-trees, which formed a delicious shade. Statues of wild beasts, fountains, and artificial brooks, profusely adorned them. While sauntering about, Corvinus caught sight of Fulvius, and made up to him.

* No domestic concealment surely could be more difficult than that of a wife's religion from her husband. Yet Tertullian supposes this to have been not uncommon. For, speaking of a married woman communicating herself at home, according to practice in those ages of persecu- tion, he says, "Let not your husband know what you taste secretly, before every other food; and if he shall know of the bread, may he not know it to be what it is called." Ad Uxor. lib. ii. c. 5. Whereas, in another place, he writes of a Catholic husband and wife giving communion to one another. De Monogamia. c. 11.

"What do you want with me?" asked the foreigner, with a look of surprise and scorn at the slovenly dress of Corvinus,

"To have a talk with you, which may turn out to your advantage—and mine."

"What can you propose to me, with the first of these recommendations? No doubt at all as to the second."

"Fulvius, I am a plain-spoken man, and have no pretensions to your cleverness and elegance; but we are both of one trade, and both consequently of one mind."

Fulvius started, and deeply colored; then said, with a contemptuous air, "What do you mean, sirrah?"

"If you double your fist," rejoined Corvinus, "to show me the fine rings on your delicate fingers, it is very well. But if you mean to threaten by it, you may as well put your hand again into the folds of your toga. It is more graceful."

"Cut this matter short, sir. Again I ask, what do you mean?"

"This, Fulvius," and he whispered into his ear, "that you are a spy and an informer."

Fulvius was staggered; then rallying, said, "What right have you to make such an odious charge against me?"

"You discovered" (with a strong emphasis) "a conspiracy in the East, and Dioeclesian—"

Fulvius stopped him, and asked, "What is your name, and who are you?"

"I am Corvinus, the son of Tertullus, prefect of the city,"

This seemed to account for all; and Fulvius said, in subdued tones, "No more here; I see friends coming. Meet me disguised at day-break to-morrow in the Patrician Street,* under the portico of the Baths of Novatus. We will talk more at leisure."

Corvinus returned home, not ill-satisfied with his first attempt at diplomacy; he procured a garment shabbier than his own from one of his father's slaves, and was at the appointed spot by the first dawn of day. He had to wait a long time, and had almost lost patience, when he saw his new friend approach.

Fulvius was well wrapped up in a large over-coat, and wore its hood over his face. He thus saluted Corvinus,

"Good morning, comrade; I fear I have kept you waiting in the cold morning air, especially as you are thinly clad."

"I own," replied Corvinus, "that I should have been tired, had I not been immensely amused and yet puzzled, by what I have been observing."

"What is that?"

"Why, from an early hour, long, I suspect, before my coming, there have been arriving here from every side, and entering into that house, by the back door in the narrow street, the rarest collection of miserable objects that you ever saw; the blind, the lame, the maimed, the decrepit, the deformed of every possible shape; while by the front door several persons have entered, evidently of a different class."

"Whose dwelling is it, do you know? It looks a large old house, but rather out of condition."

"It belongs to a very rich, and, it is said, very miserly old patrician. But look! there come some more."

At that moment a rary feeble man, bent down by age, was approaching, supported by a young and cheerful girl, who chatted most kindly to him as she supported him.

"We are just there," she said to him; "a few more steps, and you shall sit down and rest."

"Thank you, my child," replied the poor old man; "how kind of you to come for me so early!"

"I knew," she said, "you would want help; and as I am the most useless person about, I thought I would go and fetch you."

"I have always heard that blind people are selfish, and it seems but natural; but you, Cæcilia, are certainly an exception."

"Not at all; this is only my way of showing selfishness."

"How do you mean?"

"Why, first, I get the advantage of your eyes, and then I get the satisfaction of supporting you. 'I was an eye to the blind,' that is you; and 'a foot to the lame,' that is myself."*

They reached the door as she spoke these words.

"That girl is blind," said Fulvius to Corvinus. "Do you not see how straight she walks, without looking right or left?"

"So she is," answered the other. "Surely this is not the place so often spoken of, where beggars meet, and the blind see, and the lame walk, and all feast together? But yet I observed these people were so different from the mendicants on the Arician bridge.† They appeared respectable and even cheerful; and not one asked me for alms as he passed."

"It is very strange; and I should like to discover the mystery. A good job might, perhaps, be got out of it. The old patrician, you say, is very rich?"

"Immensely!"

"Humph! How could one manage to get in?"

"I have it! I will take off my shoes, screw up one leg like a cripple, and join the next group of queer ones that come, and go boldly in, doing as they do."

"That will hardly succeed; depend upon it every one of these people is known at the house."

"I am sure not, for several of them asked me if this was the house of the Lady Agnes."

"Of whom?" asked Fulvius, with a start.

"Why do you look so?" said Corvinus. "It is the house of her parents; but she is better known than they, as being a young heiress, nearly as rich as her cousin Fabiola."

Fulvius paused for a moment; a strong suspicion, too subtle and important to be communicated to this rude companion, flashed through his mind. He said, therefore, to Corvinus.

"If you are sure these people are not familiar at the house, try your plan. I have met the lady before, and will venture by the front door. Thus we shall have a double chance."

"Do you know what I am thinking, Fulvius?"

"Something very bright, no doubt."

"That when you and I join in any enterprise, we shall always have two chances."

"What are they?"

"The fox's and the wolf's, when they conspire to rob a fold."

Fulvius cast on him a look of disdain, which Corvinus returned by a hideous leer; and they separated for their respective posts.

CHAPTER XIII.

CHARITY.

As we do not choose to enter the house of Agnes, either with the wolf or with the fox, we will take a more spiritual mode of doing so, and find ourselves at once inside.

The parents of Agnes represented noble lines of ancestry, and her family was not one of recent conversion, but had for several generations professed the faith. As in heathen families was cherished the memory of ancestors who had won a triumph, or held high offices in the state, so in this, and other Christian houses, was preserved with pious reverence and affectionate pride, the remembrance of those relations who had, in the last hundred and fifty years or more, borne the palm of martyrdom, or occupied the sublimer dignities of the Church. But, though ennobled thus, and with a constant stream of blood poured forth for Christ, accompanying the waving branches of the family-tree, the stem had never been hewn down, but had survived repeated storms. This may appear surprising; but when we reflect how many a soldier goes through a whole * Job xxix. 15.

† The place most noted in the neighborhood of Rome for whining and importunate beggars campaign of frequent actions, and does not receive a wound; or how many a family remains untainted through a plague, we cannot be surprised if Providence watched over the well-being of the Church, by preserving in it, through old family successions, long unbroken chains of tradition, and so enabling the faithful to say: "Unless the Lord of Hosts had left us seed, we had been as Sodom, and we should have been like to Gomorrah."*

All the honors and the hopes of this family centred now in one, whose name is already known to our readers, Agnes, the only child of that ancient house. Given to her parents as they had reached the very verge of hope that their line could be continued, she had been from infancy blest with such a sweetness of disposition, such a docility and intelligence of mind, and such simplicity and innocence of character, that she had grown up the common object of love, and almost of reverence, to the entire house, from her parents down to the lowest servant. Yet nothing seemed to spoil, or warp, the compact virtuousness of her nature; but her good qualities expanded, with a well-balanced adjustment, which at the early age in which we find her, had ripened into combined grace and wisdom. She shared all her parents' virtuous thoughts, and cared as little for the world as they. She lived with them in a small portion of the mansion, which was fitted up with elegance, though not with luxury; and their establishment was adequate to all their wants. Here they received the few friends with whom they preserved familiar relations; though, as they did not entertain, nor go out, these were few. Fabiola was an occasional visitor, though Agnes preferred going to see her at her house; and she often expressed to her young friend her longing for the day, when, meeting with a suitable match, she would re-embellish and open all the splendid dwelling. For, notwithstanding the Voconian law "on the inheritance of women,"† now quite obsolete, Agnes had received, from collateral sources, large personal additions to the family property.

In general, of course, the heathen world, who visited, attributed appearances to avarice, and calculated what immense accumulations of wealth the miserly parents must be putting by; and concluded, that all beyond the solid screen which shut up the second court, was left to fall into decay and ruin.

It was not so, however. The inner part of the house, consisting of a large court, and the garden, with a detached dining-hall, or triclinium, turned into a church, and the upper portion of the house, accessible from those parts, were devoted to the administration of that copious charity, which the church carried on as a business of its life. It was under the care and direction of the deacon Reparatus, and his exorcist Secundus, officially appointed by the supreme Pontiff to take care of the sick, poor, and strangers, in one of the seven regions into which Pope Cajus, about five years before, had divided the city for this purpose; committing each region to one of the seven deacons of the Roman Church.

Rooms were set apart for lodging strangers who came from a distance, recommended by other churches; and a frugal table was provided for them. Upstairs were apartments for an hospital for the bed-ridden, the decrepit, and the sick, under the care of the deaconesses, and such of the faithful as loved to assist in this work of charity. It was here that the blind girl had her cell, though she refused to take her food, as we have seen, in the house. The tablinum, or muniment-room, which generally stood detached in the middle of the passage between the inner courts, served as the office and archives for transacting the business of this charitable establishment, and preserving all local documents, such as the acts of martyrs, procured or compiled by one of the seven notaries, kept for that purpose, by institution of St. Clement I., who was attached to that region,

A door of communication allowed the household to assist in these works of charity; and Agnes had been accustomed from childhood to run in and out, many times a day, and to pass hours there; always beaming, like an angel of light, consolation, and joy on the suffering and distressed. This house, then, might be called the almshouse of the region, or district, of charity and hospitality in which it was situated, and it was accessible for these purposes through the posticum or back-door, situated in a narrow lane little frequented. No wonder that, with such an establishment, the fortunes of the inmates should find an easy application.

We heard Pancratius request Sebastian to arrange for the distribution of his plate and jewels among the poor, without its being known to whom they belonged. He had not lost sight of the commission, and had fixed on the house of Agnes as the fittest for this purpose. On the morning which we have described, the distribution had to take place; other regions had sent their poor, accompanied by their deacons; while Sebastian, Pancratius, and other persons of higher rank had come in through the front door, to assist in the division. Some of these had been seen to enter by Corvinus.

CHAPTER XIV.

EXTREMES MEET.

A GROUP of poor coming opportunely towards the door enabled Corvinus to tack himself to them—an admirable counterfeited in all but the modesty of their deportment. He kept sufficiently close to them to hear that each of them, as he entered in, pronounced the words, "Deo gratias" ("Thanks be to God"). This was not merely a Christian, but a Catholic pass-word; for St. Augustine tells us that heretics ridiculed Catholics for using it, on the ground that it was not a salutation, but rather a reply; but that Catholics employed it, because consecrated by pious usage. It is yet heard in Italy on similar occasions.

Corvinus pronounced the mystic words, and was allowed to pass. Following the others closely, and copying their manners and gestures, he found himself in the inner court of the house, which was already filled with the poor and infirm. The men were ranged on one side, the women on the other. Under the portico at the end were tables piled with costly plate, and near them was another covered with brilliant jewelry. Two silver and gold smiths were weighing and valuing most conscientiously this property; and beside them was the money which they would give, to be distributed amongst the poor in just proportion.

Corvinus eyed all this with a gluttonous heart. He would have given anything to get it all, and almost thought of making a dash at something, and running out. But he saw at once the folly or madness of such a course, and resolved to wait for a share, and in the meantime take note for Fulvius of all he saw. He soon, however, became aware of the awkwardness of his present position. While the poor were all mixed up together and moving about, he remained unnoticed. But he soon saw several young men of peculiarly gentle manners, but active, and evidently in authority, dressed in the garment known to him by the name of Dalmatic, from its Dalmatian origin; that is, having over the tunic, instead of the toga, a close-fitting shorter tunic, with ample, but not over long or wide, sleeves; the dress adopted and worn by the deacons, not only at their more solemn ministrations in church, but also when engaged in the discharge of their secondary duties about the sick and poor.

These officers went on marshalling the attendants, each evidently knowing those of his own district, and conducting them to a peculiar spot within the porticoes. But as no one recognized or claimed Corvinus for one of his poor, he was at length left alone in the middle of the court. Even his dull mind could feel the anomalous situation into which he had thrust himself. Here he was, the son of the prefect of the city, whose duty it was to punish such violators of domestic rights, an intruder into the innermost parts of a nobleman's house, having entered by a cheat, dressed like a beggar, and associating himself with such people, of course for some sinister, or at least unlawful, purpose. He looked towards the door, meditating an escape; but he saw it guarded by an old man named Diogenes and his two stout sons, who could hardly restrain their hot blood at this insolence, though they only showed it by scowling looks and repressive biting of their lips. He saw that he was a subject of consultation among the young deacons, who cast occasional glances towards him; he imagined that even the blind were staring at him, and the decrepit ready to wield their crutches like battle-axes against him. He had only one consolation; it was evident he was not known, and he hoped to frame some excuse for getting out of the scrape.

* Is. 1. 9.

† "Ne quis hæredem virginem neque mulierem faceret," that no one should leave a virgin or a woman his heir.—Cicero in Verem, l.

At length the Deacon Reparatus came up to him, and, thus courteously accosted him:

"Friend, you probably do not belong to one of the regions invited here to-day. Where do you live?"

"In the region of the Alta Semita."*

The answer gave the civil, not the ecclesiastical, division of Rome; still Reparatus went on: "The Alta Semita is in my region, yet I do not remember to have seen you."

While he spoke these words, he was astonished to see the stranger turn deadly pale, and totter as if about to fall, while his eyes were fixed upon the door of communication with the dwelling-house. Reparatus looked in the same direction, and saw Pancratius, just entered, and gathering some hasty information from Secundus. Corvinus's last hope was gone. He stood the next moment confronted with the youth (who asked Reparatus to retire), much in the same position as they had last met, only that, instead of a circle around him of applauders and backers, he was hemmed in on all sides by a multitude who evidently looked with preference upon his rival. Nor could Corvinus help observing the graceful development and manly bearing, which a few weeks had given his late school-mate. He expected a volley of keen reproach, and, perhaps, such chastisement as he would himself have inflicted under similar circumstances. What was his amazement when Pancratius thus addressed him in the mildest tone:

"Corvinus, are you really reduced to distress and lamed by some accident?" Or how have you left your father's house?"

"Not quite come to that yet, I hope," replied the bully, encouraged to insolence by the gentle address, "though, no doubt, you would be heartily glad to see it."

"By no means, I assure you; I hold you no grudge. If, therefore, you require relief, tell me; and though it is not right that you should be here, I can take you into a private chamber where you can receive it unknown."

"Then I will tell you the truth: I came in here merely for a freak; and I should be glad if you could get me quietly out."

"Corvinus," said the youth, with some sternness, "this is a serious offence. What would your father say, if I desired these young men, who would instantly obey, to take you as you are, barefoot, clothed as a slave, counterfeiting a cripple, into the Forum before his tribunal, and publicly charge you with what every Roman would resent, forcing your way into the heart of a patrician's house."

"For the gods' sakes, good Pancratius, do not inflict such frightful punishment."

"You know, Corvinus, that your own father would be obliged to act towards you the part of Junius Brutus, or forfeit his office."

"I entreat you by all that you love, by all that you hold sacred, not to dishonor me and mine so cruelly. My father and his house, not I, would be crushed and ruined forever. I will go on my knees and beg your pardon for my former injuries, if you will only be merciful."

"Hold, hold, Corvinus, I have told you that was long forgotten. But hear me now. Every one but the blind around you is a witness to this outrage. There will be a hundred evidences to prove it. If ever, then, you speak of this assembly, still more if you attempt to molest any one for it, we shall have it in our power to bring you to trial at your own father's judgment-seat. Do you understand me, Corvinus?"

"I do, indeed," replied the captive in a whining tone. "Never, as long as I live, will I breathe to mortal soul that I came into this dreadful place. I swear it by the—"

"Hush, hush! we want no such oaths here. Take my arm and walk with me." Then turning to the others, he continued: "I know this person; his coming here is quite a mistake."

The spectators, who had taken the wretch's supplicating gestures and tone for accompaniments to a tale of woe, and strong application for relief, joined in crying out, "Pancratius, you will not send him away fasting and unsuccessful?"

"Leave that to me," was the reply. The self-appointed porters gave way before Pancratius, who led Corvinus, still pretending to limp, into the street, and dismissed him, saying: "Corvinus, we are now quits; only, take care of your promise."

Fulvius, as we have seen, went to try his fortune by the front door. He found it, according to Roman custom, unlocked; and, indeed, no one could have suspected the possibility of a stranger entering at such an hour. Instead of a porter, he found guarding the door only a simple-looking girl about twelve or thirteen years of age, clad in a peasant's garment. No one else was near, and he thought it an excellent opportunity to verify the strong suspicion which had crossed his mind. Accordingly, he thus addressed the little portress:

"What is your name, child, and who are you?"

"I am," she replied, "Emerentiana, the Lady Agnes's foster sister."

"Are you a Christian?" he asked her sharply.

The poor little peasant opened her eyes in the amazement of ignorance, and replied, "No, sir." It was impossible to resist the evidence of her simplicity; and Fulvius was satisfied that he was mistaken. The fact was that she was the daughter of a peasant who had been Agnes's nurse. The mother had just died, and her kind sister had sent for the orphan daughter, intending to have her instructed and baptized. She had only arrived a day or two before, and was yet totally ignorant of Christianity.

Fulvius stood embarrassed what to do next. Solitude made him feel as awkwardly situated as a crowd was making Corvinus. He thought of retreating, but this would have destroyed all his hopes; he was going to advance, when he reflected that he might commit himself unpleasantly. At this critical juncture, whom should he see coming lightly across the court but the youthful mistress of the house, all joy, all spring, all brightness and sunshine. As soon as she saw him, she stood as if to receive his errand, and he approached with his blandest smile and most courtly gesture, and thus addressed her:

"I have anticipated the usual hour at which visitors come, and I fear must appear an intruder, Lady Agnes; but I was impatient to subscribe myself as an humble client to your noble house."

"Our house," she replied, smiling, "boasts of no clients, nor do we seek them; for we have no pretensions to influence or power."

"Pardon me; with such a ruler, it possesses the highest of influences and the mightiest of powers, those which reign, without effort, over the heart as a most willing subject."

Incapable of imagining that such words could allude to herself, she replied, with artless simplicity:

"Oh, how true are your words! The Lord of this house is indeed the sovereign over the affections of all within it."

"But I," interposed Fulvius, "allude to that softer and benignant dominion, which graceful charms alone can exercise on those who from near behold them."

Agnes looked as one entranced; her eyes beheld a very different image before them from that of her wretched flatterer; and with an impassioned glance towards heaven, she exclaimed:

"Yes, He whose beauty sun and moon in their lofty firma-mont gaze on and admire, to Him is pledged my service and love.*"

*The upper part of the Quirinal, leading to the Nomentan gate, Porta Pia.

Fulvius was confounded and perplexed. The inspired look, the rapturous attitude, the music of the thrilling tones in which she uttered these words, their mysterious import, the strangeness of the whole scene, fastened him to the spot and sealed his lips, till feeling that he was losing the most favorable opportunity he could ever expect of opening his mind (affection it could not be called) to her, he boldly said, "It is of you I am speaking; and I entreat you to believe my expression of sincerest admiration of you, and of unbounded attachment to you." As he uttered these words, he dropt on his knee and attempted to take her hand, but the maiden bounded back with a shudder, and turned away her burning countenance.

Fulvius started in an instant to his feet; for he saw Sebastian, who was come to summon Agnes to the poor, impatient of her absence, striding forwards towards him, with an air of indignation.

"Sebastian," said Agnes to him, as he approached, "be not angry; this gentleman has probably entered here by some unintentional mistake, and no doubt will quietly retire." Saying this, she withdrew.

Sebastian, with his calm but energetic manner, now addressed the intruder, who quailed beneath his look, "Fulvius, what do you here? what business has brought you?"

"I suppose," answered he, regaining courage, "that having met the lady of the house at the same place with you, her noble cousin's table, I have a right to wait upon her, in common with other voluntary clients."

"But not at so unreasonable an hour as this, I presume?"

"The hour that is not unreasonable for a young officer," retorted Fulvius insolently, "is not, I trust, so for a civilian."

Sebastian had to use all his power of self-control to check his indignation, as he replied,

"Fulvius, be not rash in what you say; but remember that two persons may be on a very different footing in a house. Yet not even the longest familiarity, still less a one dinner's acquaintance, can authorize or justify the audacity of your bearing towards the young mistress of this house, a few moments ago."

"Oh, you are jealous, I suppose, brave captain!" replied Fulvius, with his most refined sarcastic tone. "Report says that you are the acceptable, if not accepted, candidate for Fabiola's hand. She is now in the country; and, no doubt, you wish to make sure for yourself of the fortune of one or the other of Rome's richest heiresses. There is nothing like having two strings to one's bow."

This coarse and bitter sarcasm wounded the noble officer's best feelings to the quick; and had he not long before disciplined himself to Christian meekness, his blood would have proved too powerful for his reason.

"It is not good for either of us, Fulvius, that you remain longer here. The courteous dismissal of the noble lady whom you have grossly insulted has not sufficed; I must be the ruder executor of her command." Saying this, he took the unbidden guest's arm in his powerful grasp, and conducted him to the door. When he had put him outside, still holding him fast, he added, "Go now, Fulvius, in peace; and remember that you have this day made yourself amenable to the laws of the state by this unworthy conduct. I will spare you, if you know how to keep your own counsel; but it is well that you should know, that I am acquainted with your occupation in Rome; and that I hold this morning's insolence over your head, as a security that you follow it discreetly. Now, again I say, go in peace."

But he had no sooner let go his grasp, than he felt himself seized from behind by an unseen, but evidently an athletic, assailant. It was Eurotas, from whom Fulvius durst conceal nothing, and to whom he had confided the intended interview with Corvinus, that had followed and watched him. From the black slave he had before learnt the mean and coarse character of this client of her magical arts; and he feared some trap.

When he saw the seeming struggle at the door, he ran stealthily behind Sebastian, who, he fancied, must be his pupil's new ally, and pounced upon him with a bear's rude assault. But he had no common rival to deal with. He attempted in vain, though now helped by Fulvius, to throw the soldier heavily down; till, despairing of success in this way, he detached from his girdle a small but deadly weapon, a steel mace of finished Syrian make, and was raising it over the back of Sebastian's head, when he felt it wrenched in a trice from his hand, and himself twirled two or three times round, in an iron gripe, and flung flat in the middle of the street.

"I am afraid you have hurt the poor fellow, Quadratus," said Sebastian to his centurion, who was coming up at that moment to join his fellow-Christians, and was of most Herculean make and strength.

"He well deserves it, tribune, for his cowardly assault," replied the other, as they re-entered the house.

The two foreigners, crest-fallen, slunk away from the scene of their defeat; and as they turned the corner, caught a glimpse of Corvinus, no longer limping, but running as fast as his legs would carry him, from his discomfiture at the back-door. However often they may have met afterwards, neither ever alluded to their feats of that morning. Each knew that the other had incurred only failure and shame; and they came both to the conclusion, that there was one fold at least in Rome, which either fox or wolf would assail in vain.

CHAPTER XV.

CHARITY RETURNS.

WHEN calm had been restored, after this twofold disturbance, the work of the day went quietly on. Besides the distribution of greater alms, such as was made by St. Laurence, from the Church, it was by no means so uncommon in early ages, for fortunes to be given away at once, by those who wished to retire from the world.* Indeed we would naturally expect to find, that the noble charity of the Apostolic Church at Jerusalem would not be a barren example to that of Rome. But this extraordinary charity would be most naturally suggested at periods when the Church was threatened with persecution; and when Christians, who from position and circumstances might look forward to martyrdom, would, to use a homely phrase, clear their hearts and houses for action, by removing from both whatever could attach themselves to earth, and become the spoil of the impious soldier, instead of having been made the inheritance of the poor.†

Nor would the great principles be forgotten, of making the light of good works to shine before men, while the hand which filled the lamp, poured in its oil in the secret, which only He who seeth in secret can penetrate. The plate and jewels of a noble family publicly valued, sold, and, in their price, distributed to the poor, must have been a bright example of charity, which consoled the Church, animated the generous, shamed the avaricious, touched the heart of the catechumen, and drew blessings and prayers from the lips of the poor. And yet the individual right hand that gave them remained closely shrouded from the scrutiny or consciousness of the left; and the humility and modesty of the noble giver remained concealed in His bosom, into which these earthly treasures were laid up, to be returned with boundless and eternal usury.

And such was the case in the instance before us. When all was prepared, Dionysius the priest, who at the same time was the physician to whom the care of the sick was committed, and who had succeeded Polycarp in the title of St. Pastor, made his appearance, and seated in a chair at one end of the court, thus addressed the assembly:

"Dear brethren, our merciful God has touched the heart of some charitable brother, to have compassion on his poorer brethren, and strip himself of much worldly possession for Christ's sake. Who he is I know not; nor would I seek to know. He is some one who loves not to have his treasures where rust consumes, and thieves break in and steal, but prefers, like the blessed Laurence, that they should be borne up, by the hands of Christ's poor, into the heavenly treasury.

* We have it recorded of Nepotian, that on his conversion he distributed all his property to the poor. St. Paulinus of Nola did the same.

† "Dabis impto militi quod non vis dare sacerdoti, et hoc tollit fœcus, quod non accipit Christus."—St. Aug.

"Oculus pulchritudinem sol et luna miratur, ipse soli servo fidem."—Office of St. Agnes.

"Accept, then, as a gift from God, who has inspired this charity, the distribution which is about to be made, and which may be a useful help, in the days of tribulation, which are preparing for us. And as the only return which is desired from you, join all in that familiar prayer, which we daily recite for those who give, or do, us good."

During this brief address, poor Pancratius knew not which way to look. He had shrunk into a corner behind the assistants, and Sebastian had compassionately stood before him, making himself as large as possible. And his emotion did all but betray him, when the whole of that assembly knelt down, and with outstretched hands, uplifted eyes, and fervent tone, cried out, as if with one voice,

"Retribuere dignare, Domine, omnibus nobis bona factis tuis, propter Nomen tuum, vitam æternam. Amen."*

The alms were then distributed, and they proved unexpectedly large. Abundant food was also served out to all, and a cheerful banquet closed the edifying scene. It was yet early: indeed many partook not of food, as a still more delicious, and spiritual, feast was about to be prepared for them in the neighboring titular church.

When all was over, Cæcilia insisted upon seeing her poor old cripple safe home, and upon carrying for him his heavy cravie purse; and chatted so cheerfully to him, that he was surprised when he found they had reached the door of his poor but clean lodging. His blind guide then thrust his purse into his hand, and giving him a hurried good day, tripped away most lightly, and was soon lost to his sight. The bag seemed uncommonly full; so he counted carefully its contents, and found, to his amazement, that he had a double portion. He tried again, and still it was so. At the first opportunity, he made inquiries from Reparatus, but could get no explanation. If he had seen Cæcilia, when she had turned the corner, laugh outright, as if she had been playing some one a good trick, and running as lightly as if she had nothing heavy about her, he might have discovered a solution of the problem of his wealth.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE MONTH OF OCTOBER.

THE month of October in Italy is certainly a glorious season. The sun has contracted his heat, but not his splendor; he is less scorching, but not less bright. As he rises in the morning, he dashes sparks of radiance over awakening nature, as an Indian prince, upon entering his presence-chamber, flings handfuls of gems and gold into the crowd; and the mountains seem to stretch forth their rocky heads, and the woods to wave their lofty arms, in eagerness to catch his royal largess. And after careering through a cloudless sky, when he reaches his goal, and finds his bed spread with molten gold on the western sea, and canopied above with purple clouds, edged with burnished yet airy fringes, more brilliant than Ophir supplied to the couch of Solomon, he expands himself into a huge disk of most benignant effulgence, as if to bid farewell to his past course; but soon sends back, after disappearing, radiant messengers from the world he is visiting and cheering, to remind us he will soon come back, and gladden us again. If less powerful, his ray is certainly richer and more active. It has taken months to draw out of the sapless, shrivelled vine-stem, first green leaves, then crisp slender tendrils, and last little clusters of hard sour berries; and the growth has been provokingly slow. But now the leaves are large and manly, and worthy in vine-countries to have a name of their own;* and the separated little knots have swelled up into luxurious bunches of grapes. And of these some are already assuming their bright amber tint, while those which are to glow in rich imperial purple, are passing rapidly to it, through a changing opal hue, scarcely less beautiful.

It is pleasant then to sit in a shady spot, on a hill-side, and look ever and anon, from one's book, over the varied and varying landscape. For, as the breeze sweeps over the olives on the hill-side, and turns over their leaves, it brings out from them light and shade, for their two sides vary in sober tint; and as the sun shines, or the cloud darkens, on the vineyards, in the rounded hollows between, the brilliant web of unstirring vine-leaves displays a yellower or browner shade of other delicious green. Then, mingle with these the innumerable colors that tinge the picture, from the dark cypress, the duller ilex, the rich chestnut, the reddening orchard, the adust stubble, the melancholy pine—to Italy what the palm-tree is to the East—towering above the box, and the arbutus, and laurels of villas, and these scattered all over the mountain, hill, and plain, with fountains leaping up, and cascades gliding down, periticoes of glittering marble, statues of bronze and stone, painted fronts of rustic dwellings, with flowers innumerable, and patches of greensward; and you have a faint idea of the attractions which, for this month, as in our days, used to draw out the Roman patrician and knight, from what Horace calls the clatter and smoke of Rome, to feast his eyes upon the calmer beauties of the country.

And so, as the happy month approached, villas were seen open to let in air; and innumerable slaves were busy, dusting and scouring, trimming the hedges into fantastic shapes, clearing the canals for the artificial brooklets, and plucking up the weeds from the gravel-walks. The villicus or country steward superintends all; and with sharp word, or sharper lash, makes many suffer, that perhaps one only may enjoy.

At last the dusty roads become encumbered with every species of vehicle, from the huge wain carrying furniture, and slowly drawn by oxen, to the light chariot or gig, dashing on behind spirited barbs; and as the best roads were narrow, and the drivers of other days were not more smooth-tongued than those of ours, we may imagine what confusion and noise and squabbling filled the public ways. Nor was there a favored one among these. Sabine, Tusculan, and Alban hills were all studded over with splendid villas, or humbler cottages, such as a Mæcenas or a Horace might respectively occupy; even the flat Campagna of Rome is covered with the ruins of immense country residences; while from the mouth of the Tiber, along the coast by Laurentum, Lanuvium, and Antium, and so on to Cajeta, Bajæ, and other fashionable watering-places round Vesuvius, a street of noble residences may be said to have run. Nor were these limits sufficient to satisfy the periodical fever for rustication in Rome. The borders of Benacus (now the Lago Maggiore, north of Milan), Como, and the beautiful banks of the Brenta, received their visitors not from neighboring cities only, still less from wanderers of Germanic origin, but rather from the inhabitants of the imperial capital.

It was to one of these "tender eyes of Italy," as Pliny calls its villas,† because forming its truest beauty, that Fabiola had hastened, before the rush on the road, the day after her black slave's interview with Corvinus. It was situated on the slope of the hill which descends to the bay of Gaeta; and was remarkable, like her house, for the good taste which arranged the most costly, though not luxurious, elements of comfort. From the terrace in front of the elegant villa, could be seen the calm azure bay, embowered in the richest of shores, like a mirror in an embossed and enamelled frame, relieved by the white sun-lit sails of yachts, galleys, pleasure-boats, and fishing-skiffs; from some of which rose the roaring laugh of excursionists, from others the song or harp-notes of family parties, or the loud, sharp, and not over-refined ditties of the various ploughmen of the deep. A gallery of lattice, covered with creepers, led to the baths on the shore; and half way down was an opening on a favored spot of green, kept ever fresh by the gush, from an out-cropping rock, of a crystal spring, confined for a moment in a natural basin, in which it bubbled and fretted, till, rushing over its ledge, it went down murmuring and chattering, in the most good-natured way imaginable, along the side of the trellis, into the sea. Two enormous plane-trees cast their shade over this classic ground, as did Plato's and Cicero's over their choice scenes of philosophical disquisition. The most beautiful flowers and plants from distant climates had been taught to make this spot their home, sheltered, as it was, equally from sultriness and from frost.

* "Be pleased to render, O Lord, eternal life to all who for Thy Name's sake do unto us good things."

* Pampinus pampino.

† Ocelli Italice.

Fabius, for reasons which will be explained later, seldom paid more than a flying visit for a couple of days to this villa; and even then it was generally on his way to some gayer resort of Roman fashion, where he had, or pretended to have, business. His daughter was, therefore, mostly alone, and enjoyed a delicious solitude. Besides a well-furnished library, always kept at the villa, chiefly containing works on agriculture or of a local interest, a stock of books, some old favorites, other lighter productions of the season (of which she generally procured an early copy at a high price), was brought every year from Rome, together with a quantity of smaller familiar works of art, such as, distributed through new apartments, make them become a home. Most of her morning hours were spent in the cherished retreat just described, with a book-casket at her side, from which she selected first one volume and then another. But any visitor calling upon her this year would have been surprised to find her almost always with a companion—and that a slave!

We may imagine how amazed she was when the day following the dinner at her house, Agnes informed her that Syra had declined leaving her service, though tempted by a bribe of liberty. Still more astonished was she at learning that the reason was attachment to herself. She could feel no pleasurable consciousness of having earned this affection by any acts of kindness, nor even by any decent gratitude for her servant's care of her in illness. She was therefore at first inclined to think Syra a fool for her pains. But it would not do in her mind. It was true she had often read or heard of instances of fidelity and devotedness in slaves, even towards oppressive masters;* but these were always accounted as exceptions to the general rule; and what were a few dozen cases, in as many centuries, of love, compared with the daily ten thousand ones of hatred around her? Yet here was a clear and palpable one at hand, and it struck her forcibly. She waited a time, and watched her maid eagerly, to see if she could discover in her conduct any airs, any symptoms of thinking she had done a grand thing, and that her mistress must feel it. Not in the least. Syra pursued all her duties with the same simple diligence, and never betrayed any signs of believing herself less a slave than before. Fabiola's heart softened more and more; and she now began to think that not quite so difficult which, in her conversation with Agnes, she had pronounced impossible—to love a slave. And she had also discovered a second evidence, that there was such a thing in the world as disinterested love, affection that asked for no return.

Her conversation with her slave, after the memorable one which we have recounted, had satisfied her that she had received a superior education. She was too delicate to question her on her early history, especially as masters often had young slaves highly educated to enhance their value. But she soon discovered that she read Greek and Latin authors with ease and elegance, and wrote well in both languages. By degrees she raised her position, to the great annoyance of her companions: she ordered Euphrosyne to give her a separate room, the greatest of comforts to the poor maid; and she employed her near herself as a secretary and reader. Still she could perceive no change in her conduct, no pride, no pretensions; for the moment any work presented itself of the menial character formerly allotted to her, she never seemed to think of turning it over to any one else, but at once naturally and cheerfully set herself about it.

The reading generally pursued by Fabiola was, as has been previously observed, of rather an abstruse and refined character, consisting of philosophical literature. She was surprised however, to find how her slave, by a simply remark, would often confute an apparently solid maxim, bring down a grand flight of virtuous declamation, or suggest a higher view of moral truth, or a more practical course of action, than authors whom she had long admired proposed in their writings. Nor was this done by any apparent shrewdness of judgment or pungency of wit; nor did it seem to come from much reading or deep thought, or superiority of education. For though she saw traces of this in Syra's words, ideas, and behaviour, yet the books and doctrines which she was reading now, were evidently new to her. But there seemed to be in her maid's mind some latent but infallible standard of truth, some master-key, which opened equally every closed deposit of moral knowledge, some well-attuned chord, which vibrated in unending unison with what was just and right, but jangled in dissonance with whatever was wrong, vicious or even inaccurate. What this secret was, she wanted to discover; it was more like an intuition, than anything she had before witnessed. She was not yet in a condition to learn, that the meanest and least in the Kingdom of Heaven (and what lower than a slave?) was greater in spiritual wisdom, intellectual light, and heavenly privileges, than even the Baptist Precursor.*

It was on a delicious morning in October, that, reclining by the spring, the mistress and slave were occupied in reading; when the former, wearied by the heaviness of the volume, looked for something lighter and newer; and drawing out a manuscript from her casket, said:

"Syra, put that stupid book down. Here is something, I am told, very amusing, and only just come out. It will be new to both of us."

The handmaid did as she was told, looked at the title of the proposed volume, and blushed. She glanced over the first few lines, and her fears were confirmed. She saw that it was one of those trashy works, which were freely allowed to circulate, as St. Justin complained, though grossly immoral, and making light of all virtue; while every Christian writing was suppressed, or as much as possible discountenanced. She put down the book with a calm resolution, and said:

"Do not, my good mistress, ask me to read to you from that book. It is fit neither for me to recite, nor for you to hear."

Fabiola was astonished. She had never heard, or even thought, of such a thing as restraint put upon her studies. What in our days would be looked upon as unfit for common perusal, formed part of current and fashionable literature. From Horace to Anonius, all classical writers demonstrate this. And what rule of virtue could have made that reading seem indelicate, which only described by the pen a system of morals, which the pencil and the chisel made hourly visible to every eye? Fabiola had no higher standard of right and wrong than the system, under which she had been educated could give her.

"What possible harm can it do either of us?" she asked, smiling. "I have no doubt there are plenty of foul crimes and wicked actions described in the book; but it will not induce us to commit them. And, in the meantime, it is amusing to read them of others."

"Would you yourself, for any consideration do them?"

"Not for the world."

"Yet, as you hear them read, their image must occupy your mind; as they amuse you, your thoughts must dwell upon them with pleasure."

"Certainly. What then?"

"That image is foulness, that thought is wickedness."

"How is that possible? Does not wickedness require an action, to have any existence?"

"True, my mistress; and what is the action of the mind, or as I call it the soul, but thought? A passion which wishes death, is the action of this invisible power, like it, unseen; the blow which inflicts it is but the mechanical action of the body, discernible like its origin. But which power commands, and which obeys? In which resides the responsibility of the final effect?"

* Such as are given by Macrobius in his Saturnalia, lib. i., and by Valerius Maximus.

"I understand you," said Fabiola, after a pause of some little mortification. "But one difficulty remains. There is responsibility, you maintain, for the inward, as well as the outward, act. To whom? If the second follow, there is joint responsibility for both, to society, to the laws, to principles of justice, to self; for painful results will ensue. But if only the inward action exist, to whom can there be responsibility? Who sees it? Who can presume to judge it? Who to control it?"

"God," answered Syra, with simple earnestness,

Fabiola was disappointed. She expected some new theory, some striking principle, to come out. Instead, they had sunk down into what she feared was mere superstition, though not so much as she once had deemed. "What, Syra, do you then really believe in Jupiter, and Juno, or perhaps Minerva, who is about the most respectable of the Olympian family? Do you think they have anything to do with our affairs?"

"Far indeed from it; I loathe their very names, and I detest the wickedness which their histories or fables symbolize on earth. No, I spoke not of gods and goddesses, but of one only God."

"And what do you call Him, Syra, in your system?"

"He has no name but God; and that only men have given Him, that they may speak of Him. It describes not His nature, His origin, His attributes."

"And what are these?" asked the mistress, with awakened curiosity.

"Simple as light is His nature, one and the same everywhere, indivisible, undefilable, penetrating yet diffusive, ubiquitous and unlimited. He existed before there was any beginning; He will exist after all ending has ceased. Power, wisdom, love, justice too, and unerring judgment belong to Him by His nature, and are as unlimited and unrestrained as it. He alone can create, He alone can preserve, and He alone can destroy."

Fabiola had often read of the inspired looks which animated a sibyl, or the priestess of an oracle; but she had never witnessed them till now. The slave's countenance glowed, her eyes shone with a calm brilliancy, her frame was immovable, the words flowed from her lips, as if these were but the opening of a musical reed, made vocal by another's breath. Her expression and manner forcibly reminded Fabiola of that abstracted and mysterious look, which she had so often noticed in Agnes; and though in the child it was more tender and graceful, in the maid it seemed more earnest and oracular. "How enthusiastic and excitable an Eastern temperament is, to be sure!" thought Fabiola, as she gazed upon her slave. "No wonder the East should be thought the land of poetry and inspiration." When she saw Syra relaxed from the evident tension of her mind, she said, in as light a tone as she could assume: "But, Syra, can you think, that a Being such as you have described, far beyond all the conception of ancient fable, can occupy Himself with constantly watching the actions, still more the paltry thoughts, of millions of creatures?"

"It is no occupation, lady, it is not even choice. I called Him light. Is it occupation or labor to the sun to send his rays through the crystal of this fountain, to the very pebbles in its bed? See how, of themselves they disclose, not only the beautiful, but the foul that harbors there; not only the sparkles that the falling drops strike from its rough sides; not only the pearly bubbles that merely rise, glisten for a moment, then break against the surface; not only the golden fish that bask in their light, but black and loathsome creeping things, which seek to hide and bury themselves below, and cannot; for the light pursues them. Is there toil or occupation in all this, to the sun that thus visits them? Far more would it appear so, were he to restrain his beams at the surface of the transparent element, and hold them back from throwing it into light. And what he does here he does in the next stream, and in that which is a thousand miles off, with equal ease; nor can any imaginable increase of their number, or bulk, lead us to fancy, or believe, that rays would be wanting, or light would fail, to scrutinize them all."

"Your theories are beautiful always, Syra, and, if true, most wonderful," observed Fabiola, after a pause, during which her eyes were fixedly contemplating the fountain, as though she were testing the truth of Syra's words.

"And they sound like the truth," she added; "for could falsehood be more beautiful than truth? But what an awful idea, that one has never been alone, has never had a wish to oneself, has never held a single thought in secret, has never hidden the most foolish fancy of a proud or childish brain, from the observation of One that knows no imperfection. Terrible thought, that one is living, if you say true, under the steady gaze of an Eye, of which the sun is but a shadow, for he enters not the soul! It is enough to make one any evening commit self-destruction, to get rid of the torturing watchfulness! Yet it sounds so true!"

Fabiola looked almost wild as she spoke these words. The pride of her pagan heart rose strong within her, and she rebelled against the supposition that she could never again feel alone with her own thoughts, or that any power should exist which could control her inmost desires; imaginings, or caprices. Still the thought came back: "Yet it seems so true!" Her generous intellect struggled against the writhing passion, like an eagle with a serpent; more with eye, than with beak and talons, subduing the quailing foe. After a struggle, visible in her countenance and gestures, a calm came over her. She seemed for the first time to feel the presence of One greater than herself, some one whom she feared, yet whom she would wish to love. She bowed down her mind, she bent her intelligence to His feet; and her heart too owned, for the first time, that it had a Master, and a Lord.

Syra, with a calm intensity of feeling, silently watched the workings of her mistress's mind. She knew how much depended on their issue, what a mighty step in her unconscious pupil's religious progress was involved in the recognition of the truth before her; and she fervently prayed for this grace.

At length Fabiola raised her head, which seemed to have been bowed down in accompaniment to her mind, and with graceful kindness said,

"Syra, I am sure I have not yet reached the depths of your knowledge; you must have much more to teach me." (A tear and a blush came to the poor handmaid's relief.) "But to-day you have opened a new world, and a new life, to my thoughts. A sphere of virtue beyond the opinions and the judgments of men, a consciousness of a controlling, an approving, and a rewarding Power too: am I right?" (Syra expressed approbation.) "standing by us when no other eye can see, or restrain, or encourage us; a feeling that, were we shut up for ever in solitude, we should be ever the same, because that influence on us must be so superior to that of any amount of human principles, in guiding us, and could not leave us; such, if I understand your theory, is the position of moral elevation, in which it would place each individual. To fall below it, even with an outwardly virtuous life, is mere deceit, and positive wickedness. Is this so?"

"O my dear mistress," exclaimed Syra, "how much better you can express all this than I!"

"You have never flattered me yet, Syra," replied Fabiola, smilingly; "do not begin now. But you have thrown a new light upon other subjects, till to-day obscure to me. Tell me, now, was it not this you meant, when you once told me, that in your view there was no distinction between mistress and slave; that is, that as the distinction is only outward, bodily and social, it is not to be put in comparison with that equality which exists before your Supreme Being, and that possible moral superiority which He might see of the one over the other, inversely of their visible rank?"

"It was in a great measure so, my noble lady; though there are other considerations involved in the idea, which would hardly interest you at present?"

"And yet, when you stated that proposition, it seemed to me so monstrous, so absurd, that pride and anger overcame me. Do you remember that, Syra?"

"Oh, no, no!" replied the gentle servant; "do not allude to it, I pray!"

"Have you forgiven me that day, Syra?" said the mistress, with an emotion quite new to her.

The poor maid was overpowered. She rose and threw herself on her knees before her mistress, and tried to seize her hand; but she prevented her, and, for the first time in her life, Fabiola threw herself upon a slave's neck, and wept.

Her passion of tears was long and tender. Her heart was getting above her intellect; and this can only be by its increasing softness. At length she grew calm; and as she withdrew her embrace she said:

"One thing more, Syra: dare one address, by worship, this Being whom you have described to me? Is He not too great, too lofty, too distant, for this?"

"Oh, no! far from it, noble lady," answered the servant. "He is not distant from any of us; for as much as in the light of the sun, so in the very splendor of His might, His kindness, and His wisdom, we live and move and have our being. Hence, one may address Him, not as far off, but as around us and within us, while we are in Him; and He hears us not with ears, but our words drop at once into His very bosom, and the desires of our hearts pass directly into the divine abyss of His."

"But," pursued Fabiola, somewhat timidly, "is there no great act of acknowledgment, such as sacrifice is supposed to be, whereby He may be formally recognized and adored?"

Syra hesitated, for the conversation seemed to be trenching upon mysterious and sacred ground, never opened by the Church to profane foot. She, however, answered in a simple and general affirmative.

"And could not I," still more humbly asked her mistress, "be so far instructed in your school, as to be able to perform this sublimer act of homage?"

"I fear not, noble Fabiola: one must needs obtain a Victim worthy of the Deity."

"Ah, yes! to be sure," answered Fabiola. "A bull may be good enough for Jupiter, or a goat for Bacchus! but where can be found a sacrifice worthy of Him, whom you have brought me to know?"

"It must indeed be one every way worthy of Him, spotless in purity, matchless in greatness, unbounded in acceptableness."

"And what can that be, Syra?"

"Only Himself."

Fabiola shrouded her face with her hands, and then looking up earnestly into Syra's face, said to her:

"I am sure that, after having so clearly described to me the deep sense of responsibility, under which you must habitually speak as well as act, you have a real meaning in this awful saying, though I understand you not."

"As surely as every word of mine is heard, as every thought of mine is seen, it is a truth which I have spoken."

"I have not strength to carry the subject further at present; my mind has need of rest."

which this light imposed, the watchfulness which it demanded, the unseemly and unrequited struggles which it required, the desolateness, almost, of a virtue without admiration or even sympathy, she again shrunk from the life that was before her, as about to be passed without any stay or help, from the only sources of it which she knew. Unconscious of the real cause she saw that she possessed not instruments or means, to carry out the beautiful theory. This seemed to stand like a brilliant lamp in the midst of a huge, bare, unfurnished hall, lighting up only a wilderness. What was the use of so much wasted splendor?

The next morning had been fixed for one of those visits which used to be annually paid to the country,—that to the now ex-prefect of the city, Chromatius. Our reader will remember, that after his conversion and resignation of office, this magistrate had retired to his villa in Campania, taking with him a number of the converts made by Sebastian, with the holy priest Polycarp, to complete their instruction. Of these circumstances, of course, Fabiola had never been informed; but she heard all sorts of curious reports about Chromatius's villa. It was said that he had a number of visitors never before seen at his house; that he gave no entertainments; that he had freed all his country slaves, but that many of them had preferred remaining with him; that if numerous, the whole establishment seemed very happy, though no boisterous sports or frolicsome meetings seemed to be indulged in. All this stimulated Fabiola's curiosity, in addition to her wish to discharge a pleasing duty of courtesy to a most kind friend of hers in childhood; and she longed to see, with her own eyes, what appeared to her to be a very Platonic, or, as we should say, Utopian, experiment.

In a light country carriage, with good horses, Fabiola started early, and dashed gaily along the level road across the "happy Campania." An autumnal shower had laid the dust, and studded with glistening gems the garlands of vine which bordered the way, festooned, instead of hedges, from tree to tree. It was not long before she reached the gentle acclivity, for hill it could scarcely be called, covered with box, arbutus, and laurels, relieved by tall tapering eypresses, amidst which shone the white walls of the large villa on the summit. A change she perceived, had taken place, which at first she could not exactly define; but when she had passed through the gate, the number of empty pedestals and niches reminded her, that the villa had entirely lost one of its most characteristic ornaments—the number of beautiful statues which stood gracefully against the clipped evergreen hedges, and gave it the name, now become quite an empty one, of Ad Statuas.*

Chromatius, whom she had last seen limping with gout, now a hale old man, courteously received her, and inquired kindly after her father, asking if the report were true that he was going shortly to Asia. At this Fabiola seemed grieved and mortified; for he had not mentioned his intention to her. Chromatius hoped it might be a false alarm, and asked her to take a stroll about the grounds. She found them kept with the same care as ever, full of beautiful plants; but still much missed the old statues. At last they reached a grotto with a fountain, in which formerly nymphs and sea-deities disported, but which now presented a black unbroken surface. She could contain herself no longer, and, turning to Chromatius, she said:

"Why, what on earth have you been doing, Chromatius, to send away all your statues, and destroy the peculiar feature of your handsome villa? What induced you to do this?"

"My dear young lady," answered the good-humored old gentleman, "do not be so angry. Of what use were those figures to any one?"

"If you thought so," replied she, "others might not. But tell me, what have you done with them all?"

"Why, to tell you the truth, I have had them brought under the hammer."

"What! and never let me know anything about it? You know there were several pieces I would most gladly have purchased."

CHAPTER XVII.

THE CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY.

AFTER this conversation Fabiola retired; and during the rest of the day her mind was alternately agitated and calm. When she looked steadily on the grand view of moral life which her mind had grasped, she found an unusual tranquillity in its contemplation; she felt as if she had made discovery of a great phenomenon, the knowledge of which guided her into a new and lofty region, whence she could smile on the errors and follies of mankind. But when she considered the responsibility

*The Villa of Statues," or "at the Statues."

Chromatins laughed outright, and said, with that familiar tone, which acquaintance with Fabiola from a child authorized him always to assume with her :

"Dear me! how your young imagination runs away, far too fast for my poor old tongue to keep pace with; I meant not the auctioneer's hammer, but the sledge-hammer. The gods and goddesses have been all smashed, pulverized! If you happen to want a stray leg, or a hand minus a few fingers, perhaps I may pick up such a thing for you. But I cannot promise you a face with a nose, or a skull without a fracture."

Fabiola was utterly amazed, as she exclaimed, "What an utter barbarian you have become, my wise old judge! What shadow of reason can you give to justify so outrageous a proceeding?"

"Why, you see, as I have grown older, I have grown wiser! and I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Jupiter and Mrs. Juno are no more gods than you or I; so I summarily got rid of them."

"Yes, that may be very well; and I, though neither old nor wise, have been long of the same opinion. But why not retain them as mere works of art?"

"Because they had been set up here, not in that capacity, but as divinities. They were here as impostors, under false pretences; and as you would turn out of your house, for an intruder, any bust or image found among those of your ancestors, but belonging to quite another family, so did I these pretenders to a higher connection with me, when I found it false. Neither could I run a risk, of their being bought for the continuance of the same imposture."

"And pray, my most righteous old friend, is it not an imposture to continue calling your villa Ad Statuas, after not a single statue is left standing in it?"

"Certainly," replied Chromatius, amused at her sharpness, "and you will see that I have planted palm-trees all about; and, as soon as they show their heads above the evergreens, the villa will take the title of Ad Palmas* instead."

"That will be a pretty name," said Fabiola, who little thought of the higher sense of appropriateness which it would contain. She, of course, was not aware, that the villa was now a training-school, in which many were being prepared, as wrestlers or gladiators used to be, in separate institutions, for the great combat of faith, martyrdom to death. They who had entered in, and they who would go out, might equally say they were on their way to pluck the conqueror's palm; to be borne by them before God's judgment-seat, in token of their victory over the world. Many were the palm-branches shortly to be gathered in that early Christian retreat.

But we must here give the history of the demolition of Chromatins's statues, which forms a peculiar episode in the "Acts of Sebastian."

When Nicostratus informed him, as prefect of Rome, of the release of his prisoners, and of the recovery of Tranquillinus from gout by baptism, Chromatius, after making every inquiry into the truth of the fact, sent for Sebastian, and proposed to become a Christian, as a means of obtaining a cure of the same complaint. This of course could not be; and another course was proposed, which would give him new and personal evidence of Christianity without risking an insincere baptism. Chromatius was celebrated for the immense number of idolatrous images which he possessed; and was assured by Sebastian, that, if he would have them all broken in pieces, he would at once recover. This was a hard condition; but he consented. His son Tiburtius, however, was furious, and protested that if the promised result did not follow, he would have Sebastian and Polycarp thrown into a blazing furnace; not perhaps so difficult a matter for the prefect's son.

In one day, two hundred pagan statues were broken in pieces, including, of course, those in the villa, as well as those in the house at Rome. The images indeed were broken; but Chromatius was not cured. Sebastian was sent for, and sharply rebuked. But he was calm and inflexible. "I am sure," he said, "that all have not been destroyed. Something has been withheld from demolition." He proved right. Some small objects had been treated as works of art rather than religious things, and, like Achan's coveted spoil,* concealed. They were brought forth and broken up; and Chromatius instantly recovered. Not only was he converted, but his son Tiburtius became also one of the most fervent of Christians; and, dying in glorious martyrdom, gave his name to a catacomb. He had begged to stay in Rome, to encourage and assist his fellow-believers, in the coming persecution, which his connection with the palace, his great courage and activity, would enable him to do. He had become, naturally, the great friend and frequent companion of Sebastian and Pancratius.

After this little digression, we resume the conversation between Chromatius and Fabiola, who continued her last sentence, by adding,

"But do you know, Chromatius—let us sit down in this lovely spot, where I remember there was a beautiful Bacchus—that all sorts of strange reports are going round the country, about your doings here?"

"Dear me! What are they? Do tell me."

"Why, that you have a quantity of people living with you, whom nobody knows; that you see no company, go out nowhere, and lead quite a philosophical sort of life, forming a most Platonic republic."

"Highly flattered!" interrupted Chromatius, with a smile and bow.

"But that is not all," continued Fabiola. "They say you keep most unfashionable hours, have no amusements, and live most abstemiously; in fact, almost starve yourselves."

"But I hope they do us the justice to add that we pay our way?" observed Chromatius. "They don't say, do they, that we have a long score run up at the baker's or grocer's?"

"Oh, no!" replied Fabiola, laughing.

"How kind of them!" rejoined the good-humored old judge.

"They—the whole public, I mean—seem to take a wonderful interest in our concerns. But is it not strange, my dear young lady, that so long as my villa was on the free-and-easy system, with as much loose talk, deep drinking, occasional sallies of youthful mirth, and troublesome freaks in the neighborhood, as others—I beg your pardon for alluding to such things; but, in fact, so long as I and my friends were neither temperate nor irreproachable, nobody gave himself the least trouble about us? But let a few people retire to live in quiet, be frugal, industrious, entirely removed from public affairs, and never even talk about politics or society, and at once there springs up a vulgar curiosity to know all about them, and a mean pruritus in third-rate statesmen to meddle with them; and there must needs fly about flocks of false reports and foul suspicions about their motives and manner of living. Is not this a phenomenon?"

"It is, indeed; but how do you account for it?"

"I can only do so by that faculty of little minds, which makes them always jealous of any aims higher than their own; so that, almost unconsciously, they depreciate whatever they feel to be better than they dare aspire to."

"But what is really your object and your mode of life here, my good friend?"

"We spend our time in the cultivation of our higher faculties. We rise frightfully early—I hardly dare tell you how early; we then devote some hours to religious worship; after which we occupy ourselves in a variety of ways; some read, some write, some labor in the gardens; and I assure you no hired workmen ever toiled harder and better than these spontaneous agriculturists. We meet at different times, and sing beautiful songs together, all breathing virtue and purity, and read most improving books, and receive oral instruction from eloquent teachers. Our meals are, indeed, very temperate; we live entirely on vegetables; but I have already found out that laughing is quite compatible with lentils, and that good cheer does not necessarily mean good fare."

"Why you are turned complete Pythagoreans. I thought that was quite out of date. But it must be a most economical system," remarked Fabiola, with a knowing look.

* "At" or "to the palms."

* Jos. vii.

"Ha! you cunning thing!" answered the judge; "so you really think that this may be a saving plan after all? But it won't be, for we have taken a most desperate resolution."

"And what on earth is that?" asked the young lady.

"Nothing less than this. We are determined that there shall not be such a thing as a poor person within our reach; this winter we will endeavour to clothe all the naked, and feed the hungry, and attend all the sick about. All our economy will go for this."

"It is, indeed, a very generous, though very new, idea in our times; and no doubt you will be well laughed at for your pains, and abused on all sides. They will even say worse of you than they do now, if it were possible; but it is not."

"How so?"

"Do not be offended if I tell you; but already they have gone so far as to hint that possibly you are Christians. But this, I assure you, I have everywhere indignantly contradicted."

Chromatius smiled, and said, "Why an indignant contradiction, my dear child?"

"Because, to be sure, I know you and Tiburtius, and Nicestratus, and that dear dumb Zoë, too well to admit, for a moment, that you had adopted the compound of stupidity and knavery called by that name."

"Let me ask you one question. Have you taken the trouble of reading any Christian writings, by which you might know what is really held and done by that despised body?"

"Oh, not I, indeed; I would not waste my time over them; I could not have patience to learn anything about them. I scorn them too much, as enemies of all intellectual progress, as doubtful citizens, as credulous to the last degree, and as sanctioning every abominable crime, ever to give myself a chance of nearer acquaintance with them."

"Well, dear Fabiola, I thought just the same about them once, but I have much altered my opinion of late."

"This is, indeed, strange; since, as prefect of the city, you must have had to punish many of these wretched people for their constant transgression of the laws."

A cloud came over the cheerful countenance of the old man, and a tear stood in his eye. He thought of St. Paul, who had once persecuted the Church of God. Fabiola saw the change, and was distressed. In the most affectionate manner, she said to him, "I have said something very thoughtless, I fear, or stirred up recollections of what must be painful to your kind heart. Forgive me, dear Chromatius, and let us talk of something else. One purpose of my visit to you was, to ask if you knew of anyone going immediately to Rome. I have heard, from several quarters of my father's projected journey, and I am anxious to write to him*, lest he repeat what he did before—go without taking leave of me, to spare me pain."

"Yes," replied Chromatius, "there is a young man starting early to-morrow morning. Come into the library, and write your letter; the bearer is probably there."

They returned to the house, and entered an apartment on the ground floor, full of book-chests. At a table in the middle of the room a young man was seated, transcribing a large volume; which, on seeing a stranger enter, he closed and put aside.

"Torquatus," said Chromatius, addressing him, "this lady desires to send a letter to her father in Rome."

"It will always give me great pleasure," replied the young man, "to serve the noble Fabiola or her illustrious father."

"What, do you know them?" asked the judge, rather surprised.

"I had the honor, when very young, as my father had had before me, to be employed by the noble Fabians in Asia. Ill-health compelled me to leave his service."

Several sheets of fine vellum, cut to a size, evidently for transcription of some book, lay on the table. One of these the good old man placed before the lady, with ink and a reed, and she wrote a few affectionate lines to her father. She doubled the paper, tied a thread round it, attached some wax to this, and impressed her seal, which she drew from an embroidered bag, upon the wax. Anxious, some time, to reward the messenger, when she could better know how, she took another piece of the vellum, and made on it a memorandum of his name and residence, and carefully put this into her bosom. After partaking of some slight refreshment, she mounted her ear, and bid Chromatius an affectionate farewell. There was something touchingly paternal in his look, as though he felt he should never see her again. So she thought; but it was a very different feeling which softened his heart. Should she always remain thus? Must he leave her to perish in obstinate ignorance? Were that generous heart, and that noble intellect, to grovel on in the slime of bitter paganism, when every feeling and every thought in them seemed formed of strong yet finest fibres, across which truth might weave the richest web? It could not be; and yet a thousand motives restrained him from an avowal, which he felt would, at present, only repulse her fatally from any nearer approach to the faith. "Farewell," my child," he exclaimed, "may you be blessed a hundredfold, in ways which as yet you know not." He turned away his face as he dropped her hand, and hastily withdrew.

Fabiola too was moved by the mystery, as well as the tenderness, of his words; but was startled, before reaching the gate, to find her chariot stopped by Torquatus. She was at that moment painfully struck by the contrast between the easy and rather familiar, though respectful, manner of the youth, and the mild gravity, mixed with cheerfulness, of the old ex-prefect.

"Pardon this interruption, madam," he said, "but are you anxious to have this letter quickly delivered?"

"Certainly, I am most anxious that it should reach my father as speedily as possible."

"Then I fear I shall be hardly able to serve you. I can only afford to travel on foot, or by chance and cheap conveyance, and I shall be some days on the road."

Fabiola, hesitating, said: "Would it be taking too great a liberty, if I should offer to defray the expenses of a more rapid journey?"

"By no means," answered Torquatus, rather eagerly, "if I can thereby better serve your noble house."

Fabiola handed him a purse abundantly supplied, not only for his journey, but for an ample recompense. He received it with smiling readiness, and disappeared by a side alley. There was something in his manner which made a disagreeable impression; she could not think he was fit company for her dear old friend. If Chromatius had witnessed the transaction, he would have seen a likeness to Judas, in that eager clutching of the purse. Fabiola, however, was not sorry to have discharged, by a sum of money, once for all, any obligation she might have contracted by making him her messenger. She therefore drew out memorandum to destroy it as useless, when she perceived that the other side of the vellum was written on; as the transcriber of the book, which she saw put by, had just commenced its continuation on that sheet. Only a few sentences, however, had been written, and she proceeded to read them. Then for the first time she perused the following words from a book unknown to her:

"I say to you, love your enemies; do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that persecute and calumniate you: that you may be the children of your Father who is in heaven, who maketh the sun to rise on the good and the bad, and raineth upon the just and the unjust."*

We may imagine the perplexity of an Indian peasant who has picked up in a torrent's bed a white pellucid pebble, rough and dull outside, but where chipped, emitting sparks of light; unable to decide whether he has become possessor of a splendid diamond, or of a worthless stone, a thing to be placed on a royal crown, or trodden under a beggar's feet. Shall he put an end to his embarrassment by at once flinging it away, or shall

* There was no post in those days, and persons wishing to send letters had to despatch an express, or find some opportunity.

* Matt. v. 44.

he take it to a lapidary, ask its value, and perhaps be laughed at to his face? Such were the alternating feelings of Fabiola on her way home. "Whose can these sentences be? No Greek or Roman philosopher's. They are either very false or very true, either sublime morality or base degradation. Does any one practice this doctrine, or is it a splendid paradox? I will trouble myself no more on the subject. Or rather I will ask Syra about it; it sounds very like one of her beautiful, but impracticable theories. No; it is better not. She overpowers me by her sublime views, so impossible for me, though they seem easy to her. My mind wants rest. The shortest way is to get rid of the cause of my perplexity, and forget such harassing words. So here it goes to the winds, or to puzzle some one else, who may find it on the roadside. Ho! Phormio, stop the chariot, and pick up that piece of parchment which I have dropped."

The outrider obeyed, though he had thought the sheet deliberately flung out. It was replaced in Fabiola's bosom: it was like a seal upon her heart; for that heart was calm and silent till she reached home.

CHAPTER XVIII.

TEMPTATION.

VERY early next morning a mule and guide came to the door of Chromatius's villa. On it was packed a moderate pair of saddle-bags, the whole known property of Torquatus. Many friends were up to see him off, and receive from him the kiss of peace ere he departed. May it not prove like that of Gethsemani! Some whispered a kind, soft word in his ear, exhorting him to be faithful to the graces he had received; and he earnestly, and probably sincerely, promised that he would. Others, knowing his poverty, put a little present into his hand, and entreated him to avoid his old haunts and acquaintances. Polycarp, however, the director of the community, called him aside; and with fervent words, and flowing tears, conjured him to correct the irregularities, slight perhaps but threatening, which had appeared in his conduct, repress the levity which had manifested itself in his bearing, and cultivate more all Christian virtues. Torquatus, also with tears, promised obedience, knelt down, kissed the good priest's hand, and obtained his blessing; then received from him letters of recommendation for his journey, and a small sum for its moderate expenses.

At length all was ready: the last farewell was spoken, the last good wish expressed; and Torquatus, mounted on his mule, with his guide at its bridle, proceeded slowly along the straight avenue which led to the gate. Long after every one else had reëntered the house, Chromatius was standing at the door, looking wistfully, with a moist eye, after him. It was just such a look as the Prodigal's father kept fixed on his departing son.

As the villa was not on the high road, this modest quadrupedal conveyance had been hired to take him across the country to Fundi (now Fondi), as the nearest point where he could reach it. There he was to find what means he could for prosecuting his journey. Fabiola's purse, however, had set him very much at ease on that score.

The road by which he travelled was varied in its beauties. Sometimes it wound along the banks of the Liris, gay with villas and cottages. Then it plunged into a miniature ravine, in the skirts of the Apennines, walled in by rocks, matted with myrtle, aloes, and the wild vine, amidst which white goats shone like spots of snow; while beside the path gurgled, and wriggled on, a tiny brook, that seemed to have worked itself into the bright conceit that it was a mountain torrent; so great was the bustle and noise with which it pushed on, and pretended to foam, and appeared to congratulate itself loudly on having achieved a waterfall by leaping down two stones at a time, and plunging into an abyss concealed by a wide acanthus-leaf. Then the road emerged, to enjoy a wide prospect of the vast garden of Campania, with the blue bay of Cajeta, in the background, speckled by the white sails of its craft, that looked at that distance like flocks of bright-plumed waterfowl, basking and fluttering on a lake.

What were the traveller's thoughts amidst these shifting scenes of a new act in his life's drama? did they amuse him? did they delight him? did they elevate him, or did they depress? His eye scarcely noted them. It had run on far beyond them, to the shady porticoes and noisy streets of the capital. The dusty garden and the artificial fountain, the marble bath and the painted vault, were more beautiful in his eyes than fresh autumn vineyards, pure streams, purple ocean, and azure sky. He did not, of course, for a moment turn his thoughts towards its foul deeds and impious practices, its luxury, its debauchery, its profaneness, its dishonesties, its calumnies, its treacheries, its uncleannesses. Oh, no! what would he, a Christian, have again to do with these? Sometimes, as his mind became abstracted, it saw, in a dark nook of a hall in the Thermæ, a table, round which moody but eager gamblers were casting their knuckle-bone dice; and he felt a quivering creep over him of an excitement long suppressed; but a pair of mild eyes, like Polycarp's, loomed on him from behind the table and aroused him. Then he caught himself, in fancy, seated at a maple board, with a ruby gem of Palernian wine, set in the rim of a golden goblet, and discourse, ungirded by inebriety, going round with the cup; when the reproving countenance of Chromatius would seem placed opposite, repelling with a scowl the approach of either.

He was, in fact, returning only to the innocent enjoyment of the imperial city, to its walks, its music, its paintings, its magnificence, its beauty. He forgot that all these were but the accessories to a living and panting mass of human beings, whose passions they enkindled, whose evil desires they inflamed, whose ambition they fanned, whose resolutions they melted, and whose minds they enervated. Poor youth! he thought he could walk through that fire, and not be scorched! Poor moth! he imagined he could fly through that flame, and have his wings unscathed!

It was in one of his abstracted moods that he journeyed through a narrow overhung defile, when suddenly he found himself at its opening, with an inlet of the sea before him, and in it one solitary and motionless skiff. The sight at once brought to his memory a story of his childhood, true or false, it mattered not; but he almost fancied its scene was before him.

Once upon a time there was a bold young fisherman living on the coast of southern Italy. One night, stormy and dark, he found that his father and brothers would not venture out in their tight and strong smack; so he determined, in spite of every remonstrance, to go alone in the little cockle-shell attached to it. It blew a gale, but he rode it out in his tiny buoyant bark, till the sun rose, warm and bright, upon a placid, glassy sea. Overcome by fatigue and heat, he fell asleep; but, after some time, was awakened by a loud shouting at a distance. He looked round, and saw the family boat, the crew of which were crying aloud and waving their hands to invite him back; but they made no effort to reach him. What could they want? what could they mean? He seized his oars, and began to pull lustily toward them; but he was soon amazed to find that the fishing-boat, toward which he had turned the prow of his skiff, appeared upon his quarter; and soon, though he righted his craft, it was on the opposite side. Evidently he had been making a circle; but the end came within its beginning, in a spiral curve, and now he was commencing another and a narrower, one. A horrible suspicion flashed upon his mind: he threw off his tunic, and pulled like a madman at his oars. But though he broke the circle a bit here and a bit there, still round he went, and every time nearer to the centre, in which he could see a downward funnel of hissing and foaming water. Then, in despair, he threw down his oars, and standing, he flung up his arms frantically; and a sea-bird screaming near, heard him cry out as loud as itself, "Charibdis!"* And now the circle his boat went spinning round was only a few times longer than itself; and he cast himself flat down, and shut his ears and eyes with his hands, and held his breath, till he felt the waters gurgling above him, and he was whirled down into the abyss.

*A whirlpool between Italy and Sicily.

"I wonder," Torquatus said to himself, "did any one ever perish in this way? or is it a mere allegory?—if so, of what? Can a person be drawn on gradually in this manner to spiritual destruction? are my present thoughts, by any chance, an outer circle, which has caught me, and—"

"Fundi!" exclaimed the muleteer, pointing to a town before them; and presently the mule was sliding along the broad flags of its pavement.

Torquatus looked over his letters, and drew one out for the town. He was taken to a little inn of the poorest class by his guide, who was paid handsomely, and retired swearing and grumbling at the niggardliness of the traveller. He then inquired the way to the house of Cassianus, the schoolmaster, found it, and delivered his letter. He received as kind a welcome as if he had arrived at home; joined his host in a frugal meal, during which he learned the master's history.

A native of Fundi, he had started the school in Rome, with which we became acquainted at an early period of our history, and had proved eminently successful. But finding a persecution imminent, and his Christianity discovered, he had disposed of his school, and retired to his small native town, where he was promised, after the vacation, the children of the principal inhabitants. In a fellow-Christian he saw nothing but a brother; and as such he talked freely with him of his past adventures and his future prospects. A strange idea dashed through the mind of Torquatus, that some day that information might be turned into money.

It was still early when Torquatus took his leave, and, pretending to have some business in the town, he would not allow his host to accompany him. He bought himself some more respectable apparel, went to the best inn, and ordered a couple of horses, with a postilion to accompany him; for, to fulfil Fabiola's commission, it was necessary to ride forward quick, change his horses at each relay, and travel through the night. He did so, till he reached Bovillæ, on the skirts of the Alban hills. Here he rested, changed his travelling suit, and rode on gaily between the lines of tombs, which brought him to the gates of that city, within whose walls there was more of good and more of evil contained, than in any province of the empire.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE FALL.

TORQUATUS, now elegantly attired, proceeded at once to the house of Fabius, delivered his letter, answered all inquiries, and accepted, without much pressing, an invitation to supper that evening. He then went to seek a respectable lodging, suited to the present state of his purse; and easily found one.

Fabius, we have said, did not accompany his daughter into the country, and rarely visited her there. The fact was, that he had no love for green fields or running brooks; his tastes were for the gossip and free society of Rome. During the year, his daughter's presence was a restraint upon his liberty; but when she was gone, with her establishment, into Campania, his house presented scenes and entertained persons, that he would not have presumed to bring in contact with her. Men of profligate life surrounded his table; and deep drinking till late hours, with gambling and loose conversation, generally followed his sumptuous entertainments.

Having invited Torquatus to sup with him, he went forth in search of guests to meet him. He soon picked up a batch of sycophants, who were loitering about his known haunts, in readiness for invitations. But as he was sauntering home from the baths of Titus, he saw two men in a small grove round a temple earnestly conversing together. After a moment's look, he advanced towards them; but waited, at a small distance, for a pause in the dialogue, which was something to this effect:

"There is no doubt, then, about the news?"

"None at all. It is quite certain that the people have risen at Nicomedia and burnt down the church, as they call it, of the Christians, close to, and in sight of the palace. My father heard it from the emperor's secretary himself this morning."

"What ever possessed the fools to go and build a temple, in one of the most conspicuous places of the metropolis? They must have known that, sooner or later, the religious spirit of the nation would rise against them and destroy the eye-sore, as every exhibition of a foreign religion must be to an empire."

"To be sure, as my father says, these Christians, if they had any wit in them, would hide their heads, and slink into corners, when they are so condescendingly tolerated for a time by the most humane princes. But as they do not choose to do so, but will build temples in public instead of skulking in by-lanes, as they used to do, I for one am not sorry. One may gain some notoriety, and profit too, by hunting these odious people down, and destroying them if possible."

"Well, be it so; but to come to the purpose. It is understood between us, that when we discover who are Christians among the rich, and not too powerful at first, there shall be a fair division. We will aid one another. You propose bold and rough means; I will keep my counsel as to mine. But each shall reap all the profit from those whom he discovers; and his right proportion from those who are shared between us. Is it not so?"

"Exactly."

Fabius now stepped forward, with a hearty "How are you, Fulvius? I have not seen you for an age; come and sup with me to-day, I have friends engaged; and your friend, too,—Corvinus, I believe" (the gentleman alluded to made an uncouth bow), "will accompany you, I hope."

"Thank you," replied Fulvius; "but I fear I have an engagement already."

"Nonsense, man," said the good-natured knight; "there is nobody left in the city with whom you could sup, except myself. But has my house the plague, that you have never ventured into it, since you dined there with Sebastian, and quarrelled with him? Or did you get struck by some magical charm which has driven you away?"

Fulvius turned pale, and drew away Fabius to one side, while he said: "To tell the truth, something very like it."

"I hope," answered Fabius, somewhat startled, "that the black witch has been playing no tricks with you; I wish heartily she were out of my house. But, come," he continued in good humor, "I really thought you were struck by a better charm that evening. I have my eyes open; I saw how your heart was fixed on my little cousin Agnes."

Fulvius stared at him, with some amazement; and, after a pause, replied: "And if it was so, I saw that your daughter made up her mind, that no good should ever come out of it."

"Say you so? Then that explains your constant refusal to come to me again. But Fabiola is a philosopher, and understands nothing of such matters. I wish, indeed, she would give up her books, and think of settling herself in life, instead of preventing others. But I can give you better news than that; Agnes is as much attached to you as you can be to her."

"Is it possible? How can you happen to know it?"

"Why, then, to tell you what I should have told you long since, if you had not fought so shy of me, she confided it to me that very day."

"To you?"

"Yes, to me; those jewels of yours quite won her heart. She told me as much. I knew she could only mean you. Indeed, I am sure she meant you."

Fulvius understood these words of the rich gems which he displayed; while the knight spoke of the jewels which he imagined Agnes had received. She had proved, Fulvius was thinking, an easy prize, in spite of her demureness; and here lay fortune and rank open before him, if he could only manage his game; when Fabius thus broke in upon his dream, "Come, now, you have only to press your suit boldly; and I tell you, you will win it, whatever Fabiola may think. But you have nothing to fear from her now. She and all her servants are absent; her part of the house is closed, and we enter by the back-door to the more enjoyable part of the establishment."

"I will wait on you without fail," replied Fulvius. "And Corvinus with you," added Fabius, as he turned away.

We will not describe the banquet further than to say, that wines of rare excellence flowed so plentifully, that almost all the guests got, more or less, heated and excited. Fulvius, however, for one, kept himself cool.

The news from the East came into discussion. The destruction of the church at Nicomedia had been followed by incendiary fires in the imperial palace. Little doubt could exist that the Emperor Galerius was their author; but he charged them on the Christians; and thus goaded on the reluctant mind of Dioclesian to become their fiercest persecutor. Every one began to see that, before many months were over, the imperial edict to commence the work of destruction would reach Rome, and find in Maximian a ready executor.

The guests were generally inclined to gore the stricken deer; for generosity, in favor of those whom popular clamor hunts down, requires an amount of courage too heroic to be common.

Even the most liberal found reasons for Christians being excepted from all kind consideration. One could not bear their mysteriousness, another was vexed at their supposed progress; this man thought them opposed to the real glory of the empire, that considered them a foreign element, that ought to be eliminated from it. One thought their doctrine detestable, another their practice infamous. During all this debate, if it could be so called, where both sides came to the same conclusion, Fulvius, after having glanced from one to the other of the guests, had fixed his evil eye upon Torquatus.

The youth was silent; but his countenance, by turns, was pale and flushed. Wine had given him a rash courage, which some strong principle restrained. Now he clenched his hand, and pressed it to his breast; now he bit his lip. At one time he was crumbling the bread between his fingers; at another, he drank off, unconsciously, a cup of wine.

"These Christians hate us, and would destroy us all if they could," said one. Torquatus leaned forward, opened his lips, but remained silent.

"Destroy us, indeed! Did they not burn Rome, under Nero; and have they not just set fire to the palace in Asia, over the emperor's head?" asked a second. Torquatus rose upon his couch, stretched forth his hand, as if about to reply, but drew it back.

"But what is infinitely worse is, their maintaining such anti-social doctrines, conniving at such frightful excesses, and degrading themselves to the disgusting worship of an ass's head," proceeded a third. Torquatus now fairly writhed; and rising, had lifted his arm, when Fulvius, with a cool calculation of time and words, added, in bitter sarcasm: "Ay, and massacre a child, and devour his flesh and blood, at every assembly."*

The arm descended on the table, with a blow that made every goblet and beaker dance and ring, as, in a choked voice, Torquatus exclaimed: "It is a lie! a cursed lie!"

"How can you know that?" asked Fulvius, with his blandest tone and look.

"Because," answered the other, with great excitement, "I am myself a Christian; and ready to die for my faith!"

If the beautiful alabaster statue, with a bronze head, in the niche beside the table, had fallen forward, and been smashed on the marble pavement, it could not have caused a more fearful sensation than this sudden announcement. All were startled for a moment. Next, a long blank pause ensued, after which, each began to show his feelings in his features. Fabius looked exceedingly foolish, as if conscious that he had brought his guests into bad company. Calpurnius puffed himself out, evidently thinking himself ill-used, by having a guest brought in, who might absurdly be supposed to know more about Christians than himself. A young man opened his mouth as he stared at Torquatus; and a testy old gentleman was evidently hesitating, whether he should not knock down somebody or other, no matter whom. Corvinus looked at the poor Christian with the sort of grin of delight, half idiotic, half savage, with which a countryman might gaze upon the vermin that he finds in his trap in a morning. Here was a man ready to hand, to put on the rack, or gridiron, whenever he pleased. But the look of Fulvius was worth them all. If ever any microscopic observer has had the opportunity of witnessing the expression of the spider's features, when, after a long fast, it sees a fly, plump with others' blood, approach its net, and keenly watches every stroke of its wing, and studies how it can best throw the first thread round it, sure that then all that gorges it shall be its own; that we fancy would be the best image of his looks, as certainly it is of his feelings. To get hold of a Christian, ready to turn traitor, had long been his desire and study. Here, he was sure, was one, if he could only manage him. How did he know this? Because he knew sufficient of Christians to be convinced, that no genuine one would have allowed himself either to drink to excess, or to boast of his readiness to court martyrdom.

The company broke up; every body slunk away from the discovered Christian, as from one pest-stricken. He felt alone and depressed, when Fulvius, who had whispered a word to Corvinus, went up to him, and taking him by the hand said courteously: "I fear, I spoke inconsiderately, in drawing out from you a declaration which may prove dangerous."

"I fear nothing," replied Torquatus, again excited: "I will stand to my colors to the last."

"Hush, hush!" broke in Fulvius, "the slaves may betray you. Come with me to another chamber, where we can talk quietly together."

So saying, he led him into an elegant room, where Fabius had ordered goblets and flagons of the richest Falernian wine to be brought, for such as, according to Roman fashion, liked to enjoy a commissatio, or drinking-bout. But only Corvinus, engaged by Fulvius, followed.

On a beautifully inlaid table were dice. Fulvius, after plying Torquatus with more liquor, negligently took them up, and threw them playfully down, talking in the mean time on indifferent subjects. "Dear me!" he kept exclaiming, "what throws! It is well I am not playing with any one, or I should have been ruined. You try, Torquatus."

Gambling, as we learnt before, had been the ruin of Torquatus: for a transaction arising out of it he was in prison, when Sebastian converted him. As he took the dice into his hand, with no intention, as he thought, of playing, Fulvius watched him, as a lynx might its prey. Torquatus's eye flashed keenly, his lips quivered, his hand trembled. Fulvius at once recognized in all this, coupled with the poisoning of his hand, the knowing cast of the wrist, and the sharp eye to the value of the throw, the violence of a first temptation to resume a renounced vice.

"I fear you are not a better hand than I am at this stupid occupation," said he indifferently; "but, I dare say, Corvinus here will give you a chance, if you will stake something very low."

"It must be very low indeed,—merely for recreation; for I have renounced gambling. Once, indeed—but no matter."

"Come on," said Corvinus, whom Fulvius had pressed to his work by a look.

They began to throw for the most trifling stakes, and Torquatus generally won. Fulvius made him drink still, from time to time, and he became very talkative.

"Corvinus, Corvinus," he said at length, as if recollecting himself, "was not that the name that Cassianus mentioned?"

"Who?" asked the other, surprised.

"Yes, it was," continued Torquatus to himself,—"the bully, the big brute. Were you the person," he asked, looking up to Corvinus, "who struck that nice Christian boy Paneratus?"

Corvinus was on the point of bursting into a rage; but Fulvius checked him by a gesture, and said:

*The Heathen notion of the Blessed Eucharist.

"That Cassianus whom you mentioned is an eminent school-master; pray, where does he live?"

This he knew his companion wished to ascertain; and thus he quieted him. Torquatus answered:

"He lives, let me see,—no, no; I won't turn traitor. No; I am ready to be burnt, or tortured, or die for my faith; but I won't betray any one—that I won't."

"Let me take your place, Corvinus," said Fulvius, who saw Torquatus's interest in the game deepening. He put forth sufficient skill to make his antagonist more careful, and more intent. He threw down a somewhat larger stake. Torquatus, after a moment's pause of deliberation matched it. He won it. Fulvius seemed vexed. Torquatus threw back both sums. Fulvius seemed to hesitate, but put down an equivalent, and lost again. The play was now silent: each won and lost; but Fulvius had steadily the advantage; and he was the more collected of the two.

Once Torquatus looked up, and started. He thought he saw the good Polycarp behind his adversary's chair. He rubbed his eyes, and saw it was only Corvinus staring at him. All his skill was now put forth. Conscience had retreated; faith was wavering; grace had already departed. For the demon of covetousness, of rapine, of dishonesty, of recklessness, had come back, and brought with him seven spirits worse than himself, to that cleansed, but ill-guarded soul; and as they entered in, all that was holy, all that was good, departed.

At length, worked up, by repeated losses and draughts of wine, into a phrenzy, after he had drawn frequently upon the heavy purse which Fabiola had given him, he threw the purse itself upon the table. Fulvius coolly opened it, emptied it, counted the money, and placed opposite an equal heap of gold. Each prepared himself for a final throw. The fatal bones fell; each glanced silently upon their spots. Fulvius drew the money towards himself; Torquatus fell upon the table, his head buried and hidden within his arms. Fulvius motioned Corvinus out of the room.

Torquatus beat the ground with his foot; then moaned, next gnashed his teeth and growled; then put his finger in his hair, and began to pull and tear it. A voice whispered in his ear, "Are you a Christian?" Which of the seven spirits was it? surely the worst.

"It is hopeless," continued the voice; "you have disgraced your religion, and you have betrayed it, too."

"No, no," groaned the despairing wretch.

"Yes; in your drunkenness you have told us all: quite enough to make it impossible for you ever to return to those you have betrayed."

"Begone, begone," exclaimed piteously the tortured sinner. "They will forgive me still. God——"

"Silence; utter not His name: you are degraded, perjured, hopelessly lost. You are a beggar; to-morrow you must beg your bread. You are an outcast, a ruined prodigal and gambler. Who will look at you? will your Christian friends? And nevertheless you are a Christian; you will be torn to pieces by some cruel death for it; yet you will not be worshipped by them as one of their martyrs. You are a hypocrite, Torquatus, and nothing more."

"Who is it that is tormenting me?" he exclaimed, and looked up. Fulvius was standing with folded arms at his side. "And if all this be true, what is it to you? What have you to say more to me?" he continued.

"Much more than you think. You have betrayed yourself into my power completely. I am master of your money"—(and he showed him Fabiola's purse)—"of your character, of your peace, of your life. I have only to let your fellow Christians know what you have done, what you have said, what you have been to-night, and you dare not face them. I have only to let that 'bully—that big brute,' as you called him, but who is son of the prefect of the city, loose upon you, (and no one else can now restrain him after such provocation), and to-morrow you will be standing before his father's tribunal to die for that religion which you have betrayed and disgraced. Are you ready now, any longer to reel and stagger as a drunken gambler, to represent your Christianity before the judgment-seat in the Forum?"

The fallen man had not courage to follow the prodigal in repentance, as he had done in sin. Hope was dead in him; for he had relapsed into his capital sin, and scarcely felt remorse. He remained silent till Fulvius aroused him by asking, "Well, have you made your choice; either to go at once to the Christians with to-night on your head, or to-morrow to the court? Which do you choose?"

Torquatus raised his eyes to him, with a stolid look, and faintly answered, "Neither."

"Come, then, what will you do?" asked Fulvius, mastering him with one of his falcon glances.

"What you like," said Torquatus, "only neither of those things."

Fulvius sat down beside him and said, in a soft and soothing voice, "Now, Torquatus, listen to me; do as I tell you, and all is mended. You shall have house, and food, and apparel, ay, and money to play with, if you will only do my bidding."

"And what is that?"

"Rise to-morrow as usual; put on your Christian face; go among your friends; act as if nothing had happened; but answer all my questions, tell me every thing."

Torquatus groaned, "A traitor at last!"

"Call it what you will; that or death! Ay, death by inches, I hear Corvinus pacing impatiently up and down the court. Quick! which is it to be?"

"Not death! Oh, no! any thing but that!"

Fulvius went out, and found his friend fuming with rage and wine; he had hard work to pacify him. Corvinus had almost forgotten Cassianus in fresher resentments; but all his former hatred had been rekindled, and he burnt for revenge. Fulvius promised to find out where he lived, and used this means to secure the suspension of any violent and immediate measure.

Having sent Corvinus sulky and fretting home, he returned to Torquatus, whom he wished to accompany, that he might ascertain his lodgings. As soon as he had left the room, his victim had arisen from his chair, and endeavoured, by walking up and down, to steady his senses and regain self-possession. But it was in vain; his head was swimming from his inebriety, and his subsequent excitement. The apartment seemed to turn round and round, and float up and down; he was sick too, and his heart was beating almost audibly. Shame, remorse, self-contempt, hatred of his destroyers and of himself, the desolateness of the outcast, and the black despair of the reprobate, rolled like dark billows through his soul, each coming in turn uppermost. Unable to sustain himself longer on his feet, he threw himself on his face upon a silken couch, and buried his burning brow in his icy hands, and groaned. And still all whirled round and round him, and a constant moaning sounded in his ears.

Fulvius found him in this state, and touched his shoulder to rouse him. Torquatus shuddered, and was convulsed; then exclaimed: "Can this be Charybdis?"

PART SECOND—CONFLICT.

CHAPTER I.

THE scenes through which we have hitherto led our reader have been laid in one of those slippery truces, rather than peace, which often intervened between persecution and persecution. Already rumors of war have crossed our path, and its note of preparation has been distinctly heard. The roar of the lions near the Amphitheatre, which startled but dismayed not Sebastian, the reports from the East, the hints of Fulvius, and the threats of Corvinus have brought us the same news, that before long the horrors of persecution will re-appear, and Christian blood will have to flow in a fuller and nobler stream than had hitherto watered the Paradise of the New Law. The Church, ever calmly provident, cannot neglect the many signs of a threatened combat, nor the preparations necessary for meeting it. From the moment she earnestly begins to arm herself, we date the second period of our narrative. It is the commencement of conflict.

It was towards the end of October that a young man, not unknown to us, closely muffled up in his cloak, for it was dark and rather chill, might be seen threading his way through the narrow alleys of the district called the Suburra; a region, the extent and exact position of which is still under dispute, but which lay in the immediate vicinity of the Forum. As vice is unfortunately too often linked with poverty, the two found a common asylum here. Pancratius did not seem much at home in this part of the city, and made several wrong turns, till at length he found the street he was in search of. Still, without numbers on the doors, the house he wanted was an unsolved problem; although not quite insoluble. He looked for the neatest dwelling in the street; and being particularly struck with the cleanliness and good order of one beyond the rest, he boldly knocked at its door. It was opened by an old man, whose name has already appeared in our pages, Diogenes. He was tall and broad-shouldered, as if accustomed to bear burdens, which, however, had given him a stoop in his gait. His hair was a perfect silver, and hung down at the sides of a massive head; his features were strongly marked in deep melancholy lines, and though the expression of his countenance was calm, it was solemnly sad. He looked like one who had lived much among the dead, and was happiest in their company. His two sons, Majus and Severus, fine athletic youths were with him. The first was busy carving, or scratching rather, a rude epitaph on an old slab of marble, the reverse of which still bore traces of a heathen sepulchral inscription, rudely effaced by its new possessor. Pancratius looked over the work in hand and smiled; there was hardly a word rightly spelt, or a part of speech correct; indeed, here it is:

* Diogenes, the excavator, deposited in peace eight days before the first of October.—From St. Sebastian's, Boldetti, t. 15, p. 69.

DE BIANOBA

POLLECLA QVE ORDEV BENDET DE BIANOBA.*

The other son was making a rough design, in which could be distinguished Jonas devoured by the whale, and Lazarus raised from the dead, both most conventionally drawn with charcoal on a board; a sketch evidently for a more permanent painting elsewhere. Further, it was clear, that when the knock came to the door, old Diogenes was busy fitting a new handle to an old pick-axe. These varied occupations in one family might have surprised a modern, but they did not at all the youthful visitor; he well knew that the family belonged to the honorable and religious craft of the FOSSORES, or excavators of the Christian cemeteries. Indeed, Diogenes was the head, and director of that confraternity. In conformity with the assertion of an anonymous writer, contemporary with St. Jerome, some modern antiquarians have considered the fossor as forming a lesser ecclesiastical order in the primitive Church, like the lector, or reader. But although this opinion is untenable, it is extremely probable that the duties of this office were in the hands of persons appointed and recognized by ecclesiastical authority. The uniform system pursued in excavating, arranging and filling up of the numerous cemeteries round Rome, a system, too, so complete from the beginning, as not to leave positive signs of improvement or change as time went on, gives us reason to conclude that these wonderful and venerable works were carried on under one direction, and probably by some body associated for that purpose. It was not a cemetery or necropolis company, which made a speculation of burying the dead, but rather a pious and recognized confraternity, which was associated for the purpose.

A series of interesting inscriptions, found in the cemetery of St. Agnes, proves that this occupation was continued in particular families; grandfather, father, and sons, having carried it on in the same place.† We can thus easily understand the great skill, and uniformity of practice observable in the catacombs. But the fossores had evidently a higher office, or even jurisdiction, in that underground world. Though the Church provided space for the burial of all her children, it was natural that some should make some compensation for their place of sepulture, if chosen in a favorite spot, such as the vicinity of a martyr's tomb. These sextons had the management of such transactions, which are often recorded in the ancient cemeteries. The following inscription is preserved in the Capitol:

EMPTV LOCVM AB ARTEMISIVM VISOMVM HOC EST
ET PRAETIVM DATVM FOSSORI HILARO IDEST
FOL NOOD PRAESENTIA SEVERI FOSS ET LAVRENTI.

That is—

"This is the grave for two bodies, bought by Artemisius; and the price was given to the Fossor Hilarius—that is, pure . . . . In the presence of Severus the Fossor and Laurentius."

Possibly the last named was the witness on the purchaser's side, and Severus on the seller's. However this may be, we trust we have laid before our readers all that is known about the profession, as such, of Diogenes and his sons.

We left Pancratius amused at Majus's rude attempts in glyptic art; his next step was to address him.

"Do you always execute these inscriptions yourself?"

"Oh, no," answered the artist, looking up and smiling, "I do them for poor people, who cannot afford to pay a better hand. This was a good woman who kept a shop in the Viano-va, and you may suppose did not become rich, especially as she was very honest. And yet a curious thought struck me as I was carving her epitaph."

* "From New Street. Pollecla who sells barley in New Street." Found in the cemetery of Callistus.

† Given by F. Marchi in his Architecture of Subterranean Christian Rome, 1844; a work on which we will freely draw.

‡ The number, unfortunately, is not intelligible being in cipher.

"Let me hear it, Majus."

"It was, that perhaps some thousand years hence or more, Christians might read with reverence my scratches on the wall, and hear of poor old Pollecla and her barley-stall with interest, while the inscription of not a single emperor, who persecuted the Church would be read or even known."

"Well, I can hardly imagine that the superb mausoleums of sovereigns will fall to utter decay, and yet the memory of a market-wife descend to distant ages. But what is your reason for thinking thus?"

"Simply because I would sooner commit to the keeping of posterity the memory of the pious poor than that of the wicked rich. And my rude record may possibly be read when triumphal arches have been demolished. It's dreadfully written though, is it not?"

"Never mind that; its simplicity is worth much fine writing. What is that slab against the wall?"

"Ah, that is a beautiful inscription brought us to put up; you will see the writer and engraver were different people. It is to go to the cemetery at the Lady Agnes's villa, on the Nomentan way. I believe it is in memory of a most sweet child, whose death is deeply felt by its virtuous parents." Pancratius took a light to it, and read as follows:

"The innocent boy Dionysius lieth here among the saints. Remember us in your holy prayers, the writer and the engraver."

"Dear, happy child!" continued Pancratius, when he had perused the inscription; "add me, the reader, to the writer and carver of thine epitaph, in thy holy prayers."

"Amen," answered the pious family.

But Pancratius, attracted by a certain husky sound in Diogenes's voice, turned round, and saw the old man vigorously trying to cut off the end of a little wedge which he had driven into the top of the handle of his pick-axe, to keep it fast in the iron; but every moment baffled by some defect in his vision, which he removed by drawing the back of his brawny hand across his eyes. "What is the matter, my good old friend?" said the youth kindly. "Why does this epitaph of young Dionysius particularly affect you?"

"It does not of itself; but it reminds me of so much that is past, and suggests so much that may be about to come, that I feel almost faint to think of either."

"What are your painful thoughts, Diogenes?"

"Why, do you see, it is all simple enough to take into one's arms a good child like Dionysius, wrapped in his cerecloth, fragrant with spices, and lay him in his grave. His parents may weep, but his passage from sorrow to joy was easy and sweet. It is a very different thing, and requires a heart as hardened as mine by practice" (another stroke of the hand across the eyes) "to gather up hastily the torn flesh and broken limbs of such another youth, to wrap them hurriedly in their winding sheet, then fold them into another sheet full of lime, instead of balsam, and shove them precipitately into their tomb.* How differently one would wish to treat a martyr's body!"

"True, Diogenes; but a brave officer prefers the plain soldier's grave, on the field of battle, to the carved sarcophagus on the Via Appia. But are such scenes as you describe common in times of persecution?"

"By no means uncommon, my good young master. I am sure a pious youth like you must have visited, on his anniversary, the tomb of Restitutus in the cemetery of Hermes."

"Indeed I have, and often have I been almost jealous of his early martyrdom. Did you bury him?"

"Yes; and his parents had a beautiful tomb made, the arcosolium of his crypt.† My father and I made it of six slabs of marble, hastily collected, and I engraved the inscription now beside it. I think I carved better than Majus there," added the old man, now quite cheerful.

"That is not saying much for yourself, father," rejoined his son no less smiling; "but here is the copy of the inscription which you wrote," he added, drawing out a parchment from a number of sheets.

"I remember it perfectly," said Pancratius, glancing over it, and reading it as follows, correcting the errors in orthography, but not those in grammar, as he read:

AELIO FABIO RESTVTO
FILIO PIISSIMO PARI N
TES FECERVNT QVIVI
XIT ANNI. S XVIII MENS
VII INIRENE.

"To Ælius Fabius Restitutus, their most pious son, his parents erected (this tomb), Who lived eighteen years and seven months. In peace."

He continued: "What a glorious youth, to have confessed Christ at such an age."

"No doubt," replied the old man; "But I dare say you have always thought that his body reposes alone in his sepulchre. Anyone would think so from the inscription."

"Certainly, I have always thought it so. Is it otherwise?"

"Yes, noble Pancratius, he has a comrade younger than himself lying in the same bed. As we were closing the tomb of Restitutus, the body of a boy not more than twelve or thirteen years old was brought to us. Oh, I shall never forget the sight! He had been hung over a fire, and his head, trunk, and limbs nearly to the knees, were burnt to the very bone; and so disfigured was he, that no feature could be recognized. Poor little fellow, what he must have suffered! But why should I pity him? Well, we were pressed for time; and we thought the youth of eighteen would not grudge room for his fellow-soldier of twelve, but would own him for a younger brother; so we laid him at Ælius Fabius's feet. But we had no second phial of blood to put outside, that a second martyr might be known to lie there; for the fire had dried his blood up in his veins."‡

"What a noble boy! If the first was older, the second was younger than I. What say you, Diogenes, don't you think it likely you may have to perform the same office for me one of these days?"

"Oh, no, I hope not," said the old digger, with a return of his husky voice. "Do not, I entreat you, allude to such a possibility. Surely my own time must come sooner. How the old trees are spared, indeed, and the young plants cut down."

* In the cemetery of St. Agnes, pieces of lime have been found in tombs forming exact moulds of different parts of the body, with the impression of a finer linen inside, and a coarser outside. As to spices and balsams, Tertullian observes that "the Arabs and Sabæans well know that the Christians annually consume more for their dead than the heathen world did for its gods."

† These terms will be explained later.

‡ On the 22nd of April, 1823, this tomb was discovered unviolated. On being opened, the bones, white, bright, and polished as ivory were found, corresponding to the framework of a youth of eighteen. At his head was the phial of blood. With his head to his feet was the skeleton of a boy, of twelve or thirteen, black and charred chiefly at the head and upper parts, down to the middle of the thigh-bones, from which to the feet the bones gradually whitened. The two bodies, richly clothed, repose side by side under the altar of the Jesuits' college

"Come, come, my good friend, I won't afflict you. But I have almost forgotten to deliver the message I came to bring. It is, that to-morrow at dawn, you must come to my mother's house, to arrange about preparing the cemeteries, for our coming trouble. Our holy Pope will be there, with the priests of the titles, the regionary deacons, the notaries, whose number has been filled up, and you, the head fossor, that all may act in concert."

"I will not fail, Paneratius," replied Diogenes.

"And now," added the youth, "I have a favor to ask you."

"A favor from me?" asked the old man surprised.

"Yes; you will have to begin your work immediately, I suppose. Now, often as I have visited, for devotion, our sacred cemeteries, I have never studied or examined them: and this I should like to do with you, who know them so well."

"Nothing would give me greater pleasure," answered Diogenes, somewhat flattered by the compliment, but still more pleased by this love for what he so much loved. "After I have received my instructions, I shall go at once to the cemetery of Callistus. Meet me out of the Porta Capena, half an hour before mid-day, and we will go together."

"But I shall not be alone," continued Paneratius. "Two youths, recently baptized, desire much to become acquainted with our cemeteries, which they do not yet much know; and have asked me to initiate them there."

"Any friends of yours will be always welcome. What are their names, that we may make no mistake?"

"One is Tiburtius, the son of Chromatius, the late prefect; the other is a young man named Torquatus."

Severus started a little, and said: "Are you quite sure about him, Paneratius?"

Diogenes rebuked him, saying, "That he comes to us in Paneratius's company is security enough."

"I own," interposed the youth, "that I do not know as much about him as about Tiburtius, who is really a gallant, noble fellow. Torquatus is, however, very anxious to obtain all information about our affairs, and seems in earnest. What makes you fear, Severus?"

"Only a trifle, indeed. But as I was going early to the cemetery this morning, I turned into the Baths of Antoninus."

"What!" interrupted Paneratius, laughing, "do you frequent such fashionable resorts?"

"Not exactly," replied the honest artist; "but you are not perhaps aware that Cucumio the capsarius and his wife are Christians?"

"Is it possible? where shall we find them next?"

"Well, so it is; and moreover they are making a tomb for themselves in the cemetery of Callistus: and I had to show them Majus's inscription for it."

"Here it is," said the latter, exhibiting it, as follows:

CVCVMIO ET VICTORIA
SE VIVOS FECERVNT
CAPSARARIVS DE ANTONINIANAS. †

"Capital!" exclaimed Paneratius, amused at the blunders in the epitaph; "but we are forgetting Torquatus."

"As I entered the building, then," said Severus, "I was not a little surprised to find in one corner, at that early hour this Torquatus in close conversation with the present prefect's son, Corvinus, the pretended cripple, who thrust himself into Agnes's house, you remember, when some charitable unknown person (God bless him!) gave large alms to the poor there. Not good company I thought, and at such an hour for a Christian."

"True, Severus," returned Paneratius, blushing deeply; "but he is young as yet in the faith, and probably his old friends do not know of his change. We will hope for the best."

The two young men offered to accompany Paneratius, who rose to leave, and see him safe through the poor and profligate neighborhood. He accepted the courtesy with pleasure, and bade the old excavator a hearty good night.

CHAPTER II.

M. ANTONI
VS. RESTVTV
S. FECIT . YPO
GEVSIBI . ET
SVIS . FIDENTI
BVS . IN . DOMINO

It seems to us as though we had neglected one, whose character and thoughts opened this little history, the pious Lucina. Her virtues were indeed of that quiet, unobtrusive nature, which affords little scope for appearing on a public scene, or taking part in general affairs. Her house, besides being, or rather containing, a title or parochial church, was now honored by being the residence of the supreme Pontiff. The approach of a violent persecution, in which the rulers of Christ's spiritual kingdom were sure to be the first sought out, as the enemies of Cæsar, rendered it necessary to transfer the residence of the Ruler of the Church, from his ordinary dwelling, to a securer asylum. For this purpose Lucina's house was chosen; and it continued to be so occupied, to her great delight, in that and the following pontificate, when the wild beasts were ordered to be transferred to it, that Pope Marcellus might feed them at home. This loathsome punishment soon caused his death.

Lucina admitted, at forty,† into the order of deaconesses, found plenty of occupation in the duties of her office. The charge and supervision of the women in the church, the care of the sick and poor of her own sex, the making, and keeping in order of sacred vestments and linen for the altar, and the instruction of children and female converts preparing for baptism, as well as the attending them at that sacred rite, belonged to the deaconesses, and gave sufficient occupation in addition to domestic offices. In the exercise of both these classes of duties, Lucina quietly passed her life. Its main object seemed to be attained. Her son had offered himself to God; and lived ready to shed his blood for the faith. To watch over him, and pray for him, were her delight, rather than an additional employment.

Early in the morning of the appointed day, the meeting mentioned in our last chapter took place. It will be sufficient to say, that in it full instructions were given for increasing the collection of alms, to be employed in enlarging the cemeteries and burying the dead, in succoring those driven to concealment by persecution, in nourishing prisoners, and obtaining access to them, and finally in ransoming or rescuing the bodies of martyrs. A notary was named for each region, to collect their acts and record interesting events. The cardinals, or titular priests, received instructions about the administration of sacraments, particularly of the Holy Eucharist, during the persecution; and to each was intrusted one cemetery or more, in whose subterranean church he was to perform the sacred mysteries. The holy Pontiff chose for himself that of Callistus, which made Diogenes, its chief sexton, not a little, but innocently, proud.

The good old excavator seemed rather more cheery than * Better known as Carnocella's.

† The person who had charge of the bathers' clothes, from capsa, chest.

‡ Cucumio and Victoria made (the tomb) for themselves while living. Capsarius of the Antonines (baths). Found in the cemetery of Callistus, first published by F. Marchi, who attributes it, erroneously, to the cemetery of Prætextatus.

* "Marcus Antonius Restitutus made this subterranean for himself and his family, that trust in the Lord." Lately found in the cemetery of SS. Nereus and Achilleus. It is singular that in the inscription of the martyr Restitutus, given in the last chapter, as in this, a syllable should be omitted in the name, one easily slurred in pronouncing it.

† Sixty was the full age, but admission was given sometimes at forty.

otherwise, under the exciting forebodings of a coming persecution. No commanding officer of engineers could have given his orders more briskly, or more decidedly, for the defence of a fortified city committed to his skill to guard, than he issued his to the subordinate superintendents of the various cemeteries round Rome, who met him by appointment at his own house, to learn the instructions of the superior assembly. The shadow of the sun-dial at the Porta Capena was pointing to mid-day, as he issued from it with his sons, and found already waiting the three young men. They walked in parties of two along the Appian road; and at nearly two miles from the gate,* they entered by various ways (slipping round different tombs that lined the road) into the same villa on the right hand. Here they found all the requisites for a descent into the subterranean cemeteries, such as candles, lanterns, and the instruments for procuring light. Severus proposed that, as the guides and the strangers were in equal number, they should be divided into pairs; and in the division he allotted Torquatus to himself. What his reason was we may easily conjecture.

It would probably weary our readers to follow the whole conversation of the party. Diogenes not only answered all questions put to him, but, from time to time, gave intelligent little lectures, on such objects as he considered peculiarly attractive. But we believe we shall better interest and inform our friends, if we digest the whole matter of these into a more connected narrative. And besides, they will wish to know something of the subsequent history of those wonderful excavations, into which we have conducted our youthful pilgrims.

The history of the early Christian cemeteries, the Catacombs, as they are commonly called, may be divided into three portions: from their beginning to the period of our narrative, or a few years later; from this term to the eight century; then down to our own time, when we have reason to hope that a new epoch is being commenced.

We have generally avoided using the name of catacombs, because it might mislead our readers into an idea that this was either the original or a generic name of those early Christian crypts. It is not so, however: Rome might be said to be surrounded by a circumvallation of cemeteries, sixty or thereabouts in number, each of which was generally known by the name of some saint or saints whose bodies reposed there. Thus we have the cemeteries of SS. Nereus and Achilleus, of St. Agnes, of St. Pancratius, of Prætextatus, Priscilla, Hermes, &c. Sometimes these cemeteries were known by the names of the places where they existed.† The cemetery of St. Sebastian, which was called sometimes Cæmeterium ad Sanctam Cæciliam,‡ and by other names, had among them that of Ad Catacumbas,§ The meaning of this word is completely unknown; though it may be attributed to the circumstance of the relics of SS. Peter and Paul having been for a time buried there, in a crypt still existing near the cemetery. This term became the name of that particular cemetery, then was generalized, till we familiarly call the whole system of these underground excavations—the Catacombs.

Their origin was, in the last century, a subject of controversy. Following two or three vague and equivocal passages, some learned writers pronounced the catacombs to have been originally heathen excavations, made to extract sand, for the building of the city. These sand-pits were called arenaria, and so occasionally are the Christian cemeteries. But a more scientific and minute examination, particularly made by the accurate F. Marehi, has completely confuted this theory. The entrance to the catacombs was often, as can yet be seen, from these sand-pits, which are themselves underground, and no doubt were a convenient cover for the cemetery; but several circumstances prove that they were never used for Christian burial, nor converted into Christian cemeteries.

The man who wishes to get the sand out of the ground will keep his excavation as near as may be to the surface; will have it of easiest possible access, for drawing out materials; and will make it as ample as is consistent with the safety of the roof, and the supply of what he is seeking. And all this we find in the arenaria still abounding around Rome. But the catacombs are constructed on principles exactly contrary to all these.

The catacomb dives at once, generally by a steep flight of steps, below the stratum of loose and friable sand,* into that where it is indurated to the hardness of a tender, but consistent rock; on the surface of which every stroke of the pick-axe is yet distinctly traceable. When you have reached this depth you are in the first story of the cemetery, for you descend again by stairs, to the second and third below, all constructed on the same principle.

A catacomb may be divided into three parts, its passages or streets, its chambers or squares, and its churches. The passages are long, narrow galleries, cut with tolerable regularity, so that the roof and floor are at right angles with the sides, often so narrow as scarcely to allow two persons to go abreast. They sometimes run quite straight to a great length; but they are crossed by others, and these again by others, so as to form a complete labyrinth, or net-work, of subterranean corridors. To be lost among them would easily be fatal.

But these passages are not constructed, as the name would imply, merely to lead to something else. They are themselves the catacomb or cemetery. Their walls, as well as the sides of the staircases, are honeycombed with graves, that is, with rows of excavations, large and small, of sufficient length to admit a human body, from a child to a full-grown man, laid with its side to the gallery. Sometimes there are as many as fourteen, sometimes as few as three or four, of these rows, one above the other. They are evidently so made to measure, that it is probable the body was lying by the side of the grave, while this was being dug.

When the corpse, wrapped up, as we heard from Diogenes, was laid in its narrow cell, the front was hermetically closed either by a marble slab or more frequently by several broad tiles, put edgewise in a groove or mortice, cut for them in the rock, and cemented all round. The inscription was cut upon the marble, or scratched in the wet mortar. Thousands of the former sort have been collected, and may be seen in museums and churches; many of the latter have been copied and published; but by far the greater number of tombs are anonymous, and have no record upon them. And now the reader may reasonably ask through what period does the interment in the catacombs range, and how are its limits determined. We will try to content him, as briefly as possible.

There is no evidence of the Christians having ever buried anywhere anteriorly to the construction of catacombs. Two principles as old as Christianity regulate this mode of burial. The first is, the manner of Christ's entombment. He was laid in a grave in a cavern, wrapped up in linen, embalmed with spices; and a stone, sealed up, closed His sepulchre. As St. Paul so often proposes Him for the model of our resurrection, and speaks of our being buried with Him in baptism, it was natural for His disciples to wish to be buried after His example, so to be ready to rise with Him.

This lying in wait for resurrection was the second thought that guided the formation of these cemeteries. Every expression connected with them alluded to the rising again. The word to bury is unknown in Christian inscriptions. "Deposited in peace," "the deposition of —," are the expressions used; that is, the dead are but left there for a time, till called for again, as a pledge, or precious thing, intrusted to faithful, but temporary, keeping. The very name of cemetery suggests that it is only a place where many lie, as in a dormitory, slumbering for a while, till dawn come, and the trumpet's sound awake them. Hence the grave is only called "the place," or more technically, "the small home," of the dead in Christ.

* Now St. Sebastian's. The older Porta Capena was nearly a mile within the present.

† As Ad Nymphas, Ad Ursam pileatum, inter duas lauros, Ad Sextum Philippi, &c.

‡ The cemetery at St. Cecilia's tomb.

§ Formed apparently of a Greek preposition and a Latin verb,

* That is, the red volcanic sand called puzzolana, so much prized for making Roman cement. † Locus, loculus.

These two ideas, which are combined in the planning of the catacombs, were not later insertions into the Christian system, but must have been more vivid in its earlier times. They inspired abhorrence of the pagan custom of burning the dead; nor have we a hint that this mode was, at any time, adopted by Christians.

But ample proof is to be found in the catacombs themselves of their early origin. The style of paintings, yet remaining, belongs to a period of still flourishing art. Their symbols, and the symbolical taste itself, are characteristic of a very ancient period. For this peculiar taste declined as time went on. Although inscriptions with dates are rare, yet out of ten thousand collected, and about to be published, by the learned and sagacious Cavalier De Rossi, about three hundred are found bearing consular dates, through every period, from the early emperors to the middle of the fourth century (A.D. 350). Another curious and interesting custom furnishes us with dates on tombs. At the closing of the grave, the relations or friends, to mark it, would press into its wet plaster, and leave there, a coin, a cameo, or engraved gem, sometimes even a shell or pebble; probably that they might find the sepulchre again, especially where no inscription was left. Many of these objects continue to be found; many have been long collected. But it is not uncommon, where the coin, or, to speak scientifically, the medal, has fallen from its place, to find a mould of it left, distinct and clear in the cement, which equally gives its date. This is sometimes of Domitian, or other early emperors.

It may be asked, wherefore this anxiety to rediscover with certainty the tomb? Besides motives of natural piety, there is one constantly recorded on sepulchral inscriptions. In England, if want of space prevented the full date of a person's death being given, we should prefer chronicling the year to the day of the month when it occurred. It is more historical. No one cares about remembering the day on which a person died without the year; but the year without the day is an important recollection. Yet while so few ancient Christian inscriptions supply the year of people's deaths, thousands give us the very day of it, on which they died, whether in the hopefulness of believers or in the assurance of martyrs. This is easily explained. Of both classes, annual commemoration had to be made on the very day of their departure; and accurate knowledge of this was necessary. Therefore it alone was recorded.

In a cemetery close to the one in which we have left our three youths, with Diogenes and his sons*, were lately found inscriptions mingled together, belonging to both orders of the dead. One in Greek, after mentioning the "Deposition of Augenda on the 13th day before the Calends, or 1st of June," adds this simple address:

ΖΗΤΑΙ ΕΝΚΩ ΚΑΙ
ΕΡΩΤΑ ΥΠΕΡ ΗΜΩΝ

"Live in the Lord, and pray for us."

Another fragment is as follows:

.... N. IVN—
..... IVIBAS—
IN PACE ET PETE
PRO NOBIS

"... Nones of June . . . Live in peace, and pray for us."

This is a third:

VICTORIA · REFRIGERER [ET]
ISSPIRITVS · TVS IN BONO

"Victoria, be refreshed, and may thy spirit be in enjoyment."
(good).

This last reminds us of a most peculiar inscription found scratched in the mortar beside a grave in the cemetery of Prætextatus, not many yards from that of Callistus. It is remarkable, first, for being in Latin, written with Greek letters; then, for containing a testimony of the divinity of our Lord; lastly, for expressing a prayer for the refreshment of the departed. We fill up the portions of the words wanting, from the falling out of part of the plaster.

* That of SS. Nereus and Achilleus.

BENE	MERENTI	SORORI	BON
		VII	KAL
		NOB
	ΑΕ		ΚΤΙ
	ΟΥC		PIT
	XPTC		ΤΟΥ
	ΤΟΥC		ΡΕΦ
	ΟΝΝ		ΙΓΕΡΕ
	ΙΤΟ		ΙΝ
	ΤΕC		✠

"To the well-deserving sister Bon . . . The eighth day before the calends of Nov. Christ God Almighty refresh thy spirit in Christ."

In spite of this digression on prayers inscribed over tombs, the reader will not, we trust, have forgotten that we were establishing the fact that the Christian cemeteries of Rome owe their origin to the earliest ages. We have now to state down to what period they were used. After peace was restored to the Church, the devotion of the Christians prompted them to desire burials near the martyrs, and holy people of an earlier age. But, generally speaking, they were satisfied to lie under the pavement. Hence, the sepulchral stones which are often found in the rubbish of the catacombs, and sometimes in their places, bearing consular dates of the fourth century, are thicker, larger, better carved, and in a less simple style than those of an earlier period, placed upon the walls. But before the end of that century, these monuments become rarer; and interment in the catacombs ceased in the following, at latest. Pope Damasus, who died in 384, reverently shrunk, as he tells us in his own epitaph, from intruding into the company of the saints.

Restitutus, therefore, whose sepulchral tablet we gave for a title to our chapter, may well be considered as speaking in the name of the early Christians, and claiming as their own exclusive work and property, the thousand miles of subterranean city, with their six millions of slumbering inhabitants, who trust in the Lord, and await His resurrection.*

CHAPTER III.

WHAT DIOGENES COULD NOT TELL ABOUT THE CATACOMBS.

DIOGENES lived during the first period in the history of the cemeteries, though near its close. Could he have looked into their future fate, he would have seen, near at hand, an epoch that would have gladdened his heart, to be followed by one that would have deeply afflicted him. Although, therefore, the matter of this chapter have no direct bearing upon our narrative, it will serve essentially to connect it with the present topography of its scene.

When peace and liberty were restored to the Church, these cemeteries became places of devotion, and of great resort. Each of them was associated with the name of one, or the names of several, of the more eminent martyrs buried in it; and, on their anniversaries, crowds of citizens and of pilgrims thronged to their tombs, where the Divine mysteries were offered up, and the homily delivered in their praise. Hence began to be compiled the first martyrologies, or calendars of martyrs' days, which told the faithful whither to go. "At Rome, on the Salarian, or the Appian, or the Ardeatine way," such are the indications almost daily read in the Roman mar-

* So F. Marchi calculates them, after diligent examination. We may mention here that, in the construction of these cemeteries, the sand extracted from one gallery was removed into another already excavated. Hence many are now found completely filled up.

tyrology, now swelled out, by the additions of later ages.*

An ordinary reader of the book hardly knows the importance of these indications; for they have served to verify several otherwise dubious cemeteries. Another class of valuable writers also comes to our aid; but before mentioning them we will glance at the changes which this devotion produced in the cemeteries. First, commodious entrances, with easy staircases, were made; then walls were built to support the crumbling galleries; and, from time to time, funnel-shaped apertures in the vaults were opened to admit light and air. Finally, basilicas or churches were erected over their entrances, generally leading immediately to the principal tomb, then called the confession of the church. The pilgrim thus, on arriving at the holy city, visited each of these churches, a custom yet practised; descended below, and without having to grope his way about, went direct, by well-constructed passages, to the principal martyr's shrine, and so on to others, perhaps equally objects of reverence and devotion.

During this period, no tomb was allowed to be opened, no body to be extracted. Through apertures made into the grave, handkerchiefs or scarfs, called brandea, were introduced, to touch the martyr's relics; and these were carried to distant countries, to be held in equal reverence. No wonder that St. Ambrose, St. Gaudentius, and other bishops, should have found it so difficult to obtain bodies, or large relics of martyrs for their churches. Another sort of relics consisted of what was called familiarly the oil of a martyr, that is, the oil, often mixed with a balsam, which burned in a lamp beside his tomb. Often a round stone pillar, three feet or so in height, and scooped out at the top, stands beside a monument; probably to hold the lamp, or serve for the distribution of its contents. St. Gregory the Great wrote to Queen Theodelinda, that he sent her a collection of the oils of the popes who were martyrs. The list which accompanied them was copied by Mabillon in the treasury of Monza, and republished by Ruinart.† It exists there yet, together with the very phials containing them, sealed up in metal tubes.

This jealousy of disturbing the saints, is displayed most beautifully in an incident, related by St. Gregory of Tours. Among the martyrs most honored in the ancient Roman Church were St. Chrysanthus and Daria. Their tombs became so celebrated for cures, that their fellow-Christians built (that is excavated) over them a chamber, with a vault of beautiful workmanship, where crowds of worshippers assembled. This was discovered by the heathens, and the emperor closed them in, walled up the entrance, and from above, probably through the luminare, or ventilating shaft, showered down earth and stones, and buried the congregation alive, as the two holy martyrs had been before them. The place was unknown at the peace of the Church, till discovered by Divine manifestation. But instead of being permitted to enter again into this hallowed spot, pilgrims were merely allowed to look at it, through a window opened in the wall, so as to see not only, the tombs of the martyrs, but also the bodies of those who had been buried alive at their shrines. And as the cruel massacre had taken place while preparations were being made for oblation of the holy Eucharist, there were still to be seen lying about, the silver cruets in which the wine was brought for that spotless sacrifice.‡

* One or two entries from the old Kalendarium Romanum will illustrate this:

“iii. Non. Mart. Lucii in Callisti.

vi. Id. Dec. Eutichiani in Callisti.

xiii. Kal. Feb. Fabiani in Callisti, et Sebastiani ad Ostacumbas.

viii. Id. Aug. Syati in Callisti.”

We have extracted these entries of depositions in the cemetery of Callistus because, while actually writing this chapter, we have received news of the discovery of the tombs and lapidary inscriptions of every one of these Popes, together with those of St. Antherus, in one chapel of the newly-ascertained cemetery of Callistus, with an inscription in verso by St. Damasus:

“Frid. Kal. Jan. Sylvestri in Priscille.

iv. Id. (Aug.) Laurentii in Tiburtina.

iii. Kal. Dec. Saturnini in Thraseonis.”

Published by Ruinart,—Acta, tom. iii.

† Acta Martyr. tom. iiii.

‡ S. Greg. Turon. de Gloria Mart. lib. i. c. 28, ap. Marchi, p. 81. One would apply St. Damasus's epigram on these martyrs to this occurrence, Carm xxviii.

It is clear that pilgrims resorting to Rome would want a handbook to the cemeteries that they might know what they had to visit. It is likewise but natural that, on their return home, they may have sought to edify their less fortunate neighbors by giving an account of what they had seen. Accordingly there exist, no less fortunately for us than for their untravelled neighbors, several records of this character. The first place, among these, is held by catalogues compiled in the fourth century; one, of the places of sepulture of Roman Pontiffs, the other of martyrs.* After these comes three distinct guides to the catacombs; the more interesting because they take different rounds, yet agree marvellously in their account.

To show the value of these documents, and describe the changes which took place in the catacombs during the second period of their history, we will give a brief account of one discovery, in the cemetery where we have left our little party. Among the rubbish near the entrance of a catacomb, the name of which was yet doubtful, and which had been taken for that of Prætextatus, was found a fragment of a slab of marble which had been broken across obliquely, from left to right, with the following letters:

The young Cavalier de Rossi at once declared that this was part of the sepulchral inscription of the holy Pope Cornelius; that probably his tomb would be found below, in a distinguished form; and that as the itineraries above mentioned concurred in placing it in the cemetery of Callistus, this, and not the one at St. Sebastian's, a few hundred yards off, must claim the honor of that name. He went further, and foretold that as these works pronounced St. Cyprian to be buried near Cornelius, there would be found something at the tomb which would account for that idea; for it was known that his body rested in Africa. It was not long before every prediction was verified. The great staircase discovered‡ was found to lead at once to a wider space, carefully secured by brick-work of the time of peace, and provided with light and air from above. On the left was a tomb, cut like others in the rock, without any exterior arch over it. It was, however, large and ample; and except one, very high above it, there were no other graves below, or over, or at the sides. The remaining portion of the slab was found within it; the first piece was brought from the Kircherian Museum, where it had been deposited, and exactly fitted to it; and both covered the tomb, thus:

Below, reaching from the lower edge of this stone to the ground was a marble slab covered with an inscription, of which only the left-hand end remains, the rest being broken off and lost. Above the tomb was another slab let into the sand-stone, of which the right-hand end exists, and a few more fragments have been recovered in the rubbish; not enough to make out the lines, but sufficient to show it was an inscription in verse, by Pope Damasus. How is this authorship traceable? Very easily. Not only do we know that this holy pope, already mentioned, took pleasure in putting verses, which he loved to write, on the tombs of martyrs,|| but the number of inscrip-

* Published by Boucherius in 1634.

† (Of) . . . nelius martyr.

‡ The crypt, we believe, was discovered before the stairs.

§ Of Cornelius Martyr Bishop.

|| These form the great bulk of his extant works in verse.

tions of his yet extant exhibit a particular and very elegant form of letters, known among antiquarians by the name of "Damasian." The fragments of this marble bear portions of verses, in this character.

To proceed : on the wall, right of the tomb, and on the same plane, were painted two full-length figures in sacerdotal garments, with glories round their heads, evidently of Byzantine work of the seventh century. Down the wall, by the left side of each, letter below letter, were their names ; some letters were effaced, which we supply in italics as follow :

SCI ✕ CORNELI SCI ✕ CIPRIANI.*

We here see how a foreigner, reading these two inscriptions, with the portraits, and knowing that the Church commemorates the two martyrs on the same day, might easily be led to suppose, that they were here deposited together. Finally, at the right hand of the tomb, stands a truncated column, about three feet high, concave at the top, as before described ; and as a confirmation of the use to which we said it might be put, St. Gregory has, in his list of oils sent to the Lombard Queen, "Oleum S. Cornelii," the oil of St. Cornelius.

We see then, how, during the second period, new ornaments, as well as greater conveniences, were added to the primitive simple forms of the cemeteries. But we must not, on that account, imagine that we are in any danger of mistaking these later embellishments for the productions of the early ages. The difference is so immense, that we might as easily blunder by taking a Rubens for a Beato Angelico, as by considering a Byzantine figure to be a production of the two first centuries.

We come now to the third period of these holy cemeteries, the sad one of their desolation. When the Lombards, and later the Saracens, began to devastate the neighborhood of Rome, and the catacombs were exposed to desecration, the popes extracted the bodies of the most illustrious martyrs, and placed them in the basilicas of the city. This went on till the eighth or ninth century ; when we still read of repairs made in the cemeteries by the sovereign pontiffs. The catacombs ceased to be so much places of devotion ; and the churches, which stood over their entrances, were destroyed, or fell to decay. Only those remained which were fortified, and could be defended. Such are the extramural basilicas of St. Paul on the Ostian way, of St. Sebastian on the Appian, St. Laurence on the Tiburtine, or in the Ager Veranus, St. Agnes on the Nomentan road, St. Pancratius on the Aurelian, and, greatest of all, St. Peter's on the Vatican. The first and last had separate burghs or cities round them ; and the traveller can still trace remains of strong walls round some of the others.

Strange it is, however, that the young antiquarian, whom we have frequently named with honor, should have re-discovered two of the basilicas over the entrance to the cemetery of Callistus, almost entire ; the one being a stable and bake-house, the other a wine-store. One is, most probably, that built by Pope Damasus, so often mentioned. The earth washed down, through air-holes, the spoliation practised during ages, by persons entering from vineyards through unguarded entrances, the mere wasting action of time and weather, have left us but a wreck of the ancient catacombs. Still there is much to be thankful for. Enough remains to verify the records left us in better times, and these serve to guide us to the reconstruction of our ruins. The present Pontiff has done more in a few years for these sacred places, than has been effected in centuries. The

* (The picture) of St. Cornelius Pope, of St. Cyprian." On the other side, on the other side, on a narrow wall projecting at a right angle, are two more similar portraits ; but only one name can be deciphered, that of St. Sixtus, or, as he is there and elsewhere called, Suetne. On the paintings of the principal saints may still be read, scratched in the mortar, in characters of the seventh century, the name of visitors to the tomb. Those of two priests are thus

✕LEO PRB IOANNIS PRB.

It may be interesting to add the entry in the Roman calendar :

"xviii. Kal. Oct. Cypriani Africa: Romæ celebratur in Callisti." "Sept. 14. (The deposition) of Cyprian in Africa: at Rome it is kept in (the cemetery) of Callistus."

mixed commission which he has appointed have done wonders. With very limited means, they are going systematically to work, finishing as they advance. Nothing is taken from the spot where it is found ; but every thing is restored, as far as possible, to its original state. Accurate tracings are made of all the paintings, and plans of every part explored. To secure these good results, the Pope has, from his own resources, bought vineyards and fields, especially at Tor Marancia, where the cemetery of SS. Nereus and Achilleus is situated ; and we believe also over that of Callistus. The French emperor too has sent to Rome, artists, who have produced a most magnificent work, perhaps somewhat overdone, upon the catacombs : a truly imperial undertaking.

It is time, however, for us to rejoin our party below, and finish our inspection of these marvellous cities of departed saints, under the guidance of our friends the excavators.

CHAPTER IV.

WHAT DIOGENES DID TELL ABOUT THE CATACOMBS.

ALL that we have told our readers of the first period of the history of subterranean Rome, as ecclesiastical antiquarians love to call the catacombs, has no doubt been better related by Diogenes to his youthful hearers, as, taper in hand, they have been slowly walking through a long straight gallery, crossed, indeed, by many others, but adhered to faithfully ; with sundry pauses, and, of course, lectures, embodying what we have put together in our prosaic second chapter.

At length Diogenes turned to the right, and Torquatus looked around him anxiously.

"I wonder," he said, "how many turns we have passed by, before leaving this main gallery ?"

"A great many," answered Severus, drily.

"How many do you think, ten or twenty ?"

"Full that, I fancy ; for I never have counted them."

Torquatus had, however, but wished to make sure. He continued, still pausing :

"How do you distinguish the right turn, then ? Oh, what is this ?" and he pretended to examine a small niche in the corner. But Severus too kept a sharp look-out, and saw that he was making a mark in the sand.

"Come, come along," he said, "or we shall lose sight of the rest, and not see which way they turn. That little niche is to hold a lamp ; you will find one at each angle. As to ourselves, we know every alley and turn here below, as you do those of the city above."

Torquatus was somewhat re-assured by this account of the lamps—those little earthen ones, evidently made on purpose for the catacombs, of which so many are there found. But not content, he kept as good count as he could of the turns, as they went ; and now with one excuse, and now with another, he constantly stopped, and scrutinised particular spots and corners. But Severus had a lynx's eye upon him, and allowed nothing to escape his attention.

At last they entered a doorway, and found themselves in a square chamber, richly adorned with paintings.

"What do you call this ?" asked Tiburtius.

"It is one of the many crypts, or cubicula,* which abound in our cemeteries," answered Diogenes ; "sometimes they are merely family sepultures, but generally they contain the tomb of some martyr, on whose anniversary we meet here. See that tomb opposite us, which, though flush with the wall, is arched over. That becomes, on such an occasion, the altar whereon the Divine mysteries are celebrated. You are of course aware of the custom of so performing them."

"Perhaps my two friends," interposed Pancratius, "so recently baptised, may not have heard it ; but I know it well. It is surely one of the glorious privileges of martyrdom, to have the Lord's sacred Body and precious Blood offered upon one's ashes, and to repose thus under the very feet of God.* But let us see well the paintings all over this crypt."

* Chambers.

"It is on account of them that I brought you into this chamber, in preference to so many others in the cemetery. It is one of the most ancient, and contains a most complete series of pictures, from the remotest times down to some of my son's doing."

"Well, then, Diogenes, explain them systematically to my friends," said Pancratus. "I think I know most of them, but not all; and I shall be glad to hear you describe them."

"I am no scholar," replied the old man, modestly, "but when one has lived sixty years, man and boy, among things, one gets to know them better than others, because one loves them more. All here have been fully initiated, I suppose?" he added, with a pause.

"All," answered Tiburtius, "though not so fully instructed as converts ordinarily are. Torquatus and myself have received the sacred Gift."

"Enough," resumed the excavator. "The ceiling is the oldest part of the painting, as is natural; for that was done when the crypt was excavated, whereas the walls were decorated, as tombs were hollowed out. You see the ceiling has a sort of trellis work painted over it, with grapes, to represent perhaps our true Vine, of which we are the branches. There you see Orpheus sitting down, and playing sweet music, not only to his own flock, but to the wild beasts of the desert, which stand charmed around him."

"Why, that is a heathen picture altogether," interrupted Torquatus, with pettishness, and some sarcasm; "what has it to do with Christianity?"

"It is an allegory, Torquatus," replied Pancratus, gently, "and a favorite one. The use of Gentile images, when in themselves harmless, has been permitted. You see masks, for instance, and other pagan ornaments in this ceiling, and they belong generally to a very ancient period. And so our Lord was represented under the symbol of Orpheus, to conceal His sacred representation from Gentile blasphemy and sacrilege. Look, now, in that arch; you have a more recent representation of the same subject."

"I see," said Torquatus, "a shepherd with a sheep over his shoulders—the Good Shepherd; that I can understand; I remember the parable."

"But why is this subject such a favorite one?" asked Tiburtius; "I have observed it in other cemeteries."

"If you will look over the arcosolium,"† answered Severus, "you will see a fuller representation of the scene. But I think we had better first continue what we have begun, and finish the ceiling. You see that figure on the right?"

"Yes," replied Tiburtius; "it is that of a man apparently in a chest, with a dove flying towards him. Is that meant to represent the Deluge?"

"It is," said Severus, "as the emblem of regeneration by water and the Holy Spirit; and of the salvation of the world. Such is our beginning; and here is our end; Jonas thrown out of the boat, and swallowed by the whale; and then sitting in enjoyment under his gourd. The resurrection with our Lord, and eternal rest as its fruit."

"How natural is this representation in such a place!" observed Pancratus, pointing to the other side; "and here we have another type of the same consoling doctrine."

* *Bis venerarior osses libet,
Ossibus altar et impositum;
Illa Dei sila sub pedibus,
Prosperit hæc, populæque snæ
Carmine propitiata fovet.*

‡ Prudentius, peri orep iii. 43.

§ With her relics gathered here,
The altar o'er them placed revere,
She beneath God's feet repose,
Nor to us her soft eyes close,
Nor her gracious ear."

The idea that the martyr lies "beneath the feet of God" is in allusion to the Real Presence in the Blessed Eucharist.

† The arched tombs were so called. A homely illustration would be an arched fireplace, walled up to the height of three feet. The paintings would be inside, above the wall.

"Where?" asked Torquatus, languidly; "I see nothing but a figure bandaged all round, and standing up, like a huge infant in a small temple; and another person opposite to it."

"Exactly," said Severus; "that is the way we always represent the resurrection of Lazarus. Here look, is a touching expression of the hope of our fathers in persecution: The three Babylonian children in the fiery furnace."

"Well, now, I think," said Torquatus, "we may come to the arcosolium, and finish this room. What are these pictures around it?"

"If you look at the left side, you see the multiplication of the loaves and fishes. The fish* is you know the symbol of Christ."

"Why so?" asked Torquatus, rather impatiently. Severus turned to Pancratus, as the better scholar, to answer.

"There are two opinions about its origin," said the youth, readily; "one finds the meaning in the word itself; its letters forming the beginning of words, so as to mean 'Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior.'‡ Another puts it in the symbol itself; that as fish are born and live in the water, so is the Christian born of water, and buried with Christ in it, by baptism;‡ Hence as we came along, we saw the figure of a fish carved on tombs, or its name engraven on them. Now go on, Severus."

"Then the union of the bread and the fish in one multiplication shows us how, in the Eucharist, Christ becomes the food of all.§ Opposite is Moses striking the rock, from which all drank, and which is Christ, our drink as well as our food.¶"

"Now, at last," said Torquatus, "we are come to the Good Shepherd."

"Yes," continued Severus, "you see Him in the centre of the arcosolium, in His simple tunic and leggings, with a sheep upon His shoulders, the recovered wanderer from the flock. Two more are standing at His sides; the truant ram on His right, the gentle ewe upon His left; the penitent in the post of honor. On each side, too, you see a person evidently sent by Him to preach. Both are leaning forward, and addressing sheep not of the fold. One on either side is apparently giving no heed to their words, but browsing quietly on, while one is turning up its eyes and head, looking and listening with eager attention. Rain is falling copiously on them; that is the grace of God. It is not difficult to interpret this picture."

"But what makes this emblem such a particular favorite?" again pressed Tiburtius.

"We consider this, and similar paintings, to belong chiefly to the time, when the Novatian heresy so much plagued the Church," answered Severus.

"And pray what heresy is that?" asked Torquatus, carelessly; for he thought he was losing time.

"It was, and indeed is, the heresy," answered Pancratus, "that teaches, that there are sins which the Church has not power to forgive; which are too great for God to pardon."

Pancratus was not aware of the effect of his words; but Severus, who never took off his eye from Torquatus, saw the blood go and come violently in his countenance.

"Is that a heresy?" asked the traitor, confused.

"Surely a dreadful one," replied Pancratus, "to limit the mercy and forgiveness of Him, who came to call not the just, but sinners to repentance. The Catholic Church has always held, that a sinner, however dark the dye, however huge the mass, of his crimes, on truly repenting, may receive forgiveness, through the penitential remedy left in her hands. And,

* The word is usually given in Greek, and Christ is familiarly called the ichthys, ichthus.

† This is the true interpretation of St. Optatus (adv. Parm. lib. iii.) and St. Augustine (de C. D. lib. xviii. c. 23).

‡ This is Tertullian's explanation (de Baptismo, lib. ii. c. 2).

§ In the same cemetery is another interesting painting. On a table lie a loaf and a fish; a priest is stretching his hands over them; and opposite is a female figure in adoration. The priest is the same as, in a picture close by, is represented administering baptism. In another chamber just cleared out, are very ancient decorations, such as masks, &c., and fishes bearing baskets of bread and flasks of wine, on their back as they swim.

¶ The type of the figure is that of St. Peter, as he is represented to us in the cemeteries. On a glass, bearing a picture of this scene the person striking the rock has written over his head, PETRUS.

therefore, she has always so much loved this type of the Good Shepherd, ready to run into the wilderness, to bring back a lost sheep;”

“But suppose,” said Torquatus, evidently moved, “that one who had become a Christian, and received the sacred Gift, were to fall away, and plunge into vice, and—and”—(his voice faltered)—“almost betray his brethren, would not the Church reject such a one from hope?”

“No, no,” answered the youth; “these are the very crimes, which the Novatians insult the Catholics for admitting to pardon. The Church is a mother, with her arms ever open to re-embrace her erring children.”

There was a tear trembling in Torquatus’s eye; his lips quivered with the confession of his guilt, which ascended to them for a moment; but as if a black poisonous drop rose up his throat with it and choked him, he changed in a moment to a hard, obstinate look, bit his lip and said, with an effort at coolness, “It is certainly a consoling doctrine for those that need it.”

Severus alone observed that a moment of grace had been forfeited, and that some despairing thought had quenched a flash of hope, in that man’s heart. Diogenes and Majus, who had been absent, looking at a new place for opening a gallery near, now returned. Torquatus addressed the old master-digger:

“We have now seen the galleries and the chambers; I am anxious to visit the church in which we shall have to assemble.”

The unconscious excavator was going to lead the way, when the inexorable artist interposed.

“I think, father, it is too late for to-day; you know we have got our work to do. These young friends will excuse us, especially as they will see the church in good time, and in better order also, as the holy Pontiff intends to officiate in it.”

They assented; and when they arrived at the point where they had turned off from the first straight gallery to visit the ornamental chamber, Diogenes stopped the party, turned a few steps along an opposite passage, and said:

“If you pursue this corridor, and turn to the right, you come to the church. I have merely brought you here to show you an arcosolium, with a beautiful painting. You see here the Virgin Mother holding her Divine Infant in her arms, while the wise Easterns, here represented as four, though generally we only reckon three, are adoring Him.”*

All admired the painting; but poor Severus was much chagrined at seeing how his good father had unwittingly supplied the information desired by Torquatus, and had furnished him with a sure clue to the desired turn, by calling his attention to the tomb close round it, distinguishable by so remarkable a picture.

When their company was departed he told all that he had observed to his brother, remarking, “That man will give us trouble yet: I strongly suspect him.”

In a short time they had removed every mark which Torquatus had made at the turnings. But this was no security against his reckonings; and they determined to prepare for changing the road, by blocking up the present one and turning off at another point. For this purpose they had the sand of new excavations brought to the ends of a gallery which crossed the main avenue, where this was low, and left it heaped up there, till the faithful could be instructed of the intended change.

CHAPTER V.

ABOVE GROUND.

To recover our reader from his long subterranean excursion, we must take him with us on another visit to the “happy Campania,” or “Campany the blest,” as an old writer might have called it. There we left Fabiola perplexed by some sentences which she had found. They came to her like a letter from another world; she hardly knew of what character. She wished to learn more about them, but she hardly durst inquire. Many visitors called the next day, and for several days after, and she often thought of putting before some or other of them the mysterious sentences, but she could not bring herself to do it.

* There are several repetitions of this painting. One has been lately found, if we remember right, in the cemetery of Nereus and Achillons. It is long anterior to the Council of Chalcedon, whence this mode of representing our Lord is usually dated. It is given in our title-page.

A lady, whose life was like her own, philosophically correct, and coldly virtuous, came; and they talked together over the fashionable opinions of the day. She took out her vellum page to puzzle her; but she shrank from submitting it to her: it felt profane to do so. A learned man, well read in all branches of science and literature, paid her a long visit, and spoke very charmingly on the sublimer views of the older schools. She was tempted to consult him about her discovery; but it seemed to contain something higher than he could comprehend. It was strange that, after all, when wisdom or consolation was to be sought, the noble and haughty Roman lady should turn instinctively to her Christian slave. And so it was now. The first moment they were alone, after several days of company and visits, Fabiola produced her parchment, and placed it before Syra. There passed over her countenance an emotion not observable to her mistress; but she was perfectly calm, as she looked up from reading.

“That writing,” said her mistress, “I got at Chromatius’s villa, on the back of a note, probably by mistake. I cannot drive it out of my mind, which is quite perplexed by it.”

“Why should it be so, my noble lady? Its sense seems plain enough.”

“Yes; and that very plainness gives me trouble. My natural feelings revolt against this sentiment: I fancy I ought to despise a man who does not resent an injury, and return hatred for hatred. To forgive at most would be much; but to do good in return for evil, seems to me an unnatural exaction from human nature. Now, while I feel all this, I am conscious that I have been brought to esteem you, for conduct exactly the reverse of what I am naturally impelled to expect.”

“Oh, do not talk of me, my dear mistress; but look at the simple principle; you honor it in others, too. Do you despise, or do you respect Aristides, for obliging a boorish enemy, by writing, when asked, his own name, on the shell that voted his banishment? Do you, as a Roman lady, condemn, or honor, the name of Coriolanus, for his generous forbearance to your city?”

“I venerate both, most truly, Syra; but then you know those were heroes, and not every-day men.”

“And why should we not all be heroes?” asked Syra laughing.

“Bless me, child! what a world we should live in, if we were. It is very pleasant reading about the feats of such wonderful people; but one would be very sorry to see them performed by common men, every day.”

“Why so?” pressed the servant.

“Why so? who would like to find a baby she was nursing, playing with, or strangling, serpents in the cradle? I should be very sorry to have a gentleman whom I invited to dinner, telling me coolly he had that morning killed a minotaur, or strangled a hydra; or to have a friend offering to send the Tiber through my stables, to cleanse them. Preserve us from a generation of heroes, say I.” And Fabiola laughed heartily at the conceit. In the same good humor Syra continued:

“But suppose we had the misfortune to live in a country where such monsters existed, centaurs and minotaurs, hydras and dragons. Would it not be better that common men should be heroes enough to conquer them, than that we should have to send off to the other side of the world for a Theseus or a Hercules, to destroy them? In fact, in that case, a man would be no more a hero if he fought them, than a lion-slayer is in my country.”

“Quite true, Syra; but I do not see the application of your idea.”

“It is this: anger, hatred, revenge, ambition, avarice, are to my mind as complete monsters, as serpents or dragons; and they attack common men as much as great ones. Why should not I try to be as able to conquer them as Aristides, or Coriolanus, or Cincinnatus? Why leave it to heroes only, to do what we can do as well?"

"And do you really hold this as a common moral principle? If so, I fear you will soar too high."

"No, dear lady. You were startled when I ventured to maintain that inward and unseen virtue was as necessary as the outward and visible: I fear I must surprise you still more."

"Go on, and do not fear to tell me all."

"Well, then, the principle of that system which I profess is this: that we must treat, and practise, as every-day and common virtue, nay, as simple duty, whatever any other code, the purest and sublimest that may be, considers heroic, and proof of transcendent virtue."

"That is indeed a sublime standard to form, of moral elevation; but mark the difference between the two cases. The hero is supported by the praises of the world: his act is recorded and transmitted to posterity, when he checks his passions, and performs a sublime action. But who sees, cares for, or shall requite, the poor obscure wretch, who in humble secrecy imitates his conduct?"

Syra, with solemn, reverential look and gesture, raised her eyes and her right hand to heaven, and slowly said, "His Father, who is in heaven, who maketh His sun to rise on the good and the bad, and raineth on the just and the unjust."

Fabiola paused for a time, overawed: then said affectionately and respectfully: "Again, Syra, you have conquered my philosophy. Your wisdom is consistent as it is sublime. A virtue heroic, even when unseen, you propose as the ordinary daily virtue of every one. Men must indeed become more than what gods have been thought to be, to attempt it; but the very idea is worth a whole philosophy. Can you lead me higher than this?"

"Oh, far!—far higher still."

"And where at length would you leave me?"

"Where your heart should tell you, that it had found peace."

CHAPTER VI.

DELIBERATIONS.

The persecution had now been some time raging in the East under Dioclesian and Galerius; and the decree for enkindling it throughout the West, had reached Maximian. But it had been resolved to make this a work, not of repression, but of extermination, of the Christian name. It had been determined to spare no one; but cutting off the chiefs of the religion first, to descend down to the wholesale butchery of the poorest classes. It was necessary for this purpose to concert measures, that the various engines of destruction might work in cruel harmony; that every possible instrument should be employed to secure completeness to the effort; and also that the majesty of imperial command should add its grandeur and its terror, to the crushing blow.

For this purpose, the emperor, though impatient to begin his work of blood, had yielded to the opinion of his counsellors, that the edict should be kept concealed, till it could be published simultaneously in every province, and government, of the West. The thundercloud, fraught with vengeance, would thus hang for a time, in painful mystery, over its intended victims, and then burst suddenly upon them, discharging upon their heads its mingled elements, and its "fire, hail, snow, ice, and boisterous blast."

It was in the month of November, that Maximian Hercules convoked the meeting in which his plans had finally to be adjusted. To it were summoned the leading officers of his court, and of the state. The principal one, the prefect of the city, had brought with him his son, Corvinus, whom he had proposed to be captain of a body of armed pursuivants, picked out for their savageness and hatred of Christians; who should hunt them out, or down, with unrelenting assiduity. The chief prefects or governors of Sicily, Italy, Spain, and Gaul, were present, to receive their orders. In addition to these, several learned men, philosophers, and orators, among whom was our old acquaintance Calpurnius, had been invited; and many priests, who had come from different parts, to petition for heavier persecution, were commanded to attend.

The usual residence of the emperors, as we have seen was the Palatine. There was, however, another much esteemed by them, which Maximian Hercules in particular preferred. During the reign of Nero, the wealthy senator, Plantius Lateranus, was charged with conspiracy, and of course punished with death. His immense property was seized by the emperor, and part of this was his house, described by Juvenal, and other writers, as of unusual size and magnificence. It was beautifully situated on the Cœlian hill, and on the southern verge of the city; so that from it was a view unequalled even in the vicinity of Rome. Stretching across the wavy Campagna, here bestrided by colossal aqueducts, crossed by lines of roads, with their fringes of marble tombs, and bespangled all over with glittering villas, set like gems in the dark green enamel of laurel and cypress, the eye reached, at evening, the purple slope of hills on which, as on a couch, lay stretched luxuriously Alba and Tusculum, with "their daughters," according to oriental phrase, basking brightly in the setting sun. The craggy range of Sabine mountains on the left, and the golden expanse of the sea on the right, of the beholder, closed in this perfect landscape.

It would be attributing to Maximian a quality which he did not possess, were we to give him credit for loving a residence so admirably situated, through any taste for the beautiful. The splendor of the buildings, which he had still further adorned, or possibly the facility of running out of the city for the chase of boar and wolf, was the motive of this preference. A native of Sirmium, in Slavonia, a reputed barbarian, therefore of the lowest extraction, a mere soldier of fortune, without any education, endowed with little more than a brute strength, which made his surname of Hercules most appropriate, he had been raised to the purple by his brother-barbarian, Diocles, known as the emperor Dioclesian. Like him, covetous to meanness, and spendthrift to recklessness, addicted to the same coarse vices and foul crimes, which a Christian pen refuses to record, without restraint of any passion, without sense of justice, or feeling of humanity, this monster had never ceased to oppress, persecute, and slay whoever stood in his way. To him the coming persecution looked like an approaching feast does to a glutton, who requires the excitement of a surfeit, to relieve the monotony of daily excess. Gigantic in frame, with the well-known features of his race, with the hair on his head and face more yellow than red, shaggy and wild, like tufts of straw, with eyes restlessly rolling in a compound expression of suspicion, profligacy, and ferocity, this almost last of Rome's tyrants struck terror in the heart of any beholder, except a Christian. Is it wonderful that he hated the race and its name?

In the large basilica, or hall, then, of the Ædes Lateranæ,* Maximian met his motley council, in which secrecy was ensured by penalty of death. In the semicircular apse at the upper end of the hall, sat the emperor, on an ivory throne richly adorned, and before him were arranged his obsequious and almost trembling advisers. A chosen body of guards kept the entrance; and the officer in command, Sebastian, was leaning negligently against it on the inside, but carefully noted every word that was spoken.

Little did the emperor think, that the hall in which he sat, and which he afterwards gave, with the contiguous palace, to Constantine, as part of the dowry of his daughter, Fausta, would be transferred by him to the head of the religion he was planning to extirpate, and become, retaining its name of the Lateran Basilica, the cathedral of Rome, "of all the churches of the city and of the world the mother and chief."† Little did he imagine, that on the spot whereon rested his throne, would be raised a Chair whence commands should issue, to reach worlds unknown to Roman sway, from an immortal race of sovereigns, spiritual and temporal.

* The Lateran house or palace.

† Inscription on the front, and medals, of the Lateran Basilica.

Precedence was granted, by religious courtesy, to the priests; each of whom had his tale to tell. Here a river had overflowed its banks, and done much mischief to the neighboring plains; there an earthquake had thrown down part of a town; on the northern frontiers the barbarians threatened invasion; at the south, the plague was ravaging the pious population. In every instance, the oracles had declared, that it was all owing to the Christians, whose toleration irritated the gods, and whose evil charms brought calamity on the empire. Nay, some had afflicted their votaries by openly proclaiming, that they would utter no more, till the odious Nazarenes had been exterminated; and the great Delphic oracle had not hesitated to declare, "that the Just did not allow the gods to speak."

Next came the philosophers and orators, each of whom made his own long-winded oration; during which Maximian gave unequivocal signs of weariness. But as the Emperors in the East had held a similar meeting, he considered it his duty to sit out the annoyance. The usual calumnies were repeated, for the ten-thousandth time, to an applauding assembly; the stories of murdering and eating infants, of committing foul crimes, of worshipping martyrs' bodies, of adoring an ass's head, and inconsistently enough of being unbelievers, and serving no God. These tales were all most firmly believed: though probably their reciters knew perfectly well, they were but good sound heathen lies, very useful in keeping up a horror of Christianity.

But, at length, up rose the man, who was considered to have most deeply studied the doctrines of the enemy, and best to know their dangerous tactics. He was supposed to have read their own books, and to be drawing up a confutation of their errors, which would fairly crush them. Indeed, so great was his weight with his own side, that when he asserted that Christians held any monstrous principle, had their supreme pontiff in person contradicted it, every one would have laughed at the very idea, of taking his word for his own belief, against the assertion of Calpurnius.

He struck up a different strain, and his learning quite astonished his fellow-sophists. He had read the original books, he said not only of the Christians themselves, but of their forefathers, the Jews; who, having come into Egypt in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, to escape from a famine in their own country, through the arts of their leader, Josephus, bought up all the corn there, and sent it home. Upon which Ptolemy imprisoned them, telling them, that as they had eaten up all the corn, they should live on the straw, by making bricks with it for building a great city. Then Demetrius Phalerus, hearing from them of a great many curious histories of their ancestors, shut up Moses and Aaron, their most learned men, in a tower, having shaved half their beards, till they should write in Greek all their records. These rare books Calpurnius had seen, and he would build his argument entirely on them. This race made war upon every king and people, that came in their way and destroyed them all. It was their principle, if they took a city, to put every one to the sword; and this was all because they were under the government of their ambitious priests; so that when a certain king Saul, called also Paul, spared a poor captive monarch whose name was Agag, the priests ordered him to be brought out and hewed in pieces.

"Now," continued he, "these Christians are still under the domination of the same priesthood, and are quite as ready to-day, under their direction, to overthrow the great Roman empire, burn us all in the Forum, and even sacrilegiously assail the sacred and venerable heads of our divine emperors."

A thrill of horror ran through the assembly at this fecital. It was soon hushed, as the emperor opened his mouth to speak.

"For my part," he said, "I have another and stronger reason for my abhorrence of these Christians. They have dared to establish in the heart of the empire, and in this very city, a supreme religious authority, unknown here before, independent of the government of the State, and equally powerful over their minds as this. Formerly, all acknowledged the emperor as supreme in religious, as in civil, rule. Hence he bears still the title of Pontifex Maximus. But these men have raised up a divided power, and consequently bear but a divided loyalty. I hate, therefore, as a usurpation in my dominions, this sacerdotal sway over my subjects. For I declare that I would rather hear of a new rival starting up to my throne, than of the election of one of these priests in Rome."*

This speech, delivered in a harsh grating voice, and with a vulgar foreign accent, was received with immense applause; and plans were formed for the simultaneous publication of the Edict through the West, and for its complete and exterminating execution.

Then turning sharp upon Tertullus, the emperor said: "Perfect, you said you had some one to propose for superintending these arrangements, and for merciless dealings with these traitors."

"He is here, sire, my son Corvinus." And Tertullus handed the youthful candidate to the grim tyrant's footstool, where he knelt. Maximian eyed him keenly, burst into a hideous laugh, and said: "Upon my word, I think he'll do. Why, prefect, I had no idea you had such an ugly son. I should think he is just the thing; every quality of a thorough-paced, unconscionable scapegrace is stamped upon his features."

Then turning to Corvinus, who was scarlet with rage, terror and shame, he said to him: "Mind you, sirrah, I must have clean work of it; no hacking and hewing, no blundering. I pay up well, if I am well served; but I pay off well, too, if badly served. So now go; and remember, that if your back can answer for a small fault, your head will for a greater. The victors' fascies contain an axe as well as rods."

The emperor rose to depart, when his eye caught Fulvius, who had been summoned as a paid court spy, but who kept as much in the background as possible. "Ho, there my eastern worthy," he called out to him; "draw nearer."

Fulvius obeyed with apparent cheerfulness, but with real reluctance; much the same as if he had been invited to go very near a tiger, the strength of whose chain he was not quite sure about. He had seen, from the beginning, that his coming to Rome had not been acceptable to Maximian, though he knew not fully the cause. It was not merely that the tyrant had plenty of favorites of his own to enrich, and spies to pay, without Dioclesian's sending him more from Asia, though this had its weight; but it was more. He believed in his heart that Fulvius had been sent principally to act the spy upon himself, and to report to Nicomedia the sayings and doings of his court. While, therefore, he was obliged to tolerate him, and even employ him, he mistrusted and disliked him, which in him was equivalent to hating him. It was some compensation, therefore, to Corvinus, when he heard his more polished confederate publicly addressed, as rudely as himself, in the following terms:

"None of your smooth, put-on looks for me, fellow. I want deeds, not smirks. You came here as a famous plot-hunter, a sort of stoat, to pull conspirators out of their nests, or suck their eggs for me. I have seen nothing of this so far; and yet you have had plenty of money to set you up in business. These Christians will afford you plenty of game; so make yourself ready, and let us see what you can do. You know my ways; you had better look sharp about you, therefore, or you may have to look at something very sharp before you. The property of the convicted will be divided between the accusers and the treasury; unless I see particular reasons for taking the whole to myself. Now you may go."

Most thought that these particular reasons would turn out to be very general.

* These are the very words of Dectus, on the election of St. Cornelius to the See of St. Peter: "Cum multo patientius audiret levati adversum se anulum principem, quam constitui Romæ Dei sacerdotem." S. Cypri. Ep. li. ad Antonianum, p. 63, ed. Maur. Could there be a stronger proof that, under the heathen empire, the papal power was sensible and external, even to the extent of exciting imperial jealousy?

CHAPTER VII.

DARK DEATH.

A FEW days after Fabiola returned from the country, Sebastian considered it his duty to wait upon her, to communicate so much of the dialogue between Corvinus and her black slave, as he could without causing unnecessary suffering. We have already observed, that of the many noble youths whom Fabiola had met in her father's house, none had excited her admiration and respect except Sebastian. So frank, so generous, so brave, yet so unboasting; so mild, so kind in act and speech, so unselfish and so careful of others, blending so completely in one character nobleness and simplicity, high wisdom and practical sense, he seemed to her the most finished type of manly virtue, one which would not easily suffer by time, nor weary by familiarity.

When, therefore, it was announced to her that the officer Sebastian wished to speak to her alone, in one of the halls below, her heart beat at the unusual tidings, and conjured up a thousand strange fancies, about the possible topics of his interview. This agitation was not diminished, when, after apologizing for his seeming intrusion, he remarked with a smile, that, well knowing how sufficiently she was already annoyed by the many candidates for her hand, he felt regret at the idea, that he was going to add another, yet undeclared, to her list. If this ambiguous preface surprised, and perhaps elated her, she was soon depressed again, upon being told, it was the vulgar and stupid Corvinus. For her father, even, little as he knew how to discriminate characters out of business, had seen enough of him at his late banquet, to characterise him to his daughter by those epithets.

Sebastian, fearing rather the physical, than the moral, activity of Afra's drugs, thought it right to inform her of the compact between the two dabblers in the black art, the principal efficacy of which, however, seemed to consist in drawing money from the purse of a reluctant dupe. He of course said nothing of what related to the Christians in that dialogue. He put her on her guard, and she promised to prevent the nightly excursions of her necromancer slave. What Afra had engaged to do, she did not for a moment believe it was ever her intention to attempt; neither did she fear arts which she utterly despised. Indeed Afra's last soliloquy seemed satisfactorily to prove that she was only deceiving her victim. But she certainly felt indignant at having been bargained about by two such vile characters, and having been represented as a grasping, avaricious woman, whose price was gold.

"I feel," she said at last to Sebastian, "how very kind it is of you to come thus to put me on my guard; and I admire the delicacy with which you have unfolded so disagreeable a matter, and the tenderness with which you have treated every one concerned."

"I have only done in this instance," replied the soldier, "what I should have done for any human being—save him, if possible, from pain or danger."

"Your friends, I hope you mean," said Fabiola, smiling; "otherwise I fear your whole life would go in works of unrequited benevolence."

"And so let it go; it could not be better spent."

"Surely you are not in earnest, Sebastian. If you saw one who had ever hated you, and sought your destruction, threatened with a calamity which would make him harmless, would you stretch out your hand to save or succor him?"

"Certainly I would. While God sends His sunshine and His rain equally upon His enemies, as upon His friends, shall weak man frame another rule of justice?"

At these words Fabiola wondered; they were so like those of her mysterious parchment, identical with the moral theories of her slave.

"You have been in the East, I believe, Sebastian," she asked him, rather abruptly, "was it there that you learnt these principles? For I have one near me, who is yet, by her own choice, a servant, a woman of rare moral perceptions, who has propounded to me the same idea, and she is an Asiatic."

"It is not in any distant country that I learnt them; for here I sucked them in with my mother's milk; though, originally, they doubtless came from the East."

"They are certainly beautiful in the abstract," remarked Fabiola; "but death would overtake us before we could half carry them out, were we to make them our principles of conduct."

"And how better could death find us, though not surprise us, than in thus doing our duty, even if not to its completion?"

"For my part," resumed the lady, "I am of the old Epicurean poet's mind. This world is a banquet, from which I shall be ready to depart when I have had my fill—ut conviva satur*—and not till then. I wish to read life's book through, and close it calmly only when I have finished its last page."

Sebastian shook his head, smiling, and said, "The last page of this world's book comes but in the middle of the volume, wherever 'death' may happen to be written. But on the next page begins the illuminated book of a new life—without a last page."

"I understand you," replied Fabiola, good humoredly; "you are a brave soldier, and you speak as such. You must be always prepared for death from a thousand casualties; we seldom see it approach suddenly; it comes more mercifully, and stealthily, upon the weak. You no doubt are musing on a more glorious fate, on receiving in front full sheaves of arrows from the enemy, and falling covered with honor. You look to the soldier's funeral pile with trophies erected over it. To you, after death, opens its bright page the book of glory."

"No, no, gentle lady," exclaimed Sebastian, emphatically. "I mean not so. I care not for glory, which can only be enjoyed by an anticipating fancy. I speak of vulgar death, as it may come to me in common with the poorest slave; consuming me by slow burning fever, wasting me by long, lingering consumption, racking me by slowly eating ulcers; nay, if you please, by the still crueller inflictions of men's wrath. In any form let it come; it comes from a hand that I love."

"And do you really mean, that death, so contemplated, would be welcomed by you?"

"As joyful as is the epicure, when the doors of the banquet-hall are thrown wide open, and he sees beyond them the brilliant lamps, the glittering table, and its delicious viands, with its attendant ministers well-girt, and crowned with roses; as blithe as is the bride when the bridegroom is announced, coming with rich gifts, to conduct her to her new home, will my exulting heart be, when death, under whatever form, throws back the gates, iron on this side, but golden on the other, which lead to a new and perennial life. And I care not how grim the messenger may be, that proclaims the approach of Him who is celestially beautiful."

"And who is He?" asked Fabiola, eagerly. "Can He not be seen, save through the fleshless ribs of death?"

"No," replied Sebastian; "for it is He who must reward us, not only for our lives, but for our deaths also. Happy they whose inmost hearts, which He has ever read, have been kept pure and innocent, as well as their deeds have been virtuous! For them is this bright vision of Him, whose true rewards only then begin."

How very like Syra's doctrines! she thought. But before she could speak again, to ask whence they came, a slave entered, stood on the threshold, and respectfully said:

"A courier, madam, is just arrived from Baïre."†

"Pardon me, Sebastian!" she exclaimed. "Let him enter immediately."

The messenger came in, covered with dust, and jaded, having left his tired horse at the gate; and offered her a sealed packet.

Her hand trembled as she took it; and while she was unloosing its bands, she hesitatingly asked,

"From my father?"

*"As a sated guest,"

† A fashionable watering-place near Naples.

"About him, at least," was the messenger's ominous reply. She opened the sheet, glanced over it, shrieked, and fell. Sebastian caught her before she reached the ground, laid her on a couch, and delicately left her in the hands of her hand-maids, who had rushed in at the cry.

One glance had told her all. Her father was dead.

CHAPTER VIII.

DARKER STILL.

WHEN Sebastian came into the court, he found a little crowd of domestics gathered round the courier, listening to the details of their master's death.

The letter of which Torquatus was the bearer to him, had produced its desired effect. He called at his villa, and spent a few days with his daughter, on his way to Asia. He was more than usually affectionate; and when they parted, both father and daughter seemed to have a melancholy foreboding that they would meet no more. He soon, however, recovered his spirits at Baie, where a party of good livers anxiously awaited him; and where he considered himself obliged to stay, while his galley was being fitted up, and stored with the best wines and provisions which Campania afforded, for his voyage. He indulged, however, his luxurious tastes to excess; and on coming out of a bath, after a hearty supper, he was seized with a chill, and in four-and-twenty hours was a corpse. He had left his undivided wealth to his only child. In fine, the body was being embalmed when the courier started, and was to be brought by his galley to Ostia.

On hearing this sad tale, Sebastian was almost sorry that he had spoken as he had done of death; and left the house with mournful thoughts.

Fabiola's first plunge into the dark abyss of grief was deep and dismal, down into unconsciousness. Then the buoyancy of youth and mind bore her up again to the surface; and her view of life, to the horizon, was as of a boundless ocean of black seething waves, on which floated no living thing save herself. Her woe seemed utter and unmeasured; and she closed her eyes with a shudder, and suffered herself to sink again into oblivion, till once more roused to wakefulness of mind. Again and again she was thus tossed up and down, between transient death and life, while her attendants applied remedies to what they deemed a succession of alarming fits and convulsions. At length she sat up, pale, staring, and tearless, gently pushing aside the hand that tried to administer restoratives to her. In this state she remained long; a stupor, fixed and deadly, seemed to have entranced her; the pupils were almost insensible to the light, and fears were whispered of her brain becoming oppressed. The physician, who had been called, uttered distinctly and forcibly into her ears the question: "Fabiola, do you know that your father is dead?" She started, fell back, and a bursting flood of tears relieved her heart and head. She spoke of her father, and called for him amidst her sobs, and said wild and incoherent, but affectionate things about, and to, him. Sometimes she seemed to think him still alive, then she remembered he was dead; and so she wept and moaned, till sleep took the turn of tears, in nursing her shattered mind and frame.

Euphrosyne and Syra alone watched her. The former had, from time to time, put in the commonplaces of heathen consolation. had reminded her too, how kind a master, how honest a man, how loving a father he had been. But the Christian sat in silence, except to speak gentle and soothing words to her mistress, and served her with an active delicacy, which even then was not unnoticed. What could she do more, unless it was to pray? What hope for else, than that a new grace was folded up, like a flower, in this tribulation; that a bright angel was riding in the dark cloud that overshadowed her humbled lady?

As grief receded, it left room for thought. This came to Fabiola in a gloomy and searching form. "What was become of her father? Whither was he gone? Had he melted into unexistence, or had he been crushed into annihilation? Had his life been searched through by that unseen eye which sees the invisible? Had he stood the proof of that scrutiny which Sebastian and Syra had described? Impossible! Then what had become of him?" She shuddered as she thought, and put away the reflection from her mind.

Oh, for a ray from some unknown light, that would dart into the grave, and show her what it was! Poetry had pretended to enlighten it, and even glorify it; but had only, in truth, remained at the door, as a genius with drooping head, and torch reversed. Science had stepped in, and come out scared, with tarnished wings, and lamp extinguished in the fetid air for it had only discovered a charnel-house. And philosophy had barely ventured to wander round and round, and peep in with dread, and recoil, and then prate or babble; and, shrugging its shoulders, own, that the problem was yet unsolved, the mystery still veiled. Oh, for something, or some one, better than all these, to remove the dismal perplexity!

While these thoughts dwell like gloomy night on the heart of Fabiola, her slave is enjoying the vision of light, clothed in mortal form, translucent and radiant, rising from the grave as from an alembic, in which have remained the grosser qualities of matter, without impairing the essence of its nature. Spiritualised and free, lovely and glorious, it springs from the very hot-bed of corruption. And another, and another from land and sea; from reeking cemetery, and from beneath consecrated altar; from the tangled thicket where solitary murder has been committed on the just, and from fields of ancient battle done by Israel for God; like crystal fountains springing into the air, like brilliant signal-lights, darted from earth to heaven, till a host of millions, side by side, repeoples creation with joyous and undying life. And how knows she this? Because One, greater and better than poet, sage, or sophist, had made the trial; had descended first into the dark couch of death, had blessed it, as He had done the cradle, and made infancy sacred; rendering also death a holy thing, and its place a sanctuary. He went into it in the darkest of evening, and He came forth from it in the brightest of morning; He was laid there wrapped in spices, and He rose again robed in His own fragrant incorruption. And from that day the grave had ceased to be an object of dread to the Christian soul; for it continued what He had made it,—the furrow into which the seed of immortality must needs be cast.

The time was not come for speaking of these things to Fabiola. She mourned still, as they must mourn who have no hope. Day succeeded day in gloomy meditation on the mystery of death, till other cares mercifully roused her. The corpse arrived, and such a funeral followed as Rome then seldom witnessed. Processions by torch-light, in which the waxen effigies of ancestors were borne, and a huge funeral pile, built up of aromatic wood, and scented by the richest spices of Arabia, ended in her gathering up a few handfuls of charred bones, which were deposited in an alabaster urn, and placed in a niche of the family sepulchre, with the name inscribed of their former owner.

Calpurnius spoke the funeral oration; in which, according to the fashionable ideas of the day, he contrasted the virtues of the hospitable, and industrious citizen with the false morality of those men called Christians, who fasted and prayed all day, and were stealthily insinuating their dangerous principles into every noble family, and spreading disloyalty and immorality in every class. Fabius, he could have no doubt, if there was any future existence, whereon philosophers differed, was now basking on a green bank in Elysium, and quaffing nectar. "And oh!" concluded the old whining hypocrite, who would have been sorry to exchange one goblet of Falernian for an amphora* of that beverage, "oh! that the gods would hasten the day when I, his humble client, may join him in his shady repose and sober banquets!" This noble sentiment gained immense applause.

To this care succeeded another. Fabiola had to apply her vigorous mind to examine, and close her father's complicated affairs. How often was she pained at the discovery of what to her seemed injustice, fraud, ever-reaching and oppression, in the transactions of one whom the world had applauded as the most honest and liberal of public contractors!

In a few weeks more, in the dark attire of a mourner, Fabiola went forth to visit her friends. The first of these was her cousin Agnes.

CHAPTER IX.

THE FALSE BROTHER.

WE must take our reader back a few steps in the history of Torquatus. On the morning after his fall, he found, on awaking, Fulvius at his bed-side. It was the falconer, who, having got hold of a good hawk, was come to tame him, and train him to strike down the dove for him, in return for a well-fed slavery. With all the coolness of a practised hand, he brought back to his memory every circumstance of the preceding night's debauch, his utter ruin, and only means of escape. With unfeeling precision he strengthened every thread of the last evening's web, and added many more meshes to it.

The position of Torquatus was this: if he made one step towards Christianity, which Fulvius assured him would be fruitless, he would be at once delivered to the judge, and cruelly punished with death. If he remained faithful to his compact of treason, he should want for nothing.

"You are hot and feverish," at last concluded Fulvius; "an early walk, and fresh air, will do you good."

The poor wretch consented; and they had hardly reached the Forum, when Corvinus, as if by accident, met them. After mutual salutations, he said: "I am glad to have fallen in with you; I should like to take you, and show you my father's workshop."

"Workshop?" asked Torquatus with surprise.

"Yes, where he keeps his tools; it has just been beautifully fitted up. Here it is, and that grim old foreman, Catulus, is opening the doors."

They entered into a spacious court with a shed round it, filled with engines of torture of every form. Torquatus shrunk back.

"Come in, masters, don't be afraid," said the old executioner. "There is no fire put on yet, and nobody will hurt you, unless you happen to be a wicked Christian. It's for them we have been polishing up of late."

"Now, Catulus," said Corvinus, "tell this gentleman, who is a stranger, the use of these pretty toys you have here."

Catulus, with good heart, showed him round his museum of horrors, explaining everything with such hearty good-will, and no end of jokes not quite fit for record, that in his enthusiasm he nearly gave Torquatus practical illustrations of what he described, having once almost caught his ear in a pair of sharp pincers, and another time brought down a mallet within an inch of his teeth.

The rack, a large gridiron, an iron chair with a furnace in it for heating it, large boilers for hot oil or scalding-water baths; ladles for melting lead, and pouring it neatly into the mouth; pincers, hooks and iron combs of varied shapes, for laying bare the ribs; scorpions, or scourges, armed with iron or leaden knobs; iron collars, manacles, and fetters of the most tormenting make; in fine, swords, knives, and axes in tasteful varieties, were all commented upon with true relish, and an anticipation of much enjoyment in seeing them used on those hard-headed and thick-skinned Christians.*

Torquatus was thoroughly broken down. He was taken to the baths of Antoninus, where he caught the attention of old Cucumio, the head of the wardrobe department, or capsarius, and his wife Victoria, who had seen him at church. After a good refection, he was led to a gambling-hall in Thermæ, and lost, of course. Fulvius lent him money, but for every farthing, exacted a bond. By these means, he was, in a few days, completely subdued.

Their meetings were early and late; during the day he was left free, lest he should lose his value, through being suspected by Christians. Corvinus had determined to make a tremendous dash at them, so soon as the edict should have come out. He therefore exacted from Torquatus, as his share of the compact, that the spy should study the principal cemetery where the Pentiff intended to officiate. This Torquatus soon ascertained; and his visit to the cemetery of Callistus was in fulfilment of his engagement. When that struggle between grace and sin took place in his soul, which Severus noticed, it was the image of Catulus and his hundred plagues, with that of Fulvius and his hundred bonds, that turned the scale in favor of perdition. Corvinus, after receiving his report, and making from it a rough chart of the cemetery, determined to assail it, early, the very day after the publication of the decree.

Fulvius took another course. He determined to become acquainted, by sight, with the principal clergy and leading Christians of Rome. Once possessed of this knowledge, he was sure no disguise would conceal them from his piercing eyes: and he would easily pick them up, one by one. He therefore insisted upon Torquatus's taking him as his companion to the first great function that should collect many priests and deacons round the Pope. He overruled every remonstrance, dispelled every fear, and assured Torquatus that once in, by his password, he should behave perfectly like any Christian. Torquatus soon informed him that there would be an excellent opportunity at the coming ordination in that very month of December.

CHAPTER X.

THE ORDINATION IN DECEMBER.

WHOEVER has read the history of the early Popes will have become familiar with the fact, recorded almost invariably of each, that he held certain ordinations in the month of December, wherein he created so many priests and deacons, and so many bishops for different places. The first two orders were conferred to supply clergy for the city; the third was evidently to furnish pastors for other dioceses. In later times, the ember-days in December, regulated by the festival of St. Lucy, were those on which the Supreme Pontiff held his consistories, in which he named his cardinal priests and deacons, and preconized, as it is called, the bishops of all parts of the world. And, though this function is not now coincident with the periods of ordination, still it is continued essentially for the same purpose.

Marcellinus, under whose pontificate our narrative is placed, is stated to have held two ordinations in this month—that is, of course, in different years. It was to one of these that we have alluded as about to take place.

Where was this solemn function to be performed, was Fulvius's first inquiry. And we cannot but think that the answer will be interesting to the Christian antiquary. Nor can our acquaintance with the ancient Roman Church be complete without our knowing the favored spot where Pontiff after Pontiff preached, and celebrated the divine mysteries, and held his councils, or those glorious ordinations which sent forth not only bishops but martyrs to govern other churches, and gave to a St. Laurence his diaconate, or to St. Novatus or St. Timotheus his priesthood. There, too, a Polycarp or Irenæus visited the successor of St. Peter; and thence received their commission the apostles who converted our King Lucius to the faith.

The house which the Roman Pontiffs inhabited, and the church in which they officiated, till Constantine installed them in the Lateran palace and basilica, the residence and cathedral of the illustrious line of martyr-popes for 300 years, can be no

* These instruments of cruelty are mentioned in the Acts of the Martyrs, and guided by national or personal prepossession, we will follow a learned living antiquarian, who, intent upon another research, accidentally has put together all the data requisite for our purpose.*

We have described the house of Agnes's parents as situated in the Vicus Patricius, or the Patrician street. This had another name, for it was called the street of the Cornelii, Vicus Corneliorum, because in it lived the illustrious family of that name. The centurion whom St. Peter converted† belonged to this family; and possibly to him the apostle owed his introduction at Rome to the head of his house, Cornelius Pudens. This senator married Claudia, a noble British lady; and it is singular how the unchaste poet Martial vies with the purest writers, when he sings the wedding-song of these two virtuous spouses.

It was in their house that St. Peter lived; and his fellow-apostle, St. Paul, enumerates them among his familiar friends as well: "Eubulus and Pudens, and Linus and Claudia, and all the brethren salute thee."‡ From that house, then, went forth the bishops, whom the Prince of the Apostles sent in every direction, to propagate, and die for, the faith of Christ. After the death of Pudens, the house became the property of his children, or grandchildren,§ two sons and two daughters. The latter are better known, because they have found a place in the general calendar of the Church, and because they have given their names to two of the most illustrious churches in Rome—those of St. Praxedes and St. Pudentiana. It is the latter, which Alban Butler calls "the most ancient church in the world,"|| that marks at once the Vicus Patricius and the house of Pudens.

As in every other city, so in Rome, the eucharistic sacrifice was offered originally in one place by the bishop. And even after more churches were erected, and the faithful met in them, communion was brought to them from the one altar by the deacons and distributed by the priests. It was Pope Evaristus, the fourth successor of St. Peter, who multiplied the churches of Rome with circumstances peculiarly interesting.

This Pope, then, did two things. First, he enacted that from thenceforward no altars should be erected except of stone, and that they should be consecrated; and secondly, "he distributed the titles," that is, he divided Rome into parishes, to the churches of which he gave the name of "title." The connection of these two acts will be apparent to anyone looking at Genesis xxviii.; where, after Jacob had enjoyed an angelic vision, while sleeping with a stone for his pillow, we are told that, "trembling he said, How terrible is this place. This is no other than the house of God, and the gate of heaven. And Jacob arising in the morning, took the stone . . . and set it up for a title, pouring oil on the top of it."¶

The church or oratory, where the sacred mysteries were celebrated, was truly, to the Christian, the house of God; and the stone altar, set up in it, was consecrated by the pouring of oil upon it, as is done to this day (for the whole law of Evaristus remains in full force); and thus became a title or monument.**

Two interesting facts are elicited from this narrative. One is that to that time there was only one church with an altar in Rome; and no doubt has ever been raised, that this was the church afterwards, and yet, known by the name of St. Pudentiana. Another is, that the one altar till then existing was not of stone. It was, in fact, the wooden altar used by St. Peter, and kept in that church, till transferred by St. Sylvester to the Lateran basilica, of which it forms the high altar.†† We further conclude, that the law was not retrospective, and that the wooden altar of the Popes was preserved at that church, where it had been first erected, though from time to time it might be carried, and used elsewhere.

The church in the Vicus Patricius, therefore, which existed previous to the creation of titles, was not itself a title. It continued to be the episcopal, or rather the pontifical church of Rome. The pontificate of St. Pius I., from 142 to 157, forms an interesting period in its history, for two reasons.

First, that Pope, without altering the character of the church itself, added to it an oratory which he made a title;* and having collated to it his brother Pastor, it was called the titulus Pastoris, the designation, for a long time, of the cardinalate attached to the church. This shows that the church itself was more than a title.

Secondly, in this pontificate came to Rome, for the second time, and suffered martyrdom, the holy and learned apologist St. Justin. By comparing his writings with his Acts,† we come to some interesting conclusions respecting Christian worship in times of persecution.

"In what place do the Christians meet?" he is asked by the judge.

"Do you think," he replies, "that we all meet in one place? It is not so." But when interrogated where he lived, and where he held meetings with his disciples, he answered, "I have lived till now near the house of a certain Martin, at the bath known as the Timotine. I have come to Rome for the second time, nor do I know any other place but the one I have mentioned." The Timotine or Timothean baths were part of the house of the Pudens family, and are those at which we have said that Fulvius and Corvinus met early one morning. Novatus and Timotheus were the brothers of the holy virgins Praxedes and Pudentiana; and hence the baths were called the Novatian and the Timotine, as they passed from one brother to another.

St. Justin, therefore, lived on this spot, and, as he knew no other in Rome, attended divine worship there. The very claims of hospitality would suggest it. Now in his apology, describing the Christian liturgy, of course such as he saw it, he speaks of the officiating priest in terms that sufficiently describe the bishop, or supreme pastor of the place; not only by giving him a title applied to bishops in antiquity,‡ but by describing him as the person who has the care of orphans and widows, and succors the sick, the indigent, prisoners, strangers who come as guests, who, "in one word, undertakes to provide for all in want." This could be no other than the bishop or pope himself.

We must further observe, that St. Pius is recorded to have erected a fixed baptismal font in this church, another prerogative of the cathedral, transferred with the papal altar to the Lateran. It is related that the holy Pope Stephen (A.D. 257) baptised the tribune Nemesius and his family, with many others, in the title of Pastor.§ And here it was that the blessed deacon Laurentius distributed the rich vessels of the church to the poor.

In time this name has given way to another. But the place is the same; and no doubt can exist, that the church of St. Pudentiana was, for the first three centuries, the humble cathedral of Rome.

It was to this spot, therefore, that Torquatus unwillingly consented to lead Fulvius, that he might witness the December ordination.

We find either in sepulchral inscriptions, in martyrologies, or in ecclesiastical history, abundant traces of all the orders, * "Sopra l'antichissimo altare di legoo, rinchiuso nell' altare papale," &c. "On the most ancient wooden altar, enclosed in the papal altar of the most holy Lateran basilica." By Monsig. D. Bartolini. Rome, 1852.

† Acts, 10.

‡ 2 Tim., iv., 21.

§ A second or younger Pudens is spoken of.

|| May the 19th.

¶ Verbae 17, 18.

** It is not necessary to go into the classical uses of the word titulus.

†† Only the Pope can say mass on it, or a cardinal, by authority of a special bull. This high altar has been lately magnificently decorated. A plan of the wooden altar has always been preserved in St. Peter's altar, at St. Pudentiana's. It has been lately compared with the wood of the Lateran altar, and found to be

* Its site is now occupied by the Caetani chapel.

† Prefixed to the Maurist edition of his works, or in Rulnart, i.

‡ Ο προεστως, proepositus, see Heb. xiii. 17. Ο των Ρωμαων προεστως Βικτωρ, "Victor, bishop of the Romans." Euseb. H. E. I. v. 24. The Greek word used is the same as in St. Justin.

§ The learned Bianchini plausibly conjectures that the station on Easter Sunday is not at the Lateran (the cathedral), nor at St. Peter's, where the Pope officiates, at one of which it would naturally be expected to be, but at the Liberian basilica, because it only to be held for the administration of baptism at St. Pudentiana's, which is used a stone's throw from it.

as still conferred in the Catholic Church. Inscriptions perhaps more commonly record those of Lector or reader, and of Exorcist. We will give one interesting example of each. Of a Lector:

CINNAMIUS OPAS LECTOR TITVLI FASCIOLE AMICVS
PAVPERVM QVI VIXIT ANN. XLVI. MENS. VII. D.
VIII. DEPOSIT IN PACE X KAL. MART.†
Of an Exorcist

MACEDONIVS
EXORCISTA DE KATOLICA.†

A difference was, however, that one order was not necessarily a passage, or step to another; but persons remained, often for life, in one of these lesser orders. There was not, therefore, that frequent administration of these, nor probably was it publicly performed with the higher orders.

Torquatus, having the necessary pass-word, entered, accompanied by Fulvius, who soon showed himself expert in acting as others did around him. The assembly was not large. It was held in a hall of the house, converted into a church or oratory, which was mainly occupied by the clergy, and the candidates for orders. Among the latter were Marcus and Marcellianus, the twin brothers, fellow-converts of Torquatus, who received the deaconship, and their father Tranquillinus, who was ordained priest. Of these Fulvius impressed well in his mind the features and figure; and still more did he take note of the clergy, the most eminent of Rome, there assembled. But on one, more than the rest, he fixed his piercing eye, studying his every gesture, look, voice, and lineament

This was the Pontiff who performed the august rite. Marcellinus had already governed the Church six years, and was of a venerable old age. His countenance, benign and mild, scarcely seemed to betoken the possession of that nerve which martyrdom required, and which he exhibited in his death for Christ. In those days every outward characteristic which could have betrayed the chief shepherd to the wolves was carefully avoided. The ordinary simple garb of respectable men was worn. But there is no doubt that when officiating at the altar, a distinctive robe, the forerunner of the ample chasuble, of spotless white, was cast over the ordinary garment. To this the bishop added a crown, or infula, the origin of the later mitre; while in his hand he held the crosier, emblem of his pastoral office and authority.

On him who now stood facing the assembly, before the sacred altar of Peter, which was between him and the people,† the Eastern spy steadied his keenest glance. He scanned him minutely, measured, with his eye, his height, defined the color of his hair and complexion, observed every turn of his head, his walk, his action, his tones, almost his breathing, till he said to himself, "If he stirs abroad, disguised as he may choose, that man is my prize. And I know his worth."

CHAPTER XI.

PRIE IVN PAVSA
BET PRAETIOSA
ANNORVM PVLLA
VIRGO XII TANTVM
ANCILLA DEI ET XPI
FL. VINCENTIO ET
FRAVITO. VC' CONSS

If the learned Thomassinus had known this lately discovered inscription, when he proved, with such abundance of learning;

* "Cinnamius Opas Lector of the title of Fasciole" (now P. S. Nereus and Achilles), "the friend of the poor, who lived forty-six years, seven months and eight days. Interred in peace the tenth day before the calends of March." From St. Paul's.

† "Macedonius, an exorcist of the Catholic Church." From the cemetery of SS. Thraso and Saturninus, on the Salarian way.

‡ In the great and old basilicas of Rome the celebrant faces the faithful.

§ The day before the first of June, ceased to live Prætiōsa, a girl (puella), a virgin of only twelve years of age, the handmaid of God and of Christ. In the consubship of Flavius Vincētius, and Fravitō, a consular man. Found in the cemetery of Callistus.

that virginity could be professed in the early Church, at the age of twelve, he would certainly have quoted it.* For can we doubt "that the girl who was a virgin of only twelve years of age, a handmaid of God and Christ," was such by consecration to God? Otherwise, the more tender her age, the less wonderful her state of maidenhood.

But although this, the nubile age, according to Roman law, was the one at which such dedication to God was permitted by the Church, she reserved to a maturer period that more solemn consecration, when the veil of virginity was given by the bishop; generally on Easter Sunday. That first act probably consisted of nothing more than receiving from the hands of parents a plain dark dress. But when any danger threatened, the Church permitted the anticipation, by many years, of that period, and fortified the spouses of Christ in their holy purpose, by her more solemn blessing.†

A persecution of the most strange character was on the point of breaking out, which would not spare the most tender of the flock; and it was no wonder that they, who in their hearts had betrothed themselves to the Lamb, as His chaste spouses for ever, should desire to come to His nuptials before death. They longed naturally to bear the full-grown lily, entwined round the palm, should this be their portion.

Agnes had from her infancy chosen for herself this holiest state. The superhuman wisdom which had ever exhibited itself in her words and actions, blending itself so gracefully with the simplicity of an innocent and guileless childhood, rendered her ripe, beyond her years, for any measure of indulgence, which could be granted, to hearts that panted for their chaste bridal-hour. She eagerly seized on the claim that coming danger gave her, to a more than usual relaxation of that law, which prescribed a delay of more than ten years in the fulfilling of her desire. Another postulant joined her in this petition.

We may easily imagine that a holy friendship had been growing between her and Syra, from the first interview which we have described between them. This feeling had been increased by all that Agnes had heard Fabiola say, in praise of her favorite servant. From this, and from the slave's more modest reports, she was satisfied that the work to which she had devoted herself, of her mistress's conversion, must be entirely left in her hands. It was evidently prospering, owing to the prudence and grace with which it was conducted. In her frequent visits to Fabiola, she contented herself with admiring and approving what her cousin related of Syra's conversations, but she carefully avoided every expression that could raise suspicion of any collusion between them.

Syra as a dependant, and Agnes as a relation, had put on mourning upon Fabius's death; and hence no change of habit would raise suspicion in his daughter's mind of their having taken some secret, or some joint step. Thus far they could safely ask to be admitted at once to receive the solemn consecration to perpetual virginity. Their petition was granted; but for obvious reasons was kept carefully concealed. It was only a day or two before the happy one of their spiritual nuptials, that Syra told it, as a great secret, to her blind friend.

"And so," said the latter, pretending to be displeased, "you want to keep all the good things to yourself. Do you call that charitable, now?"

"My dear child," said Syra, soothingly, "don't be offended. It was necessary to keep it quite a secret."

"And therefore, I suppose, poor I must not even be present?"

"Oh, yes, Cæcilia, to be sure you may; and see all that you can," replied Syra, laughing.

"Never mind about the seeing. But tell me, how will you be dressed? What have you to get ready?"

Syra gave her an exact description of the habit and veil, their color and form.

* Vetus et Nova Ecclesie Disciplina; circa Beneficia. Par. I. lib. iii. (Luc. 1727.)

† Thomassin, p. 792.

"How very interesting!" she said. "And what have you to do?"

The other, amused at her unwonted curiosity, described minutely the short ceremonial.

"Well now, one question more," resumed the blind girl. "When and where is all this to be? You said I might come, so I must know the time and place."

Syra told her it would be at the titile of Pastor, at daybreak, on the third day from that. "But what has made you so inquisitive, dearest? I never saw you so before. I am afraid you are becoming quite worldly."

"Never you mind," replied Cæcilia, "if people choose to have secrets for me, I do not see why I should not have some of my own."

Syra laughed at her affected pettishness, for she knew well the humble simplicity of the poor child's heart. They embraced affectionately and parted. Cæcilia went straight to the kind Lucina, for she was a favorite in every house. No sooner was she admitted to that pious matron's presence, than she flew to her, threw herself upon her bosom, and burst into tears. Lucina soothed and caressed her, and soon composed her. In a few minutes she was again bright and joyous, and evidently deep in conspiracy with the cheerful lady about something which delighted her. When she left she was all buoyant and blithe, and went to the house of Agnes, in the hospital of which the good priest Dionysius lived. She found him at home; and casting herself on her knees before him, talked so fervently to him that he was moved to tears, and spoke kindly and consolingly to her. The Te Deum had not yet been written; but something very like it rang in the blind girl's heart as she went to her humble home.

The happy morning at length arrived, and before daybreak the more solemn mysteries had been celebrated, and the body of the faithful had dispersed. Only those remained who had to take part in the more private function, or who were specially asked to witness it. These were Lucina and her son, the aged parents of Agnes, and of course Sebastian. But Syra looked in vain for her blind friend; she had evidently retired with the crowd; and the gentle slave feared she might have hurt her feelings by her reserve before their last interview.

The hall was still shrouded in the dusk of a winter's twilight, although the glowing east without foretold a bright December day. On the altar burned perfumed tapers of large dimensions, and round it were gold and silver lamps of great value, throwing an atmosphere of mild radiance upon the sanctuary. In the front of the altar was placed the chair no less venerable than itself, now enshrined in the Vatican, the chair of Peter. On this was seated the venerable Pontiff, with staff in hand and crown on head, and round him stood his ministers, scarcely less worshipful than himself.

From the gloom of the chapel there came forth first the sound of sweet voices, like those of angels, chanting in soft cadence a hymn which anticipated the sentiments soon after embodied in the

"Jesu corona virginum."

Then there emerged into the light of the sanctuary the procession of already consecrated virgins, led by the priests and deacons who had charge of them. And in the midst of them appeared two, whose dazzling white garments shone the brighter amidst their dark habits. These were the two new postulants, who, as the rest defiled and formed a line on either side, were conducted, each by two professed, to the foot of the altar, where they knelt at the Pontiff's feet. Their bridesmaids, or sponsors, stood near to assist in the function.

Each as she came was asked solemnly what she desired, and expressed her wish to receive the veil, and practise its duties, under the care of those chosen guides. For, although consecrated virgins had begun to live in community before this period, yet many continued to reside at home; and persecution interfered with enclosure. Still there was a place in church, boarded off for the consecrated virgins; and they often met apart, for particular instruction and devotion.

The bishop then addressed the young aspirants, in glowing and affectionate words. He told them how high a call it was to lead on earth the lives of angels, who neither marry nor give in marriage, to tread the same chaste path to heaven which the Incarnate Word chose for His own Mother; and arrived there, to be received into the pure ranks of that picked host, that follows the Lamb whithersoever He goeth. He expatiated on the doctrine of St. Paul, writing to the Corinthians on the superiority of virginity to every other state; and he feelingly described the happiness of having no love on earth but one, which instead of fading, opens out into immortality, in heaven. For bliss, he observed, is but the expanded flower which Divine love bears on earth.

After this brief discourse, and an examination of the candidates for this great honor, the holy Pontiff proceeded to bless the different portions of their religious habits, by prayers probably nearly identical with those now in use, and these were put on them by their respective attendants. The new religions laid their heads upon the altar, in token of their oblation of self. But in the West, the hair was not cut, as it was in the East, but was always left long. A wreath of flowers was then placed upon the head of each; and though it was winter, the well-guarded terraces of Fabiola had been made to furnish bright and fragrant blossoms.

All seemed ended; and Agnes, kneeling at the foot of the altar, was motionless in one of her radiant raptures, gazing fixedly upwards; while Syra, near her, was bowed down, sunk into the depths of her gentle humility, wondering how she should have been found worthy of so much favor. So absorbed were both in their thanksgiving, that they perceived not a slight commotion through the assembly, as if something unexpected was occurring.

They were aroused by the bishop repeating the question: "My daughter, what dost thou seek?" when, before they could look round, each felt a hand seized, and heard the answer returned in a voice dear to both: "Holy father, to receive the veil of consecration to Jesus Christ, my only love on earth, under the care of these two holy virgins, already His happy spouses."

They were overwhelmed with joy and tenderness; for it was the poor blind Cæcilia. When she heard of the happiness that awaited Syra, she had flown, as we have seen, to the kind Lucina, who soon consoled her, by suggesting to her the possibility of obtaining a similar grace. She promised to furnish all that was necessary; only Cæcilia insisted that her dress should be coarse, as became a poor beggar-girl. The priest Dionysius presented to the Pontiff, and obtained the grant of, her prayer; and as she wished to have her two friends for sponsors, it was arranged that he should lead her up to the altar after their consecration. Cæcilia, however, kept her secret.

The blessings were spoken, and the habit and veil put on; when they asked her if she had brought no wreath of flowers. Timidly she drew from under her garment the crown she had provided, a bare, thorny branch, twisted into a circle, and presented it, saying:

"I have no flowers to offer to my bridegroom, neither did He wear flowers for me. I am but a poor girl, and do you think my Lord will be offended if I ask Him to crown me, as he was pleased to be crowned Himself? And then, flowers represent virtues in those who wear them; but my barren heart has produced nothing better than these."

She saw not, with her blind eyes, how her two companions snatched the wreaths from her hands to put on hers; but a sign from the Pontiff checked them; and amidst moistened eyes she was led forth, all joyous, in her thorny crown; emblem of what the Church has always taught, that the very queenship of virtue is innocence crowned by penance.

* "Jesus the virgin's crown," the hymn for virgins.

CHAPTER XII.

THE NOMETAN VILLA.

THE Nomentan road goes from Rome eastward, and between it and the Salarian is a deep ravine, beyond which, on the side of the Nomentan way lies a gracefully undulating ground. Amidst this is situated a picturesque round temple, and near it a truly beautiful basilica, dedicated to St. Agnes. Here was the villa belonging to her, situated about a mile and a half from the city; and thither it had been arranged that the two, now the three, newly consecrated should repair, to spend the day in retirement and tranquil joy. Few more such days, perhaps, would ever be granted them.

We need not describe this rural residence, except to say that everything in it breathed contentment and happiness. It was one of those genial days which a Roman winter supplies. The rugged Apennines were slightly powdered with snow; the ground was barely crisp, the atmosphere transparent, the sunshine glowing, and the heavens cloudless. A few greyish curls of melting smoke from the cottages, and the leafless vines, alone told that it was December. Everything seemed to know and love the gentle mistress of the place. The doves came and perched upon her shoulder or her hand; the lambs in the paddock frisked, and ran to her the moment she approached, and took the green fragrant herbs which she brought them with evident pleasure; but none owned her kindly sway so much as old Molossus, the enormous watchdog. Chained beside the gate, so fierce was he that none but a few favorite domestics durst go near him. But no sooner did Agnes appear than he crouched down, and wagged his bushy tail, and whined, till he was let loose; for now a child might approach him. He never left his mistress's side; he followed her like a lamb; and if she sat down, he would lie at her feet, looking into her face, delighted to receive, on his huge head, the caresses of her slender hand.

It was, indeed, a peaceful day; sometimes calm and quiet, soft and tender, as the three spoke together of the morning's happiness, and of the happier morning of which it was a pledge, above the liquid amber of their present skies; sometimes cheerful and even merry, as the two took Cæcilia to task for the trick she had played them. And she laughed cheerily, as she always did, and told them she had a better trick in store for them yet; which was, that she would cut them out when that next morning came, for she intended to be the first at it, and not the last.

Fabiola had, in the meantime, come to the villa to pay her first visit to Agnes after her calamity, and to thank her for her sympathy. She walked forward, but stopped suddenly on her coming near the spot where this happy group were assembled. For when she beheld the two who could see the outward brightness of heaven, hanging over her who seemed to hold all its splendour within her soul, she saw at once, in the scene, the verification of her dream. Yet unwilling to intrude herself unexpectedly upon them, and anxious to find Agnes alone, and not with her own slave and a poor blind girl, she turned away before she was noticed, and walked towards a distant part of the grounds. Still she could not help asking herself why she could not be cheerful and happy as they? Why was there a gulf between them?

But the day was not destined to finish without its clouds; it would be too blissful for earth. Besides Fabiola, another person had started from Rome, to pay a less welcome visit to Agnes. This was Fulvius, who had never forgotten the assurances of Fabius, that his fascinating address and brilliant ornaments had turned the weak head of Agnes. He had waited till the first days of mourning were over, and he respected the house in which he had once received such a rude reception, or rather suffered such a summary ejection. Having ascertained that, for the first time, she had gone without her parents, or any male attendants, to her suburban villa, he considered it a good opportunity for pressing his suit. He rode out of the Nomentan gate, and was soon at Agnes's. He dismounted; said he wished to see her on important business, and after some importunity, was admitted by the porter. He was directed along a walk, at the end of which she would be found. The sun was declining, and her companions had strolled to a distance; and she was sitting alone in a bright sunny spot, with old Molossus crouching at her feet. The slightest approach to a growl from him, rare when he was with her, made her look up from her work of tying together such winter flowers as the others brought her, while she suppressed, by raising a finger, this expression of instinctive dislike.

Fulvius came near with a respectful, but freer air than usual, as one already assured of his request.

"I have come, Lady Agnes," he said, "to renew to you the expression of my sincere regard; and I could not have chosen a better day, for brighter or fairer scarcely the summer sun could have bestowed."

"Fair, indeed, and bright it has been to me," replied Agnes, borne back in mind to the morning's scene; "and no sun in my life has ever given me fairer—it can only give me one more fair."

Fulvius was flattered, as if the compliments was to his presence, and answered, "The day, no doubt you mean, of your espousals with one who may have won your heart."

"That is indeed done," she replied, as if unconsciously; "and this is his own precious day."

"And was that wreathed veil upon your head, placed there in anticipation of this happy hour?"

"Yes: it is the sign my beloved has placed upon my countenance, that I recognize no lover but himself."*

"And who is this happy being? I was not without hopes, nor will I renounce them yet, that I have a place in your thoughts, perhaps in your affections."

Agnes seemed scarcely to heed his words. There was no appearance of shyness or timidity in her looks or manner, no embarrassment even:

"Spotless without, and innocent within,
She feared no danger, for she knew no sin."

Her childlike countenance remained bright, open, and guileless; her eyes mildly beaming, looked straight upon Fulvius's face with an earnest simplicity, that made him almost quail before her. She stood up now, with graceful dignity, as she replied:

"Milk and honey exhaled from his lips, as the blood from his stricken cheek impressed itself on mine."†

She is crazed, Fulvius was just beginning to think; when the inspired look of her countenance, and the clear brightness of her eye, as she gazed forwards towards some object seen by herself alone, overawed and subdued him. She recovered in an instant; and again he took heart. He resolved at once to pursue his demand.

"Madam," he said, "you are trifling with one who sincerely admires and loves you. I know from the best authority—yes, the best authority—that of a mutual friend departed, that you have been pleased to think favorably of me, and to express yourself not opposed to my urging my claims, to your hand. I now, therefore, seriously and earnestly solicit it. I may seem abrupt and informal, but I am sincere and warm."

"Begone from me, food of corruption!" she said with calm majesty; "for already a lover has secured my heart, for whom alone I keep my troth, to whom I intrust myself with undivided devotion; one whose love is chaste, whose caresses pure, whose brides never put off their virginal wreaths."‡

Fulvius, who had dropped on his knee as he concluded his last sentence, and had thus drawn forth that severe rebuke, rose, filled with spite and fury, at having been so completely deluded. "Is it not enough to be rejected," he said, "after having been encouraged, but must insult be heaped on me too?"

* "D'accede a me pabni um mortis, qu'a jam ab alio amatore preventa sum." "Ipsi soli servo fidem, ipsi me tota devotione committo." "Quem cum amavero casta sum, cum tetigero munda sum cum accepero virgo sum." Ibid.

† "Posuit signum in faciem meam, ut non sum præter eum amatorem admittam." Office of St. Agne.

‡ "Mel et lac ex ejus ore suscepti, et sanguis ejus ornavit genas meas." Ibid.

and must I be told to my face that another has been before me to-day?—Sebastian, I suppose, again—”

“Who are you?” exclaimed an indignant voice behind him, “that dare to utter with disdain, the name of one whose honor is untarnished, whose virtue is as unchallenged as his courage?”

He turned round, and stood confronted with Fabiola, who, having walked for sometime about the garden, thought she would now probably find her cousin disengaged, and by herself. She had come upon him suddenly, and had caught his last words.

Fulvius was abashed, and remained silent.

Fabiola, with a noble indignation, continued. “And who, too, are you, who, not content with having once thrust yourself into my kinswoman’s house, to insult her, presume now to intrude upon the privacy of her rural retreat?”

“And who are you,” retorted Fulvius, “who take upon yourself to be imperious mistress in another’s house?”

“One,” replied the lady, “who, by allowing my cousin to meet you first at her table, and there discovering your designs upon an innocent child, feels herself bound in honor and duty to thwart them, and to shield her from them.”

She took Agnes by the hand, and was leading her away; and Molossus required what he never remembered to have received before, but what he took delightedly, a gentle little tap to keep him from more than growling; when Fulvius, gnashing his teeth, muttered audibly:

“Haughty Roman dame! thou shalt bitterly rue this day and hour. Thou shalt know and feel how Asia can revenge.”

CHAPTER XIII.

THE EDICT.

The day being at length arrived for its publication in Rome, Corvinus fully felt the importance of the commission intrusted to him, of affixing in its proper place in the Forum, the edict of extermination against the Christians, or rather the sentence of their very name. News had been received from Nicodemia, that a brave Christian soldier, named George, had torn down a similar decree, and had manfully suffered death for his boldness. Corvinus was determined that nothing of the sort should happen in Rome; for he feared too seriously the consequences of such an occurrence to himself; he therefore took every precaution in his power. The edict had been written in large characters, upon sheets of parchment joined together; and these were nailed to a board, firmly supported by a pillar, against which it was hung, not far from the Puteal Libonis, the magistrate’s chair in the Forum. This, however, was not done till the Forum was deserted, and night had set in. It was thus intended that the edict should meet the eyes of the citizens early in the morning, and strike their minds with more tremendous effect.

To prevent the possibility of any nocturnal attempt to destroy the precious document, Corvinus, with much the same cunning precaution as was taken by the Jewish priests to prevent the Resurrection, obtained for a night-guard to the Forum, a company of the Pannonian cohort, a body composed of soldiers belonging to the fiercest races of the North, Dacians, Pannonians, Sarmatians, and Germans, whose uncouth features, savage aspect, matted sandy hair, and bushy red moustaches, made them appear absolutely ferocious to Roman eyes. These men could scarcely speak Latin, but were ruled by officers of their own countries, and formed, in the decline of the empire, the most faithful body-guard of the reigning tyrants, often their own fellow-countrymen; for there was no excess too monstrous for them to commit, if duly commanded to execute it.

A number of these savages, ever rough and ready, were distributed so as to guard every avenue of the Forum, with strict orders to pierce through, or hew down, any one who should attempt to pass without the watchword, or symbolum. This was every night distributed by the general in command, through his tribunes and centurions, to all the troops. But to prevent all possibility of any Christian making use of it that night, if he should chance to discover it, the cunning Corvinus had one chosen, which he felt sure no Christian would use. It was NUMEN IMPERATORUM: the “Divinity of the Emperors.”

The last thing which he did was to make his rounds, giving to each sentinel the strictest injunctions; and most minutely to the one whom he had placed close to the edict. This man had been chosen for his post on account of his rude strength and huge bulk, and the peculiar ferocity of his looks and character. Corvinus gave him the most rigid instructions, how he was to spare nobody, but to prevent any one’s interference with the sacred edict. He repeated to him again and again the watchword; and left him, already half-stupid with sabaia or beer,* in the merest animal consciousness, that it was his business, not an unpleasant one, to spear, or sabre, some one or other before morning. The night was raw and gusty, with occasional sharp and slanting showers; and the Dacian wrapped himself in his cloak, and walked up and down, occasionally taking a long pull at a flask concealed about him, containing a liquor said to be distilled from the wild cherries of the Thuringian forests; and in the intervals muddily meditating, not on the wood or river, by which his young barbarians were at play, but how soon it would be time to cut the present emperor’s throat, and sack the city.

While all this was going on, old Diogenes and his hearty sons were in their poor house in the Suburra, not far off, making preparations for their frugal meal. They were interrupted by a gentle tap at the door, followed by the lifting of the latch, and the entrance of the two young men, whom Diogenes at once recognised and welcomed.

“Come in, my noble young masters; how good of you thus to honor my poor dwelling! I hardly dare offer you our plain fare; but if you will partake of it you will indeed give us a Christian love-feast.”

“Thank you most kindly, father Diogenes,” answered the elder of the two, Quadratus, Sebastian’s sinewy centurion; “Pancratius and I have come expressly to sup with you. But not as yet; we have some business in this part of the town, and after it, we shall be glad to eat something. In the meantime, one of your youths can go out and cater for us. Come, we must have something good; and I want you to cheer yourself with a moderate cup of generous wine.”

Saying this he gave his purse to one of the sons, with instructions to bring home some better provisions than he knew the simple family usually enjoyed. They sat down; and Pancratius, by way of saying something, addressed the old man. “Good Diogenes, I have heard Sebastian say that you remember seeing the glorious Deacon Laurentius die for Christ. Tell me something about him.”

“With pleasure,” answered the old man. “It is now nearly forty-five years since it happened,* and as I was older then than you are now, you may suppose I remember all quite distinctly. He was indeed a beautiful youth to look at: so mild and sweet, so fair and graceful; and his speech was so gentle, so soft, especially when speaking to the poor. How they all loved him! I followed him every where; I stood by, as the venerable Pontiff Sixtus was going to death, and Laurentius met him, and so tenderly reproached him, just as a son might a father, for not allowing him to be his companion in the sacrifice of himself, as he had ministered to him in the sacrifice of our Lord’s body and blood.”

“Those were splendid times, Diogenes, were they not?” interrupted the youth; “how degenerate we are now! What a different race! Are we not, Quadratus?”

The rough soldier smiled at the generous sincerity of his complaint, and bid Diogenes go on.

* Est autem sabaia ex hordeo vel frumento in liquorem conversis pauperibus in Illyrico potus.” Sabaia is the drink of the poor in Illyria, made of barley or wheat, transformed into a liquid.” Annian. Marcellinus, lib. xxv. 8, p. 422, ed. Lips.

"I saw him, too, as he distributed the rich plate of the Church to the poor. We have never had any thing so splendid since. There were golden lamps and candlesticks, censurs, chalices and patens,* besides an immense quantity of silver melted down, and distributed to the blind, the lame and the indigent."

"But tell me," asked Pancratius, "how did he endure his last dreadful torment? It must have been frightful."

"I saw it all," answered the old fossor, "and it would have been intolerably frightful in another. He had been first placed on the rack, and variously tormented, and he had not uttered a groan; when the judge ordered that horrid bed, or gridiron, to be prepared and heated. To look at his tender flesh blistering and breaking over the fire, and deeply scored with red burning gashes that cut to the bone where the iron bars went across; to see the steam, thick as from a cauldron, rise from his body, and hear the fire hiss beneath him, as he melted away into it; and every now and then to observe the tremulous quivering that crept over the surface of his skin, the living motion which the agony gave to each separate muscle, and the sharp spasmodic twitches which convulsed and gradually contracted his limbs; all this, I own, was the most harrowing spectacle I have ever beheld in all my life. But to look into his countenance was to forget all this. His head was raised up from the burning body, and stretched out as if fixed on the contemplation of some most celestial vision, like that of his fellow-deacon Stephen. His face glowed indeed with the heat below, and the perspiration flowed down it; but the light from the fire shining upward, and passing through his golden locks, created a glory round his beautiful head and countenance, which made him look as if already in heaven. And every feature, serene and sweet as ever, was so impressed with an eager, longing look, accompanying the upward glancing of his eye, that you would willingly have changed places with him."

"That I would," again broke in Pancratius, "and as soon as God pleases! I dare not think that I could stand what he did; for he was indeed a noble and heroic Levite, while I am only a weak, imperfect boy. But do you not think, dear Quadratus, that strength is given in that hour proportionate to our trials, whatever they may be? You, I know, would stand any thing; for you are a fine stout soldier, accustomed to toil and wounds. But as for me, I have only a willing heart to give. Is that enough, think you?"

"Quite, quite, my dear boy," exclaimed the centurion, full of emotion, and looking tenderly on the youth, who with glistening eyes, having risen from his seat, had placed his hands upon the officer's shoulders. "God will give you strength, as He has already given you courage. But we must not forget our night's work. Wrap yourself well up in your cloak, and bring your toga quite over your head; so! It is a wet and bitter night. Now, good Diogenes, put more wood on the fire, and let us find supper ready on our return. We shall not be long absent; and just leave the door ajar."

"Go, go, my sons," said the old man, "and God speed you! whatever you are about, I am sure it is something praiseworthy."

Quadratus sturdily drew his chlamys, or military cloak, around him, and the two youths plunged into the dark lanes of the Suburra, and took the direction of the Forum. While they were absent the door was opened with the well-known salutation of "thanks to God;" and Sebastian entered, and inquired anxiously if Diogenes had seen any thing of the two young men; for he had got a hint of what they were going to do. He was told they were expected in a few moments.

A quarter of an hour had scarcely elapsed, when hasty steps were heard approaching; the door was pushed open and was as quickly shut, and then fast barred, behind Quadratus and Pancratius.

"Here it is," said the latter, producing, with a hearty laugh, a bundle of crumpled parchment.

"What?" asked all eagerly.

"Why, the grand decree, of course," answered Pancratius, with boyish glee; "look here. DOMINI NOSTRI DIOCLETIANUS ET MAXIMIANUS, INVICTI, SENIORES AUGUSTI, PATRES IMPERATORUM ET CÆSARUM,* and so forth. Here it goes!" And he thrust it into the blazing fire, while the stalwart sons of Diogenes threw a faggot over it to keep it down, and down its crackling. There it frizzled, and writhed, and cracked, and shrunk, first one letter or word coming up, then another; first an emperor's praise, and then an anti-Christian blasphemy; till all had subsided into a black ashy mass.

And what else, or more, would those be in a few years who had issued that proud document, when their corpses should have been burnt on a pile of cedar-wood and spices, and their handful of ashes be scraped together, hardly enough to fill a gilded urn? And what also, in very few years more, would that heathenism be, which it was issued to keep alive, but a dead letter at most, and as worthless a heap of extinguished embers as lay on that hearth? And the very empire which these "unconquered" Augusti were bolstering up by cruelty and injustice, how in a few centuries would it resemble that annihilated decree? the monuments of its grandeur lying in ashes, or in ruins, and proclaiming that there is no true Lord but one stronger than Cæsars, the Lord of lords; and that neither counsel nor strength of man shall prevail against Him.

Something like this did Sebastian think, perhaps, as he gazed abstractedly on the expiring embers of the pompous and cruel edict which they had torn down, not for a wanton frolic, but because it contained blasphemies against God and His holiest truths. They knew that if they should be discovered, ten-fold tortures would be their lot; but Christians in those days, when they contemplated and prepared for martyrdom, made no calculation on that head. Death for Christ, whether quick and easy, or lingering and painful, was the end for which they looked; and like brave soldiers going to battle, they did not speculate where a shaft or a sword might strike them, whether a death-blow would at once stun them out of existence, or they should have to writhe for hours upon the ground, mutilated or pierced, to die by inches among the heaps of unheeded slain.

Sebastian soon recovered, and had hardly the heart to reprove the perpetrators of this deed. In truth, it had its ridiculous side, and he was inclined to laugh at the morrow's dismay. This view he gladly took; for he saw Pancratius watched his looks with some trepidation, and his centurion looked a little disconcerted. So, after a hearty laugh, they sat down cheerfully to their meal; for it was not midnight, and the hour for commencing the fast, preparatory to receiving the holy Eucharist, was not arrived. Quadratus's object, besides kindness, in this arrangement, was partly, that if surprised, a reason for their being there might be apparent, partly to keep up the spirits of his younger companion and of Diogenes's household, if alarmed at the bold deed just performed. But there was no appearance of any such feeling. The conversation soon turned upon recollections of Diogenes's youth, and the good old fervent times, as Pancratius would persist in calling them. Sebastian saw his friend home, and then took a round, to avoid the Forum in seeking his own abode. If any one had seen Pancratius that night, when alone in his chamber preparing to retire to rest, he would have seen him every now and then almost laughing at some strange but pleasant adventure.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE DISCOVERY.

At the first dawn of morning, Corvinus was up; and, notwithstanding the gloominess of the day, proceeded straight to the Forum. He found his outposts quite undisturbed, and hastened to the principal object of his care. It would be useless to attempt describing his astonishment, his rage, his fury, when he saw the blank board, with only a few shreds of parchment left, round the nails; and beside it standing, in unconscious stolidity, his Dacian sentinel.

* Prudentius, in his hymn on St. Laurence

* "Our lords Dioclesian and Maximian, the unconquered, elder Augusti fathers of the Emperors and Cæsars."

He would have darted at his throat like a tiger, if he had not seen, in the barbarian's twinkling eye, a sort of hyæna squint, which told him he had better not. But he broke out at once into a passionate exclamation:

"Sirrah! how has the edict disappeared? Tell me directly!"

"Softly, softly, Herr Kornweiner," answered the imperturbable Northern. "There it is as you left it in my charge."

"Where, you fool? Come and look at it."

The Dacian went to his side, and for the first time confronted the board; and after looking at it for some moments, exclaimed: "Well, is not that the board you hung up last night?"

"Yes, you blockhead, but there was writing upon it, which is gone. That is what you had to guard."

"Why, look you, captain, as to writing, you see I know nothing, having never been a scholar; but as it was raining all night, it may have been washed out."

"And as it was blowing, I suppose the parchment on which it was written was blown off?"

"No doubt, Herr Kornweiner; you are quite right."

"Come, sir, this is no joking matter. Tell me, at once, who came here last night?"

"Why, two of them came."

"Two of what?"

"Two wizards, or goblins, or worse."

"None of that nonsense for me." The Dacian's eye flashed drunkenly again. "Well, tell me, Arminius, what sort of people they were, and what they did."

"Why, one of them was but a stripling, a boy, tall and thin; who went round the pillar, and I suppose must have taken away what you miss, while I was busy with the other."

"And what of him? What was he like?"

The soldier opened his mouth and eyes, and stared at Corvinus for some moments, then said, with a sort of stupid solemnity, "What was he like? Why, if he was not Thor himself, he wasn't far from it. I never felt such strength."

"What did he do to show it?"

"He came up first, and began to chat quite friendly; asked me if it was not very cold, and that sort of thing. At last, I remembered that I had to run through any one that came near me—"

"Exactly," interrupted Corvinus; "and why did you not do it?"

"Only because he wouldn't let me. I told him to be off, or I should spear him, and drew back and stretched out my javelin; when in the quietest manner, but I don't know how, he twisted it out of my hand, broke it over his knee, as if it had been a mountebank's wooden sword, and dashed the iron-headed piece fast into the ground, where you see it, fifty yards off."

"Then why not you rush on him with your sword, and dispatch him at once? But where is your sword? it is not in your scabbard."

The Dacian, with a stupid grin, pointed to the roof of the neighboring basilica, and said: "There don't you see it shining on the tiles, in the morning light?" Corvinus looked, and there indeed he saw what appeared like such an object, but he could hardly believe his own eyes.

"How did it get there, you stupid booby?" he asked,

The soldier twisted his moustache in an ominous way, which made Corvinus ask again more civilly, and then he was answered:

"He, or it, whatever it was, then without any apparent effort, by a sort of conjuring, whisked it out of my hand, and up where you see it, as easily as I could cast a quoit a dozen yards."

"And then?"

"And then, he and the boy, who came from round the pillar, walked off in the dark."

"What a strange story!" muttered Corvinus to himself;

"yet there are proofs of the fellow's tale. It is not every one who could have performed that feat. But pray, sirrah, why did you not give the alarm, and rouse the other guards to pursuit?"

"First, Master Kornweiner, because, in my country, we will fight any living men, but we do not propose to pursue hobgoblins. And secondly, what was the use? I saw the board that you gave into my care all safe and sound."

"Stupid barbarian!" growled Corvinus, but well within his teeth; then added: "This business will go hard with you; you know it is a capital offence."

"What is?"

"Why, to let a man come up and speak to you, without giving the watchword."

"Gently, captain, who says he did not give it? I never said so."

"But did he though? Then it could be no Christian."

"Oh yes, he came up, and said quite plainly, 'Nomen Imperatorum.'"

"What?" roared out Corvinus.

"Nomen Imperatorum."

"'Nunen Imperatorum' was the watchword," shrieked the enraged Roman.

"Nomen or Numen, it's all the same, I suppose. A letter can't make any difference. You call me Arminius, and I call myself Hermann, and they mean the same. How should I know your nice points of language?"

Corvinus was enraged at himself; for he saw how much better he would have gained his ends, by putting a sharp, intelligent praetorian on duty, instead of a sottish, savage foreigner. "Well," he said, in the worst of humors, "you will have to answer to the emperor for all this; and you know he is not accustomed to pass over offences."

"Look you now, Herr Krummbeiner," returned the soldier, with a look of sly stolidity; "as to that, we are pretty well in the same boat," (Corvinus turned pale, for he knew this was true.) "And you must contrive something to save me, if you want to save yourself. It was you the emperor made responsible, for the what-d'ye-call-it?—that board."

"You are right, my friend; I must make it out that a strong body attacked you, and killed you at your post. So shut yourself up in quarters for a few days, and you shall have plenty of beer till the thing blows over."

The soldier went off and concealed himself. A few days, after, the dead body of a Dacian, evidently murdered, was washed on the banks of the Tiber. It was supposed he had fallen in some drunken row; and no further trouble was taken about it. The fact was indeed so: but Corvinus could have given the best account of the transaction. Before, however, leaving the ill-omened spot in the Forum, he had carefully examined the ground, for any trace of the daring act; when he picked up, close under the place of the edict, a knife, which he was sure he had seen at school, in possession of one of his companions. He treasured it up, as an implement of future vengeance, and hastened to provide another copy of the decree.

CHAPTER XV.

EXPLANATIONS.

When morning had fairly broken, crowds streamed, from every side, into the Forum, curious to read the tremendous edict so long menaced. But when they found only a bare board, there was a universal uproar. Some admired the spirit of the Christians, so generally reckoned cowardly; others were indignant at the audacity of such an act; some ridiculed the officials concerned in the proclamation; others were angry that the expected sport of the day might be delayed.

At an early hour the places of public fashionable resort were all occupied with the same theme. In the great Antonian Therma a group of regular frequenters were talking it over. There were Scaurus the lawyer, and Proculus, and Fulvius, and the philosopher Calpurnius, who seemed very busy with some musty volumes, and several others.

*The name of the Emperor.

"What a strange affair this is, about the edict!" said one.

"Say rather, what a treasonable outrage against the divine emperors!" answered Fulvius.

"How was it done?" asked a third.

"Have you not heard," said Proculus, "that the Dacian guard stationed at the Puteal, was found dead, with twenty-seven poignard wounds on him, nineteen of which would have sufficed each by itself to cause death?"

"No, that is quite a false report," interrupted Scarus; "it was not done by violence, but entirely by witchcraft. Two women came up to the soldier, who drove his lance at one, and it passed clean through her, and stuck in the ground on the other side, without making any wound in her. He then hacked at the other with his sword, but he might as well have struck at marble. She then threw a pinch of powder upon him, and he flew into the air, and was found, asleep and unhurt, this morning, on the roof of the Æmilian basilica. A friend of mine, who was out early, saw the ladder up, by which he had been brought down."

"Wonderful!" many exclaimed. "What extraordinary people these Christians must be!"

"I don't believe a word of it," observed Proculus. "There is no such power in magic; and certainly I don't see why these wretched men should possess it more than their betters. Come, Calpurnius," he continued, "put up that old book, and answer these questions. I learnt more, one day after dinner, about these Christians from you, than I had heard in all my life before. What a wonderful memory you must have, to remember so accurately the genealogy and history of that barbarous people! Is what Scarus has just told us, possible or not?"

Calpurnius delivered himself, with great pompousness, as follows:

"There is no reason to suppose such a thing impossible; for the power of magic has no bounds. To prepare a powder that would make a man fly in the air, it would be only necessary to find some herbs in which air predominates more than the other three elements. Such for instance are pulse, or lentils, according to Pythagoras. These, being gathered when the sun is in Libra, the nature of which is to balance even heavy things in air, at the moment of conjunction with Mercury, a winged power as you know, and properly energised by certain mysterious words, by a skilful magician, then reduced to a powder in a mortar made out of an ærolite, or stone that had flown up into the sky, and come down again, would no doubt, when rightly used, enable, or force, a person to fly up into the air. It is well-known, indeed, that the Thessalian witches go at pleasure through the clouds, from place to place, which must be done by means of some such charm.

"Then, as to the Christians; you will remember, excellent Proculus, that in the account to which you have done me the honor to allude, which was at the deified Fabius's table, if I remember right, I mentioned that the sect came originally from Chaldaea, a country always famous for its occult arts. But we have a most important evidence bearing on this matter, recorded in history. It is quite certain, that here in Rome, a certain Simon, who was sometimes called Simon Peter, and at other times Simon Magus, actually in public flew up high into the air; but his charm having slipped out of his belt, he fell and broke both his legs; for which reason he was obliged to be crucified with his head downwards."

"Then are all Christians necessarily sorcerers?" asked Scarus.

"Necessarily; it is part of their superstition. They believe their priests to have most extraordinary power over nature. Thus, for example, they think they can bathe the bodies of people in water, and their souls acquire thereby wonderful gifts, and superiority, should they be slaves, over their masters and the divine emperors themselves."

"Dreadful!" all cried out.

"Then, again," resumed Calpurnius, "we all know what a frightful crime some of them committed last night, in tearing down a supreme edict of the imperial deities; and even suppose (which the gods avert) that they carried their treasons still further, and attempted their sacred lives, they believed that they have only to go to one of those priests, own the crime, and ask for pardon; and, if he gives it, they consider themselves as perfectly guiltless."

"Fearful!" joined in the chorus.

"Such a doctrine," said Scaurus, "is incompatible with the safety of the state. A man who thinks he can be pardoned by another man of every crime, is capable of committing any."

"And that, no doubt," observed Fulvius, "is the cause of this new and terrible edict against them. After what Calpurnius has told us about these desperate men, nothing can be too severe against them."

Fulvius had been keenly eyeing Sebastian, who had entered during the conversation; and now pointedly addressed him.

"And you, no doubt, think so too, Sebastian; do you not?"

"I think," he calmly replied, "that if the Christians be such as Calpurnius describes them, infamous sorcerers, they deserve to be exterminated from the face of the earth. But even so, I would gladly give them one chance of escape."

"And what is that?" sneeringly asked Fulvius.

"That no one should be allowed to join in destroying them, who could not prove himself freer from crime than they. I would have no one rise his hand against them, who cannot show that he has never been an adulterer, an extortioner, a deceiver, a drunkard, a bad husband, father or child, a profligate, a thief. For with being one of these, no one charges the poor Christians."*

Fulvius winced under the catalogue of vices, and still more under the indignant, but serene glance of Sebastian. But at the word "thief," he fairly leapt. Had the soldier seen him pick up the scarf in Fabius's house? Be it so or not, the dislike he had taken to Sebastian, at their first meeting, had ripened into hatred at their second; and hatred in that heart was only written in blood. He had only intensity now to add to that feeling.

Sebastian went out; and his thoughts got vent in familiar words of prayer. "How long, O Lord! how long? What hopes can we entertain of the conversion of this great empire, so long as we find even honest and learned men believing at once every calumny spoken against us; treasuring up, from age to age, every fable and fiction about us; and refusing even to inquire into our doctrines, because they have made up their minds that they are false and contemptible?"

He spoke aloud, believing himself alone, when a sweet voice answered him at his side: "Good youth, whoever thou art that speakest thus, and methinks I know thy voice, remember that the Son of God gave light to the dark eye of the body, by spreading thereon clay; which, in man's hands, would only have blinded the seeing. Let us be as dust beneath His feet, if we wish to become His means of enlightening the eyes of men's souls. Let us be trampled on a little longer in patience; perhaps even from our ashes may come out the spark to blaze."

"Thank you, thank you, Cæcilia," said Sebastian, "for your just and kind rebuke. Whither tripping on so gaily on this first day of danger?"

"Do you not know that I have been named guide of the cemetery of Callistus? I am going to take possession. Pray, that I may be the first flower of this coming spring."

And she passed on singing blithely. But Sebastian begged her to stay one moment.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE WOLF IN THE FOLD.

AFTER the adventures of the night, our youths had not much time for rest. Long before daybreak, the Christians had to be up, and assemble at their several titles, so as to disperse before day. It was to be their last meeting there. The oratories were to be closed, and divine worship had to begin, from that day, in the subterranean churches of the cemeteries. It could not, indeed, be expected, that all would be able to travel with safety, even on the Sunday, some miles beyond the gate.* A great privilege was, consequently, granted to the faithful, at such times of trouble, that of preserving the blessed Eucharist in their houses, and communicating themselves privately in the morning, "before taking other food," as Tertullian expresses it.†

* See Lucian's address to the judge, upon Ptolemæus's condemnation, in the beginning of St. Justin's Second Apology, or in Ruinart, vol. v. 120

The faithful felt, not as sheep going to the slaughter, not as criminals preparing for execution, but as soldiers arming for fight. Their weapons, their food, their strength, their courage, were all to be found in their Lord's table. Even the lukewarm and the timid gathered fresh spirit from the bread of life. In churches, as yet may be seen in the cemeteries, were chairs placed for the penitentiaries, before whom the sinner knelt, and confessed his sins, and received absolution. In moments like this, the penitential code was relaxed, and the terms of public expiation shortened; and the whole night had been occupied by the zealous clergy in preparing their flocks for, to many, their last public communion on earth.

We need not remind our readers, that the office then performed was essentially, and in many details, the same as they daily witness at the Catholic altar. Not only was it considered, as now, to be the Sacrifice of Our Lord's Body and Blood, not only were the oblation, the consecration, the communion alike, but many of the prayers were identical; so that the Catholic hearing them recited, and still more the priest reciting them, in the same language as the Roman Church of the catacombs spoke, may feel himself in active and living communion with the martyrs who celebrated, and the martyrs who assisted at, those sublime mysteries.

On the occasion which we are describing, when the time came for giving the kiss of peace—a genuine embrace of brotherly love—sobs could be heard, and bursts of tears; for it was to many a parting salutation. Many a youth clung to his father's neck, scarcely knowing whether that day might not sever them, till they waved their palm-branches together in heaven. And how would mothers press their daughters to their bosom, in the fervor of that new love, which fear of long separation kindled! Then came the communion, more solemn than usual, more devout, more hushed to stillness. "The Body of our Lord Jesus Christ," said the priest to each, as he offered him the sacred food. "Amen," replied the receiver, with thrilling accents of faith and love. Then extending in his hand an orarium, or white linen cloth, he received in it a provision of the bread of life, sufficient to last him till some future feast. This was most carefully and reverently folded, and hid in the bosom, wrapped up often in another and more precious cover or even placed in a gold locket.‡ It was now that, for the first time, poor Syra regretted the loss of her rich embroidered scarf, which would long before have been given to the poor, had she not studiously reserved it for such an occasion, and such a use. Nor had her mistress been able to prevail upon her to accept any objects of value, without a stipulation that she might dispose of them as she liked, that was in charitable gifts.

The various assemblies had broken up before the discovery of the violated edict. But they may rather be said to have adjourned to the cemeteries. The frequent meetings of Torquatus with his two heathen confederates in the baths of Caracalla had been narrowly watched by the caparius and his wife, as we have already remarked; and Victoria had overheard the plot, to make an inroad to the cemetery of Callistus on the day after publication. The Christians, therefore, considered themselves safer the first day, and took advantage of the circumstance to inaugurate, by solemn offices, the churches of the catacombs, which, after some years' disuse, had been put into good repair and order by the fossores, had been in some places repainted, and furnished with all requisites for divine worship.

* There was one cemetery called ad sextum Philippi, which is supposed to have been situated six miles from Rome; but many were three miles from the heart of the city.

† Ad Uzorem, lib. ii. c. 5.

‡ When the Vatican cemetery was explored, in 1571, there were found in tombs two small square golden boxes, with a ring at the top of the lid. These very ancient sacred vessels are considered by Bottari to have been used for carrying the Blessed Eucharist round the neck (Roma Subterranea, tom. i. fig. 11); and Pelliccioli confirms this by many arguments Christiana Eccl. Politia, tom. iii. p. 20.

But Corvinus, after getting over his first dismay, and having as speedily as possible another, though not so grand, a copy of the edict affixed, began better to see the dismal probabilities of serious consequences, from the wrath of his imperial master. The Dacian was right: he would have to answer for the loss. He felt it necessary to do something that very day, which might wipe off the disgrace he had incurred, before again meeting the emperor's look. He determined to anticipate the attack on the cemetery, intended for the following day.

He repaired, therefore, while it was still early, to the baths, where Fulvius, ever jealously watchful over Torquatus, kept him in expectation of Corvinus's coming to hold council with him. The worthy trio concerted their plans. Corvinus, guided by the reluctant apostate, at the head of a chosen band of soldiers who were at his disposal, had to make an incursion into the cemetery of Callistus, and drive, or drag, thence the clergy and principal Christians; while Fulvius, remaining outside with another companion, would intercept them and cut off all retreat, securing the most important prizes, and especially the Pontiff and superior clergy, whom his visit to the ordination would enable him to recognize. This was his plan. "Let fools," he said to himself, "act the parts of ferrets in the warren; I will be the sportsman outside."

In the meantime Victoria overheard sufficient to make her very busy dusting and cleaning, in the retired room where they were consulting, without appearing to listen. She told all to Cucumio; and he, after much scratching of his head, hit upon a notable plan for conveying the discovered information to the proper quarter.

Sebastian, after his early attendance on divine worship, unable, from his duties at the palace, to do more, had proceeded, according to almost universal custom, to the baths, to invigorate his limbs by their healthy refreshment, and also to remove from himself the suspicion, which his absence on that morning might have excited. While he was thus engaged, the old capsarius, as he had had himself rattlingly called in his enteposthumous inscription, wrote on a slip of parchment all that his wife had heard of the intention of an immediate assault, and of getting possession of the holy Pontiff's person. This he fastened with a pin or needle to the inside of Sebastian's tunic, of which he had charge, as he durst not speak to him in the presence of others.

The officer, after his bath, went into the hall where the events of the morning were being discussed, and where Fulvius was waiting, till Corvinus should tell him that all was ready. Upon going out, disgusted, he felt himself, as he walked, pricked by something on the chest: he examined his garments, and found the paper. It was written in about as elegant a latinity as Cucumio's epitaph; but he made it out sufficiently to consider it necessary for him to turn his steps towards the Via Appia, instead of the Palatine, and convey the important information to the Christians assembled in the cemetery.

Having, however, found a fleetier and surer messenger than himself, in the poor blind girl, who would not attract the same attention, he stopped her, gave her the note, after adding a few words to it, with the pen and ink which he carried, and bade her bear it, as speedily as possible, to its destination. But, in fact, he had hardly left the baths, when Fulvius received information that Corvinus and his troop were by that time hastening across the fields, so as to avoid suspicion, towards the appointed spot. He mounted his horse immediately, and went along the high-road; while the Christian soldier, in a by-way, was instructing his blind messenger.

When we accompanied Diogenes and his party through the catcombs, we stopped short of the subterranean church, because Severus would not let it be betrayed to Torquatus. In this the Christian congregation was now assembled, under its chief pastor. It was constructed on the principle common to all such excavations, for we can hardly call them edifices.

The reader may imagine two of the cubicula or chambers, which we have before described, placed one on each side of a gallery or passage, so that their doors, or rather wide entrances, are opposite one another. At the end of one will be found an arcosolium or altar-tomb: and the probable conjecture is that in this division the men under charge of the ostiarii,* and in the other the women, under the care of the deaconesses, were assembled. This division of the sexes at divine worship was a matter of jealous discipline in the early Church.

Often these subterranean churches were not devoid of architectural decoration. The walls, especially near the altar, were plastered and painted, and half columns, with their bases and capitals, not ungracefully cut out of the sandstone, divided the different parts or ornamented the entrances. In one instance, indeed in the chief basilica yet discovered in the cemetery of Callistus, there is a chamber without any altar, communicating with the church by means of a funnel-shaped opening, piercing the earthen wall, here some twelve feet thick, and entering the chamber, which is at a lower level, at the height of five or six feet, in a slanting direction; so that all that was spoken in the church could be heard, yet nothing that was done there could be seen, by those assembled in the chamber. This is very naturally supposed to have been the place reserved for the class of public penitents called audientes or hearers, and for the catechumens, not yet initiated by baptism.

The basilica, in which the Christians were assembled, when Sebastian sent his message, was like the one discovered in the cemetery of St. Agnes. Each of the two divisions was double, that is, consisted of two large chambers, slightly separated by half-columns, in what we may call the women's church, and by the flat pilasters in the men's, one of these surfaces having in it a small niche for an image or lamp. But the most remarkable feature of this basilica is a further prolongation of the structure, so as to give it a chancel or presbytery. This is about the size of half each other division, from which it is separated by two columns against the wall, as well as by its lesser height, after the manner of modern chancels. For while each portion of each division has first a lofty-arched tomb in its wall, and four or five tiers of graves above it, the elevation of the chancel is not much greater than that of those arcosolia or altar-tombs. At the end of the chancel, against the middle of the wall, is a chair with back and arms cut out of the solid stone, and from each side proceeds a stone bench, which thus occupies the end and two sides of the chancel. As the table of the arched-tomb behind the chair is higher than the back of the throne, and as this is immovable, it is clear that the divine mysteries could not have been celebrated upon it. A portable altar must, therefore, have been placed before the throne, in an isolated position in the middle of the sanctuary: and this, tradition tells us, was the wooden altar of Peter.

PLAN OF SUBTERRANEAN CHURCH IN THE CEMETERY OF ST. AGNES.

A. Choir, or chancel, with episcopal chair (a) and benches for the clergy (bb.)

B. Division for the men, separated from the choir by two pillars, supporting an arch.

C. Corridor of the catacomb, affording entrance to the church.

D. Division for the women, with a tomb in it.

Each portion is subdivided by projections in the wall.

* Door-keepers,—an office constituting a lesser order in the Church,

We have thus the exact arrangements to be found in the churches built after the peace, and yet to be seen in all the ancient basilicas in Rome—the episcopal chair in the center of the apse, the presbytery or seat for the clergy on either hand, and the altar between the throne and the people. The Christians thus anticipated underground, or rather gave the principles which directed, the forms of ecclesiastical architecture,

It was in such a basilica, then, that we are to imagine the faithful assembled, when Corvinus and his satellites arrived at the entrance of the cemetery. This was the way which Torquatus knew, leading down by steps from a half-ruinous building, choked up with faggots. They found the coast clear, and immediately made their arrangements. Fulvius, with one body of ten or twelve men, lurked to guard the entrance, and seize all who attempted to come out or go in. Corvinus, with Torquatus and a smaller body of eight, prepared to descend.

"I don't like this underground work," said an old, grey-bearded legionary. "I am a soldier, and not a rat-catcher. Bring me my man into the light of day, and I will fight him hand to hand, and foot to foot; but I have no love for being stifled or poisoned, like vermin in a drain."

This speech found favor with the soldiers. One said, "There may be hundreds of these skulking Christians down there, and we are little more than half a dozen."

"This is not the sort of work we receive our pay for," added another.

"It's their sorceries I care for," continued a third, "and not their valor."

It required all the eloquence of Fulvius to screw up their resolution. He assured them there was nothing to fear; that the cowardly Christians would run before them like hares, and that they would find more gold and silver in the church than a year's pay would give them. Thus encouraged, they went groping down to the bottom of the stairs. They could distinguish lamps at intervals, stretching into the gloomy length before them.

"Hush!" said one, "listen to that voice!"

From far away its accents came softened by distance; but they were the notes of a fresh youthful voice, that quailed not with fear; so clear, that the very words could be caught, as it intoned the following verses:

"Dominus illuminatio mea, et salus mea; quem timebo?"

"Dominus protector vitæ meæ; a quo trepidabo?"*

Then came a full chorus of voices, singing, like the sound of many waters:

"Dum appropriant super me nocentes, ut edant carnes meas; qui tribulant me, inimici, ipsi infirmati sunt et ceciderunt."†

A mixture of shame and anger seized on the assailants as they heard these words of calm confidence and defiance. The single voice again sang forth, but in apparently fainter accents:

"Si consistant adversum me castra, non timebit cor meum."‡

"I thought I knew that voice," muttered Corvinus. "I ought to know it out of a thousand. It is that of my bane, the cause of all last night's curse and this day's trouble. It is that of Pancratius, who pulled down the edict. On, on, my men; any reward for him, dead or alive!"

"But, stop," said one, "let us light our torches,"

"Hark!" said a second, while they were engaged in this operation; "what is that strange noise, as if of scratching and hammering at a distance? I have heard it for some time!"

"And look!" added a third; "the distant lights have disappeared, and the music has ceased. We are certainly discovered."

"No danger," said Torquatus, putting on a boldness which

* "The Lord is my light and salvation; whom shall I fear? The Lord is the protector of my life: of whom shall I be afraid?"

† "While the wicked drew nigh me, to eat my flesh, my enemies that trouble me have themselves been weakened and have fallen."

‡ "If armies in camp shall stand together against me, my heart shall not fear."

he did not feel. "That noise only comes from those old moles, Diogenes and his sons, busy preparing graves for the Christians we shall seize."

Torquatus had in vain advised the troop not to bring torches, but to provide themselves with such lamps as we see Diogenes represented carrying, in his picture, or waxen tapers, which he had brought for himself; but the men swore they would not go down without plenty of light, and such means for it as could not be put out by a draught of wind, or a stroke on the arm. The effects were soon obvious. As they advanced, silently and cautiously, along the low narrow gallery, the resinous torches crackled and hissed with a fierce glare, which heated and annoyed them; while a volume of thick pitchy smoke from each rolled downwards on to the bearers from the roof, half stifled them, and made a dense atmosphere of cloud around themselves, which effectually dimmed their light. Torquatus kept at the head of the party, counting every turning right and left, as he had noted them; though he found every mark which he had made carefully removed. He was staggered and baulked, when, after having counted little more than half the proper number, he found the road completely blocked up.

The fact was, that keener eyes than he was aware of had been on the look-out. Severus had never relaxed his watchfulness, determined not to be surprised. He was near the entrance to the cemetery below, when the soldiers reached it above; and he ran forward at once to the place where the sand had been prepared for closing the road; near which his brother and several other stout workmen were stationed, in case of danger. In a moment, with that silence and rapidity to which they were trained, they set to work lustily, shovelling the sand across the narrow and low corridor from each side, while well-directed blows of the pick brought from the roof behind, huge flakes of sandstone, which closed up the opening. Behind this barrier they stood, hardly suppressing a laugh as they heard their enemies through its loose separation. Their work it was which had been heard, and which had screened off the lights, and deadened the song.

Torquatus's perplexity was not diminished by the volley of oaths and imprecations, and the threats of violence which were showered upon him, for a fool or a traitor. "Stay one moment, I entreat you," he said. "It is possible I have mistaken my reckoning. I know the right turn by a remarkable tomb a few yards within it; I will just step into one or two of the last corridors, and see."

With these words, he ran back to the next gallery on the left, advanced a few paces, and totally disappeared.

Though his companions had followed him to the very mouth of the gallery, they could not see how this happened. It appeared like witchcraft, in which they were quite ready to believe. His light and himself seemed to have vanished at once. "We shall have no more of this work," they said; "either Torquatus is a traitor, or he has been carried off by magic." Worried, heated in the close atmosphere almost inflamed by their lights, begrimed, blinded, and choked by the pitchy smoke, crest-fallen and disheartened, they turned back; and since their road led straight to the entrance, they flung away their blazing torches into the side galleries, one here and one there, as they passed by, to get rid of them. When they looked back, it seemed as if a triumphal illumination was kindling up the very atmosphere of the gloomy corridor. From the mouths of the various caverns came forth a fiery light which turned the dull sandstone into a bright crimson; while the volumes of smoke above, hung like amber clouds along the whole gallery. The sealed tombs, receiving the unusual reflection on their yellow tiles, or marble slabs, appeared covered with golden or silver plates, set in the red damask of the walls. It looked like a homage paid to martyrdom, by the very furies of heathenism, on the first day of persecution. The torches which they had kindled to destroy, only served to shed brightness on monuments of that virtue which had never failed to save the Church.

But before these foiled hounds with drooping heads had reached the entrance, they recoiled before the sight of a singular apparition. At first they thought they had caught a glimpse of daylight; but they soon perceived it was the glimmering of a lamp. This was held steadily by an upright, immovable figure, which thus received its light upon itself. It was clothed in a dark dress, so as to resemble one of those bronze statues, which have the head and extremities of white marble, and startle one, when first seen; so like are they to living forms.

"Who can it be? What is it?" the men whispered to one another.

"A sorceress," replied one.

"The genius loci,"* observed another.

"A spirit," suggested a third.

Still, as they approached stealthily towards it, it did not appear conscious of their presence: "there was no speculation in its eyes;" it remained unmoved and unscared. At length, two got sufficiently near to seize the figure by its arms.

"Who are you?" asked Corvinus, in a rage.

"A Christian," answered Cæcilia, with her usual cheerful gentleness.

"Bring her along," he commanded; "some one at least shall pay for our disappointment."

CHAPTER XVII.

THE FIRST FLOWER.

CÆCILIA, already forewarned, had approached the cemetery by a different, but neighboring entrance. No sooner had she descended than she snuffed the strong odor of the torches. "This is none of our incense, I know," she said to herself; "the enemy is already within." She hastened therefore to the place of assembly, and delivered Sebastian's note; adding also what she had observed. It warned them to disperse and seek the shelter of the inner and lower galleries; and begged of the Pontiff not to leave till he should send for him, as his person was particularly sought for.

Pancratius urged the blind messenger to save herself too. "No," she replied, "my office is to watch the door, and guide the faithful safe."

"But the enemy may seize you."

"No matter," she answered laughing; "my being taken may save much worthier lives. Give me a lamp, Pancratius."

"Why, you cannot see by it," observed he, smiling.

"True; but others can."

"They may be your enemies."

"Even so," she answered, "I do not wish to be taken in the dark. If my Bridegroom come to me in the night of this cemetery, must He not find me with my lamp trimmed?"

Off she started, reached her post, and hearing no noise except that of quiet footsteps, she thought they were those of friends, and held up her lamp to guide them.

When the party came forth, with their only captive, Fulvius was perfectly furious. It was worse than a total failure: it was ridiculous—a poor mouse come out of the bowels of the earth. He rallied Corvinus till the wretch winced and foamed; then suddenly he asked, "And where is Torquatus?" He heard the account of his sudden disappearance, told in as many ways as the Dacian guard's adventure: but it annoyed him greatly. He had no doubt whatever, in his own mind, that he had been duped by his supposed victim, who had escaped into the unsearchable mazes of the cemetery. If so, this captive would know, and he determined to question her. He stood before her, therefore, putting on his most searching and awful look, and said to her sternly, "Look at me, woman, and tell me the truth."

"I must tell you the truth without looking at you, sir," answered the poor girl, with her cheerfulest smile and softest voice: "do you not see that I am blind?"

"Blind!" all exclaimed at once, as they crowded to look at her. But over the features of Fulvius there passed the slightest possible emotion, just as much as the wave that runs, pursued by a playful breeze, over the ripe meadow. A knowledge had flashed into his mind, a clue had fallen into his hand.

* The guardian genius of the place.

"It will be ridiculous," he said, "for twenty soldiers to march through the city, guarding a blind girl. Return to your quarters, and I will see you are well rewarded. You, Corvinus, take my horse, and go before to your father, and tell him all. I will follow in a carriage with the captive."

"No treachery, Fulvius," he said, vexed and mortified. "Mind you bring her. The day must not pass without a sacrifice."

"Do not fear," was the reply.

Fulvius, indeed, was pondering whether, having lost one spy, he should not try to make another. But the placid gentleness of the poor beggar perplexed him more than the boisterous zeal of the gamester, and her sightless orbs defied him more than the restless roll of the toper's. Still, the first thought that had struck him he could not yet pursue. When alone in a carriage with her, he assumed a soothing tone and addressed her. He knew she had not overheard the last dialogue.

"My poor girl," he said, "how long have you been blind?"

"All my life," she replied.

"What is your history? Whence do you come?"

"I have no history. My parents were poor, and brought me to Rome when I was four years old, as they came to pray, in discharge of a vow made in my early sickness, to the blessed martyrs Chrysanthus and Daria. They left me in charge of a pious lame woman, at the door of the title of Fasciola, while they went to their devotions. It was on that memorable day, when many Christians were buried at their tomb, by earth and stones cast down upon them. My parents had the happiness to be of the number."

"And how have you lived since?"

"God became my only Father then, and His Catholic Church my mother. The one feeds the birds or the air, the other nurses the weaklings of the flock. I have never wanted for any thing since.

"But you can walk about the streets freely, and without fear, as well as if you saw."

"How do you know that?"

"I have seen you. Do you remember very early one morning in the autumn, leading a poor lame man along the Vicus Patricius?"

She blushed and remained silent. Could he have seen her put into the poor old man's purse her own share of the alms?

"You have owned yourself a Christian?" he asked negligently.

"Oh, yes! how could I deny it?"

"Then that meeting was a Christian meeting?"

"Certainly; what else could it be?"

He wanted no more; his suspicions were verified. Agnes, about whom Torquatus had been able or willing to tell him nothing, was certainly a Christian. His game was made. She must yield, or he would be avenged.

After a pause, looking at her steadfastly, he said, "Do you know whither you are going?"

"Before the judge of earth, I suppose, who will send me to my Spouse in heaven."

"And so calmly?" he asked in surprise; for he could see no token from the soul to the countenance, but a smile.

"So joyfully rather," was her brief reply.

Having got out all that he desired, he consigned his prisoner to Corvinus at the gates of the Æmilian basilica, and left her to her fate. It had been a cold and drizzling day, like the preceding evening. The weather, and the incident of the night, had kept down all enthusiasm; and while the prefect had been compelled to sit in-doors, where no great crowds could collect, as hours had passed away without any arrest, trial, or tidings, most of the curious had left, and only a few more persevering remained, past the hour of afternoon recreation, in the public gardens. But just before the captive arrived, a fresh knot of spectators came in, and stood near one of the side-doors, from which they could see all

As Corvinus had prepared his father for what he was to expect, Tertullus, moved with some compassion, and imagining there could be little difficulty in overcoming the obstinacy of a poor, ignorant, blind beggar, requested the spectators to remain perfectly still, that he might try his persuasion on her, alone, as she would imagine, with him; and he threatened heavy penalties on any one who should presume to break the silence.

It was as he had calculated. Cæcilia knew not that any one else was there, as the prefect thus kindly addressed her:

"What is thy name, child?"

"Cæcilia."

"It is a noble name; hast thou it from thy family?"

"No; I am not noble; except because my parents, though poor, died for Christ. As I am blind, those who took care of me called me Cæca,* and then, out of kindness, softened it into Cæcilia."

"But now, give up all this folly of the Christians, who have kept thee only poor and blind. Honour the decrees of the divine emperors, and offer sacrifice to the gods, and thou shalt have riches, and fine clothes, and good fare; and the best physicians shall try to restore thee thy sight."

"You must have better motives to propose to me than these; for the very things for which I most thank God and His Divine Son, are those which you would have me put away."

"How dost thou mean?"

"I thank God that I am poor and meanly clad, and fare not daintily; because by all these things I am the more like Jesus Christ, my only Spouse."

"Foolish girl!" interrupted the judge, losing patience a little; "hast thou learnt all these silly delusions already? at least thou canst not thank thy God, that He has made thee sightless."

"For that, more than all the rest, I thank Him daily and hourly with all my heart."

"How so? dost thou think it a blessing never to have seen the face of a human being, or the sun, or the earth? What strange fancies are these?"

"They are not so, most noble sir. For in the midst of what you call darkness, I see a spot of what I must call light, it contrasts so strongly with all around. It is to me what the sun is to you, which I know to be local from the varying direction of its rays. And this object looks upon me as with a countenance of intensest beauty, and smiles upon me ever. And I know it to be that of Him whom I love with undivided affection. I would not for the world have its splendor dimmed by a brighter sun, nor its wondrous loveliness confounded with the diversities of others' features, nor my gaze on it drawn aside by earthly visions. I love Him too much, not to wish to see Him always alone."

"Come, come! let me have no more of this silly prattle. Obey the emperors at once, or I must try what a little pain will do. That will soon tame thee."

"Pain?" she echoed innocently.

"Yes, pain. Hast thou never felt it? hast thou never been hurt by any one in thy life?"

"Oh, no! Christians never hurt one another."

The rack was standing, as usual, before him; and he made a sign to Catulus to place her upon it. The executioner pushed her back on it by her arms; and as she made no resistance, she was easily laid extended on its wooden couch. The loops of the ever-ready ropes were in a moment passed round her ancles, and arms drawn over the head. The poor sightless girl saw not who did all this; she knew not but it might be the same person who had been conversing with her. If there had been silence hitherto, men now held their very breath; while Cæcilia's lips moved in earnest prayer.

"Once more, before proceeding further, I call on thee to sacrifice to the gods, and escape cruel torments," said the judge, with a sterner voice.

"Neither torments nor death," firmly replied the victim tied to the altar, "shall separate me from the love of Christ. I can offer up no sacrifice but to the one living God; and its ready oblation is myself."

* Blind.

The prefect made a signal to the executioner, and he gave one rapid whirl to the two wheels of the rack, round the windlasses of which the ropes were wound; and the limbs of the maiden were stretched with a sudden jerk, which, though not enough to wrench them from their sockets, as a further turn would have done, sufficed to inflict an excruciating, or more truly, a racking pain, through all her frame. Far more grievous was this, from the preparation and the cause of it being unseen, and from that additional suffering which darkness inflicts. A quivering of her features, and a sudden paleness, alone gave evidence of her torture.

"Ha! ha!" the judge exclaimed, "thou feelest that? Come, let it suffice; obey, and thou shalt be freed."

She seemed to take no heed of his words, but gave vent to her feelings in prayer: "I thank Thee, O Lord Jesus Christ, that Thou hast made me suffer pain the first time for Thy sake. I have loved Thee in peace; I have loved Thee in comfort; I have loved Thee in joy,—and now in pain I love Thee still more. How much sweeter it is to be like Thee, stretched upon Thy Cross, even than resting upon the hard couch at the poor man's table!"

"Thou triflest with me," exclaimed the judge, thoroughly vexed, "and makest light of my lenity. We will try something stronger. Here, Catulus, apply a lighted torch to her sides."*

A thrill of disgust and horror ran through the assembly, which could not help sympathizing with the poor blind creature. A murmur of suppressed indignation broke out from all sides of the hall.

Cæcilia, for the first time, learnt that she was in the midst of a crowd. A crimson glow of modesty rushed into her brow, her face, neck, just before white as marble. The angry judge checked the rising gush of feeling; and all listened in silence, as she spoke again, with warmer earnestness than before:

"O my dear Lord and Spouse! I have been ever true and faithful to Thee! Let me suffer pain and torture for Thee; but spare confusion from human eyes. Let me come to Thee at once; not covering my face with my hands in shame, when I stand before Thee."

Another muttering of compassion was heard.

"Catulus!" shouted the baffled judge in fury; "do your duty, sirrah! what are you about, fumbling all day with that torch?"

The executioner advanced, and stretched forth his hand to her robe, to withdraw it for the torture; but he drew back, and, turning to the prefect, exclaimed in softened accents,

"It is too late. She is dead?"

"Dead!" cried out Tertullus; "dead with one turn of the wheel? impossible!"

Catulus gave the rack a turn backwards, and the body remained motionless. It was true; she had passed from the rack to the throne, from the scowl of the judge's countenance to her Spouse's welcoming embrace. Had she breathed out her pure soul, as a sweet perfume, in the incense of her prayer? or had her heart been unable to get back its blood, from the intensity of that first virginal blush?†

In the stillness of awe and wonder, a clear bold voice cried out, from the group near the door: "Impious tyrant, dost thou not see, that a poor blind Christian hath more power over life and death, than thou or thy cruel masters?"

"What! a third time in twenty-four hours wilt thou dare to cross my path? This time thou shalt not escape."

These were Corvinus's words, garnished with a furious imprecation, as he rushed from his father's side round the enclosure before the tribunal, towards the group. But as he ran blindly on, he struck against an officer of herculean build, who, no doubt quite accidentally, was advancing from it. He reeled, and the soldier caught hold of him, saying,

"You are not hurt, I hope, Corvinus?"

"No, no; let me go, Quadratus, let me go,"

"Where are you running to in such a hurry? can I help you?" asked his captor, still holding him fast.

"Let me loose, I say, or he will be gone."

"Who will be gone?"

"Pancratius," answered Corvinus, "who just now insulted my father."

"Pancratius!" said Quadratus, looking round, and seeing that he had got clear off; "I do not see him." And he let him go; but it was too late. The youth was safe at Diogenes's in the Suburra.

While this scene was going on, the prefect, mortified, ordered Catulus to see the body thrown into the Tiber. But another officer, muffled in his cloak, stepped aside and beckoned to Catulus, who understood the sign, and stretched out his hand to receive a purse held out to him.

"Out of the Porta Capena, at Lucina's villa, an hour after sunset," said Sebastian.

"It shall be delivered there safe," said the executioner.

"Of what do you think did the poor girl die?" asked a spectator from his companion, as they went out.

"Of fright, I fancy," he replied.

"Of Christian modesty," interposed a stranger who passed them.

CHAPTER XVIII.

RETRIBUTION.

The prefect of the city went to give his report on the untoward events of the day, and do what was possible, to screen his worthless son. He found the emperor in the worst of moods. Had Corvinus come in his way early in the day, nobody could have answered for his head. And now the result of the inroad into the cemetery had revived his anger, when Tertullus entered the audience-chamber. Sebastian contrived to be on guard.

"Where is your booby of a son?" was the first salutation which the prefect received.

"Humbly waiting your divinity's pleasure outside, and anxious to propitiate your godlike anger, for the tricks which fortune has played upon his zeal."

"Fortune!" exclaimed the tyrant; "fortune, indeed! His own stupidity and cowardice; a pretty beginning, forsooth; but he shall smart for it. Bring him in."

The wretch, whining and trembling, was introduced; and cast himself at the emperor's feet, from which he was spurned, and sent rolling, like a lashed hound, into the midst of the hall. This set the imperial divinity a-laughing, and helped to mollify his wrath.

"Come, sirrah! stand up," he said, "and let me hear an account of yourself. How did the edict disappear?"

Corvinus told a rambling tale, which occasionally amused the emperor; for he was rather taken with the trick. This was a good symptom.

"Well," he said at last, "I will be merciful to you, Licitors, bind your fasces." They drew their axes forth, and felt their edges. Corvinus again threw himself down, and exclaimed:

"Spare my life; I have important information to furnish, if I live."

"Who wants your worthless life!" responded the gentle Maximian. "Licitors, put aside your axes; the rods are good enough for him."

In a moment his hands were seized and bound, his tunic was stripped off his shoulders, and a shower of blows fell upon them, delivered with well-regulated skill; till he roared and writhed, to the great enjoyment of his imperial master.

Smarting and humbled, he had to stand again before him.

"Now, sir," said the latter, "what is the wonderful information you have to give?"

*The rack was used for a double purpose; as a direct torment, and to keep the body distended for the application of other tortures. This of fire was one of the most common.

†There are many instances in the lives of martyrs of their deaths being the fruit of prayer, as in St. Praxedis, St. Cæcilia, St. Agatha, &c.

"That I know who perpetrated the outrage of last night, on your imperial edict."

"Who was it?"

"A youth named Paneratus, whose knife I found under where the edict had been cut away."

"And why have you not seized him and brought him to justice?"

"Twice this day he has been almost within my grasp, for I have heard his voice; but he has escaped me."

"Then let him not escape a third time, or you may have to take his place. But how do you know him, or his knife?"

"He was my schoolfellow at the school of Cassianus, who turned out to be a Christian."

"A Christian presume to teach my subjects, to make them enemies of their country, disloyal to their sovereigns, and contemners of the gods! I suppose it was he who taught that young viper Paneratus to pull down our imperial edict. Do you know where he is?"

"Yes, sire; Torquatus, who has abandoned the Christian superstition, has told me."

"And pray who is this Torquatus?"

"He is one who has been staying some time with Chromatius and a party of Christians in the country."

"Why, this is worse and worse. Is the ex-prefect then, too, become a Christian?"

"Yes, and lives with many others of that sect in Campania."

"What perfidy! what treachery! I shall not know whom to trust next. Prefect, send some one immediately to arrest all these men, and the schoolmaster, and Torquatus."

"He is no longer a Christian," interposed the judge.

"Well, what do I care?" replied the emperor peevishly; "arrest as many as you can, and spare no one, and make them smart well; do you understand me? Now begone, all; it is time for my supper."

Corvius went home; and, in spite of medicinal applications, was feverish, sore, and spiteful all night; and next morning begged his father to let him go on the expedition into Campania, that so he might retrieve his honour, gratify his revenge, and escape the disgrace and sarcasm that was sure to be heaped on him by Roman society.

When Fulvius had deposited his prisoner at the tribunal, he hastened home to recount his adventures, as usual, to Eurotas. The old man listened with imperturbable sternness to the barren recital, and at last said, coldly,

"Very little profit from all this, Fulvius."

"No immediate profit, indeed; but a good prospect in view, at least."

"How so?"

"Why, the Lady Agnes is in my power. I have made sure, at last, that she is a Christian. I can now necessarily either win her, or destroy her. In either case her property is mine."

"Take the second alternative," said the old man, with a keen glow in his eye, but no change of face; "it is the shorter, and less troublesome way."

"But my honor is engaged; I cannot allow myself to be spurned in the manner I told you."

"You have been spurned, however; and that calls for vengeance. You have no time to lose, remember, in foolery. Your funds are nearly exhausted, and nothing is coming in. You must strike a blow."

"Surely, Eurotas, you would prefer my trying to get this wealth by honorable," (Eurotas smiled at the idea coming into either of their minds) "rather than by foul means."

"Get it, get it any way, provided it be the surest and the speediest. You know our compact. Either the family is restored to wealth and splendor, or it ends in and with you. It shall never linger on in disgrace, that is, in poverty."

"I know, I know, without your every day reminding me of the bitter condition," said Fulvius, wringing his hands, and writhing in all his body. "Give me time enough, and all will be well."

"I give you time, till all is hopeless. Things do not look bright at present. But, Fulvius, it is time that I tell you who I am."

"Why, were you not my father's faithful dependant, to whose care he intrusted me?"

"I was your father's elder brother, Fulvius, and am the head of the family. I have had but one thought, but one aim in life, the restoring of our house to that greatness and splendour, from which my father's negligence and prodigality had brought it down. Thinking that your father, my brother, had greater ability for this work, I resigned my rights and gains to him upon certain terms; one of which was your guardianship, and the exclusive forming of your mind. You know how I have trained you, to care nothing about the means, so that our great ends be carried."

Fulvius, who had been riveted with amazement and deep attention on the speaker, shrunk into himself with shame, at this baring of both their hearts. The dark old man fixed his eyes more intently than ever, and went on.

"You remember the black and complicated crime by which we concentrated in your hands the divided remnant of family wealth," Fulvius covered his face with his hands and shuddered, then said entreatingly, "Oh, spare me that, Eurotas; for heaven's sake spare me!"

"Well, then," resumed the other, unmoved as ever, "I will be brief. Remember, nephew, that he who does not recoil from a brilliant future, to be gained by guilt, must not shrink from a past that prepared it by crime. For the future will one day be the past. Let our compact, therefore, be straightforward and honest; for there is an honesty even in sin. Nature has given you abundance of selfishness and cunning, and she has given me boldness and remorselessness in directing and applying them. Our lot is cast by the same throw,—we become rich, or die, together."

Fulvius, in his heart, cursed the day he came to Rome or bound himself to his stern master, whose mysterious tie was so much stronger than he had known before. But he felt himself spell-bound to him, and powerless as the kid in the lion's paws. He retired to his couch with a heavier heart than ever; for a dark, impending fate never failed to weigh upon his soul, every returning night.

The reader will perhaps be curious to know, what has become of the third member of our worthy trio, the apostate Torquatus. When confused and bewildered, he ran to look for the tomb which was to guide him, it so happened, that, just within the gallery which he entered, was a neglected staircase, cut in the sandstone, down to a lower story of the cemetery. The steps had been worn round and smooth, and the descent was precipitous. Torquatus, carrying his light before him, and running heedlessly, fell headlong down the opening, and remained stunned and insensible at the bottom, till long after his companions had retired. He then revived; and was so confused that he knew not where he was. He arose and groped about, till, consciousness completely returning, he remembered that he was in a catacomb, but could not make out how he was alone, and in the dark. It then struck him that he had a supply of tapers about him, and means of lighting them. He employed these, and was cheered by finding himself again in light. But he had wandered from the staircase, of which, indeed, he recollected nothing, and went on, and on, entangling himself more inextricably in the subterranean labyrinth.

He felt sure that, before he had exhausted his strength or his tapers, he should come to some outlet. But by degrees he began to feel serious alarm. One after another of his lights were burnt out, and his vigor began to fail, for he had been fasting from early morning; and he found himself coming back to the same spot, after he had wandered about apparently for hours. At first he had looked negligently around him, and had carelessly read the inscriptions on the tombs. But as he grew fainter, and his hope of relief weaker, these solemn monuments of death began to speak to his soul, in a language that it could not refuse to hear, nor pretend to misunderstand. "Deposited in peace," was the inmate of one; "resting in Christ" was another; and even the thousand nameless ones around them reposed in silent calm, each with the seal of the Church's motherly care stamped upon his place of rest. And within, the embalmed remains awaited the sound of angelic trumpet-notes, to awaken them to a happy resurrection. And he, in a few more hours, would be dead like them; he was lighting his last taper, and had sunk down upon a heap of mould; but would he be laid in peace, by pious hands, as they? On the cold ground, alone, he should die unpitied, unmourned, unknown. There he should rot, and drop to pieces; and if, in after years, his bones, cast out from Christian sepulture, should be found, tradition might conjecture that they were the accursed remains of an apostate lost in the cemetery. And even they might be cast out, as he was, from the communion of that hallowed ground.

It was coming on fast; he could feel it; his head reeled; his heart fluttered. The taper was getting too short for his fingers, and he placed it on a stone beside him. It might burn three minutes longer; but a drop filtering through the ceiling, fell upon it, and extinguished it. So covetous did he feel of those three minutes more of light, so jealous was he of that little taper-end, as his last link with earth's joys, so anxious was he to have one more look at things without, lest he should be forced to look at those within; that he drew forth his flint and steel, and laboured for a quarter of an hour to get a light from tinder, damped by the cold perspiration on his body. And when he had lighted his remnant of candle, instead of profiting by its flame to look around him, he fixed his eyes upon it with an idiotic stare, watching it burn down, as though it were the charm which bound his life, and this must expire with it. And soon the last spark gleamed smouldering like a glow-worm, on the red earth, and died.

Was he dead too? he thought. Why not? Darkness, complete and perpetual, had come upon him. He was cut off for ever from consort with the living, his mouth would no more taste food, his ears never again hear a sound, his eyes behold no light, or thing, again. He was associated with the dead, only his grave was much larger than theirs; but, for all that, it was as dark and lonely, and closed for ever. What else is death?

No, it could not be death as yet. Death had to be followed by something else. But even this was coming. The worm was beginning to gnaw his conscience, and it grew apace to a viper's length, and twisted itself round his heart. He tried to think of pleasant things, and they came before him; the quiet in the villa with Chromatius and Polycarp, their kind words, and last embrace. But from the beautiful vision darted a withering flash; he had betrayed them; he had told of them; to whom? To Fulvius and Corvinus. The fatal chord was touched, like the tingling nerve of a tooth, that darts its agony straight to the centre of the brain. The drunken debauch, the dishonest play, the base hypocrisy, the vile treachery, the insincere apostasy, the remorseful sacrileges of the last days, and the murderous attempt of that morning, now came dancing like demons hand in hand, in the dark before him, shouting, laughing, jibing, weeping, moaning, gnashing their teeth; and sparks of fire flying before his eyes, from his enfeebled brain, seemed to dart from glaring torches in their hands. He sunk down and covered his eyes.

"I may be dead, after all" he said to himself; "for the infernal pit can have nothing worse than this."

His heart was too weak for rage; it sunk within him in the impotence of despair. His strength was ebbing fast, when he fancied he heard a distant sound. He put away the thought; but the wave of a remote harmony beat again upon his ear. He raised himself up; it was becoming distinct. So sweet it sounded, so like a chorus of angelic voices, but in another sphere, that he said to himself, "Who would have thought that Heaven was so near to hell! Or are they accompanying the fearful Judge to try me?"

And now a faint glimmer of light appeared at the same distance as the sounds; and the words of the strain were clearly heard:

"In pace, in idipsum, dormiam et requiescam."*

* "In peace, in the selfsame, I will sleep and I will rest." Ps. iv. 9

"Those words are not for me. They might do at a martyr's entombment; they cannot at a reprobate's burial."

The light increased; it was like a dawn glowing into day; it entered the gallery and passed across it, bearing in it, as in a mirror, a vision too distinct to be unreal. First, there came virgins robed and holding lamps; then four who carried between them a form wrapped up in a white linen cloth, with a crown of thorns upon the head; after them the youthful acolyte Tarcisus bearing a censer steaming with perfumed smoke; and, after others of the clergy, the venerable Pontiff himself attended by Reparatus, and another deacon. Diogenes and his sons, with sorrowful countenances, and many others, among whom he could distinguish Sebastian, closed the procession. As many bore lamps or tapers, the figures seemed to move in an unchanging atmosphere of mildest lights.

And as they passed before him, they chanted the next verse of the psalm.

"Quoniam Tu Domine singulariter in spe constituisti me."

"That," he exclaimed, rousing himself up, "that is for me."

With this thought he had sprung upon his knees; and by an instinct of grace, words which he had before heard came back to him like an echo; words suited to the moment; words which he felt that he must speak. He crept forward, faint and feeble, turned along the gallery through which the funeral procession was passing, and followed it, unobserved, at a distance. It entered a chamber and lighted it up, so that a picture of the Good Shepherd looked brightly down on him. But he would not pass the threshold, where he stood striking his breast and praying for mercy.

The body had been laid upon the ground; and other psalms and hymns were sung, and prayers recited, all in that cheerful tone and joyous mood of hopefulness, with which the Church has always treated of death. At length it was placed in the tomb prepared for it, under an arch. While this was being done, Torquatus drew nigh to one of the spectators, and whispered to him the question:

"Whose funeral is this?"

"It is the deposition," he answered, "of the blessed Cæcilia, a blind virgin, who this morning fell into the hands of the soldiers, in this cemetery, and whose soul God took to Himself."

"Then I am her murderer," he exclaimed, with a hollow moan; and staggering forward to the holy bishop's feet, fell prostrate before him. It was some time before his feelings could find vent in words; when these came, they were the ones he had resolved to utter:

"Father, I have sinned before heaven, and against thee, and I am not worthy to be called thy child."

The Pontiff raised him up kindly, and pressed him to his bosom, saying, "Welcome back, my son, whoever thou art, to thy Father's house. But thou art weak and faint, and needest rest."

Some refreshment was immediately procured. But Torquatus would not rest till he had publicly avowed the whole of his guilt, including the day's crimes; for it was still the evening of the same day. All rejoiced at the prodigal's return, at the lost sheep's recovery. Agnes looked up to heaven from her last affectionate glance on the blind virgin's shroud, and thought that she could almost see her seated at the feet of her Spouse, smiling, with her eyes wide open, as she cast down a handful of flowers on the head of the penitent, the first-fruits of her intercession in heaven.

Diogenes and his sons took charge of him. A humble lodging was procured for him, in a Christian cottage near, that he might not be within the reach of temptation, or of vengeance, and he was enrolled in the class of penitents; where years of expiation, shortened by the intercession of confessors † that is,

* "For Thou, O Lord, singularly hast placed me in hope" Ps. v. 10.

† The penitentiary system of the early Church will be better described in any volume that embodies the antiquity of the second period of ecclesiastical history than The Church of the Basilicas. It is well known, especially from the writings of St. Cyprian, that those who proved weak in persecution, and were subjected to public penance, obtained a shortening of its term.—that is, an indulgence,—through the intercession of confessors or of a group sanctioned for the faith.

future martyrs—would prepare him for full re-admission to the privileges he had forfeited.

CHAPTER XIX.

TWFOLD REVENGE.

SEBASTIAN'S visit to the cemetery had been not merely to take thither for sepulture the relics of the first martyr, but also to consult with Marcellinus about his safety. His life was too valuable to the Church to be sacrificed so early; and Sebastian knew how eagerly it was sought. Torquatus now confirmed this, by communicating Fulvius's designs, and the motive of his attendance at the December ordination. The usual papal residence was no longer safe; and a bold idea had been adopted by the courageous soldier—the "Protector of the Christians," as his acts tell us he had been authoritatively called. It was to lodge the Pontiff where no one could suspect him to be, and where no search could be dreamt of, in the very palace of the Cæsars.* Efficiently disguised, the holy Bishop left the cemetery, and, escorted by Sebastian and Quadratus, was safely housed in the apartments of Irene, a Christian lady of rank, who lived in a remote part of the Palatine, in which her husband held a household office.

Early next morning Sebastian was with Pancratius. "My dear boy," he said, "you must leave Rome instantly, and go into Campania. I have horses ready for you and Quadratus; and there is no time to be lost."

"And why, Sebastian!" replied the youth, with sorrowful face and tearful eye. "Have I done something wrong, or are you doubtful of my fortitude?"

"Neither, I assure you, but you have promised to be guided by me in all things; and I never considered your obedience more necessary than now."

"Tell me why, good Sebastian, I pray."

"It must be a secret as yet."

"What, another secret?"

"Call it the same, to be revealed at the same time. But I can tell you what I want you to do, and that I think will satisfy you. Pancratius has got orders to seize on Chromatius and all his community, yet young in the faith, as the wretched example of Torquatus has shown us; and, what is worse, to put your old master Cassianus at Fundi to a cruel death. I want you to hasten before his messenger (perhaps he may go himself), and put them on their guard."

Pancratius looked up brightly again; he saw that Sebastian trusted him. "Your wish is enough for me," said he, smiling; "but I would go to the world's end, to save my good Cassianus, or any other fellow-Christian."

He was soon ready, took an affectionate leave of his mother; and before Rome had fully shaken off sleep, he and Quadratus, each with well-furnished saddle-bags on their powerful steeds, were trotting across the campagna of Rome, to reach the less frequented, and safer, track of the Latin way.

Corvinus having resolved to keep the hostile expedition in his own hands, as honorable, lucrative, and pleasant, it was delayed a couple of days, both that he might feel more comfortable about his shoulders, and that he might make proper preparations. He had a chariot hired, and engaged a body of Numidian runners, who could keep up with a carriage at full speed. But he was thus two days behind our Christians, though he, of course, travelled by the shorter and more beaten Appian road.

When Pancratius arrived at the Villa of Statuas, he found the little community already excited, by the rumors which had reached it, of the edict's publication. He was welcomed most warmly by all; and Sebastian's letter of advice was received with deep respect. Prayer and deliberation succeeded its perusal, and various resolutions were taken. Marcus and Marcellianus, with their father Tranquillinus, had already gone to Rome for the ordination. Nicostratus, Zoë, and others followed them now. Chromatius, who was not destined for the crown of martyrdom, though commemorated, by the Church, with his son, on the 11th of August, found shelter for a time in Fabiola's villa, for which letters had been procured from its mistress, without her knowing the reason why; for he wished to remain in the neighborhood a little while longer. In fine, the villa ad Statuas was left in charge of a few faithful servants, fully to be depended upon.

When the two messengers had given themselves and their horses a good rest, they travelled, by the same road as Torquatus had lately trodden, to Fundi, where they put up at an obscure inn out of the town, on the Roman road. Pancratius soon found out his old master, who embraced him most affectionately. He told him his errand, and entreated him to fly, or at least conceal himself.

"No," said the good man, "it must not be. I am already old, and I am weary of my unprofitable profession. I and my servant are the only two Christians in the town. The best families have, indeed, sent their children to my school, because they knew it would be kept as moral as paganism will permit; but I have not a friend among my scholars, by reason of this very strictness. And they want even the natural refinement of Roman heathens. They are rude provincials; and I believe there are some among the elder ones who would not scruple to take my life, if they could do so with impunity."

"What a wretched existence indeed, Cassianus, you must be leading! Have you made no impression on them?"

"Little or none, dear Pancratius. And how can I, while I am obliged to make them read those dangerous books, full of fables, which Roman and Greek literature contain? No, I have done little by my words; perhaps my death may do more for them."

Pancratius found all expostulation vain, and would have almost joined him in his resolution to die; only he had promised Sebastian not to expose his life during the journey. He however determined to remain about the town till he saw the end.

Corvinus arrived with his men at the villa of Chromatius; and early in the morning, rushed suddenly through the gates, and to the house. He found it empty. He searched it through and through, but discovered neither a person, a book, nor a symbol of Christianity. He was confounded and annoyed. He looked about; and having found a servant working in the garden, asked him where his master was.

"Master no tell slave where he go," was the reply, in a latinity corresponding to such a rude phraseology.

"You are trifling with me. Which way did he and his companions go?"

"Through yonder gate."

"And then?"

"Look that way," answered the servant. "You see gate? very well; you see no more. Me work here, me see gate, me see no more."

"When did they go? at least you can answer that."

"After the two come from Rome."

"What two? Always two, it seems."

"One good youth, very handsome, sing so sweet. The other very big, very strong, oh, very. See that young tree pulled up by the roots? He do that as easy as me pull my spade out of the ground."

"The very two," exclaimed Corvinus, thoroughly enraged. "Again that dastardly boy has marred my plans and destroyed my hopes. He shall suffer well for it."

As soon as he was a little rested, he resumed his journey, and determined to vent all his fury on his old master; unless, indeed, he whom he considered his evil genius should have been there before him. He was engaged during his journey, in plotting vengeance upon master and fellow-student; and he was delighted to find, that one at least was at Fundi, when he arrived. He showed the governor his order for the arrest and punishment of Cassianus, as a most dangerous Christian; but that officer, a humane man, remarked that the commission superseded ordinary jurisdiction in the matter, and gave Corvinus full power to act. He offered him the assistance of an requisitioner, and other requisites; but they were declined. Corvinus had brought an abundant supply of strength and cruelty, in his own body-guard. He took, however, a public officer with him.

* This is related in the Acts just referred to.

He proceeded to the school-house when filled with scholars; shut the doors, and reproached Cassianus, who advanced with open hand and countenance to greet him, as a conspirator against the state and a perfidious Christian. A shout arose from the boyish mob; and by its tone, and by the look which he cast around, Corvinus learnt there were many present like himself—young bears' cubs with full-grown hyenas' hearts within them.

"Boys!" he shouted out, "do you love your master, Cassianus? He was once mine too, and I owe him many a grudge."

A yell of execration broke out from the benches.

"Then I have good news for you; here is permission from the Divine Emperor Maximian, for you to do what you like to him."

A shower of books, writing-tablets, and other school missiles was directed against the master, who stood unmoved, with his arms folded, before his persecutor. Then came a rush from all sides, with menacing attitudes of a brutal onslaught.

"Stop, stop," cried out Corvinus, "we must go more systematically to work than this."

He had reverted in thought to the recollection of his own sweet school-boy days; that time which most look back on from hearts teeming with softer feelings, than the contemplation of present things can suggest. He indulged in the reminiscence of that early season in which others find but the picture of unselfish, joyous, happy hours; and he sought in the recollection what would most have gratified him then, that he might bestow it as a boon on the hopeful youths around him. But he could think of nothing that would have been such a treat to him, as to pay back to his master every stroke of correction, and write in blood upon him every word of reproach, that he had received. Delightful thought, now to be fulfilled!

It is far from our intention to harrow the feelings of our gentle readers, by descriptions of the cruel and fiendish torments inflicted by the heathen persecutors on our Christian forefathers. Few are more horrible, yet few better authenticated, than the torture practised on the martyr Cassianus. Placed, bound, in the midst of his ferocious young tigers, he was left to be the lingering victim of their feeble cruelty. Some, as the Christian poet Prudentius tells us, cut their tasks upon him with the steel points, used in engraving writing on wax-covered tablets; others exercised the ingenuity of a precocious brutality, by inflicting every possible torment on his lacerated body. Loss of blood, and acute pain, at length exhausted him; and he fell on the floor, without power to rise. A shout of exultation followed, new insults were inflicted, and the troop of youthful demons broke loose, to tell the story of their sport at their respective homes. To give Christians decent burial never entered into the minds of their persecutors; and Corvinus, who had glutted his eyes with the spectacle of his vengeance, and had urged on the first efforts at cruelty of his ready instruments, left the expiring man where he lay, to die unnoticed. His faithful servant, however, raised him up, and laid him on his bed, and sent a token, as he had preconcerted, to Paneratius, who was soon at his side, while his companion looked after preparations for their departure. The youth was horrified at what he beheld, and at the recital of his old master's exquisite torture, as he was edified by the account of his patience. For not a word of reproach had escaped him, and prayer alone had occupied his thoughts and tongue.

Cassianus recognized his dear pupil, smiled upon him, pressed his hand in his own, but could not speak. After lingering till morning, he placidly expired. The last rites of Christian sepulture were modestly paid to him on the spot, for the house was his; and Paneratius hurried from the scene, with a heavy heart and a no slight rising of its indignation, against the heartless savage who had devised and witnessed, without remorse, such a tragedy.

He was mistaken, however. No sooner was his revenge fulfilled than Corvinus felt all the disgrace and shame of what he had done; he feared it should be known to his father, who had always esteemed Cassianus; he feared the anger of the parents, whose children he had that day effectually demoralized, and fleshed to little less than parricide. He ordered his horses to be harnessed, but was told that they must have some more hours' rest. This increased his displeasure; remorse tormented him, and he sat down to drink, and so drown care and pass time. At length he started on his journey, and after baiting for an hour or two, pushed on through the night. The road was heavy from continued rain, and ran along the side of the great canal which drains the Pontine marshes, and between two rows of trees.

Corvinus had drunk again at his halt, and was heated with wine, vexation, and remorse. The dragging pace of his jaded steeds provoked him, and he kept lashing them furiously on. While they were thus excited, they heard the tramp of horses coming fast on behind, and dashed forward at an uncontrollable speed. The attendants were soon left at a distance, and the frightened horses passed between the rees on to the narrow path by the canal, and galloped forward, rocking the chariot from side to side at a reckless rate. The horsemen behind hearing the violent rush of hoofs and wheels, and the shout of the followers, clapped spurs to their horses, and pushed gallantly forward. They had passed the runners some way, when they heard a crash and a plunge. The wheel had struck the trunk of a tree, the chariot had turned over, and its half-drunken driver had been tossed head over heels into the water. In a moment Paneratius was off his horse and by the side of the canal, together with his companion.

By the faint light of the rising moon, and by the sound of his voice, the youth recognized Corvinus struggling in the muddy stream. The side was not deep, but the high clayey bank was wet and slimy, and every time he attempted to climb it, his foot slipped, and he fell back into the deep water in the middle. He was, in fact, already becoming benumbed and exhausted by his wintry bath.

"It would serve him right to leave him there," muttered the rough centurion.

"Hush, Quadratus! how can you say so? give me hold of your hand. So!" said the youth, leaning over the bank, and seizing his enemy by his arm, just as he was relaxing his hold on a withered shrub, and falling back fainting into the stream. It would have been his last plunge. They pulled him out and laid him on the road, a pitiable figure for his greatest foe. They chafed his temples and hands; and he had begun to revive, when his attendants came up. To their care they consigned him, together with his purse, which had fallen from his belt, as they drew him from the canal. But Paneratius took possession of his own pen-knife, which dropped out with it, and which Corvinus carried about him, as evidence to convict him of having cut down the edict. The servants pretended to Corvinus, when he had regained consciousness, that they had drawn him out of the water, but that his purse must have been lost in it, and lay still buried in the deep mud. They bore him to a neighboring cottage, while the carriage was being repaired; and had a good carouse with his money while he slept.

Two acts of revenge had thus been accomplished in one day,—the pagan and the Christian.

CHAPTER XX.

THE PUBLIC WORKS.

It, before the edict, the Thermæ of Dioclesian were being erected by the labor and sweat of Christian prisoners, it will not appear surprising, that their number and their sufferings should have greatly increased, with the growing intensity of a most savage persecution. That emperor himself was expected for the inauguration of his favorite building, and hands were doubled on the work to expedite its completion. Chains of supposed culprits arrived each day from the port of Luna, from Sardinia, and even from the Crimea, or Chersonesus, where they had been engaged in quarries or mines; and were put to labor in the harder departments of the building art. To transport materials, to saw and cut stone and marble, to mix the mortar, and to build up the walls, were the duties allotted to the religious culprits, many of whom were men little accustomed to such menial toil. The only recompense which they received for their labor, was that of the mules and oxen which shared their occupation. Little better, if better, than a stable to sleep in, food sufficient in quantity to keep up their strength, clothing enough to guard them from the inclemency of the season, this was all they had to expect. Fetters on their ankles, heavy chains to prevent their escape, increased their sufferings; and task-masters, acceptable in proportion as they were unreasonable, watched every gang with lash or stick in hand, ever ready to add pain to toil, whether it were to vent their own wanton cruelty upon unresisting objects, or to please their crnelier masters.

But the Christians of Rome took peculiar care of these blessed confessors, who were particularly venerated by them. Their deacons visited them, by bribing their guards: and young men would boldly venture among them, and distribute more nourishing food, or warmer clothing to them, or give them the means of conciliating their keepers, so as to obtain better treatment at their hands. They would then also recommend themselves to their prayers, as they kissed the chains and the bruises, which these holy confessors bore for Christ.

This assemblage of men, convicted of serving faithfully their divine Master, was useful for another purpose. Like the stew in which the luxurious Lucullus kept his lampreys ready fattened for a banquet; like the cages in which rare birds, the pens in which well-fed cattle, were preserved for the sacrifice, or the feast of an imperial anniversary; like the dens near the amphitheatre, in which ferocious beasts were fed for exhibition at the public games; just so were the public works the preserves, from which at any time could be drawn the materials for a sanguinary hecatomb, or a gratification of the popular appetite for cruel spectacles, on any occasion of festivity; public stores of food for those fierce animals, whenever the Roman people wished to share in their savage propensities.

Such an occasion was now approaching. The persecution had lingered. No person of note had yet been captured: and something more wholesale was expected. The people demanded more sport; and an approaching imperial birthday justified their gratification. The wild beasts, which Sebastian and Pancratius had heard, yet roared for their lawful prey. Christianos ad leones might seem to have been interpreted by them, as meaning "that the Christians of right belonged to them."

One afternoon, towards the end of December, Corvinus proceeded to the Baths of Dioclesian, accompanied by Catulus, who had an eye for proper combatants in the amphitheatre, such as a good dealer would have for cattle at a fair. He called for Rabirius, the superintendent of the convict department, and said to him,

"Rabirius, I am come by order of the emperor, to select a sufficient number of the wicked Christians under your charge, for the honor of fighting in the amphitheatre, on occasion of the coming festival."

"Really," answered the officer, "I have none to spare. I am obliged to finish the work in a given time, and I cannot do so, if I am left short of hands."

"I cannot help that; others will be got to replace those that are taken from you. You must show Catulus and myself through your works, and let us choose what will suit us."

Rabirius, grumbling at this unreasonable demand, submitted nevertheless to it, and took them into a vast area, just vaulted over. It was entered by a circular vestibule lighted from above, like the Pantheon. This led into one of the shorter arms of a cruciform hall of noble dimensions, into which opened a number of lesser, though still handsome, chambers. At each angle of the hall, where the arms intersected one another, a huge granite pillar of one block had to be erected. Two were already in their places, one was girt with ropes delivered round capstans, ready to be raised on the morrow. A number of men were actively engaged in making final preparations. Catulus nudged Corvinus, and pointed, with his thumb, to two fine youths, who, stripped slave fashion to their waists, were specimens of manly athletic forms.

"I must have those two, Rabirius," said the willing purveyor to wild beasts; "they will do charmingly. I am sure they are Christians, they work so cheerfully."

"I cannot possibly spare them at present. They are worth six men, or a pair of horses, at least, to me. Wait till the heavy work is over, and then they are at your service."

"What are their names, that I may take a note of them? And mind, keep them up in good condition."

"They are called Largus and Smaragdus; they are young men of excellent family, but work like plebeians, and will go with you nothing loth."

"They shall have their wish," said Corvinus, with great glee. And so they had later.

As they went through the works, however, they picked out a number of captives, for many of whom Rabirius made resistance, but generally in vain. At length they came near one of those chambers which flanked the eastern side of the long arm of the hall. In one of them they saw a number of convicts (if we must use the term) resting after their labor. The centre of the group was an old man, most venerable in appearance, with a long white beard streaming on his breast, mild in aspect, gentle in word, cheerful in his feeble action. It was the confessor Saturninus, now in his eightieth year, yet loaded with two heavy chains. At each side were the more youthful laborers, Cyriacus and Sisinnius, of whom it is recorded, that, in addition to their own task-work, one on each side, they bore up his bonds. Indeed, we are told that their particular delight was, over and above their own assigned portion of toil, to help their weaker brethren, and perform their work for them.* But their time was not yet come; for both of them, before their crowns, were ordained deacons in the next pontificate.

Several other captives lay on the ground, about the old man's feet, as he, seated on a block of marble, was talking to them, with a sweet gravity, which riveted their attention, and seemed to make them forget their sufferings. What was he saying to them? Was he requiting Cyriacus for his extraordinary charity, by telling him, that, in commemoration of it, a portion of the immense pile which they were toiling to raise, would be dedicated to God, under his invocation, become a title, and close its line of titulars by an illustrious name?† Or was he recounting another more glorious vision, how this small oratory was to be superseded and absorbed by a glorious temple in honor of the Queen of Angels, which should comprise the entire of the superb hall, with its vestibule, under the directing skill of the mightiest artistic genius that the world should ever see?‡ What more consoling thought could have been vouchsafed to those poor oppressed captives, than that they were not so much erecting baths for the luxury of a heathen people, or the prodigality of a wicked emperor, as in truth building up one of the stateliest churches in which the true God is worshipped, and the Virgin Mother, who bore Him incarnate, is affectionately honored?

From a distance Corvinus saw the group; and pausing, asked the superintendent the names of those who composed it. He enumerated them readily; then added, "You may as well take that old man, if you like; for he is not worth his keep, so far as work goes."

"Thank you," replied Corvinus, "a pretty figure he would cut in the amphitheatre. The people are not to be put off with *See Piazza, on the church of Santa Maria degli Angeli, in his work on the Stations at Rome.

†The last cardinal of the extinct title of St. Cyriacus's formed out of part of these Baths, was Cardinal Bembo.

‡Michel Angelo. The noble and beautiful church of Sta. Maria degli Angeli was made by him out of the central hall and circular vestibule, described in the text. The floor was afterwards raised, and thus the pillars were shortened, and the height of the building diminished by several feet.

decrepit old creatures, whom a single stroke of a bear's or tiger's paw kills outright. They like to see young blood flowing, and plenty of struggling against wounds and blows, before death comes to decide the contest. But there is one whom you have not named. His face is turned from us; he has not the prisoner's garb, nor any kind of fetter. Who can it be?"

"I do not know his name," answered Rabirius; "but he is a fine youth, who spends much of his time among the convicts, relieves them, and even at times helps them in their work. He pays, of course, well for being allowed all this; so it is not our business to ask questions." "But it is mine, though," said Corvinus, sharply; and he advanced for this purpose. The voice caught the stranger's ear, and he turned round to look.

Corvinus sprang upon him with the eye and action of a wild beast, seized him, and called out, with exultation, "Fetter him instantly. This time at least, Paneratius, thou shalt not escape."

CHAPTER XXI.

THE PRISON.

If a modern Christian wishes really to know what his forefathers underwent for the faith, during three centuries of persecution, we would not have him content himself with visiting the catacombs, as we have tried to make him do, and thus learning what sort of life they were compelled to lead; but we would advise him to peruse those imperishable records, the Acts of the Martyrs, which will show him how they were made to die. We know of no writings so moving, so tender, so consoling, and so ministering of strength to faith and to hope, after God's inspired words, as these venerable monuments. And if our reader, so advised, have not leisure sufficient to read much upon this subject, we would limit him willingly to one specimen, the genuine Acts of SS. Perpetua and Felicitas. It is true that they will be best read by the scholar in their plain African latinity; but we trust that some one will soon give us a worthy English version of these, and some other similar, early Christian documents. The ones which we have singled out are the same as were known to St. Augustine, and cannot be read by any one without emotion. If the reader would compare the morbid sensibility, and the overstrained excitement, endeavoured to be produced by a modern French writer, in the imaginary journal of a culprit condemned to death, down to the immediate approach of execution, with the unaffected pathos, and charming truthfulness, which pervades the corresponding narrative of Vivia Perpetua, a delicate lady of twenty-one years of age, he would not hesitate in concluding, how much more natural, graceful, and interesting are the simple recitals of Christianity, than the boldest fictions of romance. And when our minds are sad, or the petty persecutions of our times incline our feeble hearts to murmur, we cannot do better than turn to that really golden, because truthful legend, or to the history of the noble martyrs of Vienne, or Lyons, or to the many similar, still extant records, to nerve our courage, by the contemplation of what children and women, catechumens and slaves, suffered, uncomplainingly, for Christ.

But we are wandering from our narrative. Paneratius, with some twenty more, fettered, and chained together, were led through the streets to prison. As they were thus dragged along, staggering and stumbling helplessly, they were unmercifully struck by the guards who conducted them; and any persons near enough to reach them, dealt them blows and kicks without remorse. Those further off pelted them with stones or offal, and assailed them with insulting ribaldry.* They reached the Mamertine prison at last, and were thrust down into it, and found there already other victims, of both sexes, awaiting their time of sacrifice. The youth had just time, while he was being handcuffed, to request one of the captors to inform his mother and Sebastian of what had happened; and he slipped his purse into his hand.

A prison in ancient Rome was not the place to which a poor man might court committal; hoping there to enjoy better fare and lodging than he did at home. Two or three of these dungeons, for they are nothing better, still remain; and a brief description of the one which we have mentioned, will give our readers some idea of what confessorship cost, independent of martyrdom.

The Mamertine prison is composed of two square subterranean chambers, one below the other, with only one round aperture in the centre of each vault, through which alone light, air, food, furniture, and men could pass. When the upper story was full, we may imagine how much of the two first could reach the lower. No other means of ventilation, drainage, or access, could exist. The walls, of large stone blocks, had, or rather have, rings fastened into them, for securing the prisoners; but many used to be laid on the floor, with their feet fastened in the stocks; and the ingenious cruelty of the persecutors often increased the discomfort of the damp stone floor, by strewing with broken potsherds this only bed allowed to the mangled limbs, and welted backs, of the tortured Christians. Hence we have in Africa a company of martyrs, headed by SS. Saturninus and Dativus, who all perished through their sufferings in prison. And the acts of the Lyonesse martyrs inform us, that many new-comers expired in the jail, killed by its severities, before their bodies had endured any torments; while, on the contrary, some who returned to it so cruelly tortured that their recovery appeared hopeless, without any medical or other assistance, there regained their health.* At the same time the Christians bought access to these abodes of pain, but not of sorrow, and furnished whatever could, under such circumstances, relieve the sufferings, and increase the comforts, temporal and spiritual, of these most cherished and venerated of their brethren.

Roman justice required at least the outward forms of trial; and hence the Christian captives were led from their dungeons before the tribunal; where they were subjected to an interrogatory, of which most precious examples have been preserved in the proconsular Acts of Martyrs, just as they were entered by the secretary or registrar of the court.

When the Bishop of Lyons, Pothinus, now in his ninetyeth year, was asked, "Who is the God of the Christians?" he replied, with simple dignity, "If thou shalt be worthy, thou shalt know."† Sometimes the judge would enter into a discussion with his prisoner, and necessarily get the worst of it; though the latter would seldom go further with him, than simply reiterating his plain profession of the Christian faith. Often, as in the case of one Ptolomæus, beautifully recited by St. Justin, and in that of St. Perpetua, he was content to ask the simple question, Art thou a Christian? and upon an affirmative reply, proceeded to pronounce capital sentence.

Paneratius and his companion stood before the judge; for it wanted only three days to the munus, or games, at which they were to "fight with wild beasts."

"What art thou?" he asked of one.

"I am a Christian, by the help of God," was the rejoinder.

"And who art thou?" said the prefect to Rusticus.

"I am, indeed, a slave of Caesar's," answered the prisoner; "but becoming a Christian, I have been freed by Christ Himself; and by His grace and mercy, I have been made partaker of the same hope as those whom you see."

Then turning to a holy priest, Lucianus, venerable for his years and his virtues, the judge thus addressed him: "Come, be obedient to the gods themselves, and to the imperial edicts."

"No one," answered the old man, "can be reprehended or condemned who obeys the precepts of Jesus Christ our Saviour."

"What sort of learning and studies dost thou pursue?"

"I have endeavored to master every science, and have tried every variety of learning. But finally I adhered to the doctrines of Christianity; although they do not please those who follow the wandering of false opinions."

* Ruinart, p. 145.

† "Si dignus fueris, cognosces." Id.

* See the account of St. Pothinus, Ruinart, i. p. 145.

"Wretch! dost thou find delight in that learning?"

"The greatest; because I follow the Christians in right doctrine."

"And what is that doctrine?"

"The right doctrine, which we Christians piously hold, is to believe in one God, the Maker and Creator of all things visible and invisible; and to confess the Lord Jesus Christ the Son of God, anciently foretold by the prophets, who will come to judge mankind, and is the preacher and master of salvation, to those who will learn well under Him. I indeed, as a mere man, am so weak and insignificant to be able to utter any thing great of His infinite Deity: this office belongs to the prophets."*

"Thou art, methinks, a master of error to others, and deservest to be more severely punished than the rest. Let this Lucianus be kept in the nerve (stocks) with his feet stretched to the fifth hole.†—And you two women, what are your names and condition?"

"I am a Christian, who have no spouse but Christ. My name is Secunda," replied the one.

"And I am a widow, named Rufina, professing the same saving faith," continued the other.

At length, after having put similar questions, and received similar answers from all the others, except from one wretched man, who, to the grief of the rest, wavered and agreed to offer sacrifice, the prefect turned to Pancratius, and thus addressed him. "And now, insolent youth, who hast the audacity to tear down the edict of the divine emperors, even for thee there shall be mercy, if yet thou wilt sacrifice to the gods. Show thus at once thy piety and thy wisdom; for thou art yet but a stripling."

Pancratius signed himself with the sign of the saving cross, and calmly replied, "I am the servant of Christ. Him I acknowledge by my mouth, hold firm in my heart, incessantly adore. This youth which you behold in me has the wisdom of grey hairs, if it worship but one God. But your gods, with those who adore them, are destined to eternal destruction."‡

"Strike him on the mouth for his blasphemy, and beat him with rods," exclaimed the angry judge.

"I thank thee," replied meekly the noble youth, "that thus I suffer some of the same punishment as was inflicted on my Lord."§

The prefect then pronounced sentence in the usual form. "Lucianus, Pancratius, Rusticus, and others, and the women Secunda and Rufina, who have all owned themselves Christians, and refuse to obey the sacred emperor, or worship the gods of Rome, we order to be exposed to wild beasts, in the Flavian amphitheatre."

The mob howled with delight and hatred, and accompanied the confessors back to their prison with this rough music; but they were gradually overawed by the dignity of their gait, and the shining calmness of their countenances. Some men asserted that they must have perfumed themselves, for they could perceive a fragrant atmosphere surrounding their persons.||

CHAPTER XXII.

THE VIATICUM.

A TRUE contrast to the fury and discord without, was the scene within the prison. Peace, serenity, cheerfulness, and joy reigned there; and the rough stone walls and vaults echoed to the chant of psalmody, in which Pancratius was precentor, and in which depth called out to depth; for the prisoners in the lower dungeon responded to those above, and kept up the alternation of verses, in those psalms which the circumstances naturally suggested.

The eve of "fighting with," that is being torn to pieces by wild beasts, was always a day of greater liberty. The friends of the intended victims were admitted to see them; and the Christians boldly took full advantage of the permission to flock to the prison, and commend themselves to the prayers of the blessed confessors of Christ. At evening they were led forth, to enjoy what was called the free supper, that is, an abundant, and even luxurious, public feast. The table was surrounded by pagans, curious to watch the conduct and looks of the morrow's combatants. But they could discern neither the bravado and boisterousness, nor the dejection and bitterness, of ordinary culprits. To the guests it was truly an agape, or love-feast; for they supped with calm joyfulness amidst cheerful conversation. Pancratius, however, once or twice, reproved the unfeeling curiosity, and rude remarks, of the crowd, saying, "To-morrow is not sufficient for you, because you love to look upon the objects of your future hatred. To-day you are our friends; to-morrow our foes. But mark well our countenances, that you may know them again in the day of judgment." Many retired at this rebuke, and not a few were led by it to conversion.*

But while the persecutors thus prepared a feast for the bodies of their victims, the Church, their mother, had been preparing a much more dainty banquet for the souls of her children. They had been constantly attended on by the deacons, particularly Reparatus, who would gladly have joined their company. But his duty forbade this at present. After, therefore, having provided as well as possible for their temporal wants, he had arranged with the pious priest Dionysius, who still dwelt in the house of Agnes, to send, towards evening, sufficient portions of the Bread of life to feed, early in the morning of their battle, the champions of Christ. Although the deacons bore the consecrated elements from the principal church to others, where they were only distributed by the titulars, the office of conveying them to the martyrs in prison, and even to the dying, was committed to inferior ministers. On this day, that the hostile passions of heathen Rome were unusually excited by the coming slaughter of so many Christian victims, it was a work of more than common danger to discharge this duty. For the revelations of Torquatus had made it known that Fulvius had carefully noted all the ministers of the sanctuary, and given a description of them to his numerous active spies. Hence they could scarcely venture out by day, unless thoroughly disguised.

The sacred Bread was prepared, and the priest turned round from the altar on which it was placed, to see who would be its safest bearer. Before any other could step forward, the young acolyte Tarcisius knelt at his feet. With his hands extended before him, ready to receive the sacred deposit, with a countenance beautiful in its lovely innocence as an angel's, he seemed to entreat for preference, and even to claim it.

"Thou art too young, my child," said the kind priest, filled with admiration of the picture before him.

"My youth, holy father, will be my best protection. Oh! do not refuse me this great honor." The tears stood in the boy's eyes, and his cheeks glowed with a modest emotion, as he spoke these words. He stretched forth his hands eagerly, and his entreaty was so full of fervor and courage, that the plea was irresistible. The priest took the Divine Mysteries, wrapped up carefully in a linen cloth, then in an outer covering, and put them on his palms, saying:

"Remember, Tarcisius, what a treasure is intrusted to thy feeble care. Avoid public places as thou goest along; and remember that holy things must not be delivered to dogs, nor pearls be cast before swine. Thou wilt keep safely God's sacred gifts?"

"I will die rather than betray them," answered the holy youth, as he folded the heavenly trust in the bosom of his tunic, and with cheerful reverence started on his journey. There was a gravity beyond the usual expression of his years stamped upon his countenance, as he tripped lightly along the * Acts of St. Justin. Ruinart, p. 129.

† This is mentioned as the extreme possible extension.

‡ Ib. p. 56, Acts of St. Felicitas and her sons.

§ p. 220, Acts of St. Perpetua, &c.

|| pp. 219 and 146, Acts of Lyonese Martyrs.

* Ib. p. 219.

streets, avoiding equally the more public, and the too low, thoroughfares.

As he was approaching the door of a large mansion, its mistress, a rich lady without children, saw him coming, and was struck with his beauty and sweetness, as, with arms folded on his breast, he was hastening on. "Stay one moment, dear child," she said, putting herself in his way: "tell me thy name, and where do thy parents live?"

"I am Tarcisius, an orphan boy," he replied, looking up smilingly; "and I have no home save one which it might be displeasing to thee to hear."

"Then come into my house and rest; I wish to speak to thee. Oh, that I had a child like thee!"

"Not now, noble lady, not now. I have intrusted to me a most solemn and sacred duty, and I must not tarry a moment in its performance."

"Then promise to come to me to-morrow; this is my house."

"If I am alive, I will," answered the boy with a kindled look, which made him appear to her as a messenger from a higher sphere. She watched him a long time, and after some deliberation determined to follow him. Soon, however, she heard a tumult with horrid cries, which made her pause on her way, until they had ceased, when she went on again.

In the meantime, Tarcisius, with his thoughts fixed on better things than her inheritance, hastened on, and shortly came into an open space, where boys, just escaped from school, were beginning to play.

"We just want one to make up the game; where shall we get him?" said their leader.

"Capital!" exclaimed another; "here comes Tarcisius, whom I have not seen for an age. He used to be an excellent hand at all sports. Come Tarcisius," he added, stopping him by seizing his arm, "whither so fast? take a part in our game, that's a good fellow."

"I can't, Petilius, now; I really can't. I am going on business of great importance."

"But you shall," exclaimed the first speaker, a strong and bullying youth, laying hold of him. "I will have no sulking, when I want anything done. So come, join us at once."

"I entreat you," said the poor boy feelingly, "do let me go."

"No such thing," replied the other. "What is that you seem to be carrying so carefully in your bosom? A letter, I suppose; well, it will not addle by being for half an hour out of its nest. Give it to me, and I will put it by safe while we play." And he snatched at the sacred deposit in his breast.

"Never, never," answered the child, looking up towards heaven.

"I will see it," insisted the other rudely; "I will know what is this wonderful secret." And he commenced pulling him roughly about. A crowd of men from the neighborhood soon got round; and all asked eagerly what was the matter. They saw a boy, who, with folded arms, seemed endowed with a supernatural strength, as he resisted every effort of one much bigger and stronger, to make him reveal what he was bearing. Cuffs, pulls, blows, kicks seemed to have no effect. He bore them all without a murmur, or an attempt to retaliate; but he unflinchingly kept his purpose.

"What is it? what can it be?" one began to ask the other; when Fulvius chanced to pass by, and joined the circle round the combatants. He at once recognized Tarcisius, having seen him at the Ordination; and being asked, as a better-dressed man, the same question, he replied contemptuously, as he turned on his heel, "What is it? Why only a Christian ass, bearing the mysteries."*

This was enough: Fulvius, while he scorned such unprofitable prey, knew well the effect of his word. Heathen curiosity, to see the mysteries of the Christians revealed, and to insult them, was aroused, and a general demand was made to Tarcisius to yield up his charge. "Never with life," was his only reply. A heavy blow from a smith's fist nearly stunned him, while the blood flowed from the wound. Another and another followed, till, covered with bruises, but with his arms crossed fast upon his breast, he fell heavily on the ground. The mob closed upon him, and were just seizing him to tear open his thrice-holy trust, when they felt themselves pushed aside, right and left, by some giant strength. Some went reeling to the further side of the square, others were spun round and round, they knew not how, till they fell where they were, and the rest retired before a tall, athletic officer, who was the author of this overthrow. He had no sooner cleared the ground, than he was on his knees, and with tears in his eyes, raised up the bruised and fainting boy, as tenderly as a mother could have done, and in most gentle tones asked him, "Are you much hurt, Tarcisius?"

"Never mind me, Quadratus," answered he, opening his eyes with a smile; "but I am carrying the divine mysteries; take care of them."

The soldier raised the boy in his arms with tenfold reverence, as if bearing, not only the sweet victim of a youthful sacrifice, a martyr's relics, but the very King and Lord of Martyrs, and the divine Victim of eternal salvation. The child's head leaned in confidence on the stout soldier's neck, but his arms and hands never left their watchful custody of the confided gift; and his gallant bearer felt no weight in the hallowed double burden which he carried. No one stopped him, till a lady met him and stared amazedly at him. She drew nearer, and looked closer at what he carried. "Is it possible?" she exclaimed with terror; "is that Tarcisius, whom I met a few moments ago, so fair and lovely? Who can have done this?"

"Madam," replied Quadratus. "they have murdered him because he was a Christian."

The lady looked for an instant on the child's countenance. He opened his eyes upon her, smiled, and expired. From that look came the light of faith; she hastened to be a Christian likewise.

The venerable Dionysius could hardly see for weeping, as he removed the child's hands, and took from his bosom unviolated, the Holy of holies; and he thought he looked more like an angel now, sleeping the martyr's slumber, than he did when living scarcely an hour before. Quadratus himself bore him to the cemetery of Callistus, where he was buried amidst the admiration of older believers; and later the holy Pope Damasus composed for him an epitaph, which no one can read, without concluding that the belief in the real presence of Our Lord's Body in the B. Eucharist was the same then as now:

"Tarcisium sanctorum Christi sacramenta gerentem,
Cum malis sana manus peteret vulgare profanas;
Ipsæ antiquam potius voluit dimittere cœcus
Prodere quam canibus rabidiss. celestis membra."

He is mentioned in the Roman martyrology, on the 15th of August, as commemorated in the cemetery of Callistus; whence his relics were, in due time translated to the church of St. Sylvester in Campo, as an old inscription declares.

News of this occurrence did not reach the prisoners till after their feast; and perhaps the alarm that they were to be deprived of the spiritual food to which they looked forward for strength, was the only one that could have overcast, even slightly, the serenity of their souls. At this moment Sebastian entered, and perceived at once that some unpleasant news had arrived, and as quickly divined what it was; for Quadratus had already informed him of all. He cheered up, therefore, the confessors of Christ; assured them that they should not be deprived of their coveted food; then whispered a few words to Reparatus the deacon, who flew out immediately with a look of bright intelligence.

Sebastian, being known to the guards, had passed freely in, * "Christ's secret gifts, by good Tarcisius borne,

The mob profanely bade him to display;
He rather gave his own limbs to be torn,
Than Christ's celestial to mad dogs betray."

Carmen xviii.

See also Baronius's notes to the Martyrology. The words "(Christi) celestia membra," applied to the Blessed Eucharist, supply one of those casual, but most striking, arguments that result from identity of habitual thought in antiquity, more than from the use of studied or conventional phrases.

* A sinu portans mysteria, a Latin proverb, and out of, the prison daily ; and had been indefatigable in his care of its inmates. But now he was come to take his last farewell of his dearest friend, Pancratius, who had longed for this interview. They drew to one side, when the youth began :

"Well, Sebastian, do you remember when we heard the wild beasts roar, from your window, and looked at the many gaping arches of the amphitheatre, as open for the Christian's triumph?"

"Yes, my dear boy ; I remember that evening well, and it seemed to me as your heart anticipated then, the scenes that await you to-morrow."

"It did, in truth. I felt an inward assurance that I should be one of the first to appease the roaring fury of those deputies of human cruelty. But now that the time is come, I can hardly believe myself worthy of so immense an honor. What can I have done, Sebastian, not indeed to deserve it, but to be chosen out as the object of so great a grace?"

"You know, Pancratius, that it is not he who willeth, nor he that runneth, but God who hath mercy, that maketh the election. But tell me rather, how do you now feel about to-morrow's glorious destiny?"

"To tell the truth, it seems to me so magnificent, so far beyond my right to claim, that sometimes it appears more like a vision than a certainty. Does it not sound almost incredible to you, that I, who this night am in a cold, dark, and dismal prison, shall be, before another sun has set, listening to the harping of angelic lyres, walking in the procession of white-robed Saints, inhaling the perfume of celestial incense, and drinking from the crystal waters of the stream of life? Is it not too like what one may read or hear about another, but hardly dares to think is to be, in a few hours real of himself?"

"And nothing more than you have described, Pancratius?"

"Oh, yes, far more ; far more than one can name without presumption. That I, a boy just come out of school, who have done nothing for Christ as yet, should be able to say, 'Sometime to-morrow, I shall see him face to face, and adore Him, and shall receive from Him a palm and a crown, yea, and an affectionate embrace,'—I feel is so like a beautiful hope, that it startles me to think, it will soon be that no longer. And yet, Sebastian," he continued fervently, seizing both his friend's hands, "it is true ; it is true !"

"And more still, Pancratius."

"Yes, Sebastian, more still, and more. To close one's eyes upon the face of men, and open them in full gaze on the face of God ; to shut them upon ten thousand countenances scowling on you with hatred, contempt, and fury, from every step of the amphitheatre, and unclose them instantly upon that one sunlike intelligence, whose splendour would dazzle or scorch, did not its beams surround, and embrace, and welcome us ; to dart them at once into the furnace of God's heart, and plunge into its burning ocean of mercy and love without fear of destruction : surely, Sebastian, it sounds like presumption in me to say, that to-morrow—nay, hush ! the watchman from the capitol is proclaiming midnight—that to-day, to-day, I shall enjoy all this !"

"Happy Pancratius !" exclaimed the soldier, "you anticipate already by some hours the raptures to come."

"And do you know, dear Sebastian," continued the youth, as if unconscious of the interruption, "it looks to me so good and merciful in God, to grant me such a death. How much more willingly must one at my age face it, when it puts an end to all that is hateful on earth, when it extinguishes but the sight of hideous beasts and sinning men, scarcely less frightful than they, and hushes only the fiendlike yells of both ! How much more trying would it be to part with the last tender look of a mother like mine, and shut one's ears to the sweet plaint of her patient voice ! True, I shall see her and hear her, for the last time, as we have arranged, to-day before my fight : but I know she will not unnerve me."

A tear had made its way into the affectionate boy's eye ; but he suppressed it, and said with a gay tone.

"But, Sebastian, you have not fulfilled your promise,—your double promise to me,—to tell me the secrets you concealed from me. This is your last opportunity ; so, come, let me know all."

"Do you remember well what the secrets were?"

"Right well, indeed, for they have much perplexed me. First on that night of the meeting in your apartments, you said there was one motive strong enough to check your ardent desire to die for Christ ; and lately you refused to give me your reason for despatching me hastily to Campania, and joined this secret to the other : how, I cannot conceive."

"Yet they form but one. I had promised to watch over your true welfare, Pancratius : it was a duty of friendship and love that I had assumed. I saw your eagerness after martyrdom ; I knew the ardent temperament of your youthful heart ; I dreaded lest you should commit yourself by some over-daring action, which might tarnish, even as lightly as a breath does finely-tempered steel, the purity of your desire, or tip with a passing blight one single leaf of your palm. I determined, therefore, to restrain my own earnest longings, till I had seen you safe through danger. Was this right?"

"Oh, it was too kind of you, dear Sebastian ; it was nobly kind. But how is this connected with my journey?"

"If I had not sent you away, you would have been seized for your boldly tearing down the edict, or your rebuke of the judge in his court. You would have been certainly condemned, and would have suffered for Christ ; but your sentence would have proclaimed a different, and a civil, offence, that of rebellion against the emperors. And moreover, my dear boy, you would have been singled out for a triumph. You would have been pointed at by the very heathens with honor, as a gallant and daring youth ; you might have been disturbed, even in your conflict, by a transient cloud of pride ; at any rate, you would have been spared that ignominy, which forms the distinctive merit and the special glory, of dying for simply being a Christian."

"Quite true, Sebastian," said Pancratius, with a blush.

"But when I saw you," continued the soldier, "taken in the performance of a generous act of charity towards the confessors of Christ ; when I saw you dragged through the streets, chained to a galley-slave, as a common culprit ; when I saw you pelted and hooted, like other believers ; when I heard sentence pronounced on you in common with the rest, because you are a Christian, and for nothing else, I felt that my task was ended ; I would not have raised a finger to save you."

"How like God's love has yours been to me—so wise, so generous, and so unsparing !" sobbed out Pancratius, as he threw himself on the soldier's neck ; then continued : "Promise me one thing more : that this day you will keep near me to the end, and will secure my last legacy to my mother."

"Even if it cost my life, I will not fail. We shall not be parted long, Pancratius."

The deacon now gave notice that all was ready, for offering up the holy oblation in the dungeon itself. The two youths looked round, and Pancratius was indeed amazed. The holy priest Lucianus was laid stretched on the floor, with his limbs painfully distended in the catasta or stocks, so that he could not rise. Upon his breast Reparatus had spread the three linen cloths requisite for the altar ; on them was laid the unleavened bread, and the mingled chalice, which the deacon steadied with his hand. The head of the aged priest was held up, as he read the accustomed prayers, and performed the prescribed ceremonies of the oblation and consecration. And then each one, approaching devoutly, and with tears of gratitude, received from his consecrated hand his share,—that is, the whole of the mystical food.*

Marvellous and beautiful instance of the power of adaptation in God's Church ! Fixed as are her laws, her ingenious love finds means, through their very relaxation, to demonstrate their principles ; nay, the very exception presents only a sublimer application of them. Here was a minister of God, and a dispenser of His mysteries, who for once was privileged to be, more than others, like Him whom he represented,—at once the Priest and the Altar. The Church prescribed that the Holy Sacrifice should be offered only over the relics of martyrs; here was a martyr, by a singular prerogative, permitted to offer it over his own body. Yet living, he “lay beneath the feet of God.” The bosom still heaved, and the heart panted under the Divine Mysteries, it is true; but that was only part of the action of the minister: while self was already dead, and the sacrifice of life was, in all but act, completed in him. There was only Christ’s life within and without the sanctuary of that breast.* Was ever viaticum for martyrs more worthily prepared?

* Such a celebration of the Divine Mysteries, by a priest of this name, at Antioch, is recorded in his Acts. (See Ruinart, tom. iii. p. 182, note.)

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE FIGHT.

THE morning broke light and frosty; and the sun, glittering on the gilded ornaments of the temples and other public buildings, seemed to array them in holiday splendor. And the people, too, soon came forth into the streets in their gayest attire, decked out with unusual richness. The various streams converge towards the Flavian amphitheatre, now better known by the name of the Coliseum. Each one directs his steps to the arch indicated by the number of his ticket, and thus the huge monster keeps sucking in by degrees that stream of life, which soon animates and enlivens its oval tiers over tiers of steps, till its interior is tapestried all round with human faces, and its walls seem to rock and wave to and fro, by the swaying of the living mass. And, after this shall have been gorged with blood, and inflamed with fury, it will melt once more, and rush out in a thick continuous flow through the many avenues by which it entered, now bearing their fitting name of Vomitoria; for never did a more polluted stream of the dregs and pests of humanity issue from an unbecoming reservoir, through ill-assorted channels, than the Roman mob, drunk with the blood of martyrs, gushing forth from the pores of the splendid amphitheatre.

The emperor came to the games surrounded by his court, with all the pomp and circumstance which befitted an imperial festival, keen as any of his subjects to witness the cruel games, and to feed his eyes with a feast of carnage. His throne was on the eastern side of the amphitheatre, where a large space, called the pulvinar, was reserved, and richly decorated for the imperial court.

Various sports succeeded one another; and many a gladiator killed, or wounded, had sprinkled the bright sand with blood, when the people, eager for fiercer combats, began to call, or roar for the Christians and the wild beasts. It is time, therefore, for us to think of our captives.

Before the citizens were astir, they had been removed from the prison to a strong chamber called the spoliatorium, the press-room, where their fetters and chains were removed. An attempt was made to dress them gaudily as heathen priests and priestesses; but they resisted, urging that as they had come spontaneously to the fight, it was unfair to make them appear in a disguise which they abhorred. During the early part of the day they remained thus together encouraging one another, and singing the Divine praises, in spite of the shouts which drowned their voices from time to time.

While they were thus engaged, Corvinus entered, and, with a look of insolent triumph, thus accosted Pancratius:

“Thanks to the gods, the day is come which I have long desired. It has been a tiresome and tough struggle between us who should fall uppermost. I have won it.”

“How sayest thou, Cervinus? when and how have I contended with thee?”

“Always: everywhere. Thou hast haunted me in my dreams; thou hast danced before me like a meteor, and I have tried in vain to grasp thee. Thou hast been my tormentor, my evil genius. I have hated thee; devoted thee to the infernal gods; cursed thee and loathed thee; and now my day of vengeance is come.”

“Methinks,” replied Pancratius, smiling, “this does not look like a combat. It has been all on one side; for I have done none of these things towards thee.”

“No? thinkest thou that I believe thee, when thou hast lain ever as a viper on my path, to bite my heel, and overthrow me?”

“Where? I again ask.”

“Everywhere, I repeat. At school; in the Lady Agnes’s house; in the Forum; in the cemetery; in my father’s own court; at Chromatius’s villa. Yes, everywhere.”

“And nowhere else but where thou hast named? when thy chariot was dashed furiously along the Appian way, didst thou not hear the tramp of horses’ hoofs trying to overtake thee?”

“Wretch!” exclaimed the prefect’s son, in a fury; “and was it thy accursed steed which, purposely urged forward, frightened mine, and nearly caused my death?”

“No, Corvinus, hear me calmly. It is the last time we shall speak together. I was travelling quietly with a companion towards Rome, after having paid the last rites to our master Cassianus” (Corvinus winced, for he knew not this before), “when I heard the clatter of a runaway chariot; and then, indeed, I put spurs to my horse; and it is well for thee that I did.”

“How so?”

“Because I reached thee just in time: when thy strength was nearly exhausted, and thy blood almost frozen by repeated plunges in the cold canal; and when thy arm, already benumbed, had let go its last stay, and then wast falling backwards for the last time into the water. I saw thee: I knew thee, as I took hold of thee, insensible. I had in my grasp the murderer of one most dear to me. Divine justice seemed to have overtaken him; there was only my will between him and his doom. It was my day of vengeance, and I fully gratified it.”

“Ha! and how, pray?”

“By drawing thee out, and laying thee on the bank, and chafing thee till thy heart resumed its functions; and then consigning thee to thy servants, rescued from death.”

“Thou liest?” screamed Corvinus; “my servants told me that they drew me out.”

“And did they give thee my knife, together with thy leopard skin purse, which I found on the ground, after I had dragged thee forth?”

“No; they said the purse was lost in the canal. It was a leopard-skin purse, the gift of an African sorceress. What sayest thou of the knife?”

“That it is here, see it, still rusty with the water; thy purse I gave to thy slaves; my own knife I retained for myself; look at it again. Dost thou believe me now? Have I been always a viper on thy path?”

Too ungenerous to acknowledge that he had been conquered in the struggle between them, Corvinus only felt himself withered, degraded, before his late schoolfellow, crumbled like a clot of dust in his hands. His very heart seemed to him to blush. He felt sick, and staggered, hung down his head, and sneaked away. He cursed the games, the emperor, the yelling rabble, the roaring beasts, his horses and chariot, his slaves, his father, himself—every thing and every body except one—he could not, for his life, curse Pancratius.

He had reached the door, when the youth called him back. He turned and looked at him with a glance of respect, almost approaching to love. Pancratius put his hand on his arm, and said, “Corvinus, I have freely forgiven thee. There is One above who cannot forgive without repentance. Seek pardon from Him. If not, I foretell to thee this day, that by whatsoever death I die, thou too shalt one day perish.”

Corvinus slunk away, and appeared no more that day. He lost the sight on which his coarse imagination had gloated for days, which he had longed for during months. When the holiday was over, he was found by his father completely intoxicated: it was the only way he knew of drowning remorse.

* “I live now, not I, but Christ liveth in me.” Gal. ii. 20.

As he was leaving the prisoners, the lanista, or master of the gladiators, entered the room, and summoned them to the combat. They hastily embraced one another, and took leave on earth. They entered the arena, or pit of the amphitheatre, opposite the imperial seat, and had to pass between two files of venatores, or huntsmen, who had the care of the wild beasts, each armed with a heavy whip, wherewith he inflicted a blow on every one, as he went by him. They were then brought forward, singly or in groups, as the people desired, or the directors of the spectacle chose. Sometimes the intended prey was placed on an elevated platform to be more conspicuous; at another time he was tied up to posts to be more helpless. A favorite sport was to bundle up a female victim in a net, and expose her to be rolled, tossed, or gored by wild cattle.* One encounter with a single wild beast often finished the martyr's course; while occasionally three or four were successively let loose, without their inflicting a mortal wound. The confessor was then either remanded to prison for further torments, or taken back to the spoliatorium, where the gladiator's apprentices amused themselves with despatching him.

But we must content ourselves with following the last steps of our youthful hero, Paneratus. As he was passing through the corridor that led to the amphitheatre, he saw Sebastian standing on one side, with a lady closely enwrapped in her mantle, and veiled. He at once recognized her, stopped before her, and taking her hand, affectionately kissed it. "Bless me, dear mother," he said, "in this your promised hour."

"See, my child, the heavens," she replied, "and look up thither, where Christ with His saints expecteth thee. Fight the good fight, for thy soul's sake, and show thyself faithful and steadfast in thy Saviour's love.† Remember him too whose precious relic thou bearest round thy neck."

"Its price shall be doubled in thine eyes, my sweet mother, ere many hours are over."

"On, on, and let us have none of this fooling," exclaimed the lanista, adding a stroke of his cane.

Lucina retreated; while Sebastian pressed the hand of her son, and whispered in his ear, "Courage, dearest boy; may God bless you! I shall be close behind the emperor; give me a last look there, and—your blessing."

"Ha! ha! ha!" broke out a fiendish tone close behind him. Was it a demon's laugh? He looked behind, and caught only a glimpse of a fluttering cloak rounding a pillar. Who could it be? He guessed not. It was Fulvius, who in those words had got the last link in the chain of evidence, that he had long been weaving—that Sebastian was certainly a Christian.

Paneratius soon stood in the midst of the arena, the last of the faithful band. He had been reserved, in hopes that the sight of others' sufferings might shake his constancy; but the effect had been the reverse. He took his stand where he was placed, and his yet delicate frame contrasted with the swarthy and brawny limbs of the executioners who surrounded him. They now left him alone; and we cannot better describe him than Eusebius, an eye-witness, does a youth a few years older:

"You might have seen a tender youth, who had not yet entered his twentieth year, standing without fetters, with his hands stretched forth in the form of a cross, and praying to God most attentively, with a fixed and untrembling heart; not retiring from the place where he first stood, nor swerving the least, while bears and leopards, breathing fury and death in their very snort, were just rushing on to tear his limbs in pieces. And yet, I know not how, their jaws seemed seized and closed by some divine and mysterious power, and they drew altogether back.‡"

Such was the attitude, and such the privilege of our heroic youth. The mob were frantic, as they saw one wild beast after another careering madly round him, roaring and lashing its sides with its tail, while he seemed placed in a charmed circle, which they could not approach. A furious bull, let loose upon him, dashed madly forward, with his neck bent down, then stopped suddenly, as though he had struck his head against a wall, pawed the ground, and scattered the dust around him, bellowing fiercely.

"Provoke him, thou coward!" roared out, still louder, the enraged emperor.

Paneratius awoke as from a trance, and waving his arms, ran towards his enemy;* but the savage brute, as if a lion had been rushing on him, turned round, and ran away towards the entrance, where meeting his keeper, he tossed him high into the air. All were disconcerted except the brave youth, who had resumed his attitude of prayer; when one of the crowd shouted out: "He has a charm round his neck; he is a sorcerer!" The whole multitude re-echoed the cry, till the emperor, having commanded silence, called out to him, "Take that amulet from thy neck, and cast it from thee, or it shall be done more roughly for thee."

"Sire," replied the youth, with a musical voice, that rang sweetly through the hushed amphitheatre, "it is no charm that I wear, but a memorial of my father, who in this very place made gloriously the same confession which I now humbly make; I am a Christian; and for love of Jesus Christ, God and man, I gladly give my life. Do not take from me this only legacy, which I have bequeathed, richer than I received it, to another. Try once more; it was a panther which gave him his crown; perhaps it will bestow the same on me."

For an instant there was dead silence; the multitude seemed softened, won. The graceful form of the gallant youth, his now inspired countenance, the thrilling music of his voice, the intrepidity of his speech, and his generous self-devotion to his cause, had wrought upon that cowardly herd Paneratius felt it, and his heart quailed before their mercy more than before their rage; he had promised himself heaven that day; was he to be disappointed? Tears started into his eyes, as stretching forth his arms once more in the form of a cross, he called aloud, in a tone that again vibrated through every heart:

"To-day: oh yes, to-day, most blessed Lord, is the appointed day of Thy coming. Tarry not longer; enough has Thy power been shown in me to them that believe not in Thee; show now Thy mercy to me who in Thee believe!"

"The panther!" shouted out a voice. "The panther!" responded twenty. "The panther!" thundered forth a hundred thousand, in a chorus like the roaring of an avalanche.† A cage started up, as if by magic, from the midst of the sand, and as it rose, its side fell down, and freed the captive of the desert.‡ With one graceful bound the elegant savage gained its liberty; and, though enraged by darkness, confinement, and hunger, it seemed almost playful, as it leaped and turned about, frisked and gambolled noiselessly on the sand. At last it caught sight of its prey. All its feline cunning and cruelty seemed to return, and to conspire together in animating the cautious and treacherous movements of his velvet-clothed frame. The whole amphitheatre was as silent as if it had been a hermit's dell, while every eye was intent, watching the stealthy approaches of the sleek brute to its victim. Paneratius was still standing in the same place, facing the emperor, apparently so absorbed in higher thoughts, as not to heed the movements of his enemy. The panther had stolen round him, as if disdainful to attack him except in the front. Crouching upon its breast, slowly advancing one paw before another, it had gained its measured distance, and there it lay for some moments of breathless suspense. A deep snarling growl, an elastic spring through the air, and it was seen gathered up like a leech, with its hind feet on the chest, and its fangs and fore claws on the throat of the martyr.

He stood erect for a moment, brought his right hand to his

* See the Acts of the Martyrs of Lyons, Ruinart, vol. i. p. 153 (where will be found the account of the martyrdom of a youth of fifteen), and those of St. Perpetua and Felicitas, p. 221.

† See the Acts of St. Felicitas and her seven sons, Ruinart, vol. i. p. 55.

‡ Hist. Eccl., lib. viii. c. 7.

* Euseb. ibid. See also St. Ignatius's letter to the Romans, in his Acts, ap. Ruinart, vol. i. p. 40.

† The amphitheatre could contain 150,000.

‡ This was an ordinary device. The underground constructions for its practice have been found in the Coliseum.

mouth, and looking up at Sebastian with a smile, directed to him, by a graceful wave of his arm, the last salutation on his lips—and fell. The arteries of the neck had been severed, and the alumber of martyrdom at once settled on his eyelids. His blood softened, brightened, enriched, and blended inseparably with, that of his father, which Lucina had hung about his neck. The mother's sacrifice had been accepted.*

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE CHRISTIAN SOLDIER.

The body of the young martyr was deposited in peace on the Aurelian way, in the cemetery which soon bore his name, and gave it, as we have before observed, to the neighboring gate. In times of peace, a basilica was raised over his tomb, and yet stands to perpetuate his honor.

The persecution now increased its fury, and multiplied its daily victims. Many whose names have appeared in our pages, especially the community of Chromatius's villa, rapidly fell. The first was Zœe, whose dumbness Sebastian had cured. She was surprised by a heathen rabble, praying at St. Peter's tomb, and was hurried to trial, and hung with her head over a smoky fire till she died. Her husband, with three others of the same party, was taken, repeatedly tortured, and beheaded. Tranquillinus, the father of Marcus and Marcellianus, jealous of Zœe's crown, prayed openly at St. Paul's tomb, he was taken and summarily stoned to death. His twin sons suffered also a cruel death. The treachery of Torquatus, by his describing his former companions, especially the gallant Tiburtinus, who was now beheaded,† greatly facilitated this wholesale destruction.

Sebastian moved in the midst of this slaughter, not like a builder who saw his work destroyed by a tempest, nor a shepherd who beheld his flock borne off by marauders. He felt as a general on the battle-field, who looked only to the victory; counting every one as glorious who gave his life in its purchase, and as ready to give his own should it prove to be the required price. Every friend that fell before him was a bond less to earth, and a link more to heaven; a care less below, a claim more above. He sometimes sat lonely, or pained silently, on the spots where he had conversed with Pancratius, recalling to mind the buoyant cheerfulness, the graceful thoughts, and the unconscious virtue of the amiable and comely youth. But he never felt as if they were more separated, than when he sent him on his expedition to Campania. He had redeemed his pledge to him; and now it was soon to be his own turn. He knew it well; he felt the grace of martyrdom, swelling in his breast, and in tranquil certainty he awaited its hour. His preparation was simple: whatever he had of value he distributed to the poor; and he settled his property, by sale, beyond the reach of confiscation.

Fulvius had picked up his fair share of Christian spoils; but, on the whole, he had been disappointed. He had not been obliged to ask for assistance from the emperor, whose presence he avoided; but he had put nothing by, he was not getting rich. Every evening he had to bear the reproachful and scornful interrogatory of Eurotas on the day's success. Now, however, he told his stern master—for such he had become—that he was going to strike at higher game, the emperor's favorite officer, who must have made a large fortune in the service.

He had not long to wait for his opportunity. On the 9th of January, a court was held, attended, of course, by all aspirants for favors, or fearers of imperial wrath. Fulvius was there, and as usual, met with a cold reception. But after bearing silently the muttered curses of the royal brute, he boldly advanced, dropped on one knee and thus addressed him:

* The martyr Saturnus, torn by a leopard, and about to die, addressed the soldier Pudens, not yet a Christian, in words of exhortation; then asked him for the ring on his finger, dipped it in his own blood, and gave it back, "leaving him the inheritance of that pledge, and the memorial of his blood." Ap. Rufinart. vol. i. p. 223.

† He is commemorated on the 11th of August, with his father Chromatius, as has been already observed.

"Sire, your divinity has often reproached me with having made, by my discoveries, but poor return for your gracious countenance and liberal subsidies. But now I have found out the foulest of plots, and the basest of ingratitude, in immediate contact with your divine person."

"What dost thou mean, booby?" asked impatiently the tyrant. "Speak at once, or I'll have the words pulled out of thy throat by an iron hook."

Fulvius rose, and directing his hand, in accompaniment to his words, said with a bitter blandness of tone: "Sebastian is a Christian."

The emperor started from his throne in fury.

"Thou liest, villain! Thou shalt prove thy words, or thou shalt die such a piecemeal death as no Christian dog ever endured."

"I have sufficient proof recorded here," he replied, producing a parchment, and offering it, kneeling.

The emperor was about to make angry answer, when, to his utter amazement, Sebastian, with unruffled looks and noble mien, stood before him, and in the calmest accents said:

"My liege, I spare you all trouble of proof. I am a Christian, and I glory in the name."

As Maximian, a rude though clever soldier, without education, could hardly when calm express himself in decent Latin, when he was in a passion his language was composed of broken sentences, mingled with every vulgar and coarse epithet. In this state he was now; and he poured out on Sebastian a torrent of abuse, in which he reproached him with every crime, and called him by every opprobrious name, within his well-stocked repertory of vituperation. The two crimes, however, on which he rung his loudest changes, were ingratitude and treachery. He had nursed, he said, a viper in his bosom, a scorpion, an evil demon; and he only wondered he was still alive.

The Christian officer stood the volley, as intrepidly as ever he had borne the enemy's assault, on the field of battle.

"Listen to me, my royal master," he replied, "perhaps for the last time. I have said that I am a Christian; and in this you have had the best pledge of your security."

"How do you mean, ungrateful man?"

"Thus, noble emperor: that if you want a body-guard around you of men who will spill their last drop of life's blood for you, go to the prison and take the Christians from the stocks on the floor, and from the fetter-rings on the walls; send to the courts and bear away the mutilated confessors from the rack and gridiron; issue orders to the amphitheatres, and snatch the mangled half that lives, from the jaws of tigers; restore them to such shape as yet they are capable of, put weapons into their hands, and place them around you; and in this maimed and ill-favored host there will be more fidelity, more loyalty, more daring for you, than all your Dacian and Pannonian legions. You have taken half their blood from them, and they will give you willingly the other half."

"Folly and madness!" returned the sneering savage. "I would sooner surround myself with wolves than with Christians. Your treachery proves enough for me."

"And what would have prevented me at any time from acting the traitor, if I had been one? Have I not had access to your royal person by night as by day; and have I proved a traitor? No, emperor, none has ever been more faithful than I to you. But I have another, and a higher Lord to serve; one who will judge us both; and His laws I must obey rather than yours."

"And why have you, like a coward, concealed your religion? To escape, perhaps, the bitter death you have deserved!"

"No, sir; no more coward than traitor. No one better than yourself knows that I am neither. So long as I could do any good to my brethren, I refused not to live amidst their carnage and my afflictions. But hope had at last died within me; and I thank Fulvius with all my heart, for having, by his accusation, spared me the embarrassment of choice between seeking death or enduring life."

"I will decide that point for you. Death is your award:

and a slow lingering one it shall be. But," he added, in a lower tone, as if speaking to himself, "this must not get out. All must be done quietly at home, or treachery will spread. Here, Quadratus, take your Christian tribune under arrest. Do you hear, dolt? Why do you not move?"

"Because I too am a Christian!"

Another burst of fury, another storm of vile language, which ended in the stout centurion's being ordered at once to execution. But Sebastian was to be differently dealt with.

"Order Hyphax to come hither," roared the tyrant. In a few minutes, a tall, half-naked Numidian made his appearance. A bow of immense length, a gaily-painted quiver of arrows, and a short broad-sword, were at once the ornaments and weapons of the captain of the African archers. He stood erect before the emperor, like a handsome bronze statue, with bright enamelled eyes.

"Hyphax, I have a job for you to-morrow morning. It must be well done," said the emperor.

Perfectly, sire," replied the dusky chief, with a grin which showed another set of enamels in his face.

"You see the captain Sebastian?" The negro bowed assent. "He turns out to be a Christian!"

If Hyphax had been on his native soil, and had trodden suddenly on a hooded asp or a scorpion's nest, he could not have started more. The thought of being so near a Christian—to him who worshipped every abomination, believed every absurdity, practised every lewdness, committed any atrocity!

Maximian proceeded, and Hyphax kept time to every member of his sentences by a nod, and what he meant to be a smile;—it was hardly an earthly one.

"You will take Sebastian to your quarters; and early to-morrow morning—not this evening, mind, for I know that by this time of day you are all drunk—but to-morrow morning, when your hands are steady, you will tie him to a tree in the grove of Adonis, and you will slowly shoot him to death. Slowly, mind; none of your fine shots straight through the heart or the brain, but plenty of arrows, till he die exhausted by pain and loss of blood. Do you understand me? Then take him off at once. And mind, silence; or else—"

CHAPTER XXV.

THE RESCUE.

In spite of every attempt at concealment, the news was soon spread among all connected with the court, that Sebastian had been discovered to be a Christian, and was to be shot to death on the morrow. But on none did the double intelligence make such an impression as on Fabiola.

Sebastian a Christian! she said to herself; the noblest, purest, wisest of Rome's nobility a member of that vile, stupid sect? Impossible! Yet, the fact seems certain.

Have I, then, been deceived? Was he not that which he seemed? Was he a mean impostor, who affected virtue, but was secretly a libertine? Impossible, too! Yes, this was indeed impossible! She had certain proofs of it. He knew that he might have had her hand and a fortune, for the asking; and had acted most generously, and most delicately towards her. He was what he seemed, that she was sure—not gilded but gold.

Then how account for this phenomenon, of a Christian being all that was good, virtuous, amiable?

One solution never occurred to Fabiola's mind, that he was all this because he was a Christian. She only saw the problem in another form; how could he be all that he was, in spite of being a Christian?

She turned it variously in her mind, in vain. Then it came to her thought thus. Perhaps, after all, good old Chromatius was right, and Christianity may not be what I have fancied; and I ought to have inquired more about it. I am sure Sebastian never did the horrible things imputed to Christians. Yet every body charges them with them.

Might there not be a more refined form of this religion, and a more grovelling one; just as she knew there was in her own sect, Epicureanism? one coarse, material, wallowing in the very mire of sensualism; the other refined, sceptical, and reflective. Sebastian would belong to the higher class, and despise and loathe the superstitious and vices of the commoner Christians. Such a hypothesis might be tenable; but it was hard to reconcile to her intellect, how a man like that noble soldier could, any way, have belonged to that hated race. And yet he was ready to die for their faith! As to Zöe and the others, she had heard nothing; for she had only returned the day before from a journey made into Campania, to arrange her father's affairs.

"What a pity, she thought, that she had not talked more to Sebastian on such subjects! But it was now too late; to-morrow morning he would be no more. This second thought came with the sharp pang of a shaft shot into her heart. She felt as if she personally were about to suffer a loss, as if Sebastian's fate were going to fall on some one closely bound to her; by some secret and mysterious tie.

Her thoughts grew darker and sadder, as she dwelt on these ideas, amidst the deepening gloom. She was suddenly disturbed by the entrance of a slave with a light. It was Afra, the black servant, who came to prepare her mistress's evening repast, which she wished to take alone. While busy with her arrangements, she said, "Have you heard the news, madam?"

"What news?"

"Only that Sebastian is going to be shot with arrows to-morrow morning. What a pity; he was such a handsome youth."

"Be silent, Afra; unless you have some information to give me on the subject."

"Oh, of course, my mistress; and my information is indeed very astonishing. Do you know that he turns out to be one of those wretched Christians?"

"Hold your peace, I pray you; and do not prate any more about what you do not understand."

"Certainly not, if you so wish it; I suppose his fate is quite a matter of indifference to you, madam. It certainly is to me. He won't be the first officer that my countrymen have shot. Many they have killed, and some they have saved. But of course that was all chance."

There was a significance in her words and tones, which did not escape the quick ear and mind of Fabiola. She looked up, for the first time, and fixed her eyes searchingly on her maid's swarthy face. There was no emotion in it; she was placing a flagon of wine upon the table, just as if she had not spoken. At length the lady said to her:

"Afra, what do you mean?"

"Oh, nothing, nothing. What can a poor slave know? Still more, what can she do?"

"Come, come, you meant, by your words, something that I must know."

The slave came round the table, close to the couch on which Fabiola rested, looked behind her, and around her, then whispered, "Do you want Sebastian's life saved?"

Fabiola almost leaped up, as she replied, "Certainly."

The servant put her finger to her lip, to enforce silence, and said, "It will cost dear."

"Name your price."

"A hundred sestertia,* and my liberty."

"I accept your terms; but what is my security for them?"

"They shall be binding only, if twenty-four hours after the execution, he is still alive."

"Agreed; and what is yours?"

"Your word, lady."

"Go, Afra, lose not a moment."

"There is no hurry," quietly replied the slave, as she completed, unflurried, the preparations for supper.

She then proceeded at once to the palace, and to the Mauritanian quarters, and went in directly to the commander.

* About $4000.

"What dost thou want, Jubula," he said, "at this hour? There is no festival to-night."

"I know, Hyphax; but I have important business with thee."

"What is it about?"

"About thee, about myself, and about thy prisoner."

"Look at him there," said the barbarian, pointing across the court, which his door commanded. You would not think that he is going to be shot to-morrow. See how soundly he sleeps. He could not do so better, if he were going to be married instead."

"As thou and I, Hyphax, intend to be the next day."

"Come, not quite so fast; there are certain conditions to be fulfilled first."

"Well, what are they?"

"First, thy manumission. I cannot marry a slave."

"That is secured."

"Secondly, a dowry, a good dowry, mind; for I never wanted money more than now."

"That is safe too. How much dost thou expect?"

"Certainly not less than three hundred pounds."*

"I bring thee six hundred."

"Excellent! where didst thou get all this cash? Whom hast thou robbed? whom hast thou poisoned, my admirable priestess? Why wait till after to-morrow? Let it be to-morrow, to-night, if it please thee."

"Be quiet now, Hyphax; the money is all lawful gain; but it has its conditions, too. I said I came to speak about the prisoner also."

"Well, what has he to do with our approaching nuptials?"

"A great deal."

"What now?"

"He must not die."

The captain looked at her with a mixture of fury and stupidity. He seemed on the point of laying violent hands on her; but she stood intrepid and unmoved before him, and seemed to command him by the strong fascination of her eye, as one of the serpents of their native land might do a vulture.

"Art mad?" he at last exclaimed; "thou mightest as well at once ask for my head. If thou hadst seen the emperor's face when he issued his orders, thou wouldst have known he will have no trifling with him here."

"Pshaw! pshaw! man; of course the prisoner will appear dead, and will be reported as dead."

"And if he finally recover?"

"His fellow-Christians will take care to keep him out of the way."

"Didst thou say twenty-four hours alive? I wish thou hadst made it twelve."

"Well, but I know that thou canst calculate close. Let him die in the twenty-fifth hour, for what I care."

"It is impossible, Jubala, impossible; he is too important a person."

"Very well, then; there is an end to our bargain. The money is given only on this condition. Six hundred pounds thrown away!" And she turned off to go.

"Stay, stay!" said Hyphax, eagerly; the demon of covetousness coming uppermost. "Let us see. Why, my fellows will consume half the money, in bribes and feasting."

"Well, I have two hundred more in reserve for that."

"Sayest thou so, my princess, my sorceeress, my charming demon? But that will be too much for my scoundrels. We will give them half, and add the other half—to our marriage-settlements, shan't we?"

"As it pleases thee, provided the thing is done according to my proposal."

"It is a bargain, then. He shall live twenty-four hours; and after that, we will have a glorious wedding."

Sebastian, in the meantime, was unconscious of these amiable negotiations for his safety; for, like Peter between two guards, he was slumbering soundly by the wall of the court. Fatigued with his day's work, he had enjoyed the rare advantage of retiring early to rest; and the marble pavement was a good enough soldier's bed. But after a few hours' repose, he awoke refreshed; and now that all was hushed, he silently rose, and with outstretched arms, gave himself up to prayer.

The martyr's prayer is not a preparation for death; for his is a death that needs no preparation. The soldier who suddenly declares himself a Christian, bends down his head, and mingles his blood with that of the confessor, whom he had come to execute; or the friend, of unknown name, who salutes the martyr going to death, is seized, and made to bear him willing company,* is as prepared for martyrdom as he who has passed months in prison engaged in prayer. It is not a cry, therefore, for the forgiveness of past sin; for there is a consciousness of that perfect love, which sendeth out fear, an inward assurance of that highest grace, which is incompatible with sin.

Nor in Sebastian was it a prayer for courage or strength; for the opposite feeling, which could suggest it, was unknown to him. It never entered into his mind to doubt, that as he had faced death intrepidly for his earthly sovereign on the battle-field, so he should meet it joyfully for his heavenly Lord, in any place.

His prayer, then, till morning, was a gladsome hymn of glory and honor to the King of kings, a joining with the seraph's glowing eyes, and ever-shaking wings, in restless homage.

Then when the stars in the bright heavens caught his eyes, he challenged them as wakeful sentinels like himself, to exchange the watchword of Divine praises; and as the night-wind rustled in the leafless trees of the neighboring court of Adonis, he bade its wayward music compose itself, and its rude harping upon the vibrating boughs form softer hymns,—the only ones that earth could utter in its winter night-hours.

Now burst on him the thrilling thought that the morning hour approached, for the cock had crowed; and he would soon hear those branches murmuring over to him the sharp whistle of flying arrows, unerring in their aim. And he offered himself gladly to their sharp tongues, hissing as the serpent's to drink his blood. He offered himself as an oblation for God's honor, and for the appeasing of His wrath. He offered himself particularly for the afflicted Church, and prayed that his death might mitigate her sufferings.

And then his thoughts rose higher, from the earthly to the celestial Church; soaring like the eagle from the highest pinnacle of the mountain-peak, towards the sun. Clouds have rolled away, and the blue embroidered veil of morning is rent in twain, like the sanctuary's, and he sees quite into its revealed depths; far, far inwards, beyond senates of saints and legions of angels, to what Stephen saw of inmost and intensest glory. And now his hymn was silent; harmonies came to him, too sweet and perfect to brook the jarring of a terrestrial voice; they came to him requiring no return; for they brought heaven into his soul; and what could he give back? It was as a fountain of purest refreshment, more like gushing light than water, flowing from the foot of the Lamb, and poured into his heart, which could only be passive, and receive the gift. Yet in its sparkling bounds, as it rippled along towards him, he could see the countenance now of one, and then of another of the happy friends who had gone before him; as if they were drinking, and bathing, and disporting, and plunging, and dissolving themselves in those living waters.

His countenance was glowing as with the very reflection of the vision, and the morning dawn just brightening (oh, what a dawn that is!), caught his face as he stood up, with his arms in a cross, opposite the east; so that when Hyphax opened his door and saw him, he could have crept across the court and worshipped him on his face.

Sebastian awoke as from a trance; and the chink of sesterces sounded in the mental ears of Hyphax; so he set scientifically about earning them. He picked out of his troop of a hundred, five marksmen, who could split a flying arrow with a fletcher one, called them into his room, told them their reward, concealing his own share, and arranged how the execution was to be managed. As to the body, Christians had already secretly offered a large additional sum for its delivery, and two slaves were to wait outside to receive it. Among his own followers he could fully depend on secrecy.

* The Cardinal gave the equivalents in English money, as more intelligible.

* Called thence St. Adanctus.

Sebastian was conducted into the neighbouring court of the palace, which separated the quarters of these African arches from his own dwelling. It was planted with rows of trees, and consecrated to Adonis. He walked cheerfully in the midst of his executioners, followed by the whole band, who were alone allowed to be spectators, as they would have been of an ordinary exhibition of good archery. The officer was stripped and bound to a tree, while the chosen five took their stand opposite, cool and collected. It was at best a desolate sort of death. Not a friend, not a sympathiser near; not one fellow-Christian to bear his farewell to the faithful, or to record for them his last accents, and the constancy of his end. To stand in the middle of the crowded amphitheatre, with a hundred thousand witnesses of Christian constancy, to see the encouraging looks of many, and hear the whispered blessings of a few loving acquaintances, had something cheering, and almost inspiring in it; it lent at least the feeble aid of human emotions, to the more powerful sustainment of grace. The very shout of an insulting multitude put a strain upon natural courage, as the hunter's cry only nerves the stag at bay. But this dead and silent scene, at dawn of day, shut up in a court of a house; this being, with most unfeeling indifference tied up, like a truss of hay, or a stuffed figure, to be coolly aimed at, according to the tyrant's orders; this being alone in the midst of a horde of swarthy savages, whose very language was strange, uncouth, and unintelligible; but who were no doubt uttering their rude jokes and laughing, as men do before a match or a game, which they are going to enjoy; all this had more the appearance of a piece of cruelty, about to be acted in a gloomy forest by banditti, than open and glorious confession of Christ's name: it looked and felt more like assassination than martyrdom.

But Sebastian cared not for all this. Angels looked over the wall upon him; and the rising sun, which dazzled his eyes, but made him a clearer mark for his bowmen, shone not more brightly on him, than did the countenance of the only Witness he cared to have of suffering endured for His sake.

The first Moor drew his bow-string to his ear, and an arrow trembled in the flesh of Sebastian. Each chosen marksman followed in turn; and shouts of applause accompanied each hit, so cleverly approaching, yet avoiding, according to the imperial order, every vital part. And so the game went on; everybody laughing and brawling, and jeering, and enjoying it, without a particle of feeling for the now drooping frame, painted with blood: * all in sport, except the martyr, to whom all was sober earnest—each sharp pang, the enduring smart, the exhaustion, the weariness, the knotty bonds, the constrained attitude! Oh! but earnest too was the steadfast heart, the unfiring spirit, the unwavering faith, the unruffled patience, the unsated love of suffering for his Lord. Earnest was the prayer, earnest the gaze of the eye on heaven, earnest the listening of the ear for the welcoming strain of the heavenly porters, as they should open the gate.

It was indeed, a dreary death; yet this was not the worst. After all, death came not; the golden gates remained unbarred; the martyr in heart, still reserved for greater glory even upon earth, found himself, not suddenly translated from death to life, but sunk into unconsciousness in the lap of angels. His tormentors saw when they had reached their intended measure; they cut the cords that bound him; and Sebastian fell exhausted, and to all appearance dead, upon the carpet of blood which he had spread for himself on the pavement. Did he lie, like a noble warrior, as he now appears in marble under his altar, in his own dear church? We at least cannot imagine him as more beautiful. And not only that church do we love, but that ancient chapel which stands in the midst of the ruined Palatine, to mark the spot on which he fell.†

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE REVIVAL.

NIGHT was far advanced, when the black slave, having completed her marriage settlement, quite to her own satisfaction, was returning to her mistress's house. It was, indeed, a cold wintry night, so she was well wrapped up, and in no humor to be disturbed. But it was a lovely night, and the moon seemed to be stroking, with a silvery hand, the downy robe of the Meta Sudans.* She paused beside it; and, after a silence of some moments, broke out into a loud laugh, as if some ridiculous recollection connected itself in her mind with that beautiful object. She was turning round to proceed on her way, when she felt herself roughly seized by the arm.

"If you had not laughed," said her captor, bitterly, "I should not have recognized you. But that hyena laugh of yours is unmistakable. Listen, the wild beasts, your African cousins, are answering it from the amphitheatre. What was it about, pray?"

"About you."

"How about me?"

"I was thinking of our last interview in this place, and what a fool you made of yourself."

"How kind of you, Afra, to be thinking of me, especially as I was not just then thinking of you, but of your countrymen in those cells."

"Cease your impertinence, and call people by their proper names. I am not Afra the slave any longer, at least I shall not be so in a few hours; but Jubala, the wife of Hyphax, commander of the Mauritanian archers."

"A very respectable man, no doubt, if he could speak any language besides his gibberish; but these few hours of interval may suffice for the transaction of our business. You made a mistake, methinks, in what you said just now. It was you, was it not, that made a fool of me at our last meeting? What has become of your fair promises, and of my fairer gold, which were exchanged on that occasion? Mine, I know, proved sterling; yours, I fear, turned out but dust."

"No doubt; for so says a proverb in my language: 'the dust on the wise man's skirts is better than the gold in the fool's girdle.' But let us come to the point: did you really ever believe in the power of my charms and philtres?"

"To be sure I did; do you mean they were all imposture?"

"Not quite all; you see we have got rid of Fabius, and the daughter is in possession of the fortune. That was a preliminary step of absolute necessity."

"What! do you mean that your incantations removed the father?" asked Corvinus amazed, and shrinking from her. It was only a sudden bright thought of Afra's, so she pushed her advantage, saying:

"To be sure; what else? It is easy thus to get rid of any one that is too much in the way."

"Good night, good night," he replied, in great fear.

"Stay a moment," she added, somewhat propitiated: "Corvinus, I gave you two pieces of advice worth all your gold that night. One you have acted against; the other you have not followed."

"How?"

"Did I not tell you not to hunt the Christians, but to catch them in your toils? Fulvius has done the second, and has gained something. You have done the first, and what have you earned?"

"Nothing but rage, confusion and stripes."

"Then I was a good counsellor in the one advice; follow me in the second."

"What was it?"

"When you had become rich enough by Christian spoil, to offer yourself, with your wealth, to Fabiola. She has till now coldly rejected every offer; but I have observed one thing carefully. Not a single suit has been accompanied by riches.

* "Membraque picta cruento novo." Prud. nepoteseq. lib. 29.

† The reader, when visiting the Crystal Palace, London, will find in the Roman Court an excellent model of the Roman Forum. On the raised mound of the wall he will see the chapel to which we allude. It has been lately re-

* The fountain before described.

Every spendthrift has sought her fortune to repair his own; depend upon it, he that wins the prize must come on the principle that two and two make four. Do you understand me?"

"Too well, for where are my two to come from?"

"Listen to me, Corvinus, for this is our last interview; and I rather like you as a hearty, unscrupulous, relentless, and unfeeling good hater." She drew him nearer and whispered: "I know from Eurotas, out of whom I can wheedle anything, that Fulvius has some splendid Christian prizes in view, one especially. Come this way into the shadow, and I will tell you how surely you may intercept his treasure. Leave to him the cool murder that will be necessary, for it may be troublesome; but step in between him and the spoil. He would do it to you any day."

She spoke to him for some minutes in a low and earnest tone; and at the end, he broke out into the loud exclamation, "Excellent!" What a word in such a mouth!

She checked him by a pull, and pointing to the building opposite, exclaimed: "Hush! look there!"

How are the tables turned; or, rather, how has the world gone round in a brief space! The last time these two wicked beings were on the same spot, plotting bane to others, the window above was occupied by two virtuous youths, who, like two spirits of good, were intent on unravelling their web of mischief, and countermining their dark approaches. They are gone thence, the one sleeping in his tomb, the other slumbering on the eve of execution. Death looks to us like a holy power, seeing how much he prefers taking to his society the good, rather than the evil. He snatches away the flower, and leaves the weed its poisonous life, till it drops into mature decay.

But at the moment that they looked up, the window was occupied by two other persons.

"That is Fulvius," said Corvinus, "who just came to the window."

"And the other is his evil demon, Eurotas," added the slave. They both watched and listened from their dark nook.

Fulvius came again, at that moment, to the window with a sword in his hand, carefully turning and examining the hilt in the bright moonlight. He flung it down at last, exclaiming, with an oath, "It is only brass, after all!"

Eurotas came with, to all appearance, a rich officer's belt, and examined it carefully. "All false stones! Why I declare the whole of the effects are not worth fifty pounds. You have made but a poor job of this, Fulvius."

"Always reproaching me, Eurotas. And yet this miserable gain has cost me the life of one of the emperor's most favorite officers."

"And no thanks probably from your master for it." Eurotas was right.

Next morning, the slaves who received the body of Sebastian were surprised, by a swarthy female figure passing by them, and whispering to them, "He is still alive."

Instead, therefore, of carrying him out for burial, they bore him to the apartment of Irene. The early hour of the morning, and the emperor's having gone, the evening before, to his favorite Lateran palace, facilitated this movement. Instantly Dionysius was sent for, and pronounced every wound curable; not one arrow having touched a vital organ. But loss of blood had taken place to such a fearful extent, that he considered weeks must elapse before the patient would be fit to move.

For four-and-twenty hours Afra assiduously called almost every hour, to ask how Sebastian was. When the probationary term was finished, she conducted Fabiola to Irene's apartment, to receive herself assurance that he breathed, though scarcely more. The deed of her liberation from servitude was executed, her dowry was paid, and the whole Palatine and Forum rung with the mad carouse and hideous rites of her nuptials.

Fabiola inquired after Sebastian with such tender solicitude, that Irene doubted not that she was a Christian. The first few times she contented herself with receiving intelligence at the door, and putting into the hands of Sebastian's hostess a large sum towards the expenses of his recovery; but after two days, when he was improving, she was courteously invited to enter; and for the first time in her life, she found herself consciously in the bosom of a Christian family.

Irene, we are told, was the widow of Castulas, one of the Chromatian band of converts. Her husband had just suffered death; but she remained still, unnoticed, in the apartments held by him in the palace. Two daughters lived with her; and a marked difference in their behavior soon struck Fabiola, as she became familiar with them. One evidently thought Sebastian's presence an intrusion, and seldom or never approached him. Her behavior to her mother was rude and haughty, her ideas all belonged to the common world,—she was selfish, light, and forward. The other, who was the younger, was a perfect contrast to her,—so gentle, docile, and affectionate; so considerate about others, so devoted to her mother; so kind and attentive to the poor patient. Irene herself was a type of the Christian matron, in the middle class of life. Fabiola did not find her intelligent or learned, or witty, or highly polished; but she saw her always calm, active, sensible, and honest. Then she was clearly warm-hearted, generous, deeply affectionate, and sweetly patient. The pagan lady had never seen such a household,—so simple, frugal, and orderly. Nothing disturbed it, except the character of the elder sister. In a few days it was ascertained that the daily visitor was not a Christian; but this caused no change in their treatment of her. Then she in turn made a discovery, which mortified her—that the elder daughter was still a heathen. All that she saw made a favorable impression on her, and softened the hard crust of prejudice on her mind. For the present, however, her thoughts were all absorbed in Sebastian, whose recovery was slow. She formed plans with Irene for carrying him off to her Campanian villa, where she would have leisure to confer with him on religion. An insuperable obstacle, however, rose to this project.

We will not attempt to lead our reader into the feelings of Sebastian. To have yearned after martyrdom, to have prayed for it, to have suffered all its pangs, to have died in it as far as human consciousness went, to have lost sight of this world, and now to awaken in it again, no martyr, but an ordinary wayfaring man on probation, who might yet lose salvation,—was surely a greater trial than martyrdom itself. It was to be like a man who, in the midst of a stormy night, should try to cross an angry river, or tempestuous arm of the sea, and, after struggling for hours, and having his skiff twirled round and round and all but upset, should find himself relanded on the same side as he started from. Or, it was like St. Paul sent back to earth and to Satan's buffets, after having heard the mysterious words which only one Intelligence can utter. Yet no murmur escaped him, no regret. He adored in silence the Divine Will, hoping that its purpose was only to give him the merit of a double martyrdom. For this second crown he so earnestly longed, that he rejected every proposal for flight and concealment.

"I have now," he generously said, "earned one privilege of a martyr, that of speaking boldly to the persecutors. This I will use the first day that I can leave my bed. Nurse, me, therefore, well, that it may be the sooner."

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE SECOND CROWN.

THE memorable plot which the black slave betrayed to Corvinus, was one to which allusion has already been made, in the conversation between Fulvius and his guardian. He was convinced from the blind martyr's unsuspecting admissions, that Agnes was a Christian, and he believed he had now two strings to his bow; either he could terrify her into marriage with himself, or he could destroy her, and obtain a good share of her wealth, by confiscation. He was nerved for this second alternative by the taunts and exhortations of Eurotas; but, despairing of obtaining another interview, he wrote her a respectful, but pressing letter, descriptive of his disinterested attachment to her, and entreating her to accept his suit. There was but the faintest hint at the end, that duty might compel him to take another course, if humble petition did not prevail.

To this application he received a calm, well-bred, but unmistakable refusal; a stern, final, and hopeless rejection. But more, the letter stated in clear terms, that the writer was already espoused to the spotless Lamb, and could admit from no perishable being expressions of personal attachment. This rebuff steeled his heart against pity; but he determined to act prudently.

In the meantime, Fabiola, seeing the determination of Sebastian not to fly, conceived the romantic idea of saving him, in spite of himself, by extorting his pardon from the emperor. She did not know the depths of wickedness in man's heart. She thought that the tyrant might fume for a moment, but that he would never condemn a man twice to death. Some pity and mercy, she thought, must linger in his breast; and her earnest pleading and tears would extract them, as heat does the hidden balsam from the hard wood. She accordingly sent a petition for an audience; and knowing the covetousness of the man, presumed, as she said, to offer him a slight token of her own and her late father's loyal attachment. This was a ring with jewels of rare beauty, and immense value. The present was accepted; but she was merely told to attend with her memorial at the Palatine on the 20th, in common with other petitioners, and wait for the emperor's descent by the great staircase, on his way to sacrifice. Unencouraging as was this answer, she resolved to risk any thing, and do her best.

The appointed day came; and Fabiola, in her mourning habits, worn both as a suppliant, and for her father's death, took her stand in a row of far more wretched creatures than herself, mothers, children, sisters, who held petitions for mercy, for those dearest to them, now in dungeons or mines. She felt the little hope she had entertained die within her at the sight of so much wretchedness, too much for it all to expect favor. But fainter grew its last spark, at every step that the tyrant took down the marble stairs, though she saw her brilliant ring sparkling on his coarse haud. For on each step he snatched a paper from some sorrowful suppliant, looked at it scornfully, and either tore it up, or dashed it on the ground. Only here and there, he handed one to his secretary, a man scarcely less imperious than himself.

It was now nearly Fabiola's turn; the emperor was only two steps above her, and her heart beat violently, not from fear of man, but from anxiety about Sebastian's fate. She would have prayed, had she known how, or to whom. Maximian was stretching out his hand to take a paper offered to him, when he drew back, and turned round, on hearing his name most unceremoniously and peremptorily called out. Fabiola looked up too; for she knew the voice.

Opposite to her, high in the white marble wall, she had observed an open window, corniced in yellow marble, which gave light to a back corridor leading to where Irene's apartments were. She now looked up, guided by the voice, and in the dark panel of the window, a beautiful, but awful picture was seen. It was Sebastian, wan and thin, who, with features almost etherealized, calm and stern, as if no longer capable of passion, or strong emotion, stood there before them; his lacerated breast and arms appearing amidst the loose drapery he had thrown around him. For he had heard the familiar trumpet-notes, which told him of the emperor's approach, and he had risen, and crept thus far, to greet him.*

"Maximian!" he cried out, in a hollow but distinct voice,

"Who art thou, sirrah! that makest so free with thine emperor's name?" asked the tyrant, turning upon him.

"I am come as from the dead, to warn thee that the day of wrath and vengeance is fast approaching. Thou hast spilt the blood of God's Saints upon the pavement of this city; thou hast cast their holy bodies into the river, or flung them away upon the dunghills at the gates. Thou hast pulled down God's temples, and profaned His altars, and rifled the inheritance of His poor. For these, and thine own foul crimes and lewdnesses, thine injustices and oppressions, thy covetousness and thy pride, God hath judged thee, and His wrath shall soon overtake thee; and thou shalt die the death of the violent; and God will give His Church an emperor after His own heart. And thy memory shall be accursed through this whole world, till the end of time. Repeat thee, while thou hast time, impious man; and ask forgiveness of God, in the name of Him, the Crucified, whom thou hast persecuted till now."

Deep silence was held while these words were fully uttered. The emperor seemed under the influence of a paralyzing awe; for soon recognizing Sebastian, he felt as if standing in the presence of the dead. But quickly recovering himself and his passion, he exclaimed: "Ho! some of you, go round instantly and bring him before me!" (he did not like to pronounce his name). "Hyphax here! Where is Hyphax? I saw him just now."

But the Moor had at once recognized Sebastian, and run off to his quarters. "Ha! he is gone, I see; then here, you dolt, what's your name?" (addressing Corvinus, who was attending his father,) "go to the Numidian court, and summon Hyphax here directly."

With a heavy heart Corvinus went on his errand. Hyphax had told his tale, and put his men in order of defence. Only one entrance at the end of the court was left open; and when the messenger had reached it, he durst not advance. Fifty men stood along each side of the space, with Hyphax and Jubala on the opposite end. Silent and immovable, with their dark chests and arms bare, each with his arrow fixed, and pointed to the door, and the string ready drawn, they looked like an avenue of basalt statues, leading to an Egyptian temple.

"Hyphax," said Corvinus, in a tremulous voice, "the emperor sends for you."

"Tell his majesty, respectfully, from me," replied the African, "that my men have sworn, that no man passes that threshold, coming in, or going out, without receiving, through his breast or his back, a hundred shafts into his heart; until the emperor shall have sent us a token of forgiveness for every offence."

Corvinus hastened back with this message, and the emperor received it with a laugh. They were men with whom he could not afford to quarrel; for he relied on them in battle, or insurrection, for picking out the leaders. "The cunning rascals!" he exclaimed. "There, take that trinket to Hyphax's black spouse." And he gave him Fabiola's splendid ring. He hastened back, delivered his gracious embassy, and threw the ring across. In an instant every bow dropt, and every string relaxed. Jubala, delighted, sprang forward and caught the ring. A heavy blow from her husband's fist felled her to the ground, and was greeted with a shout of applause. The savage seized the jewel; and the woman rose, to fear that she had only exchanged one slavery for a worse.

Hyphax screened himself behind the imperial command. "If," he said, "you had allowed us to send an arrow through his head or heart, all would have been straight. As it was, we are not responsible."

"At any rate, I will myself see my work done properly this time," said Maximian. Two of you fellows with clubs come here."

Two of his attendant executioners came from behind; Sebastian, scarcely able to stand, was also there; mild and intrepid. "Now, my men," said the barbarian, "I must not have any blood spilt on these stairs; so you knock the life out of him with your cudgels; make clean work of it. Madam, what is your petition?"—stretching out his hand to Fabiola, whom he recognized, and so addressed more respectfully. She was horrified and disgusted, and almost fainting at the sight before her; so she said, "Sire I fear it is too late!"

"Why too late!" looking at the paper. A flash came to his eye, as he said to her: "What! You knew that Sebastian was alive? Are you a Christian?"

"No, sire," she replied. Why did the denial almost dry up in her throat? She could not for her life have said she was anything else. Ah! Fabiola, thy day is not far off.

* See the Acts of St. Sebastian.

"But, as you said just now," replied the emperor, more serene, returning her petition, "I fear it is too late; I think that blow must have been the ictus graciosus!"*

"I feel faint, sire," said she, respectfully; may I retire?"

"By all means. But, by the bye, I have to thank you for the beautiful ring which you sent, and which I have given to Hyphax's wife," (lately her own slave!). "It will look more brilliant on a black hand, than ever on mine. Adieu! and he kissed his hand with a wicked smile, as if there were no martyr's body near to witness against him. He was right; a heavy blow on the head had proved fatal; and Sebastian was safe where he had so longed to be. He bore with him a double palm, and received a twofold crown. Yet still, an ignominious end before the world; beaten to death without ceremony, while the emperor conversed. How much of martyrdom is in its disgrace! Woe to us when we know that our sufferings earn us honor!

The tyrant, seeing his work completed, ordered that Sebastian at least should not be cast into the Tiber nor on a dunghill. "Put plenty of weights to his body," he added, "and throw it into the Cloaca,* to rot there, and be the food of the vermin. The Christians at least shall not have it." This was done; and the Saint's Acts inform us, that in the night he appeared to the holy matron Lucina, and directed her where to find his sacred remains. She obeyed his summons, and they were buried with honor where now stands his basilica.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE CRITICAL DAY: ITS FIRST PART.

There are critical days in the life of man and of mankind. Not merely the days of Marathon, of Cannæ, or of Lepanto, in which a different result might have influenced the social or political fate of mankind. But it is probable that Columbus could look back upon not only the day, but the precise hour, the decision of which secured to the world all that he taught and gave it, and to himself the singular place which he holds among its worthies. And each of us, little and insignificant as he may be, has had his critical day; his day of choice, which has decided his fate through life; his day of Providence, which altered his position or his relation to others; his day of grace, when the spiritual conquered the material. In whatever way it has been every soul, like Jerusalem, has had its day.

And so with Fabiola, has not all been working up towards a crisis? Emperor and slave, father and guest, the good and the wicked, Christian and heathen, rich and poor; then life and death, joy and sorrow, learning and simplicity, silence and conversation, have they not all come as agents, pulling at her mind in opposite ways, yet all directing her noble and generous, though haughty and impetuous, soul one way, as the breeze and the rudder struggle against one another, only to determine the ship's single path? By what shall the resolution of these contending forces be determined? That rests not with man; wisdom, not philosophy, can decide. We have been engaged with events commemorated on the 20th of January; let the reader look, and see what comes on the following day in his calendar, and he will agree it must be an important day in our little narrative.

From the audience, Fabiola retired to the apartments of Irene, where she found nothing but desolation and sorrow. She sympathized fully with the grief around her, but she saw and felt that there was a difference between her affliction and theirs. There was a buoyancy about them: there was almost an exultation breaking out through their distress; their clouds were sunlit and brightened at times. Hers was a dead and sullen, a dull and heavy gloom, as if she had sustained a hopeless loss. Her search after Christianity, as associated with anything amiable or intelligent, seemed at an end. Her desired teacher, or informant, was gone. When the crowd had moved away from the palace, she took affectionate leave of the widow and her daughters; but, some way or other, she could not like the heathen one as she loved her sister.

She sat alone at home, and tried to read; she took up volume after volume of favorite works on Death, on Fortune, on Friendship, on Virtue; and every one of them seemed insipid, unsound, and insincere. She plunged into a deeper and a deeper melancholy, which lasted till towards evening, when she was disturbed by a letter being put into her hand. The Greek slave, Graja, who brought it in, retired to the other end of the room, alarmed and perplexed by what she had witnessed. For her mistress had scarcely glanced over the note, than she leapt up wildly from her seat, threw her hair into disorder with her hands, which she pressed, as in agony, on her temples, stood thus for a moment, looking up with an unnatural stare in her eyes, and then sank heavily down again on her chair with a deep groan. Thus she remained for some minutes, holding the letter in both her hands, with her arms relaxed, apparently unconscious.

"Who brought this letter?" she then asked, quite collected.

"A soldier, madam," answered the maid.

"Ask him to come here."

While her errand was being delivered, she composed herself, and gathered up her hair. As soon as the soldier appeared she held this brief dialogue:

"Whence do you come?"

"I am on guard at the Tullian prison."

"Who gave you the letter?"

"The Lady Agnes herself."

"On what cause is the poor child there?"

"On the accusation of a man named Fulvius, for being a Christian."

"For nothing else?"

"For nothing, I am sure."

"Then we shall soon set that matter right. I can give witness to the contrary. Tell her I will come presently; and take this for your trouble."

The soldier retired, and Fabiola was left alone. When there was something to do, her mind was at once energetic and concentrated, though afterwards the tenderness of womanhood might display itself the more painfully. She wrapped herself close up, proceeded alone to the prison, and was at once conducted to the separate cell, which Agnes had obtained, in consideration of her rank, backed by her parents' handsome largitions.

"What is the meaning of this, Agnes?" eagerly inquired Fabiola, after a warm embrace.

"I was arrested a few hours ago, and brought hither."

"And is Fulvius fool enough, as well as scoundrel, to trump up an accusation against you, which five minutes will confute? I will go to Tertullus myself, and contradict his absurd charge."

"What charge, dearest?"

"Why, that you are a Christian."

"And so I am, thank God!" replied Agnes, making on herself the sign of the cross.

The announcement did not strike Fabiola like a thunderbolt, nor rouse her, nor stagger her, nor perplex her. Sebastian's death had taken all edge or heaviness from it. She had found that faith existing in what she had considered the type of every manly virtue; she was not surprised to find it in her, whom she had loved as the very model of womanly perfection. The simple grandeur of that child's excellence, her guileless innocence, and unexcepting kindness, she had almost worshipped. It made Fabiola's difficulties less, it brought her problem nearer to a solution, to find two such peerless beings to be not mere chance-grown plants, but springing from the same seed. She bowed her head in reverence for the child, and asked her, "How long have you been so?"

"All my life, dear Fabiola; I sucked the faith, as we say, with my mother's milk."

"And why did you conceal it from me?"

* The coup de grace, the blow by which culprits were "put out of their pain." Breaking the legs of the crucified was considered an ictus graciosus.

* The great sewer of Rome.

"Because I saw your violent prejudices against us; how you abhorred us as practisers of the most ridiculous superstitions, as perpetrators of the most odious abominations. I perceived how you contemned us as unintellectual, uneducated, unphilosophical, and unreasonable. You would not bear a word about us; and the only object of hatred to your generous mind was the Christian name."

"True, dearest Agnes; yet I think that had I known that you, or Sebastian, was a Christian, I could not have hated it. I could have loved any thing in you."

"You think so, now, Fabiola; but you know not the force of universal prejudice, the weight of falsehood daily repeated. How many noble minds, fine intellects, and loving hearts have they enslaved, and induced to believe all that we are not, something even worse than the worst of others!"

"Well, Agnes, it is selfish in me to argue thus with you in your present position. You will of course compel Fulvius to prove that you are a Christian."

"Oh, no! dear Fabiola; I have already confessed it, and intend to do so again publicly in the morning."

"In the morning!—what, to-morrow?" asked Fabiola, shocked at the idea of anything so immediate.

"Yes, to-morrow. To prevent any clamor or disturbance about me (though I suspect few people will care much), I am to be interrogated early, and summary proceedings will be taken. Is not that good news, dear?" asked Agnes eagerly, seizing her cousin's hands. And then putting on one of her ecstatic looks, she exclaimed, "Behold, what I have long coveted, I already see; what I have hoped for, I hold safe; to Him alone I feel already associated in heaven, whom here on earth I have loved with all devotedness.* Oh! is He not beautiful, Fabiola; lovelier far than the angels who surround Him! How sweet His smile! how mild His eye! how bland the whole expression of His face! And that sweetest and most gracious Lady, who ever accompanies Him, our Queen and Mistress, who loves Him alone, how winningly doth she beckon me forward to join her train! I come! I come!—They are departed, Fabiola; but they return early for me to-morrow; early, mind, and we part no more."

Fabiola felt her own heart swell and heave, as if a new element were entering in. She knew not what it was, but it seemed something better than a mere human emotion. She had not heard the name of Grace. Agnes, however, saw the favorable change in her spirit, and inwardly thanked God for it. She begged her cousin to return before dawn to her, for their final farewell.

At this same time a consultation was being held at the house of the prefect, between that worthy functionary and his worthier son. The reader had better listen to it, to learn its purport.

"Certainly," said the magistrate, "if the old sorceress was right in one thing, she ought to be in the other. I will answer from experience, how powerful is wealth in conquering any resistance."

"And you will allow, too," rejoined Corvinus, "from the enumeration we have made, that among the competitors for Fabiola's hand, there has not been one who could not justly be rather called an aspirant after her fortune."

"Yourself included, my dear Corvinus."

"Yes, so far; but not if I succeed in offering her, with myself the lady Agnes's great wealth."

"And in a manner too, methinks, that will more easily gain upon what I hear of her generous and lofty disposition. Giving her that wealth independent of conditions, and then offering yourself to her, will put her under one of two obligations, either to accept you as her husband, or throw you back the fortune."

"Admirable, father! I never saw the second alternative before. Do you think there is no possibility of securing it except through her?"

"None whatever. Fulvius, of course, will apply for his share; and the probability is, that the emperor will declare he intends to take it all for himself. For he hates Fulvius. But if I propose a more popular and palpably reasonable plan, of giving the property to the nearest relation, who worships—this Fabiola does, don't she?"

"Certainly, father."

"I think he will embrace it! while I am sure there is no chance of making a free gift to me. The proposal from a judge would enrage him."

"Then how will you manage it, father?"

"I will have an imperial rescript prepared during the night, ready for signature; and I will proceed immediately after the execution to the palace, magnify the unpopularity which is sure to follow it, lay it all on Fulvius, and show the emperor how his granting the property to the next in the settlement of it, will redound greatly to his credit and glory. He is as vain as he is cruel and rapacious; and one vice must be made to fight another."

"Nothing could be better, my dear father; I shall retire to rest with an easy mind. To-morrow will be the critical day of my life. All my future depends upon whether I am accepted or rejected."

"I only wish," added Tertullus, rising, "that I could have seen this peerless lady, and sounded the depths of her philosophy, before your final bargain was struck."

"Fear not, father; she is well worthy of being your daughter-in-law. Yes, to-morrow is indeed the turning-point of my fortunes."

Even Corvinus can have his critical day. Why not Fabiola?

Whilst this domestic interview was going on, a conference was taking place between Fulvius and his amiable uncle. The latter, entering late, found his nephew sitting sullen and lone in the house, and thus accosted him.

"Well, Fulvius, is she secured?"

"She is, uncle, as fast as bars and walls can make her; but her spirit is free and independent as ever."

"Never mind that: sharp steel makes short work of spirit. Is her fate certain? and are its consequences sure?"

"Why, if nothing else happens, the first is safe; the second has still to encounter imperial caprice. But I own I feel pain and remorse at sacrificing so young a life, and for an insecure result."

"Come Fulvius," said the old man sternly, looking as cold as a grey rock in the morning mist; "no softness, I hope, in this matter. Do you remember what day is to-morrow?"

"Yes, the twelfth before the calends of February.*"

"The critical day always for you. It was on this day that to gain another's wealth, you committed——"

"Peace, peace!" interrupted Fulvius in agony. Why will you always remind me of every thing I most wish to forget?"

"Because of this: you wish to forget yourself, and this must not be. I must take you from every pretence to be guided by conscience, virtue, or even honor. It is folly to affect compassion for any one's life, who stands in the way of your fortune, after what you did to her."

Fulvius bit his lip in silent rage, and covered his crimson face with his hands. Eurotas roused him by saying: "Well then, to-morrow is another, and probably a final critical day for you. Let us calmly weigh its prospects. You will go to the emperor, and ask for your rightful share in the confiscated property. Suppose it is granted?"

"I will sell it as quick as possible, pay my debts, and retire to some country where my name has never been heard."

"Suppose your claims are rejected?"

"Impossible, impossible!" exclaimed Fulvius, racked by the very idea; it is my right, hardly earned. It cannot be denied me."

"Quietly, my young friend; let us discuss the matter coolly. Remember our proverb: 'From the stirrup to the saddle there has been many a fall.' Suppose only that your rights are refused you?"

* Ecce quod concupivi jam video, quod speravi jam teneo; ipsi sum juncta to smile upon in tears, what I have seen, what I have longed for, I have now to smile upon in tears, what I have seen, what I have longed for, I have now

"Then I am a ruined man. I have no other prospect before me, of retrieving my fortunes here. Still I must fly hence."

"Good: and what do you owe at Janus's arch?"*

"A good couple of hundred sestertia,† between principal and compound interest at fifty per cent, to that unconscionable Jew, Ephraim.

"On what security?"

"On my sure expectation of this lady's estates."

"And if you are disappointed, do you think he will let you fly?"

"Not if he knows it, most assuredly. But we must be prepared from this moment for any emergency; and that with the utmost secrecy."

"Leave that to me, Fulvius; you see how eventful the issue of to-morrow may be to you, or rather of to-day; for morning is approaching. Life or death to you hangs upon it; it is the great day of your existence. Courage then, or rather an inflexible determination, steel you to work out its destiny!"

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE SAME DAY: ITS SECOND PART.

THE day is not yet dawning, and nevertheless we speak of having reached its second part. How may this be! Gentle reader, have we not led you to its first vespers, divided as they are between Sebastian of yesterday, and Agnes of to-day? Have not the two sung them together, without jealousy, and with fraternal impartiality, the one from the heaven which he ascended in the morning, the other from the dungeon into which she descended in the evening? Glorious Church of Christ! great in the unclashing combination of thy unity, stretching from heaven to beneath the earth, wherever exists a prison-house of the just.

From his lodgings Fulvius went out into the night air, which was crisp and sharp, to cool his blood, and still his throbbing brows. He wandered about, almost without any purpose; but found himself imperceptibly drawing nearer and nearer to the Tullian prison. As he was literally without affection, what could be his attraction thither? It was a strangely compounded feeling, made up of as bitter ingredients as ever filled the prisoner's cup. There was gnawing remorse; there was baffled pride; there was goading avarice; there was humbling shame; there was a terrible sense of the approaching consummation of his villany. It was true, he had been rejected, scorned, baffled by a mere child, while her fortune was necessary for his rescue from beggary and death,—so at least he reasoned; yet he would still rather have her hand than her head. Her murder appeared revoltingly atrocious to him, unless absolutely inevitable. So he would give her another chance.

He was now at the prison-gate, of which he possessed the watchword. He pronounced it, entered; and, at his desire, was conducted to his victim's cell. She did not flutter, nor run into a corner, like a bird into whose cage the hawk has found entrance: calm and intrepid, she stood before him.

"Respect me here, Fulvius, at least," she gently said; "I have but few hours to live: let them be spent in peace."

"Madam," he replied, "I have come to lengthen them, if you please, to years; and, instead of peace, I offer happiness."

"Surely, sir, if I understand you, the time is past for this sad vanity. Thus to address one whom you have delivered over to death, is at best a mockery."

"It is not so, gentle lady; your fate is in your own hands; only your own obstinacy will give you over to death. I have come to renew, once more, my offer, and with it that of life. It is your last chance."

"Have I not before told you that I am a Christian; and that I would forfeit a thousand lives rather than betray my faith?"

"But now I ask you no longer to do this. The gates of the prison are yet open to me. Fly with me; and, in spite of the imperial decrees, you shall be a Christian, and yet live."

"Then have I not clearly told you that I am already espoused to my Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and that to Him alone I keep eternal faith?"

"Folly and madness! Persevere in it till to-morrow, and that may be awarded to you which you fear more than death, and which will drive this illusion for ever from your mind."

"I fear nothing for Christ. For know, that I have an angel ever guarding me, who will not suffer his Master's handmaid to suffer scorn.* But now, cease this unworthy importunity, and leave me the last privilege of the condemned—solitude."

Fulvius had been gradually losing patience, and could no longer restrain his passion. Rejected again, baffled once more by a child, this time with the sword hanging over her neck! A flame irrepressible broke out from the smouldering heat within him; and, in an instant, the venomous ingredients that we have described as mingled in his heart, were distilled into one black, solitary drop,—HATRED. With flashing look, and furious gesture, he broke forth:

"Wretched woman, I give thee one more opportunity of rescuing thyself from destruction. Which wilt thou have, life with me, or death?"

"Death even I will choose for her, rather than life with a monster like thee!" exclaimed a voice just within the door.

"She shall have it," he rejoined, clenching his fist, and darting a mad look at the new speaker; "and thou, too, if again thou darest to fling thy baneful shadow across my path."

Fabiola was alone for the last time with Agnes. She had been for some minutes unobserved watching the contest; between what would have appeared to her, had she been a Christian, an angel of light and a spirit of darkness; and truly Agnes looked like the first, if human creature ever did. In preparation for her coming festival of full espousals to the Lamb, when she should sign her contract of everlasting love, as he had done, in blood, she had thrown over the dark garments of her mourning, a white and spotless bridal robe. In the midst of that dark prison, lighted by a solitary lamp, she looked radiant and almost dazzling; while her tempter, wrapped up in his dark cloak, crouching down to rush out of the low door of the dungeon, looked like a black and vanquished demon, plunging into an abyss beneath.

Then Fabiola looked into her countenance, and thought she had never seen it half so sweet. No trace of anger, of fear, of flurry, or agitation, was there; no paleness, no flush, no alterations of hectic excitement and pallid depression. Her eyes beamed with more than the usual mild intelligence; her smile was as placid and cheerful as it ever was, when they discoursed together. Then there was a noble air about her, a greatness of look and manner, which Fabiola would have compared to that mien and stateliness, and that ambrosial atmosphere by which, in poetical mythology, a being of a higher sphere was recognized on earth.† It was not inspiration, for it was passionless; but it was such expression and manner, as her highest conceptions of virtue and intellect, combined in the soul, might be supposed to stamp upon the outward form. Hence her feelings passed beyond love into a higher range; they were more akin to reverence.

Agnes took one of her hands in each of her own, crossed them upon her own calm bosom, and looking into her face with a gaze of blindest earnestness, said:

"Fabiola, I have one dying request to make you. You have never refused me any; I am sure you will not this."

"Speak not thus to me, dearest Agnes; you must not request; you command me now."

"Then promise me, that you will immediately apply your mind to master the doctrines of Christianity. I know you will embrace them; and then you will no longer be to me what you are now."

"And what is that?"

* In or near the forum stood several arches dedicated to Janus, and called simply by his name, near where usurers or money-lenders kept their posts.

† $3,000.

* "Mocum enim habeo custodem corporis mei, Angelina Domini." The Breviary, † "Incessu patulit Dea."

“Dark, dark, dearest Fabiola. When I look upon you thus, I see in you a noble intellect, a generous disposition, an affectionate heart, a cultivated mind, a fine moral feeling, and a virtuous life. What can be desired more in woman? and yet over all these splendid gifts there hangs a cloud, to my eyes, of gloomy shadow, the shade of death. Drive it away, and all will be lightsome and bright.”

“I feel it, dear Agnes—I feel it. Standing before you, I seem to be as a black spot compared to your brightness. And how, embracing Christianity, shall I become light like you?”

“You must pass, Fabiola, through the torrent that sunders us” (Fabiola started, recollecting her dream). “Waters of refreshment shall flow over your body, and oil of gladness shall embalm your flesh; and the soul shall be washed clean as the driven snow, and the heart be softened as the babe’s. From that bath you will come forth a new creature, born again to a new and immortal life.”

“And shall I lose all that you have but just now prized in me?” asked Fabiola, somewhat downcast.

“As the gardener,” answered the martyr, “selects some hardy and robust, but unprofitable plant, and on it engrafs but a small shoot of one that is sweet and tender, and the flowers and fruits of this belong to the first, and yet deprive it of no grace, no grandeur, no strength that it had before, so will the new life you shall receive ennoble, elevate, and sanctify (you can scarcely understand this word), the valuable gifts of nature and education which you already possess. What a glorious being Christianity will make you, Fabiola!”

“What a new world you are leading me to, dear Agnes! Oh, that you were not leaving me outside of its very threshold!”

“Hark!” exclaimed Agnes, in an ecstasy of joy. “They come, they come! You hear the measured tramp of the soldiers in the gallery. They are the bridesmen coming to summon me. But I see on high the white-robed bridesmaids borne on the bright clouds of morning, and beckoning me forward. Yes, my lamp is trimmed, and I go forth to meet the Bridegroom. Farewell, Fabiola, weep not for me. Oh, that I could make you feel, as I do, the happiness of dying for Christ! And now I will speak a word to you which I never addressed to you before,—God bless you!” And she made the sign of the Cross on Fabiola’s forehead. An embrace, convulsive on Fabiola’s part, calm and tender on Agnes’s, was their last earthly greeting. The one hastened home, filled with a new and generous purpose; the other resigned herself to the shame stricken guard.

Over the first part of the martyr’s trials we cast a veil of silence, though ancient Fathers, and the Church in her offices dwell upon it, as doubling her crown.* Suffice it to say, that her angel protected her from harm;† and that the purity of her presence converted a den of infamy into a holy and lovely sanctuary.‡ It was still early in the morning when she stood again before the tribunal of the prefect, in the Roman Forum; unchanged and unscathed, without a blush upon her smiling countenance, or a pang of sorrow in her innocent heart. Only her unshorn hair, the symbol of virginity, which had been let loose, flowed down, in golden waves, upon her snow-white dress.§

It was a lovely morning. Many will remember it to have been a beautiful day on its anniversary, as they have walked out of the Nomentan Gate, now the Porta Pia, towards the church which bears our virgin-martyr’s name, to see blessed upon her altar the two lambs, from whose wool are made the palliums sent by the Pope to the archbishops of his communion. Already the almond-trees are hoary, not with frost, but with blossoms; the earth is being loosened round the vines, and spring seems latent in the swelling buds, which are watching for the signal from the southern breeze, to burst and expand.* The atmosphere, rising into a cloudless sky, has just that temperature that one loves, of a sun, already vigorous, not heating, but softening, the slightly frosty air. Such we have frequently experienced St. Agnes’s day, together with thousands, hastening to her shrine.

The judge was sitting in the open Forum, and a sufficient crowd formed a circle round the charmed space, which few save Christians, loved to enter. Among the spectators were two whose appearance attracted general attention; they stood opposite each other, at the ends of the semicircle formed by the multitude. One was a youth, enveloped in his toga, with a slouching hat over his eyes, so that his features could not be distinguished. The other was a lady of aristocratic mien, tall and erect, such as one does not expect to meet on such an occasion. Wrapped close about her, and so ample as to veil her from head to foot, like the beautiful ancient statue, known among artists by the name of Modesty,† she had a scarf or mantle of Indian workmanship, woven in richest pattern of crimson, purple, and gold, a garment truly imperial, and less suitable, than even female presence, to this place of doom and blood. A slave, or servant, of superior class attended her, carefully veiled also, like her mistress. The lady’s mind seemed intent on one only object, as she stood immovable, leaning with her elbow on a marble post.

“Why is she unfettered?” asked the prefect angrily.

“She does not need it: she walks so readily,” answered Catulus; “and she is so young.”

“But she is obstinate as the oldest. Put manacles on her at once.”

The executioner turned over a quantity of such prison ornaments—to Christian eyes really such—and at length selected a pair as light and small as he could find, and placed them round her wrists. Agnes playfully, and with a smile, shook her hands, and they fell, like St. Paul’s viper, clattering at her feet.‡

“They are the smallest we have, sir,” said the softened executioner; “one so young ought to wear other bracelets.”

“Silence, man!” rejoined the exasperated judge, who, turning to the prisoner, said, in a blander tone:

“Agnes, I pity thy youth, thy station, and the bad education thou hast received. I desire, if possible, to save thee. Think better while thou hast time. Renounce the false and pernicious maxims of Christianity, obey the imperial edicts, and sacrifice to the gods.”

“It is useless,” she replied, “to tempt me longer. My resolution is unalterable. I despise thy false divinities, and can only love and serve the one living God. Eternal Ruler, open wide the heavenly gates, until lately closed to man. Blessed Christ, call to Thee the soul that cleaveth unto Thee: victim first to Thee by virginal consecration; now to Thy Father by martyrdom’s immolation.”§

“I waste time, I see,” said the impatient prefect, who saw symptoms of compassion rising in the multitude. “Secretary, write the sentence. We condemn Agnes, for contempt of the imperial edicts, to be punished by the sword.”

“On what road, and at what mile-stone, shall the judgment be executed?”|| asked the headsman.

“Let it be carried into effect at once,” was the reply.

Agnes raised for one moment her hands and eyes to heaven, * “Solvitur acris hyems, grata vice veris et Favoni.” Horace.

† Pudicitia.

‡ St. Ambrose, ubi supra.

§ “Æterne Rector, divide Januas,
Cœli, observatas terrigenis prinis,
Acie sequentem, Christo, animam vocas,
Cum virginalium, tum Patriæ hostiam.”

Prudentius, negli στέφ. 14.

|| This was the usual practice, to behead out of the gate, at the second, third, or fourth mile-stone; but it is clear from Prudentius and other writers that St. Agnes suffered at the place of trial, of which we have other instances.

* “Duplex corona est præstita martyri.” Prudentius.

† “Ingressa Agnes turpludinis locum, Angelum Domini præparatum invenit.” The Breviary.

‡ The Church of St. Agnes in the Piazza Navona, one of the most beautiful in Rome.

“Cui posse soli Cunctipotens dedit
Castam vel ipsum reddere forniceam
* * * * *
Nil non Judicium ost quod pia visere
Dignaris, almo vel pede tangere.”

Prudentius,

§ “Non intorto crine caput comptum.” Her head not dressed with braided hair. St. Ambrose, lib. 1. de Virgin, c. 2. See Prudentius’s description of St. Eulalia, negli στέφ. hymn. iii. 21.

then calmly knelt down. With her own hands she drew forward her silken hair over her head, and exposed her neck to the blow.* A pause ensued, for the executioner was trembling with emotion, and could not wield his sword.† As the child knelt alone, in her white robe, with her head inclined, her arms modestly crossed upon her bosom, and her amber locks hanging almost to the ground, and veiling her features, she might not unaptly have been compared to some rare plant, of which the slender stalk, white as the lily, bent with the luxuriance of its golden blossom.

The judge angrily reproved the executioner for his hesitation, and bid him at once do his duty. The man passed the back of his rough left hand across his eyes, as he raised his sword. It was seen to flash for an instant in the air, and the next moment, flower and stem were lying scarcely displaced on the ground. It might have been taken for the prostration of prayer, had not the white robe been in that minute dyed into a rich crimson—washed in the blood of the Lamb.

The man on the judge's right hand had looked with unflinching eye upon the stroke, and his lip curled in a wicked triumph over the fallen. The lady opposite had turned away her head, till the murmur, that follows a suppressed breath in a crowd, told her all was over. She then boldly advanced forward, unwound from round her person her splendid brocaded mantle, and stretched it, as a pall, over the mangled body. A burst of applause followed this graceful act of womanly feeling,‡ as the lady stood, now in the garb of deepest mourning, before the tribunal.

"Sir," she said in a tone clear and distinct, but full of emotion, "grant me one petition. Let not the rude hands of your servants again touch and profane the hallowed remains of her, whom I have loved more than any thing on earth; but let me bear them hence to the sepulchre of her fathers; for she was noble as she was good."

Tertullus was manifestly irritated, as he replied: "Madam, whoever you may be, your request cannot be granted. Catulus see that the body be cast, as usual, into the river, or burnt."

"I entreat you, sir," the lady earnestly insisted, "by every claim which female virtue has upon you, by any tear which a mother has shed over you, by every soothing word which a sister has ever spoken to you, in illness or sorrow; by every ministrations of their gentle hands, I implore you to grant my humble prayer. And if, when you return home this evening, you will be met at the threshold by daughters, who will kiss your hand, though stained with the blood of one, whom you may feel proud if they resemble, be able to say to them, at least, that this slightest tribute to the maidenly delicacy which they prize, has not been refused."

Such common sympathy was manifested, that Tertullus anxious to check it, asked her sharply:

"Pray, are you, too a Christian?"

She hesitated for one instant, then replied, "No, sir, I am not; but I own that if any thing could make me one, it would be what I have seen this day."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, that, to preserve the religion of the empire such beings as she whom you have slain" (her tears interrupted her for a moment) "should have to die; while monsters who disgrace the shape and name of man should have to live and flourish. Oh, sir, you know not what you have blotted out from earth this day! She was the purest, sweetest, holiest thing I ever knew upon it, the very flower of womanhood, though yet a child. And she might have lived yet, had she not scorned the proffered hand of a vile adventurer; who pursued her with his loathsome offers, into the seclusion of her villa, into the sanctuary of her home, and even into the last retreat of her dungeon. For this she died, that she would not endow with her wealth, and ennoble by her alliance, that Asiatic spy."

* Prudentius.

† St. Ambrose.

‡ Prudentius mentions that a sudden fall of snow shrouded thus the body of St. Eulalia lying in the forum. Ubi sup.

She pointed with calm scorn at Fulvius, who bounded forward, and exclaimed with fury: "She lies, foully and calumniously, sir. Agnes openly confessed herself a Christian."

"Bear with me, sir," replied the lady, with noble dignity, "while I convict him; and look on his face for proof of what I say. Didst thou not, Fulvius, early this morning, seek that gentle child in her cell, and deliberately tell, her (for unseen, I heard you) that if she would but accept thy hand, not only wouldst thou save her life, but, despising the imperial commands, secure her still remaining a Christian?"

Fulvius stood, pale as death: stood, as one does for a moment who is shot through the heart, or struck by lightning. He looked like a man on whom sentence is going to be pronounced,—not of death, but of eternal pillory, as the judge addressed him saying:

"Fulvius, thy very look confirms this grievous charge. I could arraign thee on it, for thy head at once. But take my counsel, begone hence for ever. Flee, and hide thyself after such villainy, from the indignation of all just men, and from the vengeance of the gods. Show not thy face again here, nor in the Forum, nor in any public place of Rome. If this lady please, even now I will take her deposition against thee. Pray, madam," he asked most respectfully, "may I have the honor of knowing your name?"

"Fabiola," she replied.

The judge was now all complacency, for he saw before him, he hoped, his future daughter-in-law. "I have often heard of you, madam," he said, "and of your high accomplishments, and exalted virtues. You are, moreover, nearly allied to this victim of treachery, and have a right to claim her body. It is at your disposal." This speech was interrupted at its beginning by a loud hiss and yell that accompanied Fulvius's departure. He was pale with shame, terror, and rage.

Fabiola gracefully thanked the prefect, and beckoned to Syra, who attended her. The servant again made a signal to some one else; and presently four slaves appeared bearing a lady's litter. Fabiola would allow no one but herself and Syra to raise the relics from the ground, place them on the litter, and cover them with their precious pall. "Bear this treasure to its own home," she said, and followed as mourner with her maid. A little girl, all in tears, timidly asked if she might join them. "Who art thou?" asked Fabiola. "I am poor Emerentiana, her foster-sister," replied the child; and Fabiola led her kindly by the hand.

The moment the body was removed, a crowd of Christians, children, men and women, threw themselves forward, with sponges and linen cloths, to gather up the blood. In vain did the guards fall on them, with whips, cudgels, and even with sharper weapons, so that many mingled their own blood with that of the martyr. When a sovereign, at his coronation, or on first entering his capital, throws, according to ancient custom, handfuls of gold and silver coins among the crowd, he does not create a more eager competition for his scattered treasures, than there was among those primitive Christians, for what they valued more than gold or precious stones, the ruby drops which a martyr had poured from his heart for his Lord. But all respected the prior claim of one; and here it was the deacon Reparatus, who, at risk of life, was present, phial in hand, to gather the blood of Agnes's testimony; that it might be appended, as a faithful seal, to the record of martyrdom on her tomb.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE SAME DAY: ITS THIRD PART.

TERTULLUS hastened at once to the palace: fortunately, or unfortunately, for these candidates for martyrdom. There he met Corvina, with the prepared rescript, elegantly engrossed in uncial, that is, large capital letters. He had the privilege of immediate admission into the imperial presence; and, as a matter of business, reported the death of Agnes, exaggerated the public feeling likely to be caused by it, attributed it all to the folly and mismanagement of Fulvius, whose worst guilt he did not disclose, for fear of having to try him, and thus bringing out what he was now doing ; depreciated the value of Agnes's property, and ended by saying, that it would be a gracious act of clemency, and one sure to counteract unpopular feelings, to bestow it upon her relative, who by settlement was her next heir. He described Fabiola as a young lady of extraordinary intellect and wonderful learning, who was most zealously devoted to the worship of the gods, and daily offered sacrifice to the genius of the emperors.

"I know her," said Maximian, laughing, as if at the recollection of something very droll. "Poor thing ! she sent me a splendid ring, and yesterday asked me for that wretched Sebastian's life, just as they had finished eudgelling him to death." And he laughed immoderately, then continued : "Yes, yes, by all means ; a little inheritance will console her, no doubt, for the loss of that fellow. Let a rescript be made out, and I will sign it."

Tertullus produced the one prepared, saying he had fully relied on the emperor's magnanimous clemency ; and the imperial barbarian put a signature to it which would have disgraced a schoolboy. The prefect at once consigned it to his son.

Scarcely had he left the palace, when Fulvius entered. He had been home to put on a proper court attire, and removed from his features, by the bath and the perfumer's art, the traces of his morning's passion. He felt a keen presentiment that he should be disappointed. Eurotas's cool discussion of the preceding evening, had prepared him ; the cross of all his designs, and his multiplied disappointments that day, had strengthened his instinctive conviction. One woman, indeed, seemed born to meet and baffle him whichever way he turned ; but, "thank the gods," he thought, "she cannot be in my way here. She has this morning blasted my character for ever ; she cannot claim my rightful reward : she has made me an outcast ; it is not in her power to make me a beggar." This seemed his only ground of hope. Despair, indeed, urged him forward ; and he determined to argue out his claims to the confiscated property of Agnes, with the only competitor he could fear, the rapacious emperor himself. He might as well risk his life over it, for if he failed, he was utterly ruined. After waiting some time, he entered the audience-hall, and advanced with the blindest smile that he could muster to the imperial feet.

"What want you here ?" was his first greeting.

"Sire," he replied, "I have come humbly to pray your royal justice, to order my being put into immediate possession of my share of the Lady Agnes's property. She has been convicted of being a Christian upon my accusation, and has just suffered the merited penalty of all who disobey the imperial edicts."

"That is all quite right ; but we have heard how stupidly you mismanaged the whole business as usual, and have raised murmurings and discontent in the people against us. So, now, the sooner you quit our presence, palace, and city, the better for yourself. Do you understand ? We don't usually give such warnings twice."

"I will obey instantly every intimation of the supreme will. But I am almost destitute. Command what of right is mine to be delivered over to me, and I depart immediately."

"No more words," replied the tyrant, "but go at once. As to the property which you demand with so much pertinacity, you cannot have it. We have made over the whole of it, by an irrevocable rescript, to an excellent and deserving person, the Lady Fabiola."

Fulvius did not speak another word ; but kissed the emperor's hand and slowly retired. He looked a ruined, broken man. He was only heard to say, as he passed out of the gate : "Then, after all, she has made me a beggar too." When he reached home, Eurotas, who read his answer in his nephew's eye, was amazed at his calmness.

"I see," he dryly remarked, "it is all over."

"Yes ; are your preparations made, Eurotas ?"

"Nearly so. I have sold the jewels, furniture, and slaves, at some loss ; but, with the trifle I had in hand, we have enough to take us safe to Asia. I have retained Stabio, as the most trusty of our servants ; he will carry our small travelling requisites on his horse. Two others are preparing for you and me. I have only one thing more to get for our journey, and then I am ready to start."

"Pray what is that ?"

"The poison. I ordered it last night, but it will only be ready at noon."

"What is that for ?" asked Fulvius, with some alarm.

"Surely you know," rejoined the other, unmoved. "I am willing to make one more trial any where else ; but our bargain is clear ; my father's family must not end in beggary. It must be extinguished in honor."

Fulvius bit his lip, and said, "Well, be it as you like, I am weary of life. Leave the house as soon as possible, for fear of Ephraim, and be with your horses at the third mile on the Latin gate soon after dusk. I will join you there. For I, too, have an important matter to transact before I start."

"And what is that ?" asked Eurotas, with a rather keen curiosity.

"I cannot tell even you. But if I am not with you by two hours after sunset, give me up, and save yourself without me."

Eurotas fixed upon him his cold dark eye, with one of those looks which ever read Fulvius through ; to see if he could detect any lurking idea of escape from his gripe. But his look was cool and unusually open, and the old man asked no more. While this dialogue was going on, Fulvius had been divesting himself of his court garments, and attiring himself in a travelling suit. So completely did he evidently prepare himself for his journey, without necessity of returning home, that he even took his weapons with him ; besides his sword, securing in his girdle, but concealed under his cloak, one of those curved daggers, of highest temper and most fatal form, which were only known in the East.

Eurotas proceeded at once to the Numidian quarters in the palace, and asked for Jubala ; who entered with two small flasks of different sizes, and was just going to give some explanations, when her husband, half-drunk, half-furious, was seen approaching. Eurotas had just time to conceal the flasks in his belt, and slip a coin into her hand, when Hyphax came up. His wife had mentioned to him the offers which Eurotas had made to her before marriage, and had excited in his hot African blood a jealousy that amounted to hatred. The savage rudely thrust his wife out of the apartment, and would have picked a quarrel with the Syrian ; had not the latter, his purpose being accomplished, acted with forbearance, assured the archer-chief that he should never more see him, and retired.

It is time, however, that we return to Fabiola. The reader is probably prepared to hear us say, that she returned home a Christian ; and yet it is not so. For what as yet did she know of Christianity, to be said to profess it ? In Sebastian and Agnes she had indeed willingly admired the virtue, unselfish, generous, and more than earthly, which now she was ready to attribute to that faith. She saw that it gave motives of actions, principles of life, elevation of mind, courage of conscience, and determination of virtuous will, such as no other system of belief ever bestowed. And even if, as she now shrewdly suspected, and intended in calmer moments to ascertain, the sublime revelations of Syra, concerning an unseen sphere of virtue, and its all-seeing Ruler, came from the same source, to what did it all amount more than to a grand moral and intellectual system, partly practical, partly speculative, as all codes of philosophic teaching were ? This was a very different thing from Christianity. She had as yet heard nothing of its real and essential doctrines, its fathomless, yet accessible depths of mystery ; the awful, vast, and heaven-high structure of faith, which the simplest soul may contain ; as a child's eye will take in the perfect reflection and counterpart of a mountain, though a giant cannot scale it. She had never heard of a God, One in Trinity ; of the coequal Son incarnate for man. She had never been told of the marvellous history, of Redemption by God's sufferings and death. She had not heard of Nazareth, or Bethlehem, or Calvary. How could she call herself a Christian, or be one, in ignorance of all this.

How many names had to become familiar and sweet to her which as yet were unknown, or barbarous—Mary, Joseph, Peter, Paul and John! Not to mention the sweetest of all, His, whose name is balm to the wounded heart, or as honey dropping from the broken honeycomb. And how much had she yet to learn about the provision for salvation on earth, in the Church, in grace, in sacraments, in prayer, in love, in charity to others! What unexplored regions lay beyond the small tract which she had explored!

No; Fabiola returned home, exhausted almost by the preceding day and night, and the sad scenes of the morning, and retired to her own apartment, no longer perhaps even a philosopher, yet not a Christian. She desired all her servants to keep away from the court which she occupied, that she might not be disturbed by the smallest noise; and she forbade any one to have access to her. There she sat in loneliness and silence, for several hours, too excited to obtain rest from slumber. She mourned long over Agnes, as a mother might over a child suddenly carried off. Yet, was there not a tinge of light upon the cloud that overshadowed her, more than when it hung over her father's bier? Did it not seem to her an insult to reason, an outrage to humanity, to think that she had perished; that she had been permitted to walk forward in her bright robe, and with her smiling countenance, and with her joyous, simple heart, straight on—into nothing; that she had been allured by conscience, and justice, and purity, and truth, on, on, till with arms outstretched, to embrace them, she stepped over a precipice, beneath which yawned annihilation? No. Agnes, she felt sure, was happy somehow, somewhere; or justice was a senseless word.

"How strange," she further thought, "that everyone whom I have known endowed with superior excellence, men like Sebastian, women like Agnes, should turn out to have belonged to the scorned race of Christians! One only remains, and to-morrow I will interrogate her."

When she turned from these, and looked around upon the heathen world, Fulvius, Tertullus, the Emperor, Calpurnius—nay, she shuddered as she surprised herself on the point of mentioning her own father's name—it sickened her to see the contrast of baseness with nobleness, vice with virtue, stupidity with wisdom, and the sensual with the spiritual. Her mind was thus being shaped into a mould, which some form of practical excellence must be found to fill, or it must be broken; her soul was craving as a parched soil, which heaven must send its waters to refresh, or it must become an eternal desert.

Agnes, surely, well deserved the glory of gaining, by her death, her kinswoman's conversion; but was there not one, more humble, who had established a prior claim? One who had given up freedom, and offered life, for this unselfish gain?

While Fabiola was alone and desolate, she was disturbed by the entrance of a stranger, introduced under the ominous title of "A messenger from the emperor." The porter had at first denied him admittance; but upon being assured that he bore an important embassy from the sovereign, he felt obliged to inquire from the steward what to do; when he was informed that no one with such a claim could be refused entrance.

Fabiola was amazed, and her displeasure was somewhat mitigated, by the ridiculous appearance of the person deputed in such a solemn character. It was Corvinus, who with clownish grace approached her, and in a studied speech, evidently got up very floridly, and intrusted to a bad memory, laid at her feet an imperial rescript, and his own sincere affection, the Lady Agnes's estates, and his clumsy hand. Fabiola could not at all comprehend the connection between the two combined presents, and never imagined that the one was a bribe for the other. So she desired him to return her humble thanks to the emperor for his gracious act; adding, "Say that I am too ill to-day to present myself, and do him homage."

"But these estates you are aware, were forfeited and confiscated," he gasped out in great confusion, "and my father has obtained them for you."

"That was unnecessary," said Fabiola, "for they were settled on me long ago, and became mine the moment"—she faltered, and after a strong effort at self-mastery, she continued—"the moment they ceased to be another's: they did not fall under confiscation."

Corvinus was dumb-founded; at last he stumbled into something meant for a humble petition to be admitted as an aspirant after her hand, but understood by Fabiola to be a demand of recompense, for procuring or bringing so important a document. She assured him that every claim he might have on her should be fully and honorably considered at a more favorable moment; but as she was exceedingly wearied and unwell, she must beg him to leave her at present. He did so quite elated, fancying that he had secured his prize.

After he was gone, she hardly looked at the parchment, which he had left open on a small table by her couch, but sat musing on the sorrowful scenes she had witnessed, till it wanted about an hour to sunset. Sometimes her reveries turned to one point, sometimes to another of the late events: and, at last, she was dwelling on her being confronted with Fulvius, that morning, in the Forum. Her memory vividly replaced the entire scene before her, and her mind gradually worked itself into a state of painful excitement, which she at length checked by saying aloud to herself; "Thank heaven! I shall never behold that villain's face again."

The words were scarcely out of her mouth, when she shaded her eyes with her hand, as she raised herself up on her couch, and looked towards the door. Was it her overheated fancy which beguiled her, or did her wakeful eyes show her a reality? Her ears decided the question, by these words which they heard.

"Pray, madam, who is the man you honor by that gracious speech?"

"You, Fulvius," she said, rising with dignity. A further intruder still; not only into the house, the villa, and the dungeon, but into the most secret apartments of a lady's residence; and what is worse, into the house of sorrow of one whom you have bereaved. Begone at once, or I will have you ignominiously expelled hence."

"Sit down and compose yourself, lady," rejoined the intruder; "this is my last visit to you; but we have a reckoning to make together of some weight. As to crying out, or bringing in help, you need not trouble yourself; your orders to your servants, to keep aloof, have been too well obeyed. There is no one within call."

It was true. Fulvius found the way prepared unwittingly for him by Corvinus; for upon presenting himself at the door, the porter, who had seen him twice dine at the house, told him of the strict orders given, and assured him that he could not be admitted unless he came from the emperor, for such were his instructions. That, Fulvius said was exactly his case; and the porter, wondering that so many imperial messengers should come in one day, let him pass. He begged that the door might be left unfastened, in case the porter should not be at his post when he retired; for he was in a hurry, and should not like to disturb the house, in such a state of grief! He added, that he required no guide, for he knew the way to Fabiola's apartment.

Fulvius seated himself opposite to the lady, and continued: "You ought not to be offended, madam, with my unexpectedly coming upon you, and overhearing your amiable soliloquies about myself; it is a lesson I learnt from yourself in the Tullian prison. But I must begin my scores from an earlier date. When, for the first time, I was invited by your worthy father to his table, I met one, whose looks and words at once gained my affections,—I need not now mention her name—and whose heart, with instinctive sympathy returned them."

"Insolent man!" Fabiola exclaimed, "to allude to such a topic here; it is false, that any such affection ever existed on either side."

"As to the Lady Agnes," resumed Fulvius, "I have the best authority, that of your lamented parent, who more than once encouraged me to persevere in my suit; by assuring me that his cousin had confided to him her reciprocating love."

Fabiola was mortified; for she now remembered that this was too true, from the hints which Fabius had given her, of his stupid misunderstanding.

"I know well, that my dear father was under a delusion upon the subject; but I, from whom that dear child concealed nothing—"

"Except her religion," interrupted Fulvius, with bitter irony.

"Peace!" Fabiola went on; "that word sounds like blasphemy on your lips—I knew that you were but an object of loathing and abhorrence to her,"

"Yes, after you made me such. From that hour of our first meeting, you became my bitter and unrelenting foe, in conspiracy with that treacherous officer, who has received his reward, and whom you had destined for the place I courted. Repress your indignation, lady, for I will be heard out—you undermined my character, you poisoned her feelings, and you turned my love into necessary enmity."

"Your love!" now broke in the indignant lady: "even if all that you have said were not basely false, what love could you have for her? How could you appreciate her artless simplicity, her genuine honesty, her rare understanding, her candid innocence, any more than the wolf can value the lamb's gentleness, or the vulture the dove's gentleness? No, it was her family connection, her nobility, that you grasped at, and nothing more; I read it in the very flash of your eye, when first it fixed itself, as a basilisk's, upon her."

"It is false!" he rejoined; "had I obtained my request, had I been thus worthily mated, I should have been found equal to my position, domestic, contented, and affectionate; as worthy of possessing her as—"

"As any one can be," struck in Fabiola, "who, in offering his hand, expresses himself equally ready, in three hours, to espouse or to murder the object of his affection. And she prefers the latter, and he keeps his word. Begone from my presence; you taint the very atmosphere in which you move."

"I will leave when I have accomplished my task, and you will have little reason to rejoice when I do. You have then purposely, and unprovoked, blighted and destroyed in me every honorable purpose of life, withered my only hope, cut me off from rank, society, respectable ease, and domestic happiness."

"That was not enough. After acting in that character, with which you summed up my condemnation, of a spy, and listened to my conversation, you this morning threw off all sense of female propriety, and stood forward prominently in the Forum, to complete in public what you had begun in private, excite against me the supreme tribunal, and through it the emperor, and arouse an unjust popular outcry and vengeance; such as, but for a feeling stronger than fear, which brings me hither, would make me now skulk, like a hunted wolf, till I could steal out of the nearest gate."

"And, Fulvius, I tell you," interposed Fabiola, "that the moment you cross its threshold, the average of virtue will be raised in this wicked city. Again I bid you depart from my house, at least; or at any rate I will withdraw from this offensive intrusion."

"We part not yet, lady," said Fulvius, whose countenance had been growing every moment more flushed, as his lips had been becoming more deadly pale. He rudely grasped her arm, and pushed her back to her seat; "and beware," he added, "how you attempt again either to escape or to bring aid; your first cry will be your last, cost me what it may."

"You have made me, then, an outcast, not only from society but from Rome, an exile, a homeless wanderer on a friendless earth; was not that enough to satisfy your vengeance? No; you must needs rob me of my gold, of my rightfully, though painfully earned wealth; peace, reputation, my means of subsistence, all you have stolen from me, a youthful stranger," heavily for your temerity. Dare you, in my own house, call me a thief?"

"Wicked and insolent man!" exclaimed the now indignant Roman lady, reckless of consequences, "you shall answer

"I dare; and I tell you this is your day of reckoning, and not mine. I have earned, even if by crime, it is nothing to you, my full share of your cousin's confiscated property. I have earned it hardly, by pangs and rendings of the heart and soul, by sleepless nights of struggles with fiends that have conquered; ay, and with one at home that is sterner than they; by days and days of restless search for evidence, amidst the desolation of a proud, but degraded spirit. Have I not a right to enjoy it?"

"Ay, call it what you will, call it my blood-money; and the more infamous it is, the more base in you to step in and snatch it from me. It is like a rich man tearing the carrion from the hound's jaws, after he has swollen his feet and rent his skin in hunting it down."

"I will not seek for further epithets by which to call you; your mind is deluded by some vain dream," said Fabiola, with an earnestness not untinged with alarm. She felt she was in the presence of a madman, one in whom violent passion, carried off by an unchecked, deeply-moved fancy, was lashing itself up to that intensity of wicked excitement, which constitutes a moral phrenzy—when the very murderer thinks himself a virtuous avenger. "Fulvius," she continued, with studied calmness, and looking fully into his eyes, "I now entreat you to go. If you want money, you shall have it; but in heaven's name go, before you destroy your reason by your anger."

"What vain fancy do you mean?" asked Fulvius.

"Why, that I should have ever dreamt about Agnes's wealth or property on such a day, or should have taken any advantage of her cruel death."

"And yet it is so; I have it from the emperor's mouth that he has made it over to you. Will you pretend to make me believe, that this most generous and liberal prince ever parted with a penny unsolicited, ay, or unbribed?"

"Of this I know nothing. But I know, that I would rather have died of want than petitioned for a farthing of such property!"

"Then would you make me rather believe, that in this city there is any one so disinterested as, undesired, to have petitioned for you? No, no, Lady Fabiola, all this is too incredible. But what is that?" And he pounced with eagerness on the imperial rescript, which had remained unlooked at, since Corvinus had left it. The sensation to him was like that of Æneas when he saw Pallas's belt upon the body of Turnus. The fury, which seemed to have been subdued by his subtlety, as he had been reasoning to prove Fabiola guilty, flashed up anew at the sight of this fatal document. He eyed it for a minute, then broke out, gnashing his teeth with rage:

"Now, madam, I convict you of baseness, rapacity, and unnatural cruelty, far beyond anything you have dared to charge on me! Look at this rescript, beautifully engrossed, with its golden letters and emblazoned margins; and presume to say that it was prepared in ~~the~~ one hour that elapsed between your cousin's death, and the emperor's telling me that he had signed it? Nor do you pretend to know the generous friend who procured you the gift. Bah! while Agnes was in prison at latest; while you were whining and moaning over her; while you were reproaching me for cruelty and treachery towards her,—me, a stranger and alien to her! you, the gentle lady, the virtuous philosopher, the loving, fondling kinswoman, you, my stern reprover, were coolly plotting to take advantage of my crime, for securing her property, and seeking out the elegant scribe, who should gild your covetousness with his pencil, and paint over your treason to your own flesh and blood, with his blushing minium!"

"Cease, madman, cease!" exclaimed Fabiola, endeavoring in vain to master his glaring eye. But he went on, in still wilder tone:

"And then, forsooth, when you have thus basely robbed me, you offer me money. You have out-plotted me, and you pity me! You have made me a beggar, and then you offer me alms, — alms out of my own wages, the wages that even hell allows its fated victims while on earth!"

Fabiola rose again, but he seized her with a maniac's gripe, and this time did not let her go. He went on:

"Now listen to the last words that I will speak, or they may be the last that you will hear. Give back to me that unjustly obtained property; it is not fair that I should have the guilt, and you its reward. Transfer it by your sign manual to me as a free and loving gift, and I will depart. If not, you have signed your own doom." A stern and menacing glance accompanied these words.

Fabiola's haughty self rose again erect within her; her Roman heart, unsubdued, stood firm. Danger only made her fearless. She gathered her robe with matronly dignity around her, and replied:

"Fulvius, listen to my words, though they should be the last that I may speak; as certainly they shall be the last that you shall hear from me.

"Surrender this property to you? I would give it willingly to the first leper that I might meet in the street, but to you never. Never shall you touch thing that belonged to that holy maiden, be it a gem or be it a straw! That touch would be pollution. Take gold of mine, if it please you; but any thing that ever belonged to her, from me no treasures can ransom. And one legacy I prize more than all her inheritance. You have now offered me two alternatives, as last night you did her, to yield to your demands, or die. Agnes taught me which to choose. Once again, I say, depart."

"And leave you to possess what is mine? leave you to triumph over me, as one whom you have outwitted—you honored, and I disgraced—you rich, and I penniless—you happy, and I wretched? No, never! I cannot save myself from what you have made me; but I can prevent your being what you have no right to be. For this I have come here; this is my day of Nemesis.* Now die!" While he was speaking these reproaches, he was slowly pushing her backwards with his left hand towards the couch from which she had risen; while his right was tremblingly feeling for something in the folds of his bosom.

As he finished his last word, he thrust her violently down upon the couch, and seized her by the hair. She made no resistance, she uttered no cry; partly a fainting and sickening sensation came over her; partly a noble feeling of self-respect checked any unseemly exhibition of fear, before a scornful enemy. Just as she closed her eyes, she saw something like lightning above her; she could not tell whether it was his glaring eye or flashing steel.

In another moment she felt oppressed and suffocated, as if a great weight had fallen upon her; and a hot stream was flowing over her bosom.

A sweet voice full of tenderness sounded in her ears:

"Cease, Orontius; I am thy sister Miriam!"

Fulvius, in accents choked with passion, replied:

"It is false; give me up my prey!"

A few words more were faintly spoken in a tongue unknown to Fabiola; when she felt her hair released, heard the dagger dashed to the ground, and Fulvius cry out bitterly, as he rushed out of the room:

"O Christ! this is Thy Nemesis!"

Fabiola's strength was returning; but she felt the weight upon her increase. She struggled, and released herself. Another body was lying in her place, apparently dead, and covered with blood.

It was the faithful Syra, who had thrown herself between her mistress's life and her brother's dagger.

The great thoughts, which this occurrence would naturally have suggested to the noble heart of Fabiola, were suppressed, for a time, by the exigencies of the moment. Her first care was to stanch the flowing blood with whatever was nearest at hand. While she was engaged in this work, there was a general rush of servants to her apartment. The stupid porter begun to be uneasy at Fulvius's long stay (the reader has now heard his real name), when he saw him dash out of the door like a maniac, and thought he perceived stains of blood upon his garment. He immediately gave the alarm to the entire household.

Fabiola by a gesture stopped the crowd at the door of her room, and desired only Euphrosyne and her Greek maid to enter. The latter, since the influence of the black slave had been removed, had attached herself most affectionately to Syra, as we must still call her, and had, with great docility, listened to her moral instructions. A slave was instantly despatched for the physician who had always been sent for by Syra in illness, Dionysius, who, as we have already observed, lived in the house of Agnes.

In the meantime, Fabiola had been overjoyed at finding the blood cease to flow so rapidly, and still more at seeing her servant open her eyes upon her, though only for a moment. She would not have exchanged for any wealth the sweet smile which accompanied that look.

In a few minutes the kind physician arrived. He carefully examined the wound, and pronounced favorably on it for the present. The blow, as aimed, would have gone straight to Fabiola's heart. But her loving servant, in spite of prohibition, had been hovering near her mistress during the whole day; never intruding, but anxious for any opportunity which might offer, of seconding those good impressions of grace, which the morning's scenes could not failed to have produced. While in a neighboring room, she heard violent tones which were too familiar to her ears; and hastened noiselessly round, and within the curtain which covered the door of Fabiola's own apartment. She stood concealed in the dusk, on the very spot where Agnes had, a few months before, consoled her.

She had not been there long, when the last struggle commenced. While the man was pushing her mistress backwards, she followed him close behind, and as he was lifting his arm, passed him, and threw her body over that of his victim. The blow descended, but misdirected, through the shock she gave his arm; and it fell upon her neck, where it inflicted a deep wound, checked, however, by encountering the collar-bone. We need not say what it cost her to make this sacrifice. Not the dread of pain, nor the fear of death could for a moment have deterred her: it was the horror of imprinting on her brother's brow the mark of Cain, the making him doubly a fratricide, which deeply anguished her. But she had offered her life for her mistress. To have fought with the assassin, whose strength and agility she knew, would have been useless; to try to alarm the house before one fatal blow was struck was hopeless; and nothing remained but to accomplish her immolation, by substituting herself for the intended victim. Still she wished to spare her brother the consummation of his crime, and in doing so manifested to Fabiola their relationship and their real names.

In his blind fury he refused her credit; but the words, in their native tongue, which said, "Remember my scarf which you picked up here," brought back to his memory so terrible a domestic tale, that had the earth opened a cavern in that moment before his feet, he would have leaped into it, to bury his remorse and shame.

* "The tomb of Dionysius, physician [and] priest," lately found at the entrance to the crypt of St. Cornelius, in the cemetery of Callistus.

Strange, too, it proved, that he should not have ever allowed Eurotas to get possession of that family relic, but should, ever since he regained it, have kept it apart as a sacred thing; and, when all else was being packed up, should have folded it up and put it in his breast. And now, in the act of drawing out his eastern dagger, he had plucked this out, too, and both were found upon the floor.

Dionysius, immediately after dressing the wound; and administering proper restoratives, which brought back consciousness, desired the patient to be left perfectly quiet, to see as few persons as possible, so as to prevent excitement, and to go on with the treatment which he prescribed until midnight. "I will call," he added, "very early in the morning, when I must see my patient alone." He whispered a few words in her ear, which seemed to do her more good than all his medicines; for her countenance brightened into an angelic smile.

Fabiola had her placed in her own bed, and allotting to her attendants the outward room, reserved to herself exclusively the privilege, as she deemed it, of nursing the servant, to whom a few months before she could hardly feel grateful for having tended her in fever. She had informed the others how the wound had been inflicted, concealing the relationship between her assailant and her deliverer.

Although herself exhausted and feverish, she would not leave the bedside of the patient; and when midnight was past and no more remedies had to be administered, she sank to rest upon a low couch close to the bed. And now what were her thoughts, when in the dim light of a sick-room, she opened her mind and heart to them? They were simple and earnest. She saw at once the reality and truth of all that her servant had ever spoken to her. When she last conversed with her, the principles which she heard with delight, had appeared to her wholly beyond practice, beautiful theories, which could not be brought to action. When Miriam had described a sphere of virtue, wherein no approbation or reward of man was to be expected, but only the approving eye of God, she had admired the idea, which powerfully seized her generous mind; but she had rebelled against its becoming the constraining rule of hourly conduct. Yet, if the stroke under which she cast herself had proved fatal, as it might easily have done, where would have been her reward? What, then, could be her motive but that very theory, as it seemed, of responsibility to an unseen power?

And when Miriam had discoursed of heroism in virtue as being its ordinary standard, how chimerical the principle had seemed! Yet here, without preparation, without forethought, without excitement, without glory,—nay, with marked desire of concealment, this slave had performed a deed of self-sacrifice, heroic in every way. From what could that result, but from habitual heroism of virtue, ready at any hour to do what would enoble for ever a soldier's name? She was no dreamer, then, no theorist, but a serious, real practiser of all that she taught. Could this be a philosophy? Oh, no, it must be a religion! the religion of Agnes and of Sebastian, to whom she considered Miriam every way equal. How she longed to converse with her again!

Early in the morning, according to his promise, the physician returned, and found his patient much improved. He desired to be left alone with her; when, having spread a linen cloth upon the table, and placed lighted tapers upon it, he drew from his bosom an embroidered scarf, and uncovered a golden box, the sacred contents of which she well knew. Approaching her he said,

"My dear child, as I promised you, I have now brought you not merely the truest remedy of every ailment, bodily and spiritual, but the very Physician Himself, who by His word alone restoreth all things,* whose touch opens the eyes of the blind and ears of the deaf, whose will cleanses lepers, the hem of whose garment sends forth virtue to cure all. Are you ready to receive Him?"

"With all my heart," she replied, clasping her hands; "I long to possess Him whom alone I have loved, in whom I have believed, to whom my heart belongs."

"Does no anger or indignation exist in your soul against him who has injured you? does any pride or vanity arise in your mind at the thought of what you have done? or are you conscious of any other fault requiring humble confession and absolution before receiving the sacred gift into your breast?"

"Full of imperfection and sin I know myself to be, venerable father; but I am not conscious of any knowing offence. I have had no need to forgive him to whom you allude; I love him too much for that, and would willingly give my life to save him. And of what have I to be proud, a poor servant, who have only obeyed my Lord's commands?"

"Invite, then, my child, this Lord into your house, that coming He may heal you, and fill you with His grace."

Approaching the table, he took from it a particle of the Blessed Eucharist, in the form of unleavened bread, which, being dry, he moistened in water, and placed within her lips.* She closed them upon it, and remained for some time absorbed in contemplation.

And thus did holy Dionysius discharge his two-fold office of physician and priest, attributed to him on his tomb.

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE SACRIFICE ACCEPTED.

THROUGH the whole of that day the patient seemed occupied with deep, but most pleasing, thoughts. Fabiola, who never left her, except for a few moments to give necessary directions, watched her countenance with a mixture of awe and delight. It appeared as if her servant's mind were removed from surrounding objects, and conversing in a totally different sphere. Now a smile passed like a sunbeam across her features, now a tear trembled in her eye, or flowed down her cheeks; sometimes her pupils were raised and kept fixed on heaven for a considerable time, while a blissful look of perfect and calm enjoyment sat unvarying upon her; and then, she would turn round with an expression of infinite tenderness towards her mistress, and hold out her hand to be clasped in hers. And Fabiola could sit thus for hours in silence, which was as yet prescribed; feeling it an honor, and thinking it did her good, to be in contact with such a rare type of virtue.

At length, in the course of the day, after giving her patient some nourishment, she said to her, smiling: "I think you are much better, Miriam, already. Your physician must have given you some wonderful medicine."

"Indeed he has, my dearest mistress."

Fabiola was evidently pained; and leaning over her, said softly: "Oh, do not, I entreat you, call me by such a title. If it has to be used, it should be by me towards you. But, in fact, it is no longer true; for what I intended has now been done; and the instrument of your liberation has been ordered to be made out, not as a freed-woman, but as an ingenua;† for such I know you are."

Miriam looked her thanks, for fear of further hurting Fabiola's feelings; and they continued to be happy together in silence.

Towards evening Dionysius returned, and found so great an improvement, that, ordering more nourishing food, he permitted a little quiet conversation.

"I must now," said Fabiola, as soon as they were alone, * Eusebius, in his account of Serapion, teaches us that this was the manner of administering Holy Communion to the sick, without the cup, or under only one kind.

† Persons freed from slavery retained the title of freedman or freedwoman (libertus, liberta) of the person to whom they had belonged, as "of Augustus." If they had belonged originally to a free class, they were liberated as ingenue or ingenue (well-born) and restored by emancipation to that class.

"fulfil the first duty, which my heart has been burning to discharge, that of thanking you—I wish I knew a stronger word—not for the life which you have saved me, but for the magnanimous sacrifice which you made for it—and, let me add, the unequalled example of heroic virtue, which alone inspired it."

"After all, what have I done, but simple duty? You had a right to my life, for a much less cause than to save yours," answered Miriam.

"No doubt," responded Fabiola, "it appears so to you, who have been trained to the doctrine which overpowered me, that the most heroic acts ought to be considered by men as performances of ordinary duties.

"And thereby," rejoined Miriam, "they cease to be what you have called them."

"No, no," exclaimed Fabiola, with enthusiasm; "do not try to make me mean and vile to my own heart, by teaching me to undervalue what I cannot but prize as an unrivalled act of virtue. I have been reflecting on it, night and day, since I witnessed it; and my heart has been yearning to speak to you of it, and even yet I dare not, or I should oppress your weakness with my overcharged feelings. It was noble, it was grand, it was beyond all reach of praise; though I know you do not want it. I cannot see any way in which the sublimeness of the act could have been enhanced, or human virtue rise one step higher."

Miriam who was now raised to a reclining position, took Fabiola's hand between both hers; and turning round towards her, in a soft and mild but most earnest tone, thus addressed her.

"Good and gentle lady, for one moment listen to me. Not to depreciate what you are good enough to value, since it pains you to hear it, but to teach you how far we still are from what might have been done, let me trace for you a parallel scene, but where all shall be reversed. Let it be a slave—pardon me, dear Fabiola, for another pang—I see it in your face, but it shall be the last—yes, a slave brutish, ungrateful, rebellious to the most benign and generous of masters. And let the stroke, not of an assassin, but of the minister of justice, impend over his head. What would you call the act, how would you characterize the virtue of that master, if out of pure love, and that he might reclaim that wretched man, he should rush beneath the axe's blow, ay, and its preceding ignominious stripes, and leave written in his will, that he made that slave heir to his titles and his wealth, and desired him to be considered as his brother?"

"O Miriam, Miriam, you have drawn a picture too sublime to be believed of man. You have not eclipsed your own deed, for I spoke of human virtue. To act as you have now described would require, if possible, that of a god!"

Miriam pressed the folded hands to her bosom, fixed on Fabiola's wondering eyes a look of heavenly inspiration, as she sweetly and solemnly replied: "AND JESUS CHRIST, WHO DID ALL THIS FOR MAN, WAS TRULY GOD."

Fabiola covered her face with both her hands, and for a long time was silent. Miriam prayed earnestly in her own tranquil heart.

"Miriam, I thank you from my soul," at length Fabiola said; "you have fulfilled your promise of guiding me. For some time I have only been fearing that you might not be a Christian; but it could not be.

"Now tell me, are those awful, but sweet words, which you just now uttered, which have sunk into my heart as deeply, as silently, and as irrevocably as a piece of gold dropt upon the surface of the still ocean, goes down into its depths—are those words a mere part of the Christian system, or are they its essential principle?"

"From a simple allegory, dear lady, your powerful mind has, in one bound, reached and grasped the master-key of our whole teaching; the alchemic of your refined understanding has extracted, and condensed into one thought, the most vital and prominent doctrines of Christianity. You have distilled them into their very essence.

"That man, God's creature and bondsman, rebelled against his Lord; that justice irresistible had doomed, and pursued him; that this very Lord 'took the form of a servant, and in habit was found like a man;*' that in this form He suffered stripes, buffets, mockery, and shameful death, became the 'Crucified One,' as men here call him, and thereby rescued man from his fate, and gave him part in His own riches and kingdom; all this is comprised in the words that I have spoken.

"And you have reached the right conclusion. Only God could have performed so godlike an action, or have offered so sublime an expiation."

Fabiola was again wrapped up in silent thought, till she timidly asked,—

"And was it to this that you referred in Campania, when you spoke of God alone being a victim worthy of God?"

"Yes; but I further alluded to the continuation of that sacrifice, even in our own days, by a marvellous dispensation of an all-powerful love. However, on this I must not yet speak."

Fabiola resumed: "I every moment see, how all that you have ever spoken to me coheres and fits together, like the parts of one plant; all springing one from another. I thought it bore only the lovely flowers of an elegant theory; you have shown me in your conduct how these can ripen into sweet and solid fruit. In the doctrine which you have just explained, I seem to myself to find the noble stem from which all the others branch forth—even to that very fruit. For who would refuse to do for another, what is much less than God has done for him? But, Miriam, there is a deep and unseen root whence springs all this, possibly dark beyond contemplation, deep beyond reach, complex beyond man's power to unravel; yet perhaps simple to a confiding mind. If, in my present ignorance, I can venture to speak, it should be vast enough to occupy all nature, rich enough to fill creation with all that is good and perfect in it, strong enough to bear the growth of your noble tree, till its summit reach above the stars, and its branches to the ends of earth.

"I mean, your idea of that God, whom you made me fear, when you spoke to me as a philosopher of Him, and taught me to know as the ever-present watchman and judge; but whom I am sure you will make me love when, as a Christian, you exhibit Him to me, as the root and origin of such boundless tenderness and mercy.

"Without some deep mystery in His nature, as yet unknown to me, I cannot fully apprehend that wonderful doctrine of man's purchase."

"Fabiola," responded Miriam, "more learned teachers, than I, should undertake the instruction of one so gifted and so acute. But will you believe me, if I attempt to give you some explanation?"

"Miriam," replied Fabiola, with strong emphasis, "ONE WHO IS READY TO DIE FOR ANOTHER, WILL CERTAINLY NOT DECEIVE HIM."

"And now," rejoined the patient, smiling, "you have again seized a great principle—that of FAITH. I will, therefore, be only the simple narrator of what Jesus Christ, who truly died for us, has taught us. You will believe my word only as that of a faithful witness; you will accept His, as that of an unerring God."

Fabiola bowed her head, and listened with reverential mind to her, in whom she had long honored a teacher of marvellous wisdom, which she drew from some unknown school; but whom now she almost worshipped as an angel, who could open to her the flood-gates of the eternal ocean, whose waters are the unfathomable Wisdom, overflowing on earth.

Miriam expounded, in the simple terms of Catholic teaching, the sublime doctrine of the Trinity; then after relating the fall of man, unfolded the mystery of the Incarnation, giving, in the very words of St. John, the history of the Eternal Word, till He was made flesh, and dwelt among men. Often she was interrupted by the expressions of admiration or assent which her pupil uttered; never by cavil or doubt. Philosophy had given place to religion, captiousness to docility, incredulity to faith.

But now a sadness seemed to have come over Fabiola's heart: Miriam read it in her looks, and asked her its cause.

"I hardly dare tell you," she replied. "But all that you have related to me is so beautiful, so divine, that it seems to me necessarily to end here.

"The Word (what a noble name!), that is, the expression of God's love, the extention of His wisdom, the evidence of His power, the very breath of His life-giving life, which is Himself, becometh flesh. Who shall furnish it to Him? Shall He take up the cast-off slough of a tainted humanity, or shall a new manhood be created expressly for Him? Shall He take His place in a double genealogy, receiving thus into Himself a twofold tide of corruption, and shall there be any one on earth daring and high enough to call himself His father?"

"No," softly whispered Miriam; "but there shall be one holy enough, and humble enough, to be worthy to call herself His mother!

"Almost 800 years before the Son of God came into the world a prophet spoke, recorded his words, and deposited the record of them in the hands of the Jews, Christ's inveterate enemies; and his words were these: 'Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a Son, and his name shall be called Emanuel,'† which in the Hebrew language signifies 'God with us,' that is with men.

"This prophecy was of course fulfilled in the conception and birth of God's Son on earth,"

"And who was she?" asked Fabiola, with great reverence.

"One whose very name is blessed by every one that truly loves her Son. Mary is the name by which you will know her: Miriam, its original in her own tongue, is the one by which I honor her. Well, you may suppose, was she prepared for such high destiny by holiness and virtue; not as cleansed, but as ever clean; not as purified, but as always pure: not freed, but exempted, from sin. The tide of which you spoke, found before her the dam of an eternal decree, which could not brook that the holiness of God should mingle with what it could only redeem by keeping extraneous to itself. Bright as the blood of Adam, when the breath of God sent it sparkling through his veins, pure as the flesh of Eve, while standing yet in the mould of the Almighty hands, as they drew it from the side of the slumbering man, were the blood and the flesh, which the Spirit of God formed into the glorious humanity, that Mary gave to Jesus.

"And after this glorious privilege granted to our sex are you surprised that many, like your sweet Agnes, should have chosen this peerless virgin as the pattern of their lives; should find in her, whom God so elected, the model of every virtue; and should, in preference to allowing themselves to be yoked, even by the tenderest of ties, to the chariot-wheels of this world, seek to fly upwards on wings of undivided love like hers?"

After a pause and some reflection, Miriam proceeded briefly to detail the history of our Saviour's birth, His laborious youth, His active but suffering public life, and then His ignominious Passion. Often was the narrative interrupted by the tears and sobs of the willing listener and ready learner. At last the time for rest had come, when Fabiola humbly asked:

"Are you too fatigued to answer one question more?"

"No," was the cheerful reply.

"What hope," said Fabiola, "can there be for one who cannot say she was ignorant, for she pretended to know everything; nor that she neglected to learn, for she affected eagerness after every sort of knowledge; but can only confess that she scorned the true wisdom, and blasphemed its Giver—for one who has scoffed at the very torments which proved the love, and sneered at the death which was the ransoming, of Him whom she has mocked at, as the 'Crucified'?"

A flood of tears stopped her speech.

Miriam waited till their relieving flow had subsided into that gentler dew which softens the heart; then in soothing tones addressed her as follows:

"In the days of our Lord there lived a woman who bore the same name as his spotless mother; but she had sinned publicly, degradingly, as you, Fabiola, would abhor to sin. She became acquainted, we know not how, with her Redeemer; in the secrecy of her own heart, she contemplated earnestly, till she came to love intensely, His gracious and condescending familiarity with sinners, and His singular indulgence and forgivingness to the fallen. She loved and loved still more; and forgetting herself, she only thought how she might manifest her love, so that it might bring honor, however slight, to Him, and shame, however great, on herself.

"She went into the house of a rich man, where the usual courtesies of hospitality had been denied its Divine guest, into the house of a haughty man who spurned, in the presumption of his heart, the public sinner, she supplied the attentions which had been neglected to Him whom she loved; and she was scorned, as she expected, for her obtrusive sorrow."

"How did she do this, Miriam?"

"She knelt at His feet as He sat at table; she poured out upon them a flood of tears; she wiped them with her luxurious hair, she kissed them fervently, and she anointed them with rich perfume."

"And what was the result?"

"She was defended by Jesus against the carping gibes of His host; she was told that she was forgiven on account of her love, and was dismissed with kindest comfort."

"And what became of her?"

"When on Calvary He was crucified, two women were privileged to stand close to Him; Mary the sinless, and Mary the penitent: to show how unsoiled and repentant love may walk hand in hand, beside Him who said that He had 'come to call not the just, but sinners to repentance.'"

No more was said that night. Miriam, fatigued with her exertion, sank into a placid slumber. Fabiola sat by her side, filled to her heart's brim with this tale of love. She pondered over it again and again; and she still saw more and more how every part of this wonderful system was consistent. For if Miriam had been ready to die for her, in imitation of her Saviour's love, so had she been as ready to forgive her, when she had thoughtlessly injured her. Every Christian, she now felt, ought to be a copy, a representative of his Master; but the one that slumbered so tranquilly beside her was surely true to her model, and might well represent Him to her.

When, after some time, Miriam awoke, she found her mistress (for her patent of freedom was not yet completed) lying at her feet, over which she had sobbed herself to sleep. She understood at once the full meaning and merit of this self-humiliation; she did not stir, but thanked God with a full heart that her sacrifice had been accepted.

Fabiola, on awaking, crept back to her own couch, as she thought, unobserved. A secret, sharp pang it had cost her to perform this act of self-abasement; but she had thoroughly humbled the pride of her heart. She felt for the first time that her heart was Christian.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

MIRIAM'S HISTORY.

THE next morning, when Dionysius came, he found both patient and nurse so radiant and happy, that he congratulated them both on having had a good night's rest. Both laughed at the idea; but concurred in saying that it had been the happiest night of their lives. Dionysius was surprised, till Miriam, taking the hand of Fabiola, said:

"Venerable priest of God, I confide to your fatherly care this catechumen, who desires to be fully instructed in the mysteries of our holy faith, and to be regenerated with the waters of eternal salvation."

"What!" asked Fabiola, amazed, "are you more than a physician?"

† Isaiah vii. 14.

"I am, my child," the old man replied; "unworthily I hold likewise the higher office of a priest in God's Church."

Fabiola unhesitatingly knelt before him, and kissed his hand. The priest placed his right hand upon her head, and said to her:

"Be of good courage, daughter; you are not the first of your house, whom God has brought into His holy Church. It is now many years since I was called in here, under the guise of a physician, by a former servant now no more; but in reality it was to baptize, a few hours before her death, the wife of Fabius."

"My mother!" exclaimed Fabiola. "She died immediately after giving me birth. And did she die a Christian?"

"Yes; and I doubt not that her spirit has been hovering about your life by the side of the angel who guards you, guiding you unseen to this blessed hour. And, before the throne of God, she has been unceasing in her supplications on your behalf."

Joy tenfold filled the breasts of the two friends; and after arrangements had been made with Dionysius for the necessary instructions and preparations for Fabiola's admission to baptism, she went up to the side of Miriam, and taking her hand, said to her in a low, soft voice:

"Miriam, may I from henceforth call you sister?" A pressure of the hand was the only reply which she could give.

With their mistress, the old nurse, Euphrosyne, and the Greek slave, placed themselves, as we now say, under instruction, to receive baptism on Easter-eve. Nor must we forget one who was already enrolled in the list of catechumens, and whom Fabiola had taken home with her and kept, Emerentiana, the foster-sister of Agnes. It was her delight to make herself useful, by being the ready messenger between the sick-room and the rest of the house.

During her illness, as her strength improved, Miriam imparted many particulars of her previous life to Fabiola; and as they will throw some light on our preceding narrative, we will give her history in a continuous form.

Some years before our story commenced, there lived in Antioch a man who, though not of ancient family, was rich, and moved in the highest circles of that most luxurious city. To keep his position, he was obliged to indulge in great expense; and from want of strict economy, he had gradually become oppressed with debt. He was married to a lady of great virtue, who became a Christian, at first secretly, and afterwards continued so, with her husband's reluctant consent. In the meantime, their two children, a son and daughter, had received their domestic education under her care. The former, Orontius, so called from the favorite stream which watered the city, was fifteen when his father first discovered his wife's religion. He had learnt much from his mother of the doctrines of Christianity, and had been with her an attendant on Christian worship; and hence he possessed a dangerous knowledge, of which he afterwards made so fatal a use.

But he had not the least inclination to embrace the doctrines or adopt the practices, of Christianity; nor would he hear of preparing for baptism. He was wilful and artful, with no love for any restraint upon his passions, or for any strict morality. He looked forward to distinction in the world, and to his full share in all its enjoyments. He had been, and continued to be, highly educated; and besides the Greek language, then generally spoken at Antioch, he was acquainted with Latin, which he spoke readily and gracefully, as we have seen, though with a slight foreign accent. In the family, the vernacular idiom was used with servants, and often in familiar conversation. Orontius was not sorry when his father removed him from his mother's control, and insisted that he should continue to follow the dominant and favored religion of the state.

As to the daughter, who was three years younger, he did not so much care. He deemed it foolish and unmanly to take much trouble about religion; to change it especially, or abandon that of the empire, was, he thought, a sign of weakness. But women being more imaginative, and more under the sway of the feelings, might be indulged in any fancies of this sort.

Accordingly he permitted his daughter Miriam, whose name was Syrian, as the mother belonged to a rich family from Edessa, to continue in the free exercise of her new faith. She became, in addition to her high mental cultivation, a model of virtue, simple and unpretending. It was a period, we may observe, in which the city of Antioch was renowned for the learning of its philosophers, some of whom were eminent as Christians.

A few years later, when the son had reached manhood, and had abundantly unfolded his character, the mother died. Before her end, she had seen symptoms of her husband's impending ruin; and, determined that her daughter should not be dependent on his careless administration, nor on her son's ominous selfishness and ambition, she secured effectually, from the covetousness of both, her own large fortune, which was settled on her daughter. She resisted every influence, and every art, employed to induce her to release this property, or allow it to merge in the family resources, and be made available towards relieving their embarrassments. And on her death-bed, among other solemn parental injunctions, she laid this on her daughter's filial sense of duty, that she never would allow, after coming of age, any alteration in this arrangement.

Matters grew worse and worse; creditors pressed; property had been injudiciously disposed of: when a mysterious person, called Eurotas, made his appearance in the family. No one but its head seemed to know him; and he evidently looked upon him as at once a blessing and a curse, the bearer both of salvation and of ruin.

The reader is in possession of Eurotas's own revelations; it is sufficient to add, that being the elder brother, but conscious that his rough, morose, and sinister character did not fit him for sustaining the position of head of the family and administering quietly a settled property, and having a haughty ambition to raise his house into a nobler rank, and increase even its riches, he took but a moderate sum of money as capital, vanished for years, embarked in the desperate traffic of interior Asia, penetrated into China and India, and came back home with a large fortune, and a collection of rare gems, which helped his nephew's brief career, but misguided him to ruin in Rome.

Eurotas, instead of a rich family, into which to pour superfluous wealth, found only a bankrupt house to save from ruin. But his family pride prevailed; and after many reproaches, and bitter quarrels with his brother, but concealed from all else, he paid off his debts by the extinction of his own capital, and thus virtually became master of his brother's property, and of the entire family.

After a few years of weary life, the father sickened and died. On his death-bed, he told Orontius that he had nothing to leave him, that all that he had lived on for some years, the very house over his head, belonged to his friend Eurotas, whose relationship he did not further explain, whom he must look up to entirely for support and guidance. The youth thus found himself while full of pride, ambition, and voluptuousness, in the hands of a cold-hearted, remorseless, and no less ambitious man, who soon prescribed as the basis of mutual confidence, absolute submission to his will, while he should act in the capacity of an inferior, and the understood principle, that nothing was too great or too little, nothing too good or too wicked to be done, to restore family position and wealth.

To stay at Antioch was impossible after the ruin which had overtaken the house. With a good capital in hand, much might be done elsewhere. But now, even the sale of all left would scarcely cover the liabilities discovered after the father's death. There was still untouched the sister's fortune; and both agreed that this must be got from her. Every artifice was tried, every persuasion employed, but she simply and firmly resisted; both in obedience to her mother's dying orders, and because she had in view the establishment of a house for consecrated virgins, in which she intended to pass her days. She was now of legal age to dispose of her own property. She offered them every advantage that she could give them: proposed that for a time they should all live together upon her means. But this did not answer their purpose; and when every other course had failed, Eurotas began to hint, that one who stood so much in their way should be got rid of at any cost.

Orontius shuddered at the first proposal of the thought. Eurotas familiarized him gradually with it, till—shrinking yet from the actual commission of fratricide—he thought he had almost done something virtuous, as the brothers of Joseph imagined they did, by adopting a slower and less sanguinary method of dealing with an obnoxious brother. Stratagem and unseen violence, of which no law could take cognizance, and which no one would dare reveal, offered him the best chance of success.

Among the privileges of Christians in the first ages, we have already mentioned that of reserving the Blessed Eucharist at home for domestic communion. We have described the way in which it was enfolded in an orarium, or linen cloth, again often preserved in a richer cover. This precious gift was kept in a chest (arca) with a lid, as St. Cyprian has informed us.* Orontius well knew this; and he was more aware that its contents were more prized than silver and gold; that, as the Fathers tell us, to drop negligently a crumb of the consecrated bread was considered a crime;† and that the name of “pearl,” which was given to the smallest fragment,‡ showed that it was so precious in a Christian’s eye, that he would part with all he possessed to rescue it from sacrilegious profanation.

The scarf richly embroidered with pearls, which has more than once affected our narrative, was the outer covering in which Miriam’s mother had preserved this treasure; and her daughter valued it both as a dear inheritance, and as a consecrated object, for she continued its use.

One day, early in the morning, she knelt before her ark; and after fervent preparation by prayer, proceeded to open it. To her dismay she found it already unlocked, and her treasure gone! Like Mary Magdalen at the sepulchre, she wept bitterly, because they had taken her Lord, and she knew not where they had laid Him.§ Like her, too, “as she was weeping she stooped down and looked” again into her ark, and found a paper, which in the confusion of the first glance she had overlooked.

It informed her that what she sought was safe in her brother’s hands, and might be ransomed. She ran at once to him, where he was closeted with the dark man, in whose presence she always trembled; threw herself on her knees before him, and entreated him to restore what she valued more than all her wealth. He was on the point of yielding to her tears and supplications, when Eurotas fixed his stern eye upon him, overawed him, then himself addressed her, saying:

“Miriam, we take you at your word. We wish to put the earnestness and reality of your faith to a sufficient test. Are you truly sincere in what you offer?”

“I will surrender any thing, all I have, to rescue from profanation the Holy of Holies.”

“Then sign that paper,” said Eurotas, with a sneer.

She took the pen in her hand, and after running her eye over the document, signed it. It was a surrender of her entire property to Eurotas. Orontius was furious when he saw himself overreached, by the man to whom he had suggested the snare for his sister. But it was too late; he was only the faster in his unsparing gripe. A more formal renunciation of her rights was exacted from Miriam, with the formalities required by the Roman law.

For a short time she was treated soothingly; then hints began to be given to her of the necessity of moving, as Orontius and his friend intended to proceed to Nicomedia, the imperial residence. She asked to be sent to Jerusalem, where she would obtain admission into some community of holy women. She was accordingly embarked on board a vessel, the captain of which bore a suspicious character, and was very sparingly supplied with means. But she bore round her neck what she had given proof of valuing, more than any wealth. For, as St. Ambrose relates of his brother Satyrus, yet a catechumen, Christians carried round their necks the Holy Eucharist, when embarking for a voyage.* We need not say that Miriam wore it securely, folded in the only thing of price she cared to take from her father’s house.

When the vessel was out at sea, instead of coasting towards Joppe or any port on the coast, the captain stood straight out, as if making for some distant shore. What his purpose was, it was difficult to conjecture; but his few passengers became alarmed, and a serious altercation ensued. This was cut short by a sudden storm; the vessel was carried at the mercy of the winds for some days, and then dashed to pieces on a rocky island near Cyprus. Like Satyrus, Miriam attributed her reaching the shore in safety to the precious burden which she bore. She was almost the only survivor; at least she saw no other person saved. Those, therefore, that did live besides, on returning to Antioch, reported her death, together with that of the remaining passengers and crew.

She was picked up on the shore by men who lived on such spoil. Destitute and friendless, she was sold to a trader in slaves, taken to Tarsus, on the mainland, and again sold to a person of high rank, who treated her with kindness.

After a short time, Fabius instructed one of his agents in Asia to procure a slave of polished manners and virtuous character, if possible, at any price, to attend on his daughter; and Miriam, under the name of Syra, came to bring salvation to the house of Fabiola.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

BRIGHT DEATH.

It was a few days after the occurrences related in our last chapter but one, that Fabiola was told, that an old man in great anguish, real or pretended, desired to speak with her. On going down to him and asking him his name and business, he replied:

“My name, noble lady, is Ephraim; and I have a large debt secured on the property of the late Lady Agnes, which I understand has now passed into your hands; and I am come, therefore, to claim it from you, for otherwise I am a ruined man!”

“How is that possible?” asked Fabiola in amazement. “I cannot believe that my cousin ever contracted debts.”

“No, not she,” rejoined the usurer, a little abashed; “but a gentleman called Fulvius, to whom the property was to come by confiscation; so I advanced him large sums upon it.”

Her first impulse was to turn the man out of the house; but the thought of the sister came to her mind, and she civilly said to him:

“Whatever debts Fulvius has contracted I will discharge; but with only legal interest, and without regard to usurious contracts.”

“But think of the risks I ran, madam. I have been most moderate in my rates, I assure you.”

“Well,” she answered, “call on my steward, and he shall settle all. You are running no risks now at least.”

She gave instructions, accordingly, to the freed-man who managed her affairs, to pay this sum on those conditions, which reduced it to one half the demand. But she soon engaged him in a more laborious task, that of going through the whole of her late father’s accounts, and ascertaining every * “Cum arcam suam, in qua Domini sanctum fuit, manibus indignis tasset aperire, igne inde surgente deterrita est, ne auderet attingere.” “When she attempted to open, with unworthy hands, her chest, in which was the holy (body) of our Lord, she was deterred from daring to touch it, by fire rising up from it.” De Lapida.

† See Maritonne, De antiquis Ecclesiis Ritibus.

‡ So in the eastern liturgies. Fortunatus calls the Blessed Eucharist “Corporis Agni margaritarum iugens.” “The huge pearl of the body of the Lamb.” Lit. III. car. 25.

§ St. John xxi, 18.

* De morte Satyri.

case of injury or oppression, that restitution might be made. And further, having ascertained that Corvinus had really obtained the imperial rescript, through his father, by which her own lawful property was saved from confiscation, though she refused ever to see him, she bestowed upon him such remuneration as might ensure him comfort through life.

These temporal matters being soon disposed of, she divided her attention between the care of the patient and preparation for her Christian initiation. To promote Miriam's recovery, she removed her, with a small portion of her household, to a spot dear to both, the Nomentan villa. The spring had set in, and Miriam could have her couch brought to the window, or, in the warmest part of the day, could even be carried down into the garden before the house, where, with Fabiola on one side and Emerentiana on the other, and poor Molossus, who had lost all his spirit, at her feet, they would talk of friends lost, and especially of her with whom every object around was associated in their memories. And no sooner was the name of Agnes mentioned, than her old faithful guard would prick up his ears and wag his tail, and look around him. They would also frequently discourse on Christian subjects, when Miriam would follow up, humbly and unpretendingly, but with the warm glow which had first charmed Fabiola, the instructions given by the holy Dionysius.

Thus, for instance, when he had been treating of the virtue and meaning of the sign of the cross to be used in baptism, "whether on the forehead of believers, or over the water, by which they were to be regenerated, or the oil with which, as well as the chrism, they were anointed, or the sacrifice by which they were fed;"* Miriam explained to the catechumens its more domestic and practical use, and exhorted them to practise faithfully what all good Christians did, that is, to make this holy sign upon themselves already, "in the course and at the beginning of every work, on coming in and going out, when putting on their clothes, or sandals, when they washed, sat down to table, lighted their lamp, lay down in bed, or sat on a chair, in whatever conversation they should be engaged."†

But it was observed with pain, by all but Fabiola, that the patient, though the wound had healed, did not gain strength. It is often the mother or the sister that is last to see the slow waste of illness, in child or sister. Love is so hopeful, and so blind! There was a hectic flush on her cheek, she was emaciated and weak, and a slight cough was heard from time to time. She lay long awake, and she desired to have her bed so placed that from early dawn she could look out upon one spot more fair to them all than the richest parterre.

There had long been in the villa an entrance to the cemetery on this road; but from this time it had already received the name of Agnes; for near its entrance had this holy martyr been buried. Her body rested in a cubiculum or chamber, under an arched tomb. Just above the entrance into this chamber, and in the middle of the grounds, was an opening, surrounded above by a low parapet, concealed by shrubs, which gave light and air to the room below. Towards this point Miriam loved to look, as the nearest approach she could make, in her infirm health, to the sepulchre of one whom she so much venerated and loved.

Early one morning, beautiful and calm, for it wanted but a few weeks to Easter, she was looking in that direction, when she observed half-a-dozen young men, who on their way to angle in the neighboring Anio, were taking a short cut across the villa, and so committing a trespass. They passed by this opening and one of them, having looked down, called the others.

"This is one of those underground lurking-places of the Christians."

"One of their rabbit-holes into the burrow."

"Let us go in," said one.

"Yes, and how shall we get up again?" asked a second.

This dialogue she could not hear, but she saw what followed it. One who had looked down more carefully, shading his eyes from the light, called the others to do the same, but with gestures which enjoined silence. In a moment they pulled down large stones from the rock-work of a fountain, close at hand, and threw down a volley of them at something below. They laughed very heartily as they went away; and Miriam supposed that they had seen some serpent or other noxious animal below, and had amused themselves with pelting it.

When others were stirring she mentioned the occurrence, that the stones might be removed. Fabiola went down herself with a few servants, for she was jealous of the custody of Agnes's tomb. What was her distress at finding poor Emerentiana, gone down to pray at her foster-sister's tomb, lying weltering in her blood, and perfectly dead. It was discovered that, the evening before, passing by some Pagan orgies near the river, and being invited to join in them, she had not only refused, but had reproached the partakers in them with their wickedness, and with their cruelties to Christians. They assailed her with stones, and grievously wounded her; but she escaped from their fury into the villa. Feeling herself faint and wounded, she crept unnoticed to the tomb of Agnes, there to pray. She had been unable to move away when some of her former assailants discovered her. Those brutal Pagans had anticipated the ministry of the Church, and had conferred upon her the baptism of blood. She was buried near Agnes, and the modest peasant child received the honor of annual commemoration among the Saints.

Fabiola and her companions went through the usual course of preparation, though abridged on account of the persecution. By living at the very entrance into a cemetery, and one furnished with such large churches, they were enabled to pass through the three stages of catechumenship. First they were hearers,* admitted to be present, while the lessons were read; then kneelers,† who assisted at a portion of the liturgical prayers; and lastly elect, or petitioners‡ for baptism.

Once in this last class, they had to attend frequently in church, but more particularly on the three Wednesdays following the first, the fourth, and the last Sundays in Lent, on which days the Roman Missal yet retains a second collect and lesson, derived from this custom. Any one perusing the present rite of baptism in the Catholic Church, especially that of adults, will see condensed into one office what used to be anciently distributed through a variety of functions. On one day the renunciation of Satan was made, previous to its repetition just before baptism; on another the touching of the ears and nostrils, or the Ephpheta, as it was called. Then were repeated exorcisms, and genuflections, and signings of crosses on the forehead and body,§ breathings upon the candidate, and other mysterious rites. More solemn still was the unction, which was not confined to the head, but extended to the whole body.

The Creed was also faithfully learnt, and committed to memory. But the doctrine of the Blessed Eucharist was not imparted till after baptism.

In these multiplied preparatory exercises the penitential time of Lent passed quickly and solemnly, till at last Easter-eve arrived.

It does not fall to our lot to describe the ceremonial of the Church in the administration of the Sacraments. The liturgical system received its great developments after peace had been gained; and much that belongs to outward forms and splendor was incompatible with the bitter persecution which the Church was undergoing.

It is enough for us to have shown, how not only doctrines and great sacred rites, but how even ceremonies and accessories were the same in the three first centuries as now. If our example is thought worth following, some one will perhaps illustrate a brighter period than we have chosen.

The baptism of Fabiola and her household had nothing to cheer it but purely spiritual joy. The titles in the city were * St. Aug. Tract. cxviii, in Joan.

† Tertullian (who lived earlier than two hundred years after Christ, and is the oldest Latin ecclesiastical writer) de Corona Milit. c. 3.

* Audientes. † Genuflectentes. ‡ Electi and competentes.

§ There will be found, particularly in the baptism of adults, joined with repetitions of the Our Father.

all closed, and among them that of St. Pastor with its papal baptistery.

Early, therefore, on the morning of the auspicious day, the party crept round the walls to the opposite side of the city, and following the Via Portuensis, or road that led to the port at the mouth of the Tiber, turned into a vineyard near Cæsar's gardens, and descended into the cemetery of Pontianus, celebrated as the resting-place of the Persian martyrs, SS. Abdon and Sennen.

The morning was spent in prayer and preparation, when towards evening the solemn office, which was to be protracted through the night, commenced.

When the time for the administration of baptism arrived, it was indeed but a dreary celebration that it introduced. Deep in the bowels of the earth the waters of a subterraneous stream had been gathered into a square well or cistern, from four or five feet deep. They were clear, indeed, but cold and bleak, if we may use the expression, in their subterranean bath, formed out of the tuffo, or volcanic rock. A long flight of steps led down to this rude baptistery, a small ledge at the side sufficed for the minister and the candidate, who was thrice immersed in the purifying waters.

The whole remains to this day, just as it was then, except that over the water is now to be seen a painting of St. John baptizing our Lord, added probably a century or two later.

Immediately after Baptism followed Confirmation, and then the neophyte, or new-born child of the Church, after due instruction, was admitted for the first time to the table of his Lord, and nourished with the Bread of angels.

It was not till late on Easter-day that Fabiola returned to her villa; and a long and silent embrace was her first greeting of Miriam. Both were so happy, so blissful, so fully repaid for all that they had been to one another for months, that no words could give expression to their feelings. Fabiola's grand idea and absorbing pride, that day was, that now she had risen to the level of her former slave: not in virtue, not in beauty of character, not in greatness of mind, not in heavenly wisdom, not in merit before God; oh! no; in all this she felt herself infinitely her inferior. But as a child of God, as heiress to an eternal kingdom, as a living member of the body of Christ, as admitted to a share in all His mercies, to all the price of His redemption, as a new creature in Him, she felt that she was equal to Miriam, and with happy glee she told her so.

Never had she been so proud of splendid garment as she was of the white robe, which she had received as she came out of the font, and which she had to wear for eight days.

But a merciful Father knows how to blend our joys and sorrows, and sends us the latter when He has best prepared us for them. In that warm embrace which we have mentioned, she for the first time noticed the shortened breath, and heaving chest of her dear sister. She would not dwell upon it in her thoughts, but sent to beg Dionysius to come on the morrow. That evening they all kept their Easter banquet together; and Fabiola felt happy to preside at Miriam's side over a table, at which reclined or sat her own converted slaves, and those of Agnes's household, all of whom she had retained. She never remembered having enjoyed so delightful a supper.

Early next morning, Miriam called Fabiola to her side, and with a fond, caressing manner, which she had never before displayed, said to her:

"My dear sister, what will you do, when I have left you?"

Poor Fabiola was overpowered with grief. "Are you then going to leave me? I had hoped we should live for ever as sisters together. But if you wish to leave Rome, may I not accompany you, at least to nurse you, to serve you?"

Miriam smiled, but a tear was in her eye, as taking her sister's hand, she pointed up towards heaven. Fabiola understood her, and said: "O, no, no, dearest sister. Pray to God, who will refuse you nothing, that I may not lose you. It is selfish, I know; but what can I do without you? And now, too, that I have learnt how much they who reign with Christ can do for us by intercession, I will pray to Agnes* and Sebastian, to interpose for me, and avert so great a calamity.

"Do get well: I am sure there is nothing serious in the matter; the warm weather, and the genial climate of Campania, will soon restore you. We will sit again together by the spring, and talk over better things than philosophy."

Miriam shook her head, not mournfully, but cheerfully, as she replied:

"Do not flatter yourself, dearest; God has spared me till I should see this happy day. But His hand is on me now for death, as it has been hitherto for life; and I hail it with joy. I know too well the number of my days."

"Oh! let it not be so soon!" sobbed out Fabiola.

"Not while you have on your white garment, dear sister," answered Miriam. "I know you would wish to mourn for me; but I would not rob you of one hour of your mystic whiteness."

Dionysius came, and saw a great change in his patient, whom he had not visited for some time. It was as he had feared it might be. The insidious point of the dagger had curled round the bone, and injured the pleura; and phthisis had rapidly set in. He confirmed Miriam's most serious anticipations.

Fabiola went to pray for resignation at the sepulchre of Agnes; she prayed long and fervently, and with many tears, then returned.

"Sister," she said with firmness, "God's will be done, I entreat you, what would you have me do, after you are taken from me!"

Miriam looked up to heaven, and answered, "Lay my body at the feet of Agnes, and remain to watch over us, to pray to her, and for me; until a stranger shall arrive from the East, the bearer of good tidings."

On the Sunday following, "Sunday of the white garments," Dionysius celebrated, by special permission, the sacred mysteries in Miriam's room, and administered to her the most holy Communion, as her viaticum. This private celebration, as we know from St. Augustine and others, was not a rare privilege.† Afterwards, he anointed her with oil, accompanied by prayer, the last Sacrament which the Church bestows.

Fabiola and the household who had attended these solemn rites, with tears and prayers, now descended into the crypt, and after the divine offices returned to Miriam in their darker raiment.

"The hour is come," said she, taking Fabiola's hand. "Forgive me, if I have been wanting in duty to you, and in good example."

This was more than Fabiola could stand, and she burst into tears. Miriam soothed her, and said, "Put to my lips the sign of salvation when I can speak no more; and, good Dionysius, remember me at God's altar when I am departed."

He prayed at her side, and she replied, till at length her voice failed her. But her lips moved, and she pressed them on the cross presented to her. She looked serene and joyful, till at length raising her hand to her forehead, then bringing it to her breast, it fell dead there, in making the saving sign. A smile passed-over her face, and she expired, as thousands of Christ's children have expired since.

Fabiola mourned much over her; but this time she mourned as they do who have hope.

* "Agnes sepulchrum est Romulea in domo, Fortis puella, martyris inclita. Conspectu in ipso condita turrium Servat salutem virgo Quiritum: Necnon et ipsos protegit advenas, Puro ac fideli pectore supplices."

Prudentius.

† The tomb of Agnes graces Rome, A maiden brave, a martyr great, Resting in sight of battioned gate, From harm the virgin shields her home; Nor to the stranger help denies, If sought with pure and faithful sighs."

† St. Ambrose said mass in the house of a lady beyond the Tiber (Paulina, in his Life, tom. ii. Oper. ed. Bened.) St. Augustine mentions a priest's saying mass in a house supposed to be infested with evil spirits. De Civ. D. lib. xii. c. 6.

PART THIRD—VICTORY.

CHAPTER I.

THE STRANGER FROM THE EAST.

WE APPEAR to ourselves to be walking in solitude. One by one those whose words and actions and thoughts have hitherto accompanied and sustained us, have dropped off, and the prospect around looks very dreary. But is all this unnatural? We have been describing not an ordinary period of peace and every-day life, but one of warfare, strife, and battle. Is it unnatural that the bravest, the most heroic, should have fallen thick around us? We have been reviving the memory of the cruellest persecution which the Church ever suffered, when it was proposed to erect a column bearing the inscription that the Christian name had been extinguished. Is it strange that the holiest and purest should have been the earliest to be crowned?

And yet the Church of Christ has still to sustain many years of sharper persecution than we have described. A succession of tyrants and oppressors kept up the fearful war upon her, without intermission, in one part of the world or another for twenty years, even after Constantine had checked it wherever his power reached. Dioclesian, Galerius, Maximinus, and Licinius in the East, Maximian and Maxentius in the West, allowed no rest to the Christians under their several dominions. Like one of those rolling storms which go over half the world, visiting various countries with their ravaging energy, while their gloomy foreboding or sullen wake simultaneously overshadow them all, so did this persecution wreak its fury first on one country, then on another, destroying every thing Christian, passing from Italy to Africa, from Upper Asia to Palestine, Egypt, and then back to Armenia, while it left no place in actual peace, but hung like a blighting storm-cloud over the entire empire.

And yet the Church increased, prospered, and defied this world of sin. Pontiff stepped after Pontiff at once upon the footstool of the papal throne and upon the scaffold; councils were held in the dark halls of the catacombs; bishops came to Rome, at risk of their lives, to consult the successor of St. Peter; letters were exchanged between Churches far distant and the supreme Ruler of Christendom, and between different Churches, full of sympathy, encouragement and affection; bishop succeeded bishop in his see, and ordained priests and ministers to take the place of the fallen, and be a mark set upon the bulwarks of the city for the enemy's aim; and the work of Christ's imperishable kingdom went on without interruption, and without fear of extinction.

Indeed it was in the midst of all these alarms and conflicts, that the foundations were being laid of a mighty system, destined to produce stupendous effects in after ages. The persecution drove many from the cities, into the deserts of Egypt, where the monastic state grew up, so as to make "the wilderness rejoice and flourish like the lily, bud forth and blossom, and rejoice with joy and praise."* And so, when Dioclesian had been degraded from the purple, and had died a peevish destitute old man, and Galerius had been eaten up alive by ulcers and worms, and had acknowledged, by public edict, the failure of his attempts, and Maximian Hercules had strangled himself, and Maxentius had perished in the Tiber, and Maximinus had expired amidst tortures inflicted by Divine justice, equal to any he had inflicted on Christians, his very eyes having started from their sockets, and Licinius had been put to death by Constantine; the Spouse of Christ, whom they had all conspired to destroy, stood young and blooming as ever, about to enter into her great career of universal diffusion and rule.

It was in the year 313 that Constantine, having defeated Maxentius, gave full liberty to the Church. Even if ancient writers had not described it, we may imagine the joy and gratitude of the poor Christians on this great change. It was like the coming forth, and tearful though happy greeting, of the inhabitants of a city decimated by plague, when proclamation has gone forth that the infection has ceased. For here, after ten years of separation and concealment, when families could scarcely meet in the cemeteries nearest them, many did not know who among friends or kinsfolk had fallen victims, or who might yet survive. Timid at first, and then more courageous, they ventured forth; soon the places of old assembly, which children born in the last ten years had not seen, were cleansed, or repaired, refitted and reconciled,* and opened to public and now fearless worship.

Constantine also ordered all property, public or private, belonging to Christians and confiscated, to be restored; but with the wise provision that the actual holders should be indemnified by the imperial treasury.† The Church was soon in motion to bring out all the resources of her beautiful forms and institutions; and either the existing basilicas were converted to her uses, or new ones were built on the most cherished spots of Rome.

Let not the reader fear that we are going to lead him forward into a long history. This will belong to some one better qualified for the task of unfolding the grandeur and charms of free and unfettered Christianity. We have only to show the land of promise from above, spread like an inviting paradise before our feet; we are not the Jesus that must lead others in. The little that we have to add in this brief third part of our humble book, is barely what is necessary for its completion.

We will then suppose ourselves arrived at the year 318, fifteen years after our last scene of death. Time and permanent laws have given security to the Christian religion, and the Church is likewise more fully establishing her organization. Many who on the return of peace had hung down their heads, having by some act of weak condescension escaped death, had by this time expiated their fall by penance; and now and then an aged stranger would be saluted reverently by the passers-by when they saw that his right eye had been burnt out, or his hand mutilated; or when his halting gait showed that the tendons of the knee had been severed, in the late persecution, for Christ's sake.‡

If at this period our friendly reader will follow us out of the Nomentan gate, to the valley with which he is already acquainted, he will find sad havoc among the beautiful trees and flower-beds of Fabiola's villa. Scaffold-poles are standing up in place of the first; bricks, marbles and columns lie upon the latter. Constantia, the daughter of Constantine, had prayed at St. Agnes's tomb, when not yet a Christian, to beg the cure of a virulent ulcer, had been refreshed by a vision, and completely cured. Being now baptized, she was repaying her debt of gratitude by building over her tomb her beautiful basilica. Still the faithful had access to the crypt in which she was buried; and great was the concourse of pilgrims that came from all parts of the world.

One afternoon when Fabiola returned from the city to her villa, after spending the day in attending to the sick, in an hospital established in her own house, the fossor, who had charge of the cemetery, met her with an air of great interest and no small excitement, and said:

"Madam, I sincerely believe that the stranger from the East, whom you have so long expected, is arrived."

Fabiola, who had ever treasured up the dying words of Miriam, eagerly asked, "Where is he?"

"He is gone again," was the reply.

The lady's countenance fell. "But how," she asked again, "do you know it was he?" The excavator replied:

"In the course of the morning I noticed, among the crowd, a man not yet fifty, but worn by mortification and sorrow, to premature old age. His hair was nearly grey, as was his long beard. His dress was eastern, and he wore the cloak which the monks from that country usually do. When he came before the tomb of Agnes, he flung himself upon the pavement with such a passion of tears, such groans, such sobs, as moved all around to compassion. Many approached him, and whispered, 'Brother, thou art in great distress; weep not so, the saint is merciful.' Others said to him, 'We will all pray for thee, fear not.' But he seemed to be beyond comfort. I thought to myself, surely in the presence of so gentle and kind a saint, none ought to be thus disconsolate or heart-broken, except only one man."

* The ceremony employed after desecration.

† Euseb. H. E. lib. x. c. 5.

‡ In the East, some governors, wearied with wholesale murders, adopted this more merciful way of treating Christians toward the end of the persecution. See Eusebius.

"Go on, go on," broke in Fabiola; "what did he next?"

"After a long time," continued the fessor, "he arose, and drawing from his bosom a most beautiful and sparkling ring, he laid it on her tomb. I thought I had seen it before. many years ago."

"And then?"

"Turning round he saw me, and recognized my dress. He approached me, and I could feel him trembling, as, without looking in my face, he timidly asked me, 'Brother, knowest thou if there be buried anywhere here about a maiden from Syria, called Miriam?' I pointed silently to the tomb. After a pause of great pain to himself, so agitated now that his voice faltered, he asked me again, 'Knowest thou, brother, of what she died?' 'Of consumption,' I replied. 'Thank God!' he ejaculated, with the sigh of relieved anguish, and fell prostrate on the ground. Here too he moaned and cried for more than an hour, then, approaching the tomb, affectionately kissed its cover, and retired."

"It is he, Torquatus, it is he!" warmly exclaimed Fabiola; "why did you not detain him?"

"I durst not, lady; after I had once seen his face, I had not courage to meet his eye. But I am sure he will return again; for he went towards the city."

"He must be found," concluded Fabiola. "Dear Miriam, thou hadst then, this consoling foresight in death!"

CHAPTER II.

THE STRANGER IN ROME.

EARLY next morning, the pilgrim was passing through the Forum, when he saw a group of persons gathered round one whom they were evidently teasing. He would have paid but little attention to such a scene in a public thoroughfare, had not his ear caught a name familiar to it. He therefore, drew nigh. In the centre was a man, younger than himself; but if he looked older than he was, from being wan, and attenuated, the other did so much more from being the very contrary. He was bald and bloated, with a face swelled, and red, and covered with blotches and boils. A drunken cunning swam in his eye, and his gait and tone were those of a man habitually intoxicated. His clothes were dirty, and his whole person neglected.

"Ay, ay, Corvinus," one youth was saying to him, "won't you get your deserts, now? Have you not heard that Constantine is coming this year to Rome, and don't you think the Christians will have their turn about now?"

"Not they," answered the man we have described, "they have not the pluck for it. I remember we feared it, when Constantine published his first edict, after the death of Maxentius, about liberty for the Christians, but next year he puts us out of fear, by declaring all religions to be equally permitted."*

"That is all very well, as a general rule," interposed another, determined further to plague him; "but is it not supposed that he is going to look up those who took an active part in the late persecution, and have the lex talionis† executed on them; stripe for stripe, burning for burning, and wild beast for wild beast?"

"Who says so?" asked Corvinus, turning pale.

* Eusebius, ubi sup.

† The law of retaliation, such as was prescribed also in the Mosala law, "an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth," &c.

"Why, it would surely be very natural," said one youth.

"And very just," added another.

"Oh, never mind," said Corvinus, "they will always let one off for turning Christian. And, I am sure, I would turn any thing, rather than stand—"

"Where Pancratius stood," interposed a third, more malicious.

"Hold your tongue," broke out the drunkard, with a tone of positive rage. "Mention his name again, if you dare!" And he raised his fist, and looked furiously at the speaker.

"Ay, because he told you how you were to die," shouted the youngster, running away. "Heigh! Heigh! a panther here for Corvinus!"

All ran away before the human beast, now lashed into fury, more than they would have done from the wild one of the desert. He cursed them, and threw stones after them.

The pilgrim, from a short distance, watched the close of the scene, then went on. Corvinus moved slower along the same road, that which led towards the Lateran basilica, now the Cathedral of Rome. Suddenly a sharp growl was heard, and with it a piercing shriek. As they were passing by the Coliseum, near the dens of the wild beasts, which were prepared for combats among themselves, on occasion of the emperor's visit, Corvinus, impelled by the morbid curiosity natural to persons who consider themselves victims of some fatality, connected with a particular object, approached the cage in which a splendid panther was kept. He went close to the bars, and provoked the animal, by gestures and words; saying: "Very likely, indeed, that you are to be the death of me! You are very safe in your den." In that instant, the enraged animal made a spring at him, and through the wide bars of the den, caught his neck and throat in its fangs, and inflicted a frightful lacerated wound.

The wretched man was picked up, and carried to his lodgings, not far off. The stranger followed him, and found them mean, dirty, and uncomfortable in the extreme; with only an old and decrepit slave, apparently as sottish as his master, to attend him. The stranger sent him out to procure a surgeon, who was long in coming; and, in the meantime, did his best to stanch the blood.

While he was so occupied, Corvinus fixed his eyes upon him with a look of one delirious, or demented.

"Do you know me?" asked the pilgrim, soothingly.

"Know you? No—yes. Let me see—Ha! the fox! my fox! Do you remember our hunting together those hateful Christians. Where have you been all this time? How many of them have you caught?" And he laughed outrageously.

"Peace, peace, Corvinus," replied the other. "You must be very quiet, or there is no hope for you. Besides, I do not wish you to allude to those times; for I am myself now a Christian."

"You a Christian?" broke out Corvinus savagely. "You who have shed more of their best blood than any man? Have you been forgiven for all this? Or have you slept quietly upon it? Have no furies lashed you at night? no phantoms haunted you? no viper sucked your heart? If so, tell me how you have got rid of them all, that I may do the same. If not, they will come, they will come! Vengeance and fury! why should they not have tormented you as much as me?"

"Silence, Corvinus; I have suffered as you have. But I have found the remedy, and will make it known to you, as soon as the physician has seen you, for he is approaching."

The doctor saw him, dressed the wound, but gave little hope of recovery, especially in a patient whose very blood was tainted by intemperance.

The stranger now resumed his seat beside him, and spoke of the mercy of God, and His readiness to forgive the worst of sinners; whereof he himself was a living proof. The unhappy man seemed to be in a sort of stupor; if he listened, not comprehending what was said. At length his kind instructor, having expounded to him the fundamental mysteries of Christianity in hope, rather than certainty, of being attended to, said:

"And now, Corvinus, you will ask me how is forgiveness to be applied to one who believes all this? It is by baptism, by being born again of water and the Holy Ghost."

"What?" exclaimed the sick man, loathingly.

"By being washed in the laver of regenerating water."

He was interrupted by a convulsive growl rather than a moan. "Water! water! no water for me! Take it away!" And a strong spasm seized the patient's throat.

His attendant was alarmed, but sought to calm him. "Think not," he said, "that you are to be taken hence in your present fever, and to be plunged into water" (the sick man shuddered and moaned); "in clinical baptism,* a few drops suffice, not more than is in this pitcher." And he showed him the water in a small vessel. At the sight of it, the patient writhed and foamed at the mouth, and was shaken by a violent convulsion. The sounds that proceeded from him resembled a howl from a wild beast more than any utterance of human lips.

The pilgrim saw at once that hydrophobia, with all its horrible symptoms, had come upon the patient from the bite of the enraged animal. It was with difficulty that he and the servant could hold him down at times. Occasionally he broke out into frightful paroxysms of blasphemous violence against God and man. And then, when this subsided, he would go on moaning thus:

"Water they want to give me! water! water! none for me! It is fire! fire! that I have, and that is my portion. I am already on fire, within, without! Look how it comes creeping up, all around me, it advances every moment nearer and nearer!" And he beat off the fancied flame with his hands on either side of his head, and he blew at it around his head. Then turning toward his sorrowful attendants, he would say, "Why don't you put it out? you see it is already burning me."

Thus passed the dreary day, and thus came the dismal night, when the fever increased, and with it the delirium, and the violent accessions of fury, though the body was sinking. At length he raised himself up in bed, and looking with half-glazed eyes straight before him, he exclaimed in a voice choked with bitter rage:

"Away, Pancratius, begone! Thou hast glared on me long enough. Keep back thy panther! Hold it fast; it is going to fly at my throat. It comes! Oh!" And with a convulsive grasp, as if pulling the beast from off his throat, he plucked away the bandage from his wound. A gush of blood poured over him, and he fell back a hideous corpse upon the bed.

His friend saw how unrepenting persecutors died.

CHAPTER III.

AT LAST.

THE next morning the pilgrim proceeded to discharge the business which had been interfered with by the circumstances related in the preceding chapter. He might have been first seen busily employed inquiring after some one, about the Januses in the Forum. At length the person was found; and the two walked toward a dirty little office under the Capitol, on the ascent called the Clivus Asyli. Old musty books were brought out, and searched column after column, till they came to the date of the "Consuls Dioclesian Augustus, the eighth time, and Maximian Hercules Augustus, the seventh time."† Here they found sundry entries with reference to certain documents. A roll of mouldy parchments of that date was produced, docketed as referred to, and the number corresponding to the entries was drawn out and examined. The result of the investigation seemed perfectly satisfactory to both parties.

"It is the first time in my life," said the owner of the den, "that I ever knew a person who had got clear off, come back, after fifteen years, to inquire after his debts. A Christian, I presume, sir?"

"Certainly, by God's mercy."

* Clinical baptism, or that of persons confined to their beds, was administered by pouring or sprinkling the water on the head. See Bingham, book xi. c. 11.

† A. D. 303.

"I thought as much; good morning, sir. I shall be happy to accommodate you at any time, at as reasonable rates as my father Ephraim, now with Abraham. A great fool that for his pains, I must say, begging his pardon," he added, when the stranger was out of hearing.

With a decided step and a brighter countenance than he had yet displayed, he went straight to the villa on the Nomentan way; and after again paying his devotions in the crypt, but with a lighter heart, he at once addressed the fessor, as if they had never been parted: "Torquatus, can I speak with the Lady Fabiola?"

"Certainly," answered the other; "come this way."

Neither alluded, as they went along, to old times, nor to the intermediate history of either. There seemed to be an understanding, instinctive to both, that all the past was to be obliterated before men, as they hoped it was before God. Fabiola had remained at home that and the preceding day, in hopes of the stranger's return. She was seated in the garden close to a fountain, when Torquatus, pointing to her, retired.

She rose, as she saw the long-expected visitor approach, and an indescribable emotion thrilled through her, when she found herself standing in his presence.

"Madam," he said, in a tone of deep humility and earnest simplicity, "I should never have presumed to present myself before you, had not an obligation of justice, as well as many of gratitude, obliged me."

"Orontius," she replied,— "is this the name by which I must address you?" (he signified his assent) "you can have no obligations towards me, except that which our great Apostle charges on us, that we love one another."

"I know you feel so. And therefore I would not have pretended, unworthy as I am, to intrude upon you for any lower motive than one of strict duty. I know what gratitude I owe you for the kindness and affection lavished upon one now dearer to me than any sister can be on earth, and how you discharged towards her the offices of love which I had neglected."

"And thereby sent her to me," interposed Fabiola, "to be my angel of life. Remember, Orontius, that Joseph was sold by his brethren, only that he might save his race."

"You are too good, indeed, towards one so worthless," resumed the pilgrim; "but I will not thank you for your kindness to another who has repaid you so richly. Only this morning I have learnt your mercy to one who could have no claim upon you."

"I do not understand you," observed Fabiola.

"Then I will tell you all plainly," rejoined Orontius. "I have now been for many years a member of one of those communities in Palestine, of men who live separated from the world in desert places, dividing their day, and even their night between singing the Divine praises, contemplation, and the labor of their hands. Severe penance for past transgressions, fasting, mourning, and prayer form the great duty of our penitential state. Have you heard of such men here?"

"The fame of holy Paul and Anthony is as great in the West as in the East," replied the lady.

"It is with the greatest disciple of the latter that I have lived, supported by his great example, and the consolation he has given me. But one thought troubled me, and prevented my feeling complete assurance of safety, even after years of expiation. Before I left Rome I had contracted a heavy debt, which must have been accumulating at a frightful rate of interest, till it reached an overwhelming amount. Yet it was an obligation deliberately contracted, and not to be justly evaded. I was a poor cenobite,* barely living on the produce of the few palm-leaf mats that I could weave, and the scanty herbs that would grow in the sand. How could I discharge my obligations?"

"Only one means remained. I could give myself up to my creditor as a slave, to labor for him and endure his blows and scornful reproaches in patience, or to be sold by him for my value, for I am yet strong. In either case, I should have had my Saviour's example to cheer and support me. At any rate, I should have given up all that I had—myself.

* Religious who lived in community, or common life, were so called.

"I went this morning to the Forum, found my creditor's son, examined his accounts, and found that you had discharged my debt in full. I am, therefore, your bondsman, Lady Fabiola, instead of the Jew's." And he knelt humbly at her feet.

"Rise, rise," said Fabiola, turning away her weeping eyes. "You are no bondsman of mine, but a dear brother in our common Lord."

Then sitting down with him, she said: "Orontius, I have a great favor to ask from you. Give me some account of how you were brought to that life, which you have so generously embraced."

"I will obey you as briefly as possible. I fled, as you know, one sorrowful night from Rome, accompanied by a man"—and his voice choked him.

"I know, I know whom you mean—Eurotas," interrupted Fabiola.

"The same, the curse of our house, the author of all mine, and my dear sister's, sufferings. We had to charter a vessel at great expense from Brundisium, whence we sailed for Cyprus. We attempted commerce and various speculations, but all failed. There was manifestly a curse on all that we undertook. Our means melted away, and we were obliged to seek some other country. We crossed over to Palestine, and settled for a while at Gaza. Very soon we were reduced to distress; every body shunned us, we knew not why; but my conscience told me that the mark of Cain was on my brow."

Orontius paused and wept for a time, then went on:

"At length, when all was exhausted, and nothing remained but a few jewels, of considerable price indeed, but with which, I knew not why, Eurotas would not part, he urged me to take up the odious office of denouncing Christians; for a furious persecution was breaking out. For the first time in my life I rebelled against his commands, and refused to obey. One day he asked me to walk out of the gates; we wandered far, till we came to a delightful spot in the midst of the desert. It was a narrow dell, covered with verdure, and shaded by palm-trees; a little clear stream ran down, issuing from a spring in a rock at the head of the valley. In this rock we saw grottoes and caverns; but the place seemed uninhabited. Not a sound could be heard but the bubbling of the water.

"We sat down to rest, when Eurotas addressed me in a fearful speech. The time was come, he told me, when we must both fulfil the dreadful resolution he had taken, that we must not survive the ruin of our family. Here we must both die; the wild beasts would consume our bodies, and no one would know the end of its last representatives.

"So saying, he drew forth two small flasks of unequal sizes, handed me the larger one, and swallowed the contents of the smaller.

"I refused to take it, and even reproached him for the difference of our doses; but he replied that he was old, and I young; and that they were proportioned to our respective strengths. I still refused, having no wish to die. But a sort of demoniacal fury seemed to come over him; he seized me with a giant's grasp, as I sat on the ground, threw me on my back, and exclaiming, 'We must both perish together,' forcibly poured the contents of the phial, without sparing me a drop, down my throat.

"In an instant, I was unconscious; and remained so, till I awoke in a cavern, and faintly called for drink. A venerable old man, with a white beard, put a wooden bowl of water to my lips. 'Where is Eurotas?' I asked. 'Is that your companion?' inquired the old monk. 'Yes,' I answered. 'He is dead,' was the reply. I know not by what fatality this had happened; but I bless God with all my heart, for having spared me.

"That old man was Hilarion, a native of Gaza, who, having spent many years with the holy Anthony in Egypt, had that year* returned to establish the cenobitic and eremitical life in his own country, and had already collected several disciples.

They lived in the caves hard by, and took their refection under the shade of those palms, and softened their dry food in the water of that fountain.

"Their kindness to me, their cheerful piety, their holy lives, won on me as I recovered. I saw the religion which I had persecuted in a sublime form; and rapidly recalled to mind the instructions of my dear mother, and the example of my sister; so that yielding to grace, I bewailed my sins at the feet of God's minister,* and received baptism on Easter-eve."

"Then we are doubly brethren, nay twin children of the Church; for I was born to eternal life, also, on that day. But what do you intend to do now?"

"Set out this evening on my return. I have accomplished the two objects of my journey. The first was to cancel my debt; my second was to lay an offering on the shrine of Agnes. You will remember," he added, smiling, "that your good father unintentionally deceived me into the idea, that she coveted the jewels I displayed. Fool that I was! But I resolved, after my conversion, that she should possess the best that remained in Eurotas's keeping; so I brought it to her."

"But have you means for your journey?" asked the lady timidly.

"Abundant," he replied, "in the charity of the faithful. I have letters from the Bishop of Gaza, which secure me every where sustenance and lodging; but I will accept from you a cup of water and a morsel of bread, in the name of a disciple."

They rose, and were advancing towards the house, when a woman rushed madly through the shrubs, and fell at their feet, exclaiming, "Oh, save me! dear mistress, save me! He is pursuing me, to kill me!"

Fabiola recognized, in the poor creature, her former slave Jubala, but her hair was grizzly and dishevelled, and her whole aspect bespoke abject misery. She asked whom she meant.

"My husband," she replied; "long has he been harsh and cruel, but to-day he is more brutal than usual. Oh, save me from him!"

"There is no danger here," replied the lady; "but I fear, Jubala, you are far from happy. I have not seen you for a long, long time."

"No, dear lady, why should I come to tell you of all my woes? Oh, why did I ever leave you and your house, where I ought to have been so happy? I might then with you, and Graja, and good old departed Euphrosyne, have learnt to be good myself, and have embraced Christianity!"

"What, have you really been thinking of this, Jubala?"

"For a long time, lady, in my sorrows and remorse. For I have seen how happy Christians are, even those who have been as wicked as myself. And because I hinted this to my husband this morning, he has beaten me, and threatened to take my life. But, thank God, I have been making myself acquainted with Christian doctrines, through the teaching of a friend."

"How long has this bad treatment gone on, Jubala?" asked Orontius, who had heard of it from his uncle.

"Ever," she replied, "since soon after marriage, I told him of an offer made to me previously, by a dark foreigner, named Eurotas. Oh! he was, indeed, a wicked man, a man of black passions and remorseless villainy. Connected with him, is my most racking recollection."

"How was that?" asked Orontius, with eager curiosity.

"Why, when he was leaving Rome, he asked me to prepare for him two narcotic potions; one for any enemy, he said, should he be taken prisoner. This was to be certainly fatal another had to suspend consciousness for a few hours only should he require it for himself.

"When he came for them, I was just going to explain to him, that, contrary to appearances, the small phial contained fatally concentrated poison, and the large one a more dilute and weaker dose. But my husband came in at the moment and in a fit of jealousy thrust me from the room. I fear some mistake may have been committed, and that unintentional death may have ensued."

Fabiola and Orontius looked at one another in silence, wondering at the just dispensations of Providence; when they were aroused by a shriek from the woman. They were horrified at seeing an arrow quivering in her bosom. As Fabiola supported her, Orontius, looking behind him, caught a glimpse of a black face grinning hideously through the fence. In the next moment a Numidian was seen flying away on his horse, with his bow bent, Parthian-wise over his shoulder, ready for any pursuer. The arrow had passed, unobserved, between Orontius and the lady.

"Jubala," asked Fabiola, "dost thou wish to die a Christian?"

"Most earnestly," she replied.

"Dost thou believe in One God in Three Persons?"

"I firmly believe in all the Christian Church teaches."

"And in Jesus Christ, who was born and died for our sins?"

"Yes, in all that you believe." The reply was more faint.

"Make haste, make haste, Orontius," cried Fabiola, pointing to the fountain.

He was already at its basin, filling full his two hands, and coming instantly, poured their contents on the head of the poor African, pronouncing the words of baptism; and, as she expired, the water of regeneration mingled with her blood of expiation.

After this distressing, yet consoling, scene, they entered the house, and instructed Torquatus about the burial to be given to this doubly-baptized convert.

Orontius was struck with the simple neatness of the house, so strongly contrasting with the luxurious splendor of Fabiola's former dwelling. But suddenly his attention was arrested, in a small inner room, by a splendid shrine or casket, set with jewels, but with an embroidered curtain before it, so as to allow only the frame of it to be seen. Approaching nearer, he read inscribed on it,

"THE BLOOD OF THE BLESSED MIRIAM, SHED BY CRUEL HANDS!"

Orontius turned deadly pale; then changed to a deep crimson; and almost staggered.

Fabiola saw this, and going up to him kindly and frankly, placed her hand upon his arm, and mildly said to him:

"Orontius, there is that within, which may well make us both blush deeply, but not therefore despond."

So saying she drew aside the curtain, and Orontius saw within a crystal plate, the embroidered scarf so much connected with his own, and his sister's history. Upon it were lying two sharp weapons, the points of both which were rusted with blood. In one he recognized his own dagger; the other appeared to him like one of those instruments of female vengeance, with which he knew heathen ladies punished their attendant slaves.

"We have both," said Fabiola, "unintentionally inflicted a wound, and shed the blood of her, whom now we honor as a sister in heaven. But for my part, from the day when I did so, and gave her occasion to display her virtue, I date the dawn of grace upon my soul. What say you, Orontius?"

"That I, likewise, from the instant that I so misused her, and led to her exhibition of such Christian heroism, began to feel the hand of God upon me, that has led me to repentance and forgiveness."

"It is thus ever," concluded Fabiola. "The example of our Lord has made the martyrs; and the example of the martyrs leads us upwards to Him. Their blood softens our hearts; His alone cleanses our souls. Theirs pleads for mercy; His bestows it.

"May the Church, in her days of peace and of victories, never forget what she owes to the age of her martyrs. As for us two, we are indebted to it for our spiritual lives. May many, who will only read of it, draw from it the same mercy and grace!"

They knelt down, and prayed long together silently before the shrine.

They then parted, to meet no more.

After a few years, spent by Orontius in penitential fervor, a green mound by the palms, in the little dell near Gaza, marked the spot where he slept the sleep of the just.

And after many years of charity and holiness, Fabiola withdrew to rest in peace, in company with Agnes and Miriam,

THE END.

49.

THE AUSTRALIAN DUKE,

OR

THE NEW UTOPIA.

CHAPTER I.

GRANT.

IT was a bright morning, in the early part of July, when I found myself in a railway carriage that was whirling me rapidly from the Great Babylon for the short three weeks' holiday which was all I could snatch from the law. I was about to spend them in my old home at Oakham, where my father filled the post of steward and man of business to the noble family who owned the Oakham domain.

Oakham Park was the great place, par excellence, of the country; its princely mansion, its woods and gardens were things to see; and few illustrious foreigners, in the shape of Shahs or Czarowitches, left England without enjoying the hospitality dispensed there in right royal style. In early boyhood a run with the Oakham foxhounds had ranked foremost among my home pleasures; and the support of the great family's parliamentary interest was about the first idea which had been presented to me in later life, among the duties of graver years.

Ten years of busy life in London law-courts had, indeed, somewhat dwarfed the importance of Oakham in my present estimation; and, moreover, changes had been at work by which the influence once exercised by its owners in the country had considerably diminished. The old ducal family had become extinct, and the property had passed to a younger branch whose presence was almost felt as an intrusion by those who remembered the days of "the old duke." Still, after the absence of a year or two, during which I had generally contrived that my scanty holidays should be spent in a continental ramble, the prospect of revisiting my boyhood's home was reawakening the old associations; and as I mused over past and present the images of early days began to reassume their old proportions, and to exert their former influence over my mind.

My companions in the carriage were three in number, of whom two had established themselves in corner compartments, and were absorbed in the study of their dailies. The third, clad in a plain gray suit, had nothing special to indicate his rank, or call for observation; but in a minute or so I found myself involuntarily scanning him afresh, a proceeding I was the better able to accomplish from the fact that his eyes, fixed on the passing landscape, were never once turned towards me. I could hardly say what there was to justify my glance of curious inspection, if it were not the stillness of his head, and the passive, self-forgetfulness of his attitude. As to the others, they were of the ordinary class of English railway travellers. Having painfully done his duty with the morning paper, the younger of the two attempted to open conversation with his opposite neighbor by the remark that, "Mayflower seemed to have made all the running," to which the elder replied by a grunted affirmative which seemed to indicate that the animal in question had not greatly consulted his interests by her unexpected success. He did not seem of a conversational turn, and the young man's next attempt was on the stranger in gray.

"Country badly wants rain, sir," he said, as though commenting on the attention which the other was bestowing on the fields and dusty hedge-rows.

"Does it, indeed?" was the reply. "To me everything looks so green." Then, as by way of explanation: "When you are used for half the year to see everything baked to brick-dust, England looks like a huge cabbage-garden."

"May-be," returned the other, pointing to a well-timbered bit of ground we were then just passing; "and yet I hardly know the country in Europe that could show cabbages out as those."

"Ah!" was the reply, "perhaps so; I know very little of Europe."

The chance words fell on my ear, and I proceeded to draw a somewhat hasty conclusion that my friend in gray must be a Yankee.

Meanwhile, the elder gentleman was engaged in folding his paper into the smallest possible compass, with the view of ultimately disposing of it in his coat pocket, observing, as he did so, that "they seemed to have got a good working majority," and the words at once unlocked our tongues and gave us a common subject of interest. It was the moment of a great political crisis; a once popular ministry had split to pieces, a general election had just placed the reins of power in the hands of the Conservative party, and according to their respective views men were everywhere startled or jubilant over the unexpected shifting of the scenes.

"They will have it all their own way for the present," I observed; "and released from more serious cares, Hapirock can take his own time at demolishing the Pope."

"Yes," said the first speaker; "how long it will last remains to be seen, but for a time we shall have a strong Tory Government,"

"And what will they do?" asked the Yankee (if such he were,) in a tone of grave and genuine interest, which contrasted not a little with the careless, off-hand manner of his companions.

"Do? Well, I suppose they'll give the beer-shops a lift; you know they owe it to them that they've got their innings. Then there's Clause 26—safe for a year or two; and I suppose the farmers will get some sort of a sop, and promise of more. Then we shall spend a lot of money, and have a jolly fight over the Budget; and there's talk about Law Reform; I suppose that is about our programme for the next session."

"You are not serious?"

"I am indeed."

"Yes," I observed, as he glanced towards me for confirmation of the other's accuracy; "changes in government don't come to much in England; and no man when he is in power can really do what he talks about in opposition. The new men will find it so, and they know it as well as we."

"It is incomprehensible," said the man in grey, speaking rather to himself than to any of the party; "what a contemptible system!"

The two politicians stared at him, and then at one another; it was clear that he and they revolved in different mental orbits. Further conversation was, however cut short by the stoppage of the train, the inevitable inspection of tickets, and the scrambling exit of the two travellers, whose places were not filled up, so that when the train once more started, the stranger and myself were left tete-a-tete.

"You are not familiar with our English politics?" I began. "The fact is that with us parties differ rather in name than in principle."

"Principle!" he repeated, for the first time bending on me a pair of dark eyes, so singularly expressive that I involuntarily started under their gaze, "Do you really think such a thing exists? And then such a want of power—no strength, no firm hold of anything."

"Well, I don't know," I replied; "law is power with us. We don't cling to this man or that, and we are not always raising barricades for ideas, but we keep the laws."

"And who makes them?" he inquired.

"The people," I replied.

"The people; yes, that is to say that those who are to be governed govern; is that a fair statement?"

"Well, I suppose it is."

"Well, then, I repeat, there is no power in that. The laws won't do it, that is clear, it must be the work of individuals."

"What is he thinking of?" I asked myself, in surprise. "What is it that the laws won't do? I suspect that he's some American doctrinaire that has come over to the old country to pick holes in our ways and make capital out of abusing us." Yet his eyes still haunted me.

By this time he was consulting his Bradshaw. "Perhaps," he said, with a courtesy of manner which put my suspicions to the blush. "perhaps you can tell me if we are near the Oakham Station?"

"The next but one," I replied. And I began to wonder what could be taking him thither. For be it known, dear reader, that the Oakham Station was what one might call a private one. The parliamentary influence of the Dukes of Leven, the old proprietors of the property, had succeeded in placing it in the midst of their plantations at a convenient half-mile from their own mansion, and a most inconvenient three miles from the village which clustered outside their park gates. It was seldom resorted to, save by guests of the great family, and occasional farmers journeying to and from market. My companion was not of the latter class, and I began to speculate whether he might not be of the former; an illustrious somebody, for whom I should find the Oakham carriage waiting, and the porters at a white heat of civility.

Nothing of the sort, however, met our gaze as we descended on the trim little platform. My father's dog-cart, with the well-known face of Jem the gardener, prepared to take possession of my bag and portmanteau, was the solitary equipage in view, and the gray traveller looked about him in some perplexity.

"How far to Oakham?" he inquired of the porter.

"Park, sir, or village? Village, three miles and a half, sir; Park, close at hand."

"Oh, then, I can walk; but what will happen to my portmanteau?"

"Well, sir, you see, sir, bus don't meet this train, it don't, sir; leave it in the cloak-room, sir, and bus will call for it at seven. Where might you be going sir?"

"Well, I suppose, there's an inn of some sort?"

"Oh, sure, sir, White Lion; bus will take it there, sir, all right." And he was leaving the station when I caught his eye.

"You'll have a dusty walk to the village by the road," I said; "through the plantation it's barely two miles, and a precious deal pleasanter. Jem shall show you the way; or, I say, Jem, is my father at home?"

"No, sir, no one at home; it's court day at Bradford, and master couldn't put it off no how; but he'll be back at seven."

"In that case," I said, throwing the reins into his hands, "I will walk part of the way with the gentleman, and you can take his luggage on with mine, and leave it at the White Lion." And in another minute, Jem and the dog cart were lost in a cloud of dust, and I and my unknown companion had struck into the pleasant shade of a thick fir plantation.

"I am truly grateful," he began; "yet you are not altogether the loser by the transaction. After the dust and rattle of that steam-monster this green twilight is something worth living for. So," he continued, as we emerged from the trees on the brow of a green slope that overlooked a broad expanse of park scenery, terminating with a view of the lordly mansion, "this is Oakham!"

There was a softness, a melody in his tones that struck to my heart. He stood there gazing on every feature in the scene with an earnest interest, speaking now and then more to himself than to me, whose presence he hardly seemed to notice. "Yes, I understand it better now; beautiful indeed, most beautiful; this is England!"

"You are a stranger, I perceive, to English scenery," I said; "travellers from America generally find everything so small compared to their own magnificent scale of natural beauty, that it is difficult to get them to admire a home-scene like this."

"Probably, but I have never visited America. I see what set you on that idea," he continued, smiling, "it was that word about Europe. But I am an Englishman born, though I have passed the best part of my life in Australia, never visiting my native country but once since I could walk alone, and then only in a passing way."

"And you find it beautiful?"

"Much more than that! the wilderness is beautiful, but this has what the wilderness can never give—life, human life, souls." And his eye glanced towards the tapering spire of the village church, whence came at that moment, the toll of the funeral bell. "And this Oakham family, has it much hold on the neighborhood?"

"Pretty well," I said, "not what the old dukes had, I fancy. You see, there have been changes; the Dukes of Leven were popular, but they broke up some years back, and the present proprietors, the Earls of Bradford, a younger branch of the same family, don't reside here much, though, of course, they lead the county."

"Ah! you folk at home are always thinking of the county and parliament; I did not mean that. I was thinking of the people, the tenantry; there must be hundreds dependent on a place like this."

"Of course; I believe they are considered good landlords, but you see now-a-days classes are so distinct, and the railways take country gentlemen away so much from their own place; ties of the kind to which you allude are almost things of the past."

"More's the pity," he said, with a sigh; "but hark! is not that water, and falling water too; have you cascades in these parts?"

"Not exactly a Niagara," laughing; "but there is a fall on this river, a stone-east from here, if you care to explore it." And so saying, I led the way through the thickets, pushing aside the bushes, till we were able to look down into a deep wooded glen, where the little stream which ran through the park did its best to ape the manners of a waterfall. Though the stream itself was in miniature, the height at which we stood above it was considerable, and wishing to place my companion in the best position for commanding the view, I was making my way over some jutting pieces of slippery rock, when he called me to stop in a somewhat peremptory manner. "All right," I replied; but the words had scarcely passed my lips when I found it was all wrong. A treacherous stone gave way under my foot, and but for a projecting branch, at which I caught, I should have been precipitated into the torrent. Even as I hung suspended, I was unable to regain my footing, as the sudden shock had twisted an ankle, and for the moment rendered me helpless. One steady step forward, a keen glance, a firm arm thrown around me, and with a prompt and skilful movement the stranger had lifted me from my position of peril and placed me in safety on the bank. Then those dark, earnest eyes once more met mine with a look of kind solicitude.

"You should have trusted an old bushranger like me," he said; "I saw your footing was failing you. But you really are not able to stand—and you came out of your way to do me a pleasure."

"Oh, it is nothing," I said; "it isn't really a sprain, just a twist, and I am close at home." For indeed my father's house stood in the plantations overlooking the glen, and with the help of my new friend's arm ten minutes' walk brought me to the garden gate. There he took his leave, and we shook hands as though no longer strangers.

"Perhaps," he said, taking a letter from his pocket-book, "you can confer a last favor on me by telling me where this is to be delivered?"

I glanced at the address: John Aubrey, Esq., Oakham. "My father!" I exclaimed; "I will give it to him myself on his return, and as you now know my name, I may, perhaps, venture to ask that of my deliverer."

"Deliverer is a large word for so small a service," he replied, smiling; "but my name is Grant. I shall venture to call on Mr. Aubrey to-morrow."

In another moment he was gone, and turning to the house, I soon found myself in the midst of home greetings.

CHAPTER II.

OAKHAM AND ITS MASTERS.

The Grange, as the steward's house at Oakham was called, was a modest, comfortable residence, picturesque in appearance and situation; for, from the parsonage to the gamekeeper's cottage all the Oakham surroundings were expected to be in perfect taste, and the estate was remarkable for its ornamental buildings. My father had filled his present post in the time of the old family, whose memory he venerated with something of an old man's regret. My mother and only sister, the latter my junior by several years, completed the little family party, whose members were now for a brief space reunited, and whom I will introduce to the reader as briefly as may be, for my story concerns my new friend rather than myself. It was a family of the commonplace English middle-class, with nothing about it that a novelist's utmost effort could push into the romantic. My mother was just what every man's mother is, or ought to be, at least to his individual heart, the best mother in the world. She had many practical interests associated with my father's position on the estate, and when, in addition to this, I add that she liked her garden and her poultry, and that she deliberately considered her husband to be the best man in the county, and her son the cleverest, my reader will have sufficient data wherewith to estimate her merits. As to my sister Mary, she was a sensible, good-natured girl of two-and-twenty. Besides the usual methods of getting through her mornings (and I have often speculated on what those are with the majority of young ladies), Mary had occupations of her own among the village people, and was perfectly familiar with every old Betty in the neighborhood who wanted a flannel petticoat. She was not a profound reader, neither was she Ritualistic, for both which facts I inwardly blessed her; but there were daily prayers at the parish church, and before I came down to an eight o'clock breakfast I knew that my sister had walked across the Park to the early morning service.

That evening, as I sat in the midst of the little home circle, I told my adventures, and produced Mr. Grant's letter. My father opened it and read it aloud; it ran as follows:

"DEAR MR. AUBREY, My friend, Mr. Grant, the bearer of this, is making a short stay in England, and is desirous of seeing what he can of Oakham. I shall esteem it a kindness if you will enable him to do so, and will show him my attention.—Faithfully yours,
"JOHN RIPLEY,"

Sir John Ripley was the county member, and his letter of introduction at once set at rest the question of Grant's respectability. Who or what he might be we could not guess, but he was certainly no adventurer. The earl was in Scotland; his two sons yachting off the Isle of Wight; there was, therefore, no difficulty in complying with the request that my friend should thoroughly inspect the Oakham lions, and we agreed to beat up his quarters on the morrow. Accordingly, at ten o'clock, my father and I presented ourselves in the little parlor of the White Lion, where Grant received us with simple courtesy, and did not fail to satisfy himself as to the state of my ankle before consenting to set out for the Park. It was the first time I had seen him uncovered, and I could not fail to be struck by the broad forehead and well-set head which imparted a dignity to features otherwise ordinary. My father's hearty country manner seemed to please him, and we were soon under the broad avenue which led to the mansion, conversing with little of the embarrassment of strangers.

I shall not detain the reader with a lengthened description of what may be found better set forth in the Oakham Guide Book. The fountains and gardens, the forcing-houses, and pineries and graperies; grapes in every stage of development, so as to keep up an uninterrupted supply from May to October, by means of cunning contrivances for regulating the artificial heat; flowers of dazzling hues and bizarre forms from Mexico and Brazil; orchids from Ceylon, and the newest lilies transported from the interior of Africa; all these were displayed as much to claim our wonder as our admiration. We passed from hot-houses that breathed the atmosphere of the tropics to cool conservatories with fountains playing upon marble floors. The head-gardener was in attendance, and made our brain dizzy with the names of each new floral prodigy, whilst Grant, with unmoved features, looked and listened in silence.

When the gardens had been fully inspected, my father proposed that we should proceed to the house. I thought I detected an expression of reluctance on the part of my companion, as though he shrank from the examination of private apartments in the absence of their owners.

"Is no one really at home?" he inquired; then glancing around him, "What a waste of labor! Well, let us get through the business;" and he followed my father into the great entrance hall, and up the grand staircase, adorned with pictures, and statues, and Majolica vases filled with fragrant exotics. Thence we passed through suites of softly-carpeted apartments glittering with all that was most rare and delicate, and finally into the great picture gallery, on the walls of which hung portraits of the present family, mingled with those of the elder ducal branch that had passed away.

My father did the office of cicerone, and pointed out the first founder of the family, a Lord Treasurer of the Caroline period, and other worthies of civil and military renown, till he came with a sigh to a finely-painted portrait, the beau-ideal of an English country gentleman as Lawrence alone could paint him.

"There is the old duke himself," he said, "and a finer gentleman than he never rode to cover. And a great man, too, he was in Parliament; for in his father's lifetime he sat for the county as Lord Carstairs, and when the Great Bill passed, it was he that led the county gentlemen, and by his sole influence caused them to grant the famous Carstairs clause. He could carry anything and anybody with him, there was such a power about him. But the crash came at last, and Oakham never saw another duke within these walls."

"Then, if I understand you, he left no son?" said Grant.

"No, that was not it," said my father; "but it's a sad story," and as he spoke he sat down on a fauteuil in one of the windows, and motioned us to do the same. "He had a son, young Carstairs, a fine young fellow who cut a figure at Oxford. Well do I remember, and all the county remembers too, his coming of age; why, it was here in this gallery that the duke, standing on a dais, received the Mayor of Bradford, and the county magistrates, and presented them his son, as a king might present his heir-apparent to a nation. But all he did was in that princely style; no thought of expense. Why, when the queen paid him a three days' visit here, the house was newly furnished from garret to cellar! You may guess what that took out of the year's rents. But he never stopped to calculate figures, not he. And when the Russian Emperor came over, and the people in London were on their mettle to give him a handsome reception, the old duke had him down here, and I fancy he puzzled him rarely. There were over sixty guests sat down each day to dinner; and when they went to the Bradford races, each gentleman was asked to choose his own equipage, barouche, or phaeton, green or claret color, black or bay horse, or whatever he chose, and it was ready. Well, of course, I know it was reckless extravagance, but you see it was all of a piece with the duke's character—so open-handed and munificent, I often warned him it could not last; but he never would take alarm. 'You find the money, Aubrey,' he would say, 'and I'll spend it.'"

"He was popular," said Grant.

"Popular? I should rather think so! A kind word for everyone, and then such a noble presence. But the crash came at last, as I said, and it fairly broke him. When at last the creditors could be held off no longer, he looked into his affairs, and it was just ruin, bankruptcy, beggary. Young Carstairs behaved splendidly; consented to the entail being cut off, and Oakham sold. The younger, that is the Bradford branch of the Carstairs family, had raked together a lot of money with their coal mines and iron, and they bought it up; the money paid most of the debts, not all, and Carstairs, noble fellow as he was, made over the Irish estates he held from his mother into the hands of the creditors. They offered him £500 a year if he would reside there and manage the property for them, but his father's friends, who were then in power, got him an appointment in India, or something of the sort, and he preferred to go."

"And the old duke?"

"His daughters took him to Baden—you see they had a little money of their own—and he died there two years after the break-up at Oakham. Then Lady Harriet married an Austrian count, and the elder sister followed her father; none ever returned to England."

Grant and I listened with interest: the story was familiar enough to me, but it seemed to gain a new kind of pathos, as I heard it in that gallery before the very portrait of the last Duke of Leven. Grant said nothing, but, stepping to the window, looked out for a while in silence; I thought it was to conceal an emotion which few men care to exhibit to one another; but when at last he spoke, his words struck me as harsh and severe.

"It was right," he said. "It was just that it should be so. There was nothing to regret."

"Ah, well, young sir," said my father, "that is the view you take of it, but the break-up of a great family can never be anything but a calamity in the land. That is how I see it; and Oakham, with all its modern finery, has never been the same place to me since the change."

We left the gallery in silence, for my father's words had saddened us, and I was glad to change the subject by proposing that we should look into the great library, rich in its collection of ancient and modern literature, for some of the Leven family had been antiquarians and book-collectors, and the Oakham MSS. had a European celebrity.

A gentleman in clerical costume was standing at the window, with whom, on our entrance, my father shook hands, introducing him as "Our vicar, Mr. Edwards." I knew him well; he was a reading man, of whom people liked to say that he was a "scholar and a gentleman." He was just then busy over a laborious compilation on the Roman antiquities of the county, and had the free run of the Oakham library, and a handsome salary as librarian.

Grant looked around him at the well-filled shelves: "Five thousand volumes, isn't it so?" I said.

"About that, exclusive of the manuscripts, and half as many more again in the Bradford collection," replied the vicar. And he pointed to the half-open door of an adjoining apartment.

"Plenty of other men's thoughts here," said Grant; "but it would bother me to have to use them."

"To each one his proper gift," replied the vicar, with a courteous gesture, expressive of the least possible admixture of conscious superiority. "You are a man of action, no doubt, but human thought has its own work to do, and books are its chronicles."

"Well, give me a book that will make me think," responded Grant; "but what I find in your civilized society is, that you make your books, or rather your newspapers and reviews, think for you. As to books, no man that I have yet met in England reads them. He reads his Pall Mall or his Saturday, and they do the work of literary and philosophic digestion for him; much as the Red Indian squaws chew the meat for their lords and husbands."

"Then you think," I observed, "that the multiplication of books has not been over-friendly to intellect?"

"I have no pretensions to judge on the subject," he replied; "but I am sure of this, that no one who had five thousand volumes within reach of his arm-chair could ever guess what a man feels in the bush, who has nothing but his Virgil and his Bible."

"The Bible!" I ejaculated; "our men of culture, as the Germans would say, are beginning to say queer things about that piece of literature."

"Precisely so," he replied, "and it proves my point, that your culture is an enormous humbug."

My father looked at his watch. "I believe I must leave you young gentlemen to settle your argument together," he said: "I must be at the home-farm by one o'clock; but Jack will show you what remains to be seen out of doors; and my wife will be expecting you at dinner."

"Much obliged," said Grant; "but I ordered my dinner at the Lion."

"Then the Lion may eat it," said my father. "Look here, sir, Sir John will never forgive me if I leave a friend of his to be smoke-dried in the village tavern; you must take up your quarters with us while you stay at Oakham; and, Jack, you will see about his things being brought down to the Grange."

Jack was myself, and exceedingly willing I was to second the motion that our new friend should make his stay among us. I began to feel a singular liking for him. After the atmosphere of London clubs and law-courts the contact with a mind so fresh and out-spoken, and so free from the shackles of conventionality, was inexpressibly agreeable.

"You are exceedingly good," he replied, "but my outfit is much more in keeping with the Lion's Den than with Mrs. Aubrey's drawing-room."

"Stuff and nonsense, man," said my father; "Mrs. Aubrey is used to every variety of costume; it is a settled thing, then. Jack will bring you home to dinner, and if Mr. Edwards would favor us——"

"Most happy," said that gentleman; "and I shall hope by-and-by to see Mr. Grant at the parsonage."

There were a few parting bows, and we left the library. My father's cob was waiting at the door to carry him to the farm, but Grant detained him. "Just see here, Mr. Aubrey," he said, whilst a certain look of perplexity appeared on his countenance, "I don't feel sure about this business. You see, you know nothing about me."

The extreme simplicity of his words and manner, contrasting as it did with so many an evidence that the speaker was not an ordinary man, had a singular charm about it, and my father felt it. "I know that you saved Jack here from breaking his bones yesterday," he replied, "and that you are Sir John Ripley's friend, and anything more you can tell us if you like after dinner;" and with a farewell gesture, my father cantered off, and Grant and I returned to the White Lion to arrange for his transfer to the Grange.

CHAPTER III.

THE GRANGE.

GRANT WAS accordingly admitted into our unpretending family circle, and he seemed to like it. It did not take long to make him at home, and I fancied that his manner grew less abrupt, and his philosophic utterances less harsh and conscientious, as his heart expanded in the kindly atmosphere around him.

Mr. Edwards kept his engagement, and our dinner passed pleasantly enough. I could see by my mother's looks and manner that she approved of my new acquaintance; nor did this surprise me, for he exhibited a marked respect in his manner towards her, not unmingled with a kind of tenderness.

"How often I have pictured such a scene as this!" he said to me, as we emerged from the dining-room window on to the lawn, still bright with an everlasting sunlight, and studded with its beds of scarlet geraniums. "After the intolerable affectation of those pineries and graperies, this little belt of shrubbery and reasonable flower-garden is a positive refreshment."

"Mary will feel flattered," I replied, as we approached my sister, who was loitering among the flower beds. "Mr. Grant was extolling the superiority of our garden over that of the Earl of Bradford." Mary gave an incredulous smile, but Grant vehemently protested that he was in earnest;

"My mother will be in raptures at the news," said Mary, "in her heart I know she considers her fuschias and petunias quite equal to Mr. Jones's orchids, only she don't dare to say so; but with so judicious a critic as Mr. Grant to back her, I fear for her humility."

"What I mean is this," said Grant: "this acre and a half of pleasure ground and the paddock beyond it, a man can take in and make his own; I daresay Miss Aubrey has raked every border, and my friend Jack has cre this climbed every tree within its boundaries. Well, that makes you at home with them all; but imagine climbing any of Mr. Jones's Brazilian evergreens, or pruning one of his vines!"

"I don't suppose the Earl of Bradford would desire to accomplish either of those feats," said Mary; "he is content to see the grapes sent up for his London dinner-parties, and for the rest to enjoy the reputation of having the finest collection of tropical plants in England."

"Yes," said the vicar, who at that moment joined us, "it must be owned he turns his coal-pits to some account. Wonderful how these Bradford collieries are paying just now," he continued, addressing my father; "and the strikes in the north keep up the price of iron."

"Whereabouts are these said collieries?" said Grant; "not surely in this neighborhood?"

"Oh, yes," said Mary; "you are not to suppose that our county is all made up of pineries and graperies; we produce a frightful amount of coal and iron not twelve miles from Oakham."

"And a strange contrast it is," said the vicar, "to get in here at the Oakham station, and find yourself in half an hour at Bradford."

Grant looked inquiringly.

"Perhaps you have no coal districts in Australia," said Mary; "if so, such a place as Bradford would be a novelty to you. Well, really, I wouldn't mind the ash-pits, if it were not for the women and children."

This truly feminine epitome of the social state of Bradford did not greatly enlighten our visitor, and I hastened to aid his intelligence. "Bradford is a place," I said, "where men work three days in the week, and get drunk the other four; where the wages are paid on Saturday evening in the public-houses, and spent before the men go to work again on Wednesday morning; and where husbands usually kick their wives to death, and daughters as well as sons work in the coal-pits."

"Too true," said my father; "there were five kicking cases, only last sessions, and all connected with drunkenness."

"And you tell me this new government of ours is going to support the public-houses?" said Grant.

"Bound to do it, it's the licensed victuallers' interest that returned them."

"I'd see the licensed victuallers at Old Nick first," said Grant.

"Then, my dear sir, you'd never get a majority."

"And this is the way you get your legislators," he cried, with vehemence, "a fine promise for the legislation."

"I take it, my dear sir," chimed in the vicar, with that distinct, harmonious pronunciation which marked him for an Oxonian, "I take it that legislation can never practically touch this question. Increase of education, a spread of general intelligence among our laborers and artisan classes will, in time, no doubt, effect a change; but we cannot make men moral by Act of Parliament."

"I fancy," I remarked, "that one can help them to be immoral, and our legislation on this question undoubtedly tends that way."

"A curious fact was stated in the debates the other night," said my father, "that in five dioceses in Ireland the public-houses regularly closed on Sundays by the voluntary determination of the people."

"That is the influence of the Roman Catholic priesthood," said Mr. Edwards; "a totally different state of things from anything among ourselves."

Grant rubbed his hands in a sort of ecstasy. "Exactly what I always say," he exclaimed, "personal influence will effect what your favorite law will never bring about. Now, if the Irish bishops and parish clergy can close the public-houses in Ireland on Sunday by their personal influence, why don't your Lord Bradfords and your Bishops of Exborough, and your excellent Vicars of Oakham (no offence, Mr. Edwards) come down on the Bradford pot-houses, and put a stop to all these villainies?"

"Why, indeed," said Mary, gravely, "I have often asked myself that question."

"My dear Miss Aubrey," protested the vicar, "the cases are totally different."

"Really, Grant," I exclaimed, "Your plan is an original one. Conceive our good bishop evangelizing the publicans, and bringing in the secular arm to aid him, in the person of Lord Bradford!"

"But why not?" persisted Grant.

"First and foremost," I replied, "because the publicans are staunch supporters of Church and State, and you couldn't expect their lordships to extirpate their natural allies."

Mr. Edwards cleared his throat. "Isn't that rather a strong expression, my dear Mr. John? I suppose the licensed victuallers are none the worse for upholding our venerable constitution?"

"And how do they uphold it?" I said; "I haven't yet forgotten the Bradford banners."

Mr. Edwards cleared his throat again, and was hesitating for a reply, when Grant demanded an explanation. "Oh," I said, "it was at the last general election. The Radicals had got up the cry for 'Unsectarian Schools,' whilst the other party went in for 'Sound Scriptural Education.' So what did they do but get banners inscribed in big gold letters, 'Beer and the Bible; our National Drink and our National Religion.'"

By this time, Mr. Edwards had recovered his presence of mind. "Very improper, of course, and extremely bad taste, to say the least," he said; "but you will remember the whole thing was disowned by the Conservative Committee."

"Oh, I know that," I replied; "but, notwithstanding their repudiation of the banners, they would find it difficult after that to lead a crusade against the beer-shops."

Whilst thus talking, we had sauntered to a spot commanding an extensive view over the surrounding country. In the distance rose the granite peaks of Leven Moor, divided from us by a tract of undulating and highly-cultivated land, along which white puffs of smoke from time to time revealed the presence of the Exborough and Bradford Railway.

"That is a famous view," I observed; "it gives just what one always wants, both sides of a question."

"What question?" said Mary.

"Well, everything; there's the moor, which makes you long for a free life in the wilderness, safe out of reach of beer and Bradford; and there's the express train to pull you back to common sense and duty."

"Duty!" said Grant; "it's a wonderful word. Have you ever thought, Miss Aubrey, what an odd time we should have of it, if every one took to doing their duty?"

"Why odd?" said Mary. "I wish with all my heart we did it."

"Well, but follow it up, and see what would come of it," said Grant.

Mary, who had no great capacity for "following things up," looked a little perplexed, so I came to her rescue. "What would come of it?" I asked.

"A universal social revolution," was the reply.

"I hope not," said poor Mary; "I've a horror of the very word."

Grant smiled, but persisted that it would be so. "Just consider: there would be no crimes, and therefore no police; no wars, and therefore no standing armies; nothing to punish, and so no prisons; very little poverty, so probably no work-houses."

"I beg to differ from you in that view," said Mr. Edwards; "poverty would exist if we were all saints to-morrow."

"I didn't say no poverty," said Grant, "but much less of it, and quite of another kind. It would not be squalid, or degrading, or abject poverty if the rich did their duty."

"And what is doing our duty?" said Mary, "because hadn't we better do it instead of talking about it?"

* This incident actually occurred at the late General Election.

"Exactly what I was going to say," I exclaimed; "for any practical result of our argument, we must have a precise definition of duty."

Mr. Edwards looked as if he was naturally expected to furnish this definition. "I presume," he said, "that each man's conscience must prescribe its own line of duty."

"Fidelity to conscience," said my father; "yes, that's a safe rule, and it has a good English ring about it."

Still Grant kept silence.

"With all deference, my dear father," I said, "I don't think it fully meets the requirement. Mr. Grant will smile if I go back to my old ground; but we want a fixed law to direct our conscience."

"It is conscience which supplies the law," said Edwards.

"What if my conscience prompts me to shoot the Prime Minister?" I inquired.

"That would be a false conscience, of course," he replied, "which no man would be justified in following."

"But there's the difficulty; there must be something or somebody to tell me that it is false, and, if so, it is that something or somebody that gives me the rule of duty."

Edwards found himself in a difficulty, and was not unwilling to shift it on to the shoulders of another. "It was Mr. Grant who first started this elaborate discussion," he said, politely; "perhaps he will give us his solution of the question?"

"Yes, pray do," said Mary, "or we shall get no tea this evening."

Grant looked a little confused. "It seems simple enough," he said, without raising his eyes from a rosebud which he was deliberately picking to pieces; "I suppose there's the Gospel."

"Quite so," ejaculated Mr. Edwards, much relieved; "of course, there's the Gospel."

"But, dear me! don't we follow the Gospel?" said Mary.

"I'm not so sure that we do," replied Grant; "at least a good deal of it. How about the Sermon on the Mount, for example? I can't at this moment call to mind any instance among my own acquaintance of people offering their left cheek when they've been struck on the right, or giving their cloak to those who have taken away their coat."

"Literal interpretations——" began the vicar.

"Which if everybody followed there would be very little work for us lawyers,"

"Precisely what I started with saying," cried Grant: "that if everyone simply did his duty, or, if you like it better, if everyone followed the letter of the Gospel, the result would be a universal social revolution. If every owner of a demesne like this, for instance, did his duty according to this view, I take it we should not have quite so many Bradfords."

My father laid his hand on his shoulder. "My dear young friend," he said, "you are young, and have many very generous feelings, I am sure; but when you have lived a little longer in this world of ours, you will find what a difference there is between the theoretical and the practical."

It was nice of my father to say this, and sounded kind and sensible; but, as we went in to tea, I felt that Grant had not had his answer.

"You will see our parish church to-morrow, Mr. Grant," said my dear mother, who presided at the tea-table; "it is one of the sights of Oakham."

"Ah, hem! yes," said Grant; "Mr. Edwards has been so kind; but to-morrow I expect I shall go to Bradford."

"To-morrow! to Bradford?" I exclaimed, setting down my untasted teacup on its saucer.

"Yes, I suppose there's a ten o'clock train, isn't there?" he asked composedly.

"Our morning service is at half-past ten," said Mary, in a low tone, whilst Mr. Edwards contented himself with a significant silence.

"Has my description of Bradford proved so attractive that you cannot defer your visit till Monday?" I inquired.

Poor Grant looked somewhat badgered, but he was incapable of an evasion. "Being Sunday," he said, with something of an effort, "one must hear mass, and I believe Bradford is the nearest Catholic church."

There was a moment of dead silence; Mary looked grave, my mother frightened, and it was my father at last who came to the rescue. "All right, Mr. Grant; yes, there's a Catholic chapel there; you see we didn't know, weren't aware—hem!—I suppose there are a good many Catholics in Anstralia?"

By this time Grant had recovered from his embarrassment, and the simple dignity of the man made itself felt in his answer: "I am afraid I have startled you all by my announcement; but I really couldn't help it. I told you you did not know whom you were inviting."

"Pshaw! my dear sir," cried my father; "on these matters every one suits himself, and Mr. Edwards will not mind showing you his church on Monday."

"I consider it an engagement," said the vicar, in his most Oxonian tone; "and I trust Mr. Grant will not suppose that our difference of sentiment on immaterial points is any obstacle to our agreement in essentials."

"I am no controversialist," said Grant, "and I should really like to see your church—for many reasons."

This was a happy way of escaping from a difficulty; and the vicar taking his leave, his departure was followed by another interval of silence. I saw that Grant was concealing a full heart under an exterior of composure, and presently those earnest eyes were raised, and turned upon us. "I feel, Mr. Aubrey," he said, addressing my father, "as if I ought not to be sitting here, enjoying your kind hospitality, without telling you a word of myself or my history. Not that there is anything worth telling," he continued, smiling, as he noticed a certain look of anxiety on my dear mother's countenance, "for really I am not a returned convict. But in admitting a stranger to your family circle, you show me a confidence of which I feel I am unworthy."

"Nothing wrong, my boy, is there?" said my father; he had taken a great liking to Grant, and as he spoke his voice betrayed it.

"No, my dear sir; but at Oakham this morning you challenged me to tell you something more about myself, and if you still wish it, I will do so."

"Shall we go?" said my mother, rising.

"By no means, dear madam," said Grant, laughing. "My story after all is much like that of the needy knife-grinder; but such as it is, you shall hear it."

We settled ourselves down to listen, and Grant began his story.

CHAPTER IV.

GRANT'S STORY

"My father belonged to what you in England would call a good family; we don't know much of those distinctions in the bush, but he was a gentleman by birth, a University man, and of good connections. He married in his own rank of life, and soon after the time of his marriage, family troubles obliged him to leave England. I don't need to say anything more about these affairs just now, except that they had nothing to do with character. Bayard himself was not more unstained in reputation than my dear father.

"He went to India first of all, but could not stand the climate, and removed to Australia. He had his wife's little fortune, about ten thousand pounds, and with it he bought a large tract of land in Queensland, and stocked it with sheep. A very different sort of place from Oakham, Miss Aubrey—grassy hills and valleys, no trees, open downs, and a good broad stream or two, but none of your English woods or gardens. There was only one thing to do, and that was to make wool; and in a year or two he got on, took more land and more sheep, and made more wool—that was his business. When a man has a good many thousand sheep to feed, he wants shepherds; and then there's the killing, and skinning, and packing the wool. So by degrees he got a good many fellows into his employment, for he paid them well, and was a kind master. The men respected him, they knew he could be bold as well as kind. More than once he captured a party of bushrangers, and saved his stock from their depredations; and our rough settlers felt him to be more than a good neighbor or a good master—they gathered round him as a protector.

"I have said that my father was a University man, and something of a fine scholar. He had brought with him a fair stock of books, and as time allowed him, he did his best to carry on my education. At twelve years old, I fancy I had mastered about as much Latin and Greek as I should have learnt in the same time at Harrow; and, besides that, I had gained a good many morsels of useful knowledge, better acquired in the bush. But my father could only teach me what he knew himself, and of some things he was ignorant. You see, my dear lady," said Grant, addressing my mother, "I shouldn't like to say anything that would give you pain, or seem, as it were, bumptious, and for a fellow like me to be talking about such things would just be nonsense; but still you know, it isn't always piety and that sort of thing that a man gets at the University. My father never got into any awkward scrapes; he became a good hand at the classics, and a famous rower. He spent as much money as became his rank, and a good deal more than suited his father's pocket; but as to religion, I fancy he shared it with Socrates. His standard was honor; to speak the truth, because it was the truth; to be brave, and courteous, and just, and merciful, and to be all that because nothing else was worthy of a gentleman. Of course I learnt my catechism, my mother taught me that; and she read me stories out of the Bible, in which I delighted: all about Jacob and the patriarchs, and the flocks of sheep; it seemed just like our own life in the bush, and I fancied every bushman was an Edomite.

"Well, one day, as we were sitting down to supper, there came word that old Mike, the shepherd, was dying, and that Biddy, his wife, was at the door, and would not go till she had seen the master. My father got up and went to her. "Oh, wirra, wirra, that I should see the day!" she said; "there's Mike dyin'," and askin' for the priest, and sorra a priest is there within sixty miles, and him at Ballarat!"

"A priest, Biddy!" said my father; "what good would he do your husband if he could see him? More to the purpose if he could see a doctor."

"What good is it, your honor? Why he'd get the rites of the Church, the cratur, and not be dyin' like a haythen or a Jew."

"To make a long story short, Biddy so moved my father's kind heart, that he sent off a man and horse to Ballarat to fetch a priest, and the priest came in time to give poor Mike all he wanted, so that he died like a Christian.

"My father entertained the priest as a matter of course; and, when it was all over, Father Daly said he would like to ride the country round, and see if there were any others who might chance to want him. Well, it was wonderful the number he found who were, and would be, or ought to have been Catholics; for three days, as poor Biddy said, 'he was baptizin' and marryin' and buryin' people for the bare life,' and at the end of the third day he came to my father. 'Mr. Grant,' he said, 'I've a great favor to ask of you, which I'm sure, for these poor fellows' sake, you won't refuse.'

"Anything in reason," said my father; "what is it you wish for?"

"Why, a barn, or a store, or a place of some sort, where I can say mass to-morrow morning."

"Well, a barn was found, and Father Daly was at work half the night knocking and hammering, till he had got up what did for an altar. He had brought all he wanted with him; poor enough it all was; but next day he said mass, and all the settlers within twenty miles, Catholics and Protestants, were present at it. For it was seldom enough they got a good word from priest or parson, and so, poor fellows, they cared for it when they got it; and get it they did. Just after the Gospel Father Daly turned round and addressed us. It was simple enough, nothing eloquent, nothing of fine preaching; just a few plain words, telling us that what we had got to do in the world was to serve God and save our soul—not to enjoy ourselves or make a lot of money, but to keep out of sin, and serve God, and get to heaven—very plain doctrine, indeed, Miss Aubrey, and spoken in a strong Irish brogue, very different from your friend Mr. Edward's genteel voice, that sounds for all the world like a flute-stop of an organ; and I'm half afraid to tell you that Father Daly was a short, thick-set man, with a face for all the world like a potato. But that is what he told us, and, my word, but it went home to the fellows' hearts; and as to my father, he laid his head on his arm, and sobbed like a baby.

"After mass was over he went to him; I don't know how it all came about, but Father Daly stayed two days longer, and they had some longish talks together; and a week or two later my father went down to Brisbane, and when he came back he told us he was a Catholic.

"We soon saw the change, though it did not come all at once. As brave and true, and just as ever, but the pride was gone—and after a bit he got a priest, a Spanish Benedictine, to come and settle at Glenleven, as our place was called. He took charge of my education, and rode about looking up the settlers, and every morning when he was with us, I served his mass. Well, I've seen some of your fine churches, and they get up all that sort of thing now in tremendous style, but St. Peter's itself would never be to me what that little wooden barn was, which we called our chapel. The mass, the daily mass in the wilderness there, with a dozen or so of rough shepherds and cattle drivers only, kneeling there in the early morning, all so still, so humble—I tell you it was the cave of Bethlehem!

"Father Jerome did a great work among the settlers. Gradually they got to love him and trust him, and he did what he liked among them; and my father too had a grip on them all; with all their free, unshackled ways they felt his power, and it ruled them. Many of them till then had lived like dogs, and he and Father Jerome just made men of them. It can be done, sir," said Grant, lookingly fixedly at me, "and there is only one way of doing it. It was not law that made the change at Glenleven, but two men with loving hearts, who lived in the fear of God, and spent themselves for their brethren.

"When I was nineteen, my dear mother died, and my father was obliged to revisit Europe. There was some bother about the Irish estates—well, it don't matter; he came back to Europe and brought me with him; he did not stay in England, so we just passed through, and crossed by Holyhead, and the three months, which were all we stayed, were mostly spent in the county Mayo. Before we sailed again, we came up to Dublin, and a thing happened to me there which I shall carry in memory to my grave.

"There was a lad about my own age, young Harry Gibson, whom my father had agreed to take out with him, and let him learn sheep-farming. It was a Sunday afternoon, and we two were coming home after a longish walk, when we passed a little chapel, the door was open. 'Come in here,' said Harry, 'and may be you'll see the strangest sight in Dublin.' We entered—an ugly little place enough, with an aisle divided off the whole length of the Church by iron bars, behind which some old women were kneeling. They were not nuns, but, as I afterwards heard, single ladies who lived here by way of a home, in St. Joseph's Retreat as it was called.

"We knelt down and said our prayers, and I was wondering what Harry had brought me there to see, when there came in from the little sacristy a figure such as I had never seen before—such as in this world I shall never see again. How shall I describe him? An old man, stooping and bent, in extreme old age, in his black priest's cassock, so worn it was thread-bare; but his face, his eyes—all that was human had gone out of them—the flesh, the body, and the pride of life all gone, destroyed, obliterated. Nothing left but the stamp of an unutterable meekness. He walked feebly up to the altar and knelt there, such a worship in the bend of his head; and after a little he rose and returned to the sacristy, and, as he passed us, those meek eyes fell on me and penetrated me to the soul.

"I was still full of the thought of it all, when the sacristy door opened again, and a little serving boy came up to me, and whispered that 'the Father wanted to speak to me.' I went in wonder, and there he sat in an unbroken arm-chair, with a little kneeling-place beside him, to which he motioned me. I could not have resisted him if it had been to save my life, so I knelt and waited till he should speak."

"My child," he said, "do you want to save your soul?"

"I do indeed, Father."

"Well then, you'll mind my words, will you?" I bowed my head, for my heart was beating so I could not speak.

"You must promise me three things: that you'll never miss hearing Mass on Sundays, if you're within twelve miles of it; that you'll never drink a drop of spirits—and here now, that you'll guard your eyes," and, as he said it, he put his hand over my eyes, so, and as I felt the touch of those thin, wasted fingers, I knew it was the touch of a saint. "Do you promise, my boy?"

"I do indeed," I said; "I promise you all three things."

"Well then, if you do," he said, "I'll promise you something—and he spoke slow and distinct,—I promise you, you'll save your soul. And one thing more I have to say to you, and don't forget my words: If riches increase, set not your heart on them; and mind this word, too: We must lay down our lives for the brethren." He laid his hand on my head and blessed me, and somehow or other I got back to my place. Harry took my arm, and we left the chapel.

"Who is he?" was all I could say.

"A saint," was his reply, "if there ever was one on this earth; that was Father Henry Young."

"I had never before heard of that extraordinary man, but Harry told me many marvellous things about him; how at eighty years of age he lived on bread and vegetables, never slept on a softer bed than a bare board, and how, penniless as he was, as to private means, thousands passed through his hands; the alms entrusted to him, and administered with inconceivable labor. The look and the words of such a man were not easily forgotten; and so you see," continued Grant, laughing, "you see how it is that I became a water-drinker, and why, come what will, I must go to Bradford to-morrow."

"And I see how it is," thought I to myself, "that Grant's eyes are not precisely like the eyes of other men." But I said nothing.

"Is that all?" said Mary.

"Very nearly," replied Grant. "We went back to Australia, and began the sheep-farming again. As I grew older, I often went down to Brisbane and Sydney to do business for my father, and many's the time I thanked Father Young for his three warnings. My father, meanwhile, was growing a prosperous man, and people said he was saving money. But then came the gold fever, and drew all our hands away; his health too began to break; and four years after our return from Ireland it was all over. A day or two before the end something seemed to trouble him. 'Willie,' he said, 'I don't care to live for anything else, but I wish the debts had been paid.' Now, you must know that, when he first left England, there had been debts, not his own, but his father's; a good deal had been paid, and for what remained they made a composition with their creditors. But the dream of my father's life had been to pay them all back in full, and not till he had done that, he used to say, could he feel himself a free man.

"How much is there at Sydney?" I asked.

"£70,000."

"I started. I had no notion he had laid by so much. 'And the debts?'"

"Well, they're over £60,000; if you paid them out of that, there wouldn't be much left for you, my boy."

"But, then, the land?"

"Worth nothing now, with every fellow that can do a day's work off to the diggings."

"Well, it don't matter, father," I said, "the debts shall be paid; so set your mind at ease about that. It shall never be said that you left the money, and it didn't do the thing you wished."

"I think I still see the smile on his face, as he squeezed my hand and whispered, 'Thank you.'"

"So I left Harry to do what he could at Glenleven, and as soon as I could put things straight, and get the money together, I brought it to England. The debts are all paid off, thank God, and they leave me about £4,000 to start with. You see," he added, laughing, "I am not in a way to stand much in need of Father Young's last warning."

"Really, Mr. Grant, it's a most beautiful story," said my mother, "and quite a lesson."

Grant looked at her with his kind, sweet smile, then rose and bade us all good night. My father went to show him his room, and I was following, when Mary held me fast, and whispered, "Don't go; I want to say something."

"My dear Mary, I'm so awfully sleepy."

"I don't care; one turn under the verandah."

"What a tyrant you are! Well, here goes; now what is it?"

"Jack," she said, half choking with emotion, "you see who he is, don't you?"

"See? Who? Grant?"

"Yes, Grant—if you like to call him so; I should call him the Duke of Leven."

"Duke of fiddlesticks! Why, what are you dreaming of, Mary? The old Duke died at Baden, and his son at Carstairs in India."

"Did you ever hear of his death?" she asked.

"No, I don't know that I did; but this isn't he: why he would be old enough to be Grant's father."

"And was his father," she said. "Oh, Jack, that you shouldn't see it, and you a lawyer! His father at Oxford, and the debts, and then the estates in Ireland, and the name they gave their land in Australia, Glenleven. Oh, Jack, don't you see it?"

I did see it sure enough, though it was mortifying that she had guessed it before me.

"Mary," I said, "you're a Solomon. Put you on a judge's wig, and in your summing up you'd beat the Chief Justice! But what shall we do? Must we tell my father?"

The question was debated, but, as Mary said, we might be wrong; and even if we were right, it did not seem the thing to foree Grant's secret. If he did not want to be known as the Duke of Leven, it was not for us to unveil him. At any rate we resolved to say nothing at present, but to wait for what might follow.

CHAPTER V.

AN EVENTFUL DAY.

At breakfast next morning came the letters, one for Grant, sent on from London to the White Lion, and from the Lion to the Grange, with the Australian postmark. Grant opened it, read it with a flush on his cheek, then crushed it in his hand, and read it again, and, finally, finished his breakfast in abstracted silence. As soon as it was over, he started for Bradford; and we, more at our leisure, made our way to morning service, where, I fear, the well-turned sentences of the Vicar's sermon fell on very inattentive ears, so far as I was concerned, for my thoughts were full of Grant and his story. Yes, he was right, that which he described was truly power; he had a something which we had not; it was the straight aim, the righteous purpose, the strength of a soul that knew the worth of souls, and to whom all else was nothing.

We walked home through the park. "I am sorry for Grant," said my father; "£4,000 is little enough with which to begin life afresh. He'll have to go back to Australia."

"Why so, papa?" said Mary.

"Why, my dear, what can a man do in England with £4,000?"

"It strikes me," I said, "that wherever Grant is, or whatever he has, he'll be doing something. Take it altogether, he's the most remarkable specimen I've ever set eyes on."

By this time we were approaching home, and could see some one standing at the garden gate, as it seemed on the watch for us. It was Mr. Jones, the head gardener; and, as he advanced to meet us, I noticed he held a paper in his hand, and that his manner indicated something was the matter.

"Have you seen this, sir?" he said, addressing my father; "I fear it's too true. It must have happened on Friday."

"Seen what? What has happened?"

My father seized the paper which Jones held out; I read it with him looking over his shoulder:

"Fatal Yacht Accident—Five Lives Lost.

"We regret to have to chronicle a very melancholy accident which took place yesterday off the coast of Ryde. The yacht, 'Water Lily,' belonging to Viscount Belmont, eldest son of the Earl of Bradford, came in collision with a steamer near the Start Point, and instantly filled and sank. Every exertion was made by those on board the steamer to render assistance to the crew of the 'Water Lily,' the master and two men were saved, but Lord Belmont and his brother, the Hon. E. Carstairs, together with the three remaining hands, were drowned, and all efforts to recover the bodies have as yet proved unavailing. We understand the deceased gentlemen were the only surviving sons of their noble father," &c., &c.

I saw and read no more. My father stood silent, stunned, motionless. At last the words came to his lips: "Both drowned? Impossible!—and their father!—"

We went into the house. Of the earl, Jones could tell us nothing. He was in Scotland, he believed, and it would take time for the news to reach him. But news travels fast in these our days, and we were not long left in doubt how it fared with the bereaved father. There was a ring at the bell, and a buff-colored envelope was brought in by the servant. A post-office telegram from Belmont, the Scotch residence: "From E. Scott, House Steward, to Mr. John Aubrey, Oakham. 10 A. M. Bad news from Ryde; yacht accident. Lord B—— heard it suddenly. An apoplectic fit; still insensible."

And then, in an hour, a second telegram:—

"Still insensible. Mr. Wigram and Lady Mary sent for. Doctors give no hope."

Lady Mary was his only daughter, married to a Scotch M. P., and residing near Belmont. We saw that the curtain was closing heavily on the Oakham family. We sat and waited; what else could we do? And when Grant returned from Bradford he found us thus, waiting for the final telegram.

It came at last, ere nightfall, and told us that all was over. In less than eight-and-forty hours, the earl and his two sons had been swept from life, and the younger, as well as the elder line of the Oakham family, as my father said, was now extinct.

I watched Grant's countenance as he said it, but it betrayed nothing. "I think, Mr. Aubrey," he said, "that I had better be going. You will be having plenty of business here of one sort or another, and the family coming, and I shall be an intrusion. I shall start for London by the express train to-morrow."

"So best," said my father, who was crushed with the events of that terrible Sunday; "but we shall see you here again, Mr. Grant? We all feel as though we had known you from boyhood."

Grant smiled. "Thank you, it is very pleasant, but I too have had my surprises to-day; and I find I am wanted back at Glenleven without delay. I shall probably be leaving England within a fortnight."

I felt inexpressibly sorry. But it could not be helped. So next day, after breakfast, I took his arm and led him for a last turn in the park. My father had gone up to the mansion to prepare, alas! for receiving the bodies, and give orders for the great pageant of the funeral; and Grant and I sauntered through the flower gardens that flaunted in the sunshine, and passed those very hot-houses and pineries on which we had been cutting our jokes the day before, all now an empty, miserable mockery.

"And Bradford!" ejaculated Grant, at last. "My word! what a place! to think of men drawing out their thousands from such a den to spend it on that hideous rubbish, and leave the souls of men to sink below brutality."

I laid my hand on his arm: "Have a care, Grant," I said, "they are beyond our judgment."

"True," he said, and he lifted his hat; "but tell me what you think; must wealth always bring such blindness with it?"

"How? I don't understand."

"Well, you remember the Gospel?—(I fear I did not)—

"'How hardly shall they that have riches enter heaven.' As though they could not. Can it, must it always be so?"

"My dear Grant," I said, "these questions are beyond me; anyhow, neither you nor I are just now in the way to test the facts."

Grant groaned, and handed me the Australian letter he had received the day before. "Read that," he said, "and you will see what I am thinking of." It was from his friend Harry Gibson:—

"DEAR GRANT,

"You'll think me dead and buried, but I'm just worked off my legs, and haven't had time to eat, much less to write. I've stunning news for you. You remember Bill, the native boy whom you saved from drowning? Well, he came in the other day, and told me he had something he would show to no one but me or the master. What was it? I must come and see. So I went, to humor him, and he took me to the glen. A huge boulder, as it seemed to be, concealed by some scrubby bushes, but with a yellow glitter, and what looked like quartz—in short, a monstrous nugget!—We had it out, and got it down safe to Ballarat, 2,166 ounces, value £8,376! It has made a precious noise, I can assure you. Old Lyndsay, the Government surveyor, has been here, and examined the land, and the end of it is that Glenleven is pronounced 'auriferous' from one end to the other. Now, what will you do?—sell, let, or dig? Either way I suppose the property must be about the best thing in the market. Lyndsay says what it contains must be reckoned by millions. Write your orders, or better still, come back and give them; or six months hence I won't answer for being an honest man in spite of Father Young and his warning.—Faithfully yours,

"H. GIBSON."

"You see how it is," said Grant, as I returned the letter, hardly knowing whether to congratulate or condole with him. "Millions: and I have before me here a picture of what men do with millions, and at Bradford of what they do not do, and in my heart, Jack, a terrible sense of what they might and ought to do; and I ask myself shall I do it? Will gold be a curse to me, as to them? Will its touch poison, betray, deceive me? Shall I come to think money well spent on yachts and betting-books, and the best table in all London, and leave thousands of souls in my gold-diggings going to perdition. Must that be so, I say? and if not, how prevent it?"

"Grant," I said, "you overstrain your notions, you do indeed. Money is a means: a means of good as well as of evil."

"Just so," he said; "but how many men use it for good? And how dare I prophecy to myself that I shall do better than the multitude?"

We walked home silently. There he took his leave of us all, and said a word of the happiness he had felt in our little home-circle; it had been but three days since I had met him in the train, and we were parting like brothers. I accompanied him to the station, and when the carriage door was closed, and at last the train moved on, I felt it like a bereavement.

CHAPTER VI.

FRESH SURPRISES.

THE funerals were over. Mr. Wigram, and Lady Mary, and some other family connections had assembled at Oakham; everything had been done with becoming solemnity, for, indeed it was a solemn thing to lay them side by side, the father and his two sons—the last of the Earls of Bradford. Then came the opening of the will, Lord Duffield, a maternal uncle, and Sir John Ripley being the two executors. There were so many thousands to Lady Mary, and legacies and bequests, and plenty of money to pay them. But as to Oakham and its plate, and furniture, and library, and the Bradford mines, and the Scotch estates, they were all entailed, first on his eldest, next to his second son; and failing both of these, and their children (and they had none), all the demesnes of the late earl passed to the next male heir, and who that was would be a case for the lawyers. Mr. Wigram, of course, was disappointed; but the will was clear, and the executors knew their business.

"The next male heir!" exclaimed Mr. Edwards. "It will take a lifetime to trace out the pedigree!"

"Not quite so long as you think," said Sir John; "I believe it is not so very long since the heir of Oakham has been within these very walls."

"Not Grant! exclaimed my father; "no, not possible!"

"Ay, not only possible, but most certain," said Sir John; "William Grant Carstairs, only son of Lord Carstairs, and grandson of the old Duke of Leven. His father never took the ducal title, and even dropped that of Carstairs when he settled in Australia; but I have nudisputable proof that Mr. Grant, of Glenleven, was really the man; indeed it was well known in the colony, when I was governor. Carstairs died about a year ago, and his son, this William Grant Carstairs, is really Duke of Leven. He came to England to pay off the last remnants of his grandfather's debts, and as he could not do this without putting himself in communication with the Commission of Creditors, of which I am chairman, I became acquainted with his real name and history."

"Then Mary was right," I muttered to myself, while Sir John continued:

"We shall place the necessary evidence of these facts before the right tribunals, and, meanwhile, Mr. Grant must be communicated with."

"He leaves England in a fortnight," said my father.

"He will do no such thing," said Sir John. "It will be a case for the lords, and he will, no doubt, have a subpoena to appear and give evidence."

It all happened as he said; there was no difficulty about the proofs of identity, for there had never been any concealment of the fact, and every one in Queensland knew well enough who "Grant of Glenleven" really was, and why he chose to drop the family name and ducal title. Then as to the heirship, that was equally plain. There were but the two male branches of the family, of both of which Grant was now the sole surviving representative. When all this had been sifted and proved, and every legal form gone through which could be demanded by the House of Peers or Doctor's Commons, then, and not till then, did Grant consent to appear at Oakham, and receive from the executors of the late earl all that was necessary to constitute him its master. It took more than a year to constitute all this, and when at last the day was fixed for the new duke to take possession, not Oakham only, but the entire county prepared to give him a worthy reception. I had my share of the law business, and went down to assist my father in the heavy work which the occasion brought on him. I shall not easily forget it. All the gentlemen of the county had assembled there, lords and baronets; but I need not give a list. There were triumphal arches and processions of school children, and the Exborough Volunteers, and a dozen carriages to meet him at the station. I remembered how at that same station he had stood alone a year before, looking in vain for some one to carry his bag to the White Lion; I remembered that, as I saw him now step on to the platform, and shake hands with the Marquis of Exborough, and when I heard the loud cheers that greeted him. How the bells rang out as the array of carriages drove through the village! What a bright gala day it was! The old family restored to Oakham, the old property given back to the eighth Duke of Leven.

But I don't intend to dwell on all this further. When the fuss of the grand reception was over, he sent for me to come to him. "Aubrey," he said, "what is to be done about the Australian business? Harry keeps on pressing for some one to go out. Can you find me anywhere an honest man with a clear head, and I'll engage he shall make his fortune."

I thought, and I hesitated.

"Will you go yourself?" he said, at last. "Mind, I don't ask you to go; but if you decide on accepting the post, I believe you will not regret it."

I consulted my father, and he urged me to accept the offer. There did not seem much chance of making my fortune by English law, and so, to make a long story short, before Christmas I left England, whither, as things turned out, I did not return for ten long years that were full of changes.

I have no intention, dear reader, of troubling you with my personal history during that eventful period. It was a busy part of my life, and the duke was right in saying that I should not regret it. My concern just now is to tell you my friend's story, and not my own; and my ten years in Queensland were certainly not without their utility in advancing his interests. I won't bind myself to say to a shilling the sum which I sent over to England as the produce of his gold fields at Glenleven, but Harry Gibson had not been far wrong in calculating their value at millions. If any one will bear in mind the fact (which is a fact) that in those ten years the produce of gold in this one colony exceeded £104,000,000, they will easily understand what must have been the value of a single property which extended over some thousands of acres; for when Lord Carstairs first settled in the colony, an enormous tract of sheep-feeding land could be bought for a comparative trifle.

My own interests, of course, were not forgotten; the duke's terms were more than liberal; and, when the whole estate had been finally disposed of, I was able to return to England a wealthy man. One commission, entrusted to me by the duke, spoke well for his heart; it was the removal to England of his parents' remains, which had been laid to rest in the little cemetery of Ballarat.

Yet I own there were some things in my home correspondence which gave me a secret anxiety. Much was said in praise of the new duke, of his generosity, his manly principles, his care for his property and his tenants; but expressions were now and then dropped which showed me he had the character of being eccentric. I was sorry for this, though not much surprised; in my brief intercourse with him in former years it was impossible to deny that his originality looked in that direction. What did surprise me much more was that, judging by his own letters, far from despising money, he seemed to care for it a good deal. He took his millions from Australia with a very good grace, and made no objection to the proposals I submitted, whereby a larger revenue could be raised from the property. And after all, I sometimes said to myself, this is but natural. Men theorize on gold and like to call it dirt, so long as their hands are clear of it; but let them feel its magic touch and the dirt becomes marvelously pleasant. Leven desires to get as much as he justly can from his property, and so do I, and so does everybody. And yet the sigh with which I closed my meditations showed me that my imagination had painted the "Grant" of former days as something higher and more unselfish in his aims than "everybody."

There was another thing that struck me as odd. A year or two after I came to Glenleven I became a Catholic. I had never thought much of these subjects in early youth; but many things which Grant had said had gone home; and the impressions first received from him were deepened in Australia. There, for the first time, I saw the Catholic religion at full work; I felt its mastery of souls, its reality as a Divine power, and to that power I submitted. It was only natural for me to imagine that the Catholic Duke of Leven would have been leader of his co-religionists in England. I had the English papers, Catholic and Protestant, sent out to me pretty regularly, and after my conversion I looked with some eagerness to see what part he took in parliamentary debates on questions affecting Catholic interests, education questions, workhouse questions, church-building questions, and the rest. I looked for his name, and I generally looked in vain. In my perhaps romantic imaginings about his probable course I had pictured him as the founder of benevolent institutions through the length and breadth of the kingdom; I thought he would acquire a distinguished name and achieve great things for the poor and the laboring classes; but if he did so, the papers, at any rate, had nothing to tell me about it. There is no denying, it was a disappointment, but I gradually grew used to regard the whole subject as one in which the fancy of youth had cheated me with its wonted delusions; and who is there who reaches middle life who has not to look back at one thing or other as having been the slave of his imagination?

I returned, then, to England, spending a week or two in London before going down to Oakham, where my parents still lived; for though my father's age had obliged him to give up his post as steward into younger hands, the duke would not hear of his leaving the Grange. Mary had become the wife of Charles Oswald, a small squire of the neighbourhood, and was still able to be a good deal of comfort to her father and mother, and to find an ample sphere for all her capacities of usefulness. In returning to Oakham, therefore, I was still returning home, though I had formed no plans as to my own final settlement.

In London, I found plenty of old friends to welcome me, not, perhaps, the less kindly from the fact that rumor had credited me with having brought home an Australian fortune. Some of those whom I had left just entering on their profession, had fought their way to legal eminence, and some had earned their silken gowns and a certain share of reputation.

Sir Clinton Edwards, the brother of our Oakham vicar, was now a judge, and at his table I met a group of men more or less distinguished in the world of politics and of letters. The world has many phases, some more, and some less pleasant to come in contact with. A London dinner-room, filled with refined and intelligent people, who know everything and everybody worth knowing, is, no doubt, a very agreeable sample of polite society; but mark well this truth, dear reader, it is still the world, and anything higher and better than what savors of the world, you must not look to extract from its conversation. Sir Clinton had a fancy for well-mixed variety in his company, so on the present occasion I had the good fortune to meet a Solicitor-General, and a Home Secretary; the editor of a popular philosophic review (whose theology, by the way, was not predominantly Christian), two men of science, and a county member. Including our host and myself, we numbered eight. It is needless to say that our dinner was irreproachable. For the passing moment I found myself a lion; for the gayest and wittiest circles so soon exhaust the sources of their gaiety, that any person who, for one half hour, can stimulate a new curiosity, may calculate for exactly that space of time on enjoying a fair amount of popularity.

The conversation in such a circle was as graceful and varied as the forms in a kaleidoscope. Home politics, the state of the colonies, Hapirook's last pamphlet on the Council of Ephesus, the Vicar of Oakham's long promised, and recently published, work on Roman Antiquities, the last cartoon in Punch, and the University boat race, all passed in review, till for my sins I fell into the hands of the philosophic editor, who was, of course, profoundly ignorant of the creed of his next door neighbor. He was engaged on an article which aimed, I will not say at proving men to be well-developed monkeys, for I have never found that writers of this particular class ever aim at proving anything whatsoever, but at throwing out pleasant theories of the possible probability of their being nothing better. The intellectual inferiority of the Australian aborigines was the point on which I was subjected to cross-examination, and every fact elicited was bagged by my tormentor for future editorial purposes. But the county member who sat opposite charitably stepped in to my relief.

"I tell you what, Ford," he said, when he could get in a word, "you needn't go to Australia to look for intellectual inferiority; no, nor for savages either, nor for that matter for heathens; you'll find the whole stock-in-trade ready for inspection in a good many of our manufacturing towns, only nobody comes to inspect them."

"Very true," said Sir Clinton; "when I am Lord Chancellor, I shall introduce a bill for obliging all members of Parliament to spend one calendar month in a colliery district, say Bradford, for instance."

The familiar name struck on my ear and raised a host of recollections.

"Ah," said one of the men of science, "I've been down there lately. You know the improvement of the mines is one of the duke's hobbies."

"And not merely mines, is it?" said the secretary; "I've heard a good deal of his work among the people."

"Just so," replied the scientific gentleman, "he's always at something; you know it would puzzle the calculating boy to number his hobbies; but the last thing has been the mines, and really his ideas about ventilation are very creditable."

"You are speaking, I presume, of the Duke of Leven?" I inquired.

"Ah, yes, you would have known him, of course, before going to Australia. Curious history his has been, certainly."

"He is really an excellent fellow," said Sir Clinton, "but not long for this world, I fear; I never saw a man so altered."

"Well, he is a very good fellow, of course," said the county member; "but he carries things too far, to my mind."

"How so?" I ventured to ask.

"Oh, I don't know exactly; lives the life of a hermit, which, in his position, is a mistake, and does mischief; and then he's always sporting some social view or other; setting himself a little against the current. One thing, you know, he's a Catholic."

"Yes," observed the second man of science, who till now had spoken but little, "it's a great pity that. Cuts a man of his standing so completely out of everything. He can't take his proper place in general society, parliament or anywhere."

"Well," began the editor, "of all the idiotic absurdities a man can be guilty of, I should say that was the primest. I declare it would justify a commission of lunacy."

"I'm afraid that's the real explanation of the whole thing," said the county member, looking sagacious, and touching his forehead; "there certainly is a touch in the top story."

"Touch or no touch," said Sir Clinton, "he has done wonders at Bradford. I know it by the results at the sessions."

"And may I ask what he has done?" said the editor, with the slightest possible tone of sarcasm.

"Changed the whole system of wages, shut up about twenty public-houses, and, really, I don't know how he has managed it, but they're not so brutalized by half since he's had the manor."

"And if I am rightly informed (you'll correct me, of course, if I am in error), but I understood he had brought over a lot of German monks and built them a monastery."

"Ah, yes," said Sir Clinton, "that's at Glenleven, on the moors, you know." Well, it's one of his crochets, and, perhaps, not the most sensible."

The secretary shook his head, and looked disgusted. "I know this, we shall have to put a stop to all that sort of thing some day," he said, "and the sooner the better, in my opinion."

Then the conversation, by an easy change, flowed into foreign politics, and I was left to digest all I had heard, and form my own conclusions. Was Leven really a little touched? Was he unpopular? Or was he dying? Had his ten years of boundless means produced as their whole result an improved system of wages and mine ventilation, and the building of a monastery? And did he fritter away his genius and his undoubted powers in a quick succession of profitless hobbies?

I should go down next day to Oakham and judge for myself.

CHAPTER VII.

RETURNING HOME.

My first week at Oakham was given to my family. I had to be introduced to my new brother-in-law, Oswald, who had brought Mary over from Exdale manor, that we might all be once more together. The duke had been called away to Scotland, and, to tell the truth, I was not sorry to have time and opportunity for rectifying my ideas on the new order of things before meeting him. My father praised him highly, for was he not a Leven? That single fact sufficed for him; nor would I have disturbed the simplicity of his loyalty to the representative of the old family by so much as a question. My mother had a special kindness for him, only regretting that he had never married. Mr. Edwards, as courteous and harmonious as ever, fully seconded her regrets, and suggested that the influence of a refined and affectionate wife might have softened something of that austerity of character which he humbly conceived was out of tune with the century. His curate, the Rev. Wilfrid Knowles, who happened to be present, said nothing, but I thought he looked a good deal, and on inquiry, I found that the curate held more advanced views than the vicar, and was supposed to have what Mrs. Edwards termed "monastic tendencies."

All this explained but little. Oswald informed me the general impression in the county was that his politics were revolutionary; but the solitary fact in support of this theory appeared to be that his first act on coming to Oakham had been to lower his farmers' rents on condition that they raised the rate of their laborer's wages. Mary said it was all malice, and that they did not understand him. She evidently was his warm friend, and her husband declared that she did what she liked with him.

On the third day after my arrival, I strolled up to the park in company with Oswald, and could not help observing with a little surprise that the pineries and forcing-houses kept their ground, and had even apparently received some additions. I inquired for my old friend Jones, but found he had departed, and that his place was filled by one of a younger generation.

"I half expected he would have made a clean sweep of all this," I said; "he used to inveigh against it all as though grapes in June had been one of the deadly sins."

"Ah!" said Oswald, "that was Mary's doing. She suggested to him that if he did not choose to grow grapes and apricots for his own table, he would be doing a good work to grow them for other people, and that they would be like gifts from paradise if he sent them to the hospitals. So now every week they are packed up and sent to the Exborough Infirmary, and the County Hospital, and half a dozen other institutions, not to speak of his own affair that he has founded at Bradford."

"Really that was a bright thought of old Mary's," I said; "who would ever have thought of her taking the command in that style?"

"Yes, and she gets her own perquisites, I believe," said Oswald, "with which she makes happy all the sick people of the neighborhood."

"How about the orchids?" I asked, rather maliciously.

"Oh, as to them, you had better ask Verney." And so saying, he led the way to a small enclosure where a young and intelligent-looking man was superintending the packing of various cases of fruit and flowers. I looked at the rich fruit, no longer grown for show or luxury, and felt pleased to think of its altered destination. "And the flowers?" I asked, amazed at the quantity which were being delicately packed in cool moss, about to be carried off to the station.

"To Bradford, sir, and Homchester," replied Verney, the head gardener "and one or two other missions. Thursday will be Corpus Christi, and they use a wonderful quantity of flowers."

"Hem!" I thought; "I see all about it; what used to go to the dinner-table and the ball-room he sends to the hospital and the altar. Well, that is like old Grant;" and it gave me a glow of pleasure.

I soon found that Verney was a Catholic, as were several of the men now employed about the place, and I heard from him that a private chapel had been added to the house, which sufficed for the wants of the few Oakham Catholics. But a magnificent church had replaced the old and miserable erection at Bradford; and there was a convent with nuns who worked the schools and served the hospital; and, besides that, half the town had been rebuilt, and the wretched dens which formerly abounded were replaced by model lodging-houses.

"The duke himself has a house at Bradford," said Oswald, "and spends a good deal of time there; how he can endure it, I don't know, but he sees to all manner of things himself, for at heart, you know, he likes business."

"I suspect also, Oswald," said I, "that he has a liking for souls."

"Well, I should have thought Bradford about the last place to have supplied him with that commodity," said Oswald; "very queer style of souls he must find among the colliers, and not the most responsive, for just now they seem greatly disposed to stone him by way of expressing their gratitude."

"How so? Is he not popular?"

"Not with all. You see, he attempts to limit their means of making beasts of themselves, and many resent it like true-born Britons. They've got a fellow named Degg to lead them now, who possesses a tongue, and a quite remarkable gift of slander, of which he gives the duke a weekly benefit in a rascally penny paper, which he edits, and which he sells by thousands. It's a grand thing is our education movement; it enables each man now-a-days to read his Degg."

"Would you like to see the chapel, sir?" said Verney.

"Immensely," I replied. And leaving his flowers in charge of one of the men in attendance, he led the way towards the building. It had an approach through the shrubberies as well as from the house, for the convenience of the congregation; and Verney, having found means of informing the chaplain of my presence, left me in the hands of that gentleman, and returns to his green-houses.

The Oakham chapel was small in size, and my first impression of it was rather devotional than magnificent. Except in the east window there was no painted glass; but through the open casements came the sound of waving branches, and the green and pleasant light which falls through summer foliage.

After a few minutes, I began to take in some of the details. Though the chapel was Gothic in style, the architect had contrived to find places for several pictures, some of which struck my eyes as familiar. I remarked it to the chaplain. "Probably," he replied, "you may remember them formerly in the Bradford collection; the Crucifixion which you see there used to hang in the great dining-room. It had been a Spanish altarpiece, I think, and the duke said it was a sacrilege to put such a painting over a gentleman's sideboard."

"And at the same time that he removed it," whispered Oswald, "he burned half a dozen Venuses and Adonises, which had been the glory of old Bradford's gallery: a fact, I assure you; and at Christie's they would have brought their thousands."

The paintings had, in fact, been taken from various parts of the ducal mansion; all, with one exception, a singular picture, painted, as the chaplain told me, by a young German artist, under the duke's personal direction. It was a single figure, representing a young man in poor and squalid attire, lying on a bed of straw, and clasping a crucifix. The background was dark, and there were few or no pictorial adjuncts; only in one corner of the picture appeared something like a ladder or flight of steps above the head of the principal figure. All the beauty of the painting was in that head; wasted, sweet, superhuman in its expression, carrying me back to the description which Grant had once given of old Father Henry Young's countenance, in which the pride of flesh and blood had all been destroyed and obliterated.

"What a singular picture," said Oswald. "Who is it? a saint?"

"It is St. Alexis," replied the chaplain, and Oswald evidently was not greatly the wiser. But I looked, and thought, and looked again, and I fancied I had understood its meaning. The noble youth who fled the world, who despised pleasure, and held riches as a curse, the prince who chose in his own father's house, to live unknown, and to die as a beggar, was, doubtless, one whose story might have a deep attraction for a man made rich against his will, and ever fighting with wealth and its temptations.

We approached the altar, and I perceived what had not struck me at first, the exceeding richness of all its fittings.

"That tabernacle," said the chaplain, "is solid gold: it was made out of the first gold discovered at Glenleven, in Australia, 'the great nugget,' as it was called; the duke had it sent to England untouched, and resolved that the first fruits of his gold-fields should furnish the tabernacle of his chapel. The lamps and candlesticks are likewise Australian gold, and so are the sacred vessels."

I knelt before the tabernacle, and the last fragment of my doubts and misgivings vanished into thin air. "Oh, Grant, Grant!" I murmured, "what injustice I have done you! The world talks and judges, and comprehends nothing; you are not of its form and fashion!" And as we turned to leave the chapel, I seemed still to see before me the dying face of St. Alexis, and the golden tabernacle.

We walked home through the plantations, and Oswald was silent, and, for him, thoughtful.

"I called your duke a man of business this morning," he said, "but just now I could fancy him to be a poet."

"A poet! Why so?"

"Well, it was a beautiful thought that about his gold; there was something about the whole thing that struck me as poetical."

"I doubt if the duke was ever conscious of doing anything particularly graceful; but, undoubtedly, Faith always has an innate sense of beauty."

"That is a little beyond me," said Oswald; "but I will tell you why it struck me. At Exborough Park, as you may be aware, there is also what goes by the name of a chapel. The Exborough people always set you down to gold plate at dinner, but the chapel looks like a dust-hole. Leven has abolished the gold plate at Oakham, and the gentry hereabouts called it one of his peculiarities; but I suspect they would understand it better if they looked at that altar."

"Yet the Exboroughs are Catholics," I remarked.

"I should rather think so," said Oswald, "and immensely proud of being of the old stock, and all that sort of thing. But Lady Ex. goes in for London seasons to any extent, and the Exborough girls are the fastest in the county."

"A report reached me in Australia," I said, "that one of them was likely to become Duchess of Leven."

"Wouldn't Lady Exborough have liked it!" said Oswald; "but it was a dead failure. On that subject, as on many others, Leven is peculiar; and I believe he confided to Mary that if the siege lasted he should have to leave the country."

I laughed. "Then there was a siege? And who relieved it?" I asked.

"Oh, I believe Lord Exborough stepped in and stopped proceedings; and Lady Florinda herself took alarm when Glenleven was founded, and the rumour spread that the duke was going to be a lay brother."

"What is Glenleven?" I asked. "Everyone talks of it, and no one tells me what or where it is."

"What, don't you know? It is a large tract of country just on the outskirts of Exborough Moor, where Leven has transplanted a community of Benedictines who fled from the tender mercies of Beastmark. He has built them a grand place, I believe; I have not seen it, but by all accounts the church is a second Cluny. They farm the land, and have all manner of schools of art, carving and metal work; then there are the granite works opened hard by, all which things give occupation to Leven's colony of orphan boys and other select characters, out of whom he cherishes the design of creating a New Utopia."

I looked inquiringly.

"I really cannot tell you much more about it," continued Oswald; "but I think his small success at Bradford, or what he considers as such, has convinced him that reformation of society is somewhat a difficult undertaking unless you take your society in the cradle. And he has conceived the idea of a Christian colony, not beyond the Rocky Mountains, or in the wilds of Australia, but here in the heart of England, to be peopled by men and women of his own bringing up, who shall be protected from penny newspapers, be greatly given to plain chant, and wholly ignorant of the pot-house."

"It sounds splendid; but are you in earnest?"

"Well, I tell you, I have never seen the place. It is a tremendously long drive, and killing for the horses. I gather my ideas of it chiefly from Knowles's talk, who would greatly like to be received as a monk—of course, under certain conditions."

"Well, you have excited my curiosity, and some day I shall try and see for myself," I replied; "but it sounds, as you say, uncommonly Utopian."

We reached home, and for the rest of the evening I listened, after a sort, to Oswald's careless rattle; but my attention, I confess, would often wander away to thoughts of the chapel and Utopia.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE NEW DUKE.

ON the following Monday the Duke returned, and next day I received a brief note from him, begging me to come up to the Park, to dine and sleep, and begin the settlement of the Queensland business the following morning. I went up accordingly, was shown to my room, dressed and descended to the drawing-room, where for the best part of an hour I waited alone, but Leven appeared not. As I afterwards ascertained, the hour preceding dinner was the one hour in the day he claimed for privacy, and no one then ever ventured to disturb him. At last the door opened, and he stood before me. I grasped his hand, and looked into that face, the same, and yet so altered. Aged not by ten but twenty years; no longer with the vigorous, ruddy bloom of five-and-twenty, but pale and transparent, and sweet beyond expression. I stammered out something about "waiting on his Grace," but at once he stopped me. "I have enough of that elsewhere," he said; "let you and me be always Grant and Aubrey."

We went into dinner. Remembering all I had heard of his eremitical habits, I was curious what there might be to notice, and I noticed nothing. There was no gold plate, certainly; but neither was there any affectation of extravagant simplicity.

He talked of old times in Australia, and of Scotland, whence he had just returned, and of Homehester, where he had been inspecting some new engines for his mines. Oswald was right; he certainly had a liking for business.

After dinner we stepped out on the terrace. "How delicious this is, after a week of Homehester; how it reminds me of that happy evening at the Grange, Jack, when you all made me so at home. I couldn't say the feeling it gave me to see your mother with her cap, and her croquet, and her sweet, motherly ways. It reminded me of my own dear mother. Do you know, I often go and have a talk to the old lady, that I may just look at that cap of hers; it's the most lovable thing in Oakham."

(No wonder, I thought, that she considers him faultless.)

"You have been adding to the place since I was here," I said.

"Really, Grant, I never expected to see new graperies."

"That was your sister's affair; trust a woman for getting what she has a mind for."

"And, then, the chapel?"

"Ah, yes, I couldn't always be going over to Bradford, as on that eventful Sunday. You've seen it of course?"

"Yes, and St. Alexis."

He smiled. "That was poor Werner's painting; such a fellow, Jack; a true painter; a man with a soul at the end of his paint-brush; it was wonderful."

"So you burnt poor Adonis?"

"Who's been talking about all that nonsense? Mary, I'll be bound. Yes, I burnt him, and I'd burn him again if I had the offer."

"What a Goth you are, Grant"

"About as bad as St. Gregory, for he would certainly have done the same. Look here, Jack; you send a fellow to prison for a month, with hard labor, for selling prints in a shop window that shook the eye of the respectable public; and then the respectable public votes thousands of the public money to hang the walls of the national collections with abominations much more dangerous"

"Well, but what about Werner? is he an ancient or a modern?"

"Werner? Oh, I forgot you didn't know him; well I think I never loved a fellow better; but, you see, my friends have all got a trick of leaving me."

"Is he dead, then," I asked, gently,

"Dead to this world, Jack; he has left it; passed, as the Laureate would say, 'into the silent life.' He carried his heart and his pencil to Glenleven."

He was silent. "People say——" I began, then paused, for I thought it might seem an impertinence.

"I know what you mean," he said quickly. "Yes, I dreamt about it once, but they would not hear of it. They told me truly that I had received my call, and that my sacrifice must be to remain in the world, and not to leave it."

"Why, of course," I said. "Could you doubt it? It is not every one who has such means at his command."

He sighed deeply. "Means enough, but so little comes of it."

"Come now, Grant, what do you mean by that? Just look at Bradford."

"Bradford!" he said; "yes, indeed, I do look at it—such an utter failure. No, of course, I don't regret it, nor the time, nor the plague of it, nor the money; and I don't mean that there's been nothing done; but, oh, the depths of iniquity hidden away in places like that, and all England seething with them." He bent his head for a minute or two, and an expression of great pain was on his brow when he once more raised it. But it passed in a moment, and again the sweet, calm look returned. "All right, Jack; one must do one's best, and a sad mess the best is; but one must do it, and then leave it with God."

"And how about Glenleven? Is it true, Grant, that you are trying to create a Garden of Eden there, with all due precautions for shutting out the serpent?"

"If you mean the ale-house, yes," he answered. "I suspect that is our English edition of the monster."

"What! beer actually prohibited? My dear Grant, that will never pay; the Anglo-Saxon animal cannot live without it."

"I believe he can't; but I don't go that length."

"What, then?"

"Well, I try it this way: I engage the fellows to drink what they want at home at their own houses."

"But how can they get it to drink?" I asked. "Isn't there something about 'licensed to be drunk on the premises?'"

He looked a little timid, as though aware that he was confessing to a hobby. "I do it this way, Jack: they all have their rations. Every man at work on the place has his proper allowance, and it is sent him from the little tavern. But the tavern is in my own hands, and the fellow who keeps it has no license to sell beer or spirits on the premises."

"Don't they evade your code of laws?"

"Well, on the whole, no: but time alone can test it."

We walked up and down for a while in silence. "I know, my dear Aubrey," at last he said, "that there's much to be said against it, as unreal, unpractical. Most men think me an ass, and I daresay they are in the right of it. But to secure even a year, a month, a week of innocence is worth living for—at least that is how I see it."

I felt touched at the humble, apologetic tone of the man who was speaking of what the world styled his crotchet. "My dear Grant," I said, "who can doubt it? All I was thinking was, how far any private efforts can ever take the place of law and public opinion."

"Your old stronghold!" he said, smiling. "You were always the man for law and order. Just see here. Did you ever hear of Count Rumford?"

"The stove-man," I replied; "of course. What of him?"

"Steves! that's all you know about him. He was Prime Minister to the Elector of Bavaria, and reformed everything. Munich was full of beggars, and no one knew how to get rid of them. Rumford (he was an American, you know,) got a lot of workshops ready. Then, on a fixed day, he agreed with a dozen or so of officers and gentlemen to act with him, and he himself went into the street, and arrested a beggar. The others did the same, and they took the rogues to the government workshops, and offered them food and wages if they would work, and the pillory if they would not. The next day every beggar in Munich had surrendered, and the streets were free of them."

"I think I have heard that story before," I said; "and I think, also, that the government workshops were abolished by the next Elector, and the beggars returned to their former wicked ways."

"So much the worse for the Elector," said Leven, laughing at my sequel to his story. "Anyhow, Rumford carried his purpose his own way. That is what I like; none of your mendicity acts, and spread of education."

"And yet, Leven, you might advance the good cause a precious deal in parliament?"

"Might I? There are two opinions on that point," he said. "No, parliament, and committees, and public meetings, and associations are all glorious things no doubt, but they're not my line; they paralyze me. Let those who feel they can do good that way do it, and I give them my blessing; but I can only go one way to work, and that is straight ahead, and arrest my beggar."

"Well, you must take me to your paradise some day," I said.

"That I will; we'll have a week there when all the plaguing business is over. There are red deer on the moors, and offers in the river, if you have a taste that way, and it will be very jolly."

Our conversation was interrupted by the sudden appearance of a third party in the shape of a merry fair-haired boy, who came running down the terrace to inform "Cousin Leven" that coffee was waiting; and as we turned to obey the summons, the duke held him by the hand, and let him prattle away of all he had been doing or wanting to do whilst Cousin Leven was in Scotland. At last, as we approached the end of the terrace, the boy set off to announce our coming, and Leven answered my look of inquiry. "Little Edward Wigram," he said; "you know Lady Mary died a Catholic—curious, wasn't it?—and on her death-bed got her husband to promise that this child, at least, her youngest, should be brought up in the faith. He couldn't refuse her; but when I heard it, I wrote and begged him to trust the child to me. You see, Aubrey, I have had the whole thing looked thoroughly into. After me there is no male heir. The entail ceases, and I am at full liberty to leave the property to whom I choose, or run through it during my life, and leave it to nobody. The last is what I ardently desire to do, if I have but time. Still, I suppose, Oakham, at any rate, must go to somebody, and so, the long and short of it is, I have adopted Edward, and he will have whatever is left."

"Does he know it?" I asked.

"Of course he does; how else should I train him to feel his responsibility? And a fine little fellow he is, with the spirit of twenty sea-kings in him. I suppose it will have to be thrashed out of him some day; but it's not bad raw material to begin with."

"Grant," I said bluntly, "do you never intend to marry?" He shook his head. "You see," I continued, "what I mean is this: you can't do half the good you might without that sort of influence at Oakham to help you. And, then, family life—you know its beauty, you feel its charm."

"Yes," he answered rather huskily, "I don't doubt it, I assure you, I don't; but somehow it's not my line."

"Well, but you are sure you are right about it? Look here, what I mean is this: family life is not the world, it can be sanctified. There was an Elzear and a Delphina as well as an Alexis."

"I know it," he replied, "and a lovely thing it was, that old family life of Christian society; I hardly think I know anything finer. But, bless you Jack, where should I find a Delphina now-a-days? and what on earth should I do with a girl-of-the-period, and, yet more emphatically, what would she do with me?"

"My dear Grant, all young ladies are not of the Exbore' cut."

"Ah, you've been listening to gossip; well, all I can say is this: most Catholic girls are—most that I know, and it's a crying shame on what we call 'the Catholic body.'"

"Then, my dear Grant, it's another abuse which calls for reform, and who is more fit to be a reformer?"

"No, I tell you it's not that alone, but it can't be. Family life not the world, you say? Well now, I'll just tell you this: it would be the world to me. As to your dinners and dances, your political careers, and your stars and garters, they neither tempt nor attract me; I can renounce and abjure the pomps and vanities, and feel it a light sacrifice. But if once I felt the home ties of which you speak, 'claiming responsive smiles and raptures high,' they would turn to shackles. Besides, there are other things. I'm a strange fellow, Jack, but I can't help it. I don't think I'm harder about the heart than other men; yourself, Oswald, Werner, and a lot of others, I love you all, and I love you tenderly; but it's quite a different concern, I do assure you." I could only press his hand, and remain silent. "All right, Jack, you must take me as you find me. Edward shall carry out all your plans by-and-by; he'll make a rare Elzear, and your little niece, Mary, will be just the right stuff for a Delphina."

Such was Grant, as I found him after our ten years' separation. As simple, as boyish, as unartificial as ever, but tenderer and gentler, with none of the old asperity of tone and manner. As he said of his father, after his conversion, "the pride had gone out of him." What the process had been I could not guess, but the result was not to be mistaken.

The winding-up of our Queensland business was an affair of time, and until it was finished I remained at Oakham. I gradually came to understand more of my friend's habits of life, and the more I saw the more I wondered. He was literally worn down with the press of work and business. His two secretaries worked with him, and worked hard; but the burden was on his life, and it pressed heavily. The administration of a more than princely revenue, and its administration for the glory of God and the good of his fellow-men, was his daily care and his daily cross. Not at Oakham alone, or at Bradford, or within his own county, and his own immediate circle, did Leven pour out his labor and his substance. The great floods of his charity watered the land through a thousand secret channels. I need not speak of them here; indeed, who could reckon them? for the trouble which others take to be known and done justice to, he spent to remain hidden. But I was witness to the amazing correspondence so faithfully discharged, to the patient investigation, day after day, of fresh applications (not always the most becoming, or the most reasonable), to the unalterable cheerfulness with which he chained himself to his allotted tasks, and made it his single thought "to give his life for his brethren."

At Oakham it was one of his favorite objects to draw the young men of the neighborhood, rich and poor, around him, and make his house a centre. A little whimsical in all his ways he conceived the notion of making the volunteer rifle corps, of which he was colonel, an instrument of social reformation. They had a portion of the park set apart for their exercises and rifle practice, and on certain days he had them to dinner, and on those occasions the dinner was always a great affair. Officers and privates he had them all together. "It is no bad thing the rifle uniform," he said; "it teaches the lads self-respect and courtesy." His house, with its galleries of art and library, his park, and his gardens were open to them on certain days, and during part of the day on Sundays, and among the youths whom he thus drew into his influence he formed a little society. "It cost me a good deal of thought, what we should make our bond of union," he said to me, "but at last I hit on natural history."

"What a fellow you are, Grant," I said; "how on earth does that keep them together?"

"The simplest thing in the world," he replied; "I started an Oakham museum. You remember the statuary hall of the Bradford collection?"

"I do, indeed—a good deal in the Adonis line."

"Exactly; well, I dispersed a great lot of it. What in consequence I could present to the public I did present, and the rest Werner and I doomed to the hammer."

"You sold it?"

"Not exactly, Jack; I should have had a seruple of making money out of all these gods and goddesses; but we got half a dozen paupers out of the Exborough union, with good stout hammers, and in a week the divinities were well broken up, and laid down to form our new approach to the chapel. I assure you, I never take a turn along that road without a thrill of satisfaction."

"Really, Grant, no wonder they call you 'extreme' in your notions."

"Well, but listen: the room, emptied out of all that villany, we turned into our museum. Come and see it." And he led the way to the late hall of statuary.

There were cases of stuffed birds and beasts, specimens of marble and granite from his Glenleven quarries; coal fossils from Bradford, found and contributed by his miners; crystals from the Scottish mountains; and nuggets of gold from Australia. Moreover, here and there were some of the Roman antiquities, dug up in the camp hard by, which had first set in motion the brain of good old Edwards; and there were all manners of curiosities, such as schoolboys prize, and which few but schoolboys are really found to appreciate—wasps' nests, and birds' nests, and dried snakes in bottles.

"No great varieties, you see, but all our own collection; even the boys bring their quota, and that series of bees' and wasps' nests is a real curiosity."

"And you think it answers?"

"I know it does: every hour they give to this sort of thing is an hour stolen from the beer-shop; and, besides, it cultivates and makes them think. I have had a professor or two down here to give some lectures to the society. I choose my professors myself, you know," he said, rather grimly; "and I can assure you they are not Darwins. Well, now, not very many, but a few of those lads have been thinking to good purpose, and form a class of instruction under Father Hubert."

"What does Edwards say to that?"

"Oh, of course, he was rather savage about it at first, and Knowles has opened a course of lectures against Roman aggression; but I suspect they begin to choke him in the utterance."

"Will he ever come to his senses?" I said: "I fancy there is a grain of wheat beneath the chaff in his case."

"Possibly; but it must have time to germinate. You will see him probably at Exdale, where, Oswald tells me, he is expecting you to-morrow. I shall join you there in a couple of days; and then, if all goes well, we'll start for Glenleven."

It was arranged accordingly, and the next day, with little Edward for my companion, I set out for Exdale Manor.

CHAPTER IX.

EXDALE MANOR.

I informed my reader in a previous chapter that my family had no claim whatever to figure in a romance, and that my sister Mary, in particular, had not the least pretension to be considered a heroine. Neither was her husband, Charles Oswald, anything of a hero: but he was an excellent fellow, and their marriage was a happy one. Mary supplied the plain good sense which served as ballast to her husband's animal spirits. Their family consisted of three children, of whom the "little Mary," that Grant had spoken of, was the eldest. Alexia, her young sister, was somewhat of that type which among boys we term a "sad pickle;" and Johnny, the son and heir, was yet in his cradle. The only other figure in the home group was Oswald's unmarried sister, Florence, of whom I could predicate no more on a first introduction than that she had fine, classical features, stamped, however, with that joyless intellectualism which mars all beauty on the face of woman. Mistake me not, dear reader, for an intellectual countenance is a magnificent object, and the index of a truly magnificent gift; but both the gift and the countenance need something else to soften their sharp edges, and that something seemed wanting in Florence Oswald.

Exdale itself was a modest country-house, very different in style and dimensions from Oakham; but it had a charm which Oakham did not possess, it was filled to the brim with a genial, domestic atmosphere. Dear old Mary was regularly in her glory, as mistress of a house, and head of a family. She had the true genius of that particular calling; she understood her husband's ways and wants, and also contrived to supply them; she made the most of a moderate income, and prevented his doing foolish things, without ever dreaming that he was managed; she took in girls from the village school, and trained them to be good servants; but no one was ever plagued with their awkward ways whilst they were in course of training. The house looked as if somebody was always putting it to rights, and yet there was no fuss about it, and Mary herself was never seen in a bustle. She was not a heroine, certainly, but I will maintain against all comers that she was the queen of wives and mothers.

After the deserted suites of state apartments, and long, silent galleries of Oakham, the sound of family talk and children's prattle was a pleasant change, though the scene, by comparison, was a homely one, for what they called "the Park," at Exdale, was little better than a paddock, and instead of elegant fallow deer there were to be seen in it only half a dozen cows and an old pony. The latter was already in possession of Master Edward, his claims being stoutly contested by Alexia, and as passively acknowledged and submitted to by little Mary.

"It's a miniature picture of human life," I observed, as Oswald and I stood at the window and surveyed the group, "Mary representing the old school, and Alexia standing up for the rights of man—or rather of woman."

"In the present instance, Mary will be the winning horse," said Oswald; "I never yet knew a woman who gained the day by a war of independence."

"I don't know about that, Charley," said Florence, who had meanwhile joined us at the window; "I think I have heard of one Judith."

"Under correction," I venture to remark, "Judith won the day less by resistance than by address."

"Just so," said Oswald; "if she had not known the art of making herself agreeable, she would never have brought home the head of Holofernes. And, see, it's just as I said it would be: Edward has vacated his seat in favor of Mary, and Alexia is left to go on foot. Capital lesson for you, Florry."

"A tame sort of conquest," she replied, carelessly; "she lets him lead the pony, as though she did not know how to hold the bridle. Alexia would have been half round the park by this time."

I glanced at the speaker, and it seemed to me as though this little dialogue had given me the key to her character, one that disdained to lean on the strength of another, and would far rather suffer than submit.

We were summoned to dinner, the only other addition to our party being Wilfrid Knowles, who liked to be called "Father Wilfrid," and wore a Roman collar. Between him and Florence there seemed to exist a mutual interest based on conscious antagonism; he, stiff in his sense of sacerdotal superiority, she, equally self-possessed in her audacious spirit of revolt.

"So Degg had done for himself at last," said Oswald, when preliminaries had been gone through, and everybody was feeling comfortable; "it would prolong my life if I thought I should live to see that fellow get his deserts."

"Who is Degg, and what has he done to do for himself?" I inquired.

"I was telling you of him the other day: the editor of the Western Censor, and the greatest good-for-naught in Exshire. His Philippics, as he calls them, abusive as they are, have hitherto been so elaborately contrived as to secure local obsequy ment; but in his last production entitled 'The Australian Duke,' he has passed the boundary line, and Leven, at last, has him fairly in his power, for he is bound to prosecute."

"What makes him so exceedingly savage with the duke?" I inquired.

"Oh," said Oswald, "he wanted to be returned member for Bradford at the last election, and Leven was supposed to have used his influence to save the borough from that disgrace.

"Besides, which," added Knowles, "the Duke of Leven is a Christian, and Mr. Degg has an angry aversion to everything that savors of the faith."

"Really," said Florence, "I think you are all rather hard on poor Degg; he writes extravagantly, as men of genius often do, and his sense of wrong and injustice is just like a fiery passion; but he cares for the working classes, and can't always control himself when he pleads their cause."

"Florry, don't talk nonsense," said her brother; "Degg cares for the working-classes just in the same way as I care for the ducks and chickens in my poultry-yard, which I care for extremely, with a view to my ultimate advantage."

"And what particular advantage do you think poor Degg will get from taking part with the weak against the strong?" said Florence.

"In the first place," said Oswald, "he enjoys the sweets of notoriety, and the pleasant sensation of putting down his betters; and if Hapiroek should ever again undertake the tinkering of our glorious constitution, I suspect Mr. Degg calculates on floating into parliament on the tide of universal suffrage."

"Well, so be it," said Florence, "worse men than he have before now sat in parliament."

"But, my dear Florence," said Mary, in a tone of remonstrance, "if he really is an infidel?"

"I don't see what right any one has to say so; and, after all, as the word is commonly used, it's a relative term, and means simply people who don't believe exactly as much as we do ourselves. I daresay Mr. Aubrey would consider our best Oxford divines as hopeless infidels."

The blow was intended for Wilfrid, but he remained unscathed by it. "If Mr. Aubrey were to express such an opinion it would not be far from the truth," he observed. "The Oxford of the present day is, unhappily, more than half infidel."

"Well, then, Mr. Knowles, on your own showing, poor Mr. Degg no more deserves to be sent to Coventry on that account than the most distinguished men of your own Alma Mater, so you are bound to judge him mercifully."

"She can hold her own pretty well, can't she?" said Oswald. "Take some champagne, Florry, and leave Degg to his doom. If there's justice in England, he'll soon be in limbo."

"So you are going to Glenleven?" said Knowles, addressing me, by way of changing the subject; "I suppose it's your first visit?"

"Yes," I replied, "ever since I've been in England, I've been so continually hearing of Glenleven, that I'm glad at last to satisfy my curiosity."

"It's a wonderful place, certainly," he observed; "I spent a week there last Lent, and enjoyed it immensely."

"Really, Mr. Knowles? Wasn't it rather a schismatical piece of enjoyment?" inquired Florence, "at least according to our Anglican notions."

"No, indeed, Miss Oswald," said Knowles, who seemed to have an unflinching command of temper; "I, for one, deeply deplore our unhappy separations."

Florence seemed to be considering how best to aim her weapon in retort, when I stepped in to rescue him from further badgering. "If you know Glenleven," I said, "you are probably acquainted with Leven's friend, the young German painter."

"Mr. Werner, you mean—Brother Norbert, as he is now called? yes, I know him very well."

"Of course we all know Mr. Werner," said Mary; "he was only an amateur painter, you know; in reality he was rather an important personage."

"How a man with his genius could go and bury it on the moors!" said Florence; "It was an awful sacrifice."

"What a girl you are, with your everlasting genius," said Oswald; "I believe women think every man with a black beard is a genius."

"I never thought you one, Charley," said his incorrigible sister; "so I suppose you being fair accounts for it."

"Indeed, I hope he is not," said Mary; "geniuses seem to me to be always doing or saying something they'd better have left alone."

"One of Mary's home thrusts," said Oswald; "how d'ye like it, Florry?"

"There's a good deal of truth in the remark," said Wilfrid; "a genius is an erratic thing at best—much like a comet, as brilliant and as unsubstantial. For practical ends, a stable-lantern is infinitely more to the purpose."

"I suppose both comets and geniuses have their uses in our system," I observed, "though everybody isn't sharp-sighted enough to discover it."

Florence gave me a quick glance of inspection, as though she might possibly some day or other find it worth her while to speak to me.

"The worst of it is," said Oswald, "that so many of your geniuses are just nothing but sky-rockets after all, and go out whilst you are staring at them."

"Well," said Florence, "sky-rockets are beautiful, and beauty is always of use; I appeal to Mr. Aubrey."

It struck me that she said this as it were to test me, and see what stuff I was made of. "To answer satisfactorily," I replied, "I fear I must be a bore, and ask you what you mean by beauty?"

"Well, what do you mean by it?"

"Suppose I were to call it the splendor of goodness?"

"Ah! that will do famously," she replied; "if goodness is beauty, then beauty is goodness; so we conclude in favor of the sky-rockets."

"Sad sophistry, Miss Oswald," said Wilfrid Knowles, as he rose to open the door for the ladies. But he soon followed them, leaving Oswald and myself tête-à-tête.

Poor Oswald yawned as if relieved from a mental tension more or less irksome. "I suppose we must not grudge women the use of their tongues," he said, "though they talk sad nonsense with them. I always hold that what claws are to the lion, and a beak to the eagle, that her tongue is to a woman."

"I should think old Mary's tongue was a peaceable member," I replied.

"Pretty well, though she can come out now and then with a plain truth or two, as she did just now on the matter of genius. I wish she could put some of her common sense into poor Florry."

"Your sister has a touch of the erratic gift herself, I should suspect," I said, "and, if so, you must make allowances."

"Oh, yes, and more than a touch; she is always at work on some new bother. What ever can set women on such scents I don't understand; and it's bad altogether, you know, and unhinges her."

"People have a way now-a-days," I said, "of looking unhinged and unhappy; it's the fashion."

"No," said Oswald, "I don't call Florry happy; she's always wanting a career of some sort, and can't settle down to humdrum. Mary is the only person she really minds, and Mary gets Wilfrid Knowles here to meet her, because she hopes he'll do Florry good; but I think it's a mistake; he only rouses her love of contradiction."

We talked about other things for a while, and then adjourned to the drawing-room, where we found Wilfrid and Mary deep in the discussion of parochial affairs, and Florence at the further end of the room, playing a game of fox-and-geese with Edward, while the two little girls looked on, Alexia acting as self-elected umpire. I ventured to approach, and was greeted with the information that "Aunt Florence was losing all her geese!"

"I wish I thought so," said Florence, with a sigh. Then, as the last white peg was snapped up by the inexorable fox, she resigned the board to the children, and graciously condescended to allow me to sit beside her. "I have not yet thanked you," she said, "for taking the part of poor genius. I really thought 'Father Wilfrid' (as they call him) would have condemned us for life to the use of stable-lanterns."

"Possibly," I said, "if one had to find one's way on a dark night, they might have a trifling advantage over sky-rockets."

"Yes, but one isn't always groping one's way in the dark."

"Well, really, when you come back to civilized society after ten years' absence, it's not much unlike what you find people doing."

"How so?"

"Why, everyone seems on the look-out for first principles which one would have thought they had learned centuries ago from their grandmothers."

"I think I understand what you mean," said Florence, musingly; "but it must be so when people begin to think for themselves; everyone can't exactly rest satisfied with his grandmother's speculations."

"No, but my complaint is, that these independent thinkers pick everything to pieces, and leave it so."

"That is to say," said Florence, "they analyze, and how else can they hope to get at truth?"

"Those who analyze," I said, "should know how to reconstruct, otherwise they are in the position of people who take their watches to pieces, and cannot put them together again. They would have done better to have trusted a watchmaker."

"Your simile has the vice of all similes," she replied; "it seems to say something, and it says nothing. I can trust my watch with another to regulate, but not my independent convictions."

"But, my dear Miss Oswald, how many persons now-a-days possess such a commodity? All the people I know take their convictions second-hand, from the Times newspaper, or the Saturday Review, or maybe from the Western Censor. I really hardly know one man who thinks for himself, unless it be the Duke of Leven."

"Yes, the duke is original, certainly," she replied; "I don't agree with him, of course; but he is thoroughly in earnest, and I respect him immensely."

"And Father Wilfrid, is not he also somewhat of a doctor in Israel?"

She looked disdainfully in the direction where he sat: "In his own opinion, no doubt, but not in mine. I like the real thing, Mr. Aubrey, whatever be its kind. Charley's champagne was splendid; but if he were to give us 'gooseberry' with a champagne ticket, I should call him an impostor." With that she walked to the open window, where Wilfrid presently joined her, and soon we heard them engaged afresh in a wordy war.

"That's the way she treats the impostor," said Oswald, who had caught her last words as he approached. "A most wonderful thing is woman!"

This philosophic remark closed my study of character for that evening, but when I retired to my room I could not help going over it all again, as a lawyer studies the points of his brief. "She talks at random," I said to myself, "and half of it is chaff. She thinks amazingly well of her own powers, and has read a prodigious quantity of rubbish. She would have no objection to be thought an infidel, because it would be jaunty and defiant. If ever she becomes one, it will be the result of over-preaching; if she is ever saved from becoming one, it will not be by the ministry of Father Wilfrid."

In the correctness of this last conclusion, I was next day confirmed, and it happened thus: Exdale was in the parish of Oakham, but possessed a church of its own, served by one of the Oakham curates, and just now the thoughts of Mr. Knowles were busily engaged with plans for its restoration. The architect, Mr. Buttermilk, was to meet him at Exdale, and had brought with him drawings and elevations in great store, the inspection of which furnished the drawing-room party with an agreeable morning's occupation.

Screened by my newspaper, much edifying talk over sedilia and holy water stoups fell upon my ear; and I was wondering a little about the exact utility of the last-named article in a Protestant church, when Florence joined in the conversation and at once hit the blot. "The sedilia are to sit in, I presume," she said, "and will save the expense of chairs; but what will you do with the holy water stoups?"

"It is our wish," said Buttermilk, with professional unction, "to reconstruct this beautiful little edifice, as it existed in the fourteenth century, and to do that completely none even of these minor accessories should be omitted."

"But will there be holy water in them?" inquired Florence, in the tone of one innocently desirous of information.

"Probably not," said Knowles, "but they will bear their witness."

"Oh, I see," said Florence, gravely; "holy water stoups and no holy water: let us proceed."

The next drawing was produced; it represented an elaborately carved tomb or sepulchre, to be erected on the north wall of the chancel.

"How beautiful!" said Mary; "but isn't it an odd place for a monument!"

"It is not a monument, my dear Mrs. Oswald," said Knowles, "but a sepulchre, such as was required for the touching and significant ceremony anciently practised on Easter morning," and he proceeded to read from a glossary of Gothic art the description of an elaborate rite, "now wholly obsolete."

"I was thinking it must be so," said Florence, who had listened attentively. "I have often gone to the services in Holy Week when I've been abroad: the music is so beautiful; but I never saw anything at all like what you have described."

"No," said Knowles (who, I suppose, overlooked me behind my newspaper), "it is one among many examples of the way in which the modern Roman Church has departed from the ancient practice."

"And which, no doubt, the modern English Church has preserved with jealous veneration," said his tormentor.

"If she has not preserved it, she will very probably revive it," said Knowles. "If we continue at our present pace, the English branch of the Church Catholic will ere long have the most magnificent ritual in Western Christendom."

"I don't doubt it," said Florence, "and I tell you what it will then remind me of; a grand display of gold and silver dishes with nothing to eat upon the table."

"Would you like the display any the better," said Knowles, "if the dishes were full of viands?"

"Perhaps not," said Florence, "except in this, that the banquet would then be a reality; whereas, in the present case, it is a cruel sham."

"Do not mistake me, Miss Oswald," said Knowles, with great earnestness. "I respect your love of what is real and honest; I do indeed; were we aiming at the revival of external ceremonies only, it would be as you say, a cruel sham; but ceremonial is not an empty shell; in time it will bring back the realities."

"Never!" said Florence, with a vehement emphasis, which made Mr. Buttermilk look up through his spectacles in some alarm; "never! your realities are long ago dead and buried."

"Are they?" I said as I caught her eye over my newspaper.

"Yes," she replied, leaving the group of archaeologists, and coming over to my quarter of the apartment, "can you dispute it?"

"I dispute the possibility of a reality ever dying, whatever pains may be taken to bury it."

She remained silent; and, as I looked at her, I too felt a kind of respect for that scorn of shams which was manifestly genuine in her. I thought of the impression I had myself received long years ago, when Grant had told us the story of his life, and how for the first time it had opened my heart to a sense of the realities of faith.

"May I tell you a story, Miss Oswald?" I said.

"I should like it of all things," she replied; "and perhaps it will help to restore my temper. Suppose you tell it in the garden, for if you begin here we shall be swallowed up in the mediæval Maelstrom."

So to the garden we made our way, and finding a seat adapted for story-telling, I began at the beginning, and related my friend's history and experiences as well as my memory served me. She listened, at first with curiosity only, but soon with deeper interest; and before I had concluded, the tears which gathered in her eyes had almost softened into beauty her haughty features.

"Yes, that is real, if you like," she said. "That mass in the barn listened to by a crowd of shepherds and bush-rangers, with the old priest standing up there in the midst, and speaking out to them like a man; and the others, astounded, cut to the heart, conscience-stricken! What a scene! One longs to have witnessed it!"

"But what made it real?" I asked.

"The man was in earnest," she replied, "and so was his audience. There was no affectation about mediæval vestments, or obsolete ceremonies; he spoke from his heart and they listened with theirs, and that was all about it."

"Then you don't think it was in any way explained by the fact, then he spoke as one having authority, who had the truth to give?"

"The truth! authority!" she repeated in a tone, as though the words conveyed no definite sense to her understanding.

"Perhaps I don't quite catch your meaning; I cannot see how one man has any more authority to talk than another; but if he says bravely what he thinks strongly, it is truth to him; and I listen with respect, whether the words come from Pius IX. or from Buddha."

Yes, that is the sort of thing we have to listen to now-a-days from our sisters and daughters. Of course they don't know what they are talking about, and not two of them would be able to tell you who Buddha was, or when he lived. But what does that matter? It is the last new slang which they have picked up from the last periodical, and it sounds free and slashing; so it is quite in harmony with that peculiar style of dress which finds favor in proportion as it is manly.

"That view of truth is rather self-destructive," I observed; "a dozen or two of those same strong truths would soon reduce each other to negations."

"After the fashion of Kilkenny cats," she replied. "I see what you are driving at. Mr. Knowles' favorite theory of ob-jective truth, as he calls it; I have listened to it till I am weary. No, no, Mr. Aubrey, it would never do for me; you must leave me at liberty to seek for truth wherever it blossoms, like those bees there, that are gathering their honey from every flower in the garden."

I felt reluctant to diminish the impression which Grant's story had made on her, by plunging her afresh into captious argument; though I could not help calling to mind her own words the evening before, on the peculiar vice of similes. At that moment Mary approached, indicating the break-up of the Archaeological Committee; Florence made room on the bench beside her, and informed her sister-in-law, that I had been "telling her all about the Duke of Leven."

"Ah!" said Mary, "how well I remember the evening he told us that story; I could have listened till midnight. He's so changed since then: don't you think so, Jack?"

"Yes," I said, "he is changed, but I think it is for the better."

"Better in what?" asked Florence.

"He's less harsh and dogmatic," I said; "he used to have a way of blurring out his views, as if prepared to run his head against everybody's garden wall. Time has softened his rough edges."

"And other things besides time," said Mary; "he has had his sorrows."

"Indeed!" I said. "I have heard nothing about them; but I suspect his wealth, after all, has been his chief trouble."

"An original kind of sorrow, that, to which most persons would resign themselves if the chance were given them."

"It is so, I assure you," I said. "He is weighed down with sense of responsibility, and, wishing to do the greatest possible amount of good, the actual results are always falling short his desires."

"Well," said Florence, "it is a noble weakness. He's mistaken of course—most people that I know of are; but at last he's mistaken splendidly."

CHAPTER X.

DEGG'S ESCAPE.

OUR conversation was interrupted by the arrival of the very person under discussion; the duke's carriage was seen coming along the drive, and we assembled before the door to meet him. He was always at home at Exdale, where he seemed to shake off the shackles of his position and move at ease. Thither he came at brief intervals to enjoy the sunshine of the family circle, where the children expected "Duke," as they called him, to tell them stories about kangaroos and dodos, and where he took counsel on many practical points with that wise old Mary. Greetings over, he was shown to his room, whither, at his request, I accompanied him to take care of sundry packets of unanswered letters, the daily acknowledgement of which was one of the duties which he held sacred. Before we again descended to the drawing-rooms I took occasion to inform him of the presence of Miss Oswald.

"We have had some passages-at-arms together," I said; "What do you think of her?"

"Much like the rest of her genus," he replied. "They would be offended with us if we were to call them the softer sex, since they've taken to chaff and yachting buttons."

"You are not often so severe," I replied. "In this instance do believe there is something hidden under the chaff. I begin to suspect the existence of a heart."

"She has a head, I know, and one famously full of rubbish: as to the other appendage, I will take it on your word."

"Do you know, Grant, I wish you would take her in hand; she's much like taming a wild cat, I know, but it would be worth the labor."

Grant shook his head. "I know Florence well," he said; "she rises to an argument like a trout to a fly, and would stand up against an archangel for pure love of contradiction."

"If the archangel were clothed in the garb of a High Church parson, I believe she would; but the tears were in her eyes when I talked to her to-day about Australia and Father Daly."

"So you've been blabbing, and made the little girl cry over your story, and were moved by the 'watery witness in her eye' to believe in her possession of a heart? Really, Jack, it savors of the sentimental."

"No, no, Grant, nothing of the sort, I do assure you; but the poor child is in want of a better helping hand than Wilfrid Knowles, who does his very best, and only drives her in a contrary direction."

"Well," said Grant. "we'll think it over; but the taming of young ladies is not exactly my vocation."

We went down stairs, and were met by Oswald, who barely gave himself time to shake hands with the duke, before he brought forth the iniquity of Degg, and demanded instant justice. "You'll prosecute, of course; he hasn't the least rag of conscience, and at last we shall be rid of the rascal."

"I am sorry to disappoint you," said Grant, in a very unexcused tone, "but I don't intend to prosecute."

"Not prosecute!" cried Oswald. "But, my dear Leven, have you read his last week's article?"

"Yes," replied the duke. "Verney put it into my hand as I was getting into the carriage, and I read it coming along."

"Well?"

"Well?"

"You won't let the fellow escape this time with impunity?"

"Yes, my dear Oswald, life is too short to spend it prosecuting rascals; if Degg has a fancy for publishing fancy biographies of me, he is perfectly welcome; I shall neither bring him into court, nor shall he bring me."

Oswald's disappointment was intense; but something in the duke's manner made it difficult for him to pursue the subject, and he had to content himself with an expressive gesture which if interpreted, might be understood as meaning either despair at the eccentricity of his friend, or a fervent desire of impaling the unhappy culprit.

During dinner, and the hour or two of conversation that followed, the duke was chiefly absorbed by Wilfrid Knowles, who talked to him about Glenleven, and religious rules, and the practices of the Fathers in the Desert, till Florence could not conceal her impatience, and even Oswald fidgeted. I thought that Grant himself must be tired of it, but, if so, he did not betray it in his manner; he appeared to be giving Wilfrid his whole attention, and was always courteous and kind.

As soon as she found herself out of earshot, Florence gave vent to her indignation. "Your duke should certainly be canonized," she said; "he has done two heroic acts this day; he pardoned Degg, and listened patiently to Father Wilfrid for the space of two hours."

"Oswald will never forgive him the first achievement, nor you the second."

"Well, but are they not both rather of the supernatural order?"

"Probably," I replied: "as yet, I confess, I do not understand his motives in the matter of Degg."

"If Mr. Knowles would but be quiet for a minute, I would make bold to inquire; can't you create a diversion?"

The diversion, however, was effected by the duke himself, who, having succeeded in obtaining a short respite, took refuge in an armchair beside us.

"So it is really true, then," said Florence, "that Degg is not to be delivered over to the tormentors? I assure you, Charley here was already preparing the faggots."

"I daresay he would have run a fair chance of burning in that fourteenth century Mr. Knowles is so fond of," replied the duke; "but we are happily fallen on days of toleration."

Florence paused; and it was with the least possible amount of timidity that she said at last: "Is it very impertinent? I don't mean it so; but may I ask your reasons?"

"Reasons for what?"

"For not punishing him. Was it generosity?"

"Well, I'm not very fond of revenge, or of law courts either. I don't believe they're the best places in the world for fostering charity."

"And was that all?"

"No, not quite, perhaps," and it was his turn to hesitate.

"Well, Miss Oswald, I'll say to you what I could not say just now to your brother, when he was at such a white heat of frenzy. All circumstances considered, I should feel it shocking if Degg were to be held up to judgment for libelling me, when for these many years past law court after law court has declared it impossible to call him to account for libelling my Master."

"Your Master!" ejaculated Florence.

"Yes; why do you look so astonished?"

"I don't think I exactly understand."

"Why, my dear Miss Oswald, it's what every one knows; this poor creature has found it to his profit to put out week after week the most offensive articles on religious matters. He has not been content with assailing what he calls sacerdotalism in all its branches; he has attacked Christianity along the whole line, the most sacred things and the most sacred persons. I should not like to offend your ears by repeating the titles of some of his things; yet for all this blasphemy he has escaped scot-free; and after that, do you suppose I would allow damages to be given against him for some silly lies about my character? It would go against one's instincts of faith: at least that is my feeling."

There was a long pause: Florence leant her head on her hand, and seemed to be really thinking; Grant took up a book of photographs, and I sat by and watched the scene, which deeply interested me. At last she spoke: "Faith—yes, it must be a wonderful thing; a wonderful motive-power for those who possess it."

"And don't you possess it?"

"No, and I suppose I never shall. Don't be shocked. It must be a grand thing to believe as you do; but to some minds, even whilst they admire, it is simply impossible."

"Do you mean deliberately to say that you believe nothing?" said Grant, looking at her with those grave, penetrating eyes that were so rarely turned to meet the gaze of another. She seemed almost to tremble under their power.

"No, not quite that; but not what you would call believing."

"Let us come to particulars," said Grant, "for I don't believe that you believe nothing. And if there is any one thing you do believe, obey it, and it will lead you further."

"I don't understand," said Florence. "Please to explain yourself."

"Well, I will take the first element of faith; you believe in God?"

"Of course," she replied.

"And that He made you?"

She was silent.

"You see there is no alternative. He either made you, or you are a bundle of fortuitous atoms, that have come together of themselves."

Florence still hesitated; to say Yes, would, she well knew, pledge her to fling to the owls and the bats a vast assortment of scientific semi-infidel views she had been fond of ventilating; and yet to say No in plain English, and to such an interrogator, was more than she dared.

"I suppose I believe it," she said, at length. "Of course we know so little of these matters."

"Well, never mind that; you do believe it, that is enough: you believe that He made you, body and soul: for I suppose you believe that you have a soul; you don't think you are nothing but a body, a handful of dust, do you?"

Again Florence leant her head on her hand, and the answer was, as it were, torn from her: "No, I believe that I have a soul."

"Why?" said Grant, "why do you believe it?"

She looked at him steadily. "Because I feel it," she answered.

"Dust thou art, to dust returnest,"
Was not spoken of the soul."

"Well, that is, perhaps, not the very safest ground of faith, but it will do for the present. Now, listen to me. These things are not intellectual views; they are facts, living realities. If you hold them as intellectual views merely, you don't believe them; but if you do believe them, you must obey them."

"How?" said Florence. "How can I obey a fact?"

"In this way," he replied: "If there is a God, he must be worshipped. If He made you, He is your Master; yes, you don't like the word, I see; you shrink from it, it makes you angry. But it is not the less true for that; He is your Master, and holds you in His hand, and you must serve Him. And if you have a soul, an immortal soul, as you say you believe, you must care for it as you care for nothing else; and this taking care of an immortal soul is a very serious business."

There was not another word spoken for several minutes; at last Florence raised her head from her hand, and in a timid, subdued tone, murmured, "Thank you." The duke nodded kindly to her, and she went away to the piano; and to excuse her unusual silence, spent the rest of the evening singing Oswald some of his favorite songs.

CHAPTER XI.

CAPITULATION.

THE next morning when we met at breakfast Florence was silent and abstracted. She abstained alike from provoking retort and audacious assertion, and allowed Mr. Knowles to deal forth much edifying talk without so much as a single contradiction; nay, more, when Oswald rallied her on her untactfulness, she could find nothing more brilliant to say by way of answer than that it was so hot.

Plans for the day were brought under discussion, including a visit to Exdale Church, Mr. Knowles being desirous that questions in debate about the restoration should be settled the spot. Mary good-naturedly consented to accompany him, but Florence pleaded a previous engagement. She was pledged she said, to escort Edward and the children on a fishing expedition, and shortly after breakfast we saw them depart in a pony-chaise, with a great array of baskets and fishing-rods, Florence herself being the driver.

Oswald had challenged the duke and myself to a ride over the property. There was much to examine and talk about—proposed improvements, the repairing of farms and rebuilding cottages, on all which questions Grant was an authority, and displayed his accustomed clear head and knowledge of business. It was late in the afternoon when we returned from our ride, and on reaching the house, we found that the fishing party had preceded us only by a few minutes, and were in the act of ascending from the pony-chaise.

"What a lather old Dobbin is in!" said Oswald. "What have you been doing with him, Florry?"

"Dobbin was naughty, and ran away," said Mary.

"He wouldn't have run," said Alexia, "if Aunt Florry had given him the whip."

"Naughty ponies deserve the whip," said Florence. "No, be quick or you'll be late for tea, and I shall get a scolding from the nursery authorities," and the two little girls disappeared from the scene, Edward remaining behind to witness the departure of the horses for the stable. Before she turned into the house, Florence patted the old pony kindly, and much of him. I looked at her, and I thought she looked pleased and agitated.

Grant drew Edward aside. "Has anything been wrong?" said he. "Did old Dobbin really bolt?"

"It was Florence made him," said Edward. "You see I came home over the downs, and when we reached Baker's (that's where the road turns sharp off from the cliff into a lane), a white donkey came out from the hedge, and started him, and he shied, and backed to the edge. So Florence gave him a sharp cut, and he set off on a gallop, and Lexy called him running away. He pulled up when he came to the hill, and Florry turned round, and said: 'That was a close shave, I was frightened; were you frightened?' And I was a little, you know, but I told her I had said a 'Hail Mary' and an 'Angel of God' that we might not go over the cliff, and we didn't."

"I see," said Grant, and he said no more.

We all met in the drawing-room before dinner.

"How pale you look, Florence," said Mary.

"No wonder," said Oswald. "That very high-mettled steed Dobbin, is reported to have bolted with her."

"Oh, it was only the children's nonsense," said Florence. "Dobbin gave a stretch or two just after we passed Baker's Bit, and Alexia liked to call it running away. By-bye, Charley, I wonder you don't get posts or something put there; the road goes amazingly near the edge of the cliff."

"Of course it does," said Oswald. "That's where the baker's cart went down, horse and all, so, at least, says Exdale tradition."

"Well, I think you ought to prevent the butcher from following him," said Florence; and there the matter dropped.

Guests arrived, and we went to dinner. Florence had her next door neighbor an old gentleman who appeared to prosy; but she gave him her undivided attention, or seemed to do so. For all conversational purposes, however, she was tinguished, and I was left to speculate whether this result was due to the achievements of the duke or of Dobbin.

During the rest of the evening, Grant had to receive and turn the attentions of the company invited to meet him. He was one who never forgot, and he watched his opportunity. At a convenient moment, when the buzz was general, he found means to approach Florry, and address her without observaaged at a chess-table within ear-shot, I was able, while considering the next move of my queen, to catch their dialogue. "Am I right," said Grant, "in supposing that the drive to Baker's Bit, was not altogether pleasant?"

He looked at him. "Has Edward told you?" she said; and, after a moment, "I don't want Mary to hear about it; the pony backed; it's a horrid place, we were all but fall-

"Was there really danger?" he inquired.

"Yes," she replied; "the left wheel must have been over; don't know how much Edward saw, but I could see clear over the cliff, two hundred feet to the bottom."

"A terrible moment," said the duke. "I have known such my life; they condense into a second the sensations of years."

"They do, indeed," said Florence, "and they clear away my clouds." Then she was silent, but it was a silence that seemed to indicate that there was something more she half desired to say. Grant did not hurry her; he held his tongue, and gave her time to gather up her courage; and at last she heard her voice, but it was a very husky one. "I remembered your words; I shall never forget them. It is all confusion now, but they will lead me somewhere, I don't yet know where. Only this I want to say: When I looked down that precipice, I felt that He was my Master."

"And I think that is check-mate," said my adversary, a mild-looking person, astonished at his own success; but in truth, my mind had been rather in my ears than my eyes, and in my joy at Florry's capitulation I lost my queen and my game.

"It's all right," I said; "some losses are a real victory."

He stared, as well he might; and I daresay it was next day reported in Exdale that Mrs. Oswald's brother was more than a little eccentric.

"You will let me give you your revenge," he said, replacing his pieces, whilst I continued to play the eaves-dropper; but he was little more to hear; only the duke's parting words. Well, that's all as it should be; and if you remember my words, don't forget little Edward's."

"How so?"

"At the edge of the precipice he prayed, and you were led; it was a lesson."

"Yes, yes," said Florence. "I know what you mean; I thought of it when he told me."

And so the conversation ended.

The next morning we left Exdale for a week at Glenleven. Edward was left behind, Florence pledging herself that he could come to no harm, and the riding and fishing should not together banish the Latin Grammar. Grant was silent for a while as we drove away; at last he said:

"You were right about that poor child, and I was wrong. He is always wrong in judging that people have no hearts. Everyone has one, only they can't always find it."

"I suspect Florry found hers at the edge of Baker's Bit," I said.

"Yes, and she was a brave girl, too, to hold her tongue about that adventure for fear of frightening Mary. Most men would have jabbered about it for a fortnight."

"The daughters of Eve do not certainly owe you much in the way of compliment," I said; "but my belief is that Florence only needs the faith to rise far above the average. She is a good way off yet, though."

"Yes," said Grant; "but she is in the right way. We must get them to say a lot of rosaries for her at Glenleven."

CHAPTER XII.

GLENLEVEN.

A drive of eighteen miles brought us to the outskirts of the town among which Leven had planted his Christian colony. From that semi-mountainous district, topped with granite peaks, and girded by its forests, more than one river took its course, and found its way through plains and valleys to the Southern Channel. It was a lonely, unenclosed, uninhabited district, sufficiently far removed from cities and the hum of men to savor of the wilderness. How beautiful I felt it! and how my companion seemed to revel in the freedom and freshness of the mountain air and the solitude. At an opening of the hills we came rather suddenly on the village, formed of well-built cottages, not boasting of what Leven would once have called the intolerable affectation of Oakham picturesqueness, but still pleasant to the eye, and as he was careful to inform me, rejoicing in good ventilation and drainage. The houses and the walls were all built of granite; it was the cheapest material because close at hand, and it gave a grand, solid, and somewhat ancient tone to the erections. Leven did not fail to point out to me, as we passed, the goodly structure, from which swung the sign of "the Leven Arms," the tavern, that is, where, as he said, "Nothing and nobody was licensed to be drunk on the premises." A little out of the village, in a charming spot, fenced about by beech-woods, and looking down the valley, was the Duke's house, a modest little cottage attached to a small farm-house, containing six rooms, to which it was his custom to retire when he wanted rest and solitude.

He entered it with the glee of a man who finds himself at home. Two sitting-rooms, and a couple of bedrooms, with one for his attendant. This was all. The furniture was plain and solid, the bedrooms having the rural look of cottage neatness and poverty. Of the sitting-rooms, one was a dining parlor, the other his private study; it looked into a little garden, where grew some common flowers, stocks and wall-flowers, and roses, and huge beds of mignonette, "my mother's favorite flowers," as he said, the perfume from which was borne through the open window. I looked around; on the wall were one or two prints of devotion, in plain black frames, a book-case tolerably well filled, and some plain, old-fashioned furniture. "Now this is a Paradise, old fellow," said Leven; "we'll have dinner first (no French cookery, you'll remember), and then go down to the monastery."

I shared his happiness; to have him here in this corner of the world, away from his letters and his cares, in the free, fragrant air of the mountains; it was inexpressibly delightful; and no French cookery was ever done justice to as was that first homely little dinner in Glenleven Hermitage.

We rose from table, and sailed forth on our road to the monastery. He led the way through the little garden, and we had not taken two steps when we came in view of the majestic pile through an opening in the trees, and as we stood to gaze at it, the deep tone of its chiming bells came up from the valley. It was built, like everything else at Glenleven, of granite, and seemed extensive; but what struck me most was the vast size of the Abbey Church, and its roof of loftiest proportions.

"Aye, you'll see all about that presently," said Leven. "I'll just tell you, to begin with, that the monks were their own architects. I put in my word as to size, and so on, but the grandeur is in their own design; monks should best know what monks require."

We reached the gates, and ringing at the door, were ushered by a lay brother into the guest-room, which looked monastic enough in the severity of its fittings. In a minute or two the door opened, and two blackrobed figures entered; one, to whom Leven knelt for a blessing, and whom I guessed to be the abbot, and another young man, whose expressive countenance beamed with pleasure, as he greeted his friend; I did not need to be told it was Werner.

I had never before been in the company of religious, and imagination helped impressions which under any circumstances would have been powerful. The abbot, like most of the community, was German, and after a few minutes of pleasant, easy talking, they told us that vespers were about to be sung, and conducted us to the church.

As I entered, I was transfixed. I had been prepared for vastness, but not for such as this; nor yet for the wonderful religiousness of that stately severity. A cruciform building; the two transepts forming separate chapels under the two great towers, a nave supported on enormous granite pillars, and beyond, a choir for the monks, separated from the nave by a light low screen, and fitted with oaken stalls. Above rose arch upon arch, catching the evening rays, and seeming to soar away into amazing heights of flickering light and shadow. Presently there entered the long line of black-robed monks; the stalls were filled, and after a minute or two of silence, one clear voice began the office; and then an anthem was intoned, and then burst forth the full joyous harmony of organ and choir.

What sounds those were to which, for the first time I listened, awaking in me a new sense, yet one to which my whole nature seemed responsive. It was the voice of the Church, the voice of the ancient mother. How the music yielded to the words and became their interpreter, translating their sense from the ear to the heart, and from the heart to the ear! How impossible it was to associate the memories of the world, or the pleadings of flesh and blood, to any of those tones to which I listened! It only lasted too short a time, and when it ceased I found I had been weeping.

But it ceased at last, and then Leven touched me, and bade me look at the figures in niches which adorned the choir above the stalls of the religious. Some were kings, some bishops, some hooded monks, in stone, habited like those of flesh and blood, who sang beneath them. "A devotion of my own," he said, "the English saints, Oswald and Edmund, and the two Edwards, kings of our race; and our bishops, St. Augustine and St. Ethelwold; and the good Odo, St. Dunstan, and the two St. Thomases; and dear old St. Richard, of Chichester; and English Benedictines, too, St. Bede, St. Benedict, St. Aldhelm, and St. Wolstan! What a galaxy of saints, and what saints they were, yet who in England cares now to think of them!"

We walked around the choir to the Lady Chapel, rich in marbles, and delicately ornamented; then passing back, the duke pointed out to me the two transepts, divided off by gilded gates, the metal-work of the Glenleven workshops.

"This northern transept," he said, "contains a treasure, the shrine of an English saint, the brave Saxon king whose remains lay for many centuries in a ruined abbey of the county. It was to be had for money (the ruin, I mean), so I bought it. We disinterred the sacred relics, and brought them here, and now they rest there over the altar."

We knelt and prayed before the shrine of the glorious martyr, and then rising, we passed to the southern transept. "To whom is this chapel dedicated?" I whispered. "To St. John, the titular of the Church, and my own dear father's patron;" and then I perceived that this chapel contained two altar tombs, on which reposed carved figures with hands clasped in prayer, and I guessed it all in a minute.

The church was the mausoleum of his parents, and it was here he had laid them to rest, when he had caused the remains of those he had loved so dearly to be sent back to their native country. He did not speak, for he saw that I understood it. We went up to the tombs; one clad in ducal robes, with his feet resting on his good dog, his grave, manly features carved with exquisite care, and the hands joined upon the breast. The tomb itself displayed no carving beyond the quatrefoiled panels, and at one end the family arms; but a brass fillet ran round the upper surface, engraved with these words in old English characters: "If they had been mindful of the country whence they came out, they had, doubtless, the time to return; but now they desire a better, that is, a heavenly one. Therefore, God is not ashamed to be called their God, for He hath prepared for them a city." (Heb. xi. 15-16.)

I passed to the other tomb, and thought I recognized in the sweet, matronly features of her whose effigy reposed there, a likeness to my friend; then I read the inscription which bade me pray for the soul of John William, Marquis of Carstairs, and his wife, Eleanor; and kneeling together, Leven and I softly recited a De Profundis. As we arose from our knees, I observed a brass plate let into the floor in front of the two monuments. "My own resting-place," said Leven, as I pointed to it. "Some day, perhaps not very far off, I shall be lying here at their feet."

We left the church, but his last words struck to my heart, and I looked at him earnestly. "All right, old fellow," he said,

"don't spin cobwebs out of what I said just now. I meant nothing in particular."

"I sometimes fancy it is not all right," I replied. "You wear yourself out with many cares, and too little recreation."

"Well, this is recreation, anyhow," he said; "just look at the light behind those granite peaks! Let's go down to the river, it's just the hour for the otters."

CHAPTER XIII.

UTOPIA.

It was about the fourth day after our establishment at Glenleven that the postbag brought, among other contents, a packet from Ekdale, and a newspaper forwarded by Oswald. Grant tossed me the paper, which I opened; and whilst he was busy with his letters, I had the gratification of reading a lengthy report in the Exshire Gazette, of a meeting of the "United Colliers" which had been held at Bradford, to hear the address of the illustrious orators, Messrs. Degg and Redfever, and pass certain resolutions under their inspiration. The meeting, we were told, had been most enthusiastic, and terminated with a procession through the streets, in the course of which the windows of the Catholic Presbytery were smashed, and an effigy of the Duke, as "the Arch-enemy of Progress," burnt before the Leven Institute.

All this I proceeded to retail to Grant, as he finished his breakfast, nor did it seem in any way to diminish his appetite. "And these are the fellows on whose benefit you have spent the best part of the last ten years," I exclaimed. "No wonder Oswald has marked the column with such a note of indignation!"

"I am afraid, Jack, that the result shows there is not enough left for ten years more."

"That is your way of taking it, is it?" I replied. "But now tell me, Grant, do you never feel discouraged?"

"Discouraged? of course, it's the commonest and the stupidest of temptations—something shows you how little you have succeeded in doing, and, therefore, you resolve to mend it by doing less, instead of trying to do more."

I remained silent.

"Now look here, Jack, you are thinking of those colliers, and their public demonstration against me in the streets of Bradford. But what is the truth of the matter? Degg and the Free Thought Committee distributed the drink, and furnished the inflammatory speeches and the effigy, and the poor fellow enjoyed the excitement of burning it exactly as they would have enjoyed a dog-fight. If you say that they are deplorable, brutalized, I agree; and it does but show the burden that lies on those who have property, means, influence, and education—everything, in short, which those poor outcasts have not."

"And what is to be the end of it?" I said; "because, if things stand here," and I held up the paper, "I hold that they are discouraging."

"The end of it, Jack, is neither in your power nor in mine to foresee," said Grant. "I think we may safely affirm that the wolf will not lie down with the lamb in our day, nor at our bidding; but that is no reason why we should not do what comes to hand in that direction."

"Ten years ago you thought very differently about some of these questions," I said, as I recalled the flashing eyes and the vivid speech of the Grant of former years, and involuntarily compared them with the tones and looks of to-day, which spoke truly of a patience rooted in deepest resignation.

"I daresay I did," he replied. "At twenty-five it seems an easy thing to keep the commandments, and make all the world do so, too; but, bless your heart, Jack, a little experience makes a man take a very different view of the meaning of the word success."

"And what do you mean by success, then?" I asked.

"Ah, that is a question," he replied, leaning back in his chair, and looking into space, as though considering. "There is nothing I love like a definition when one can get at it; success is—the power of persevering at a noble aim. That is about the thing, as I take it.”

“What, no results?” I exclaimed, “positively none?”

“Who said so?” he replied. “Who could suppose such a case as unflinching perseverance at a noble end that was not crowned? But how, or with what, is quite another question. In certain cases probably with martyrdom: that might not be success in the world’s estimation, but it would certainly be a crown.”

“You are taking a very high flight, my dear Grant,” I said “and I will admit all its incontrovertibility; but now to descend a mile or two, and to get on a lower level, are we to look for no results in the commonplace sense of the word?”

“I do not say so,” he replied. “All I mean is that you must not look for what is startling and pictorial. You must not look for larger success than the Gospel.”

“I imagined that the success of the Gospel had been exactly of the character you describe,” I said.

“Really? Do you mean to say that the impression left on your mind after laying down one of those villainous newspapers is that the whole world is going the way of the Gospel—the beatitudes? All I can say is it is not my idea of the Gospel.”

“I wish,” I said, “you would clear up your idea a little; at present I can catch only half a view of it.”

“Well,” he replied, “the case seems a simple one enough. There is a sense in which the success of the Gospel always disappoints us; that is, when we expect it to regenerate the world; meaning by the world that evil thing which is the enemy of God, and never will be regenerated. The world reigns supreme in newspapers, parliaments, ministries, fashionable society, and the like, and in all of them the Gospel is suffering a daily and hourly defeat. But take into account, on the other side, the number of graces which it is bringing all the while to millions of souls living and dying in every quarter of the globe; and, as a matter of course its victories far outweigh its defeats, only for the report of them, I believe, we shall have to wait until the day of judgment.”

“That is a very solemn view of the matter,” I replied; and it seems to require in any one who labors for the good of his kind, an almost sublime degree of self-suppression and purity of intention.”

“Just so, Jack; and as very few of such poor creatures as we are have anything sublime about us, you perceive how it is we are so tempted to talk of discouragement, if the naughty world does not at once turn its swords into ploughshares at the voice of our eloquence. But now, see here, I have a drop of comfort for you, which should atone for many an effigy-burning; read that;” and he handed me a note sheet, which I guessed, as I glanced at the large childish text-hand, to be from little Edward. It ran as follows:

“DEAR COUSIN LEVEN.—Since you left us, I have had some famous rides; Oswald took me to show him Baker’s Bit, and he has had posts and chains put up. I think Florry must have told him. She hears me my Latin grammar every day, and my catechism. Two of the puppies are drowned. The other has got his eyes open; we mean to call him Toby—Your affectionate cousin,

“EDWARD.”

“P.S.—She has asked me to write ont those prayers, and I think she says them.”

“Pretty well, is not?” said Grant. “I suspect Toby is not the only individual at Exdale who is getting his eyes open. But really is it not a fine thing to see the apologist of Degg and Free Thought surrendering to Edward and the ‘Penny Catechism?’”

“Just what I should have expected,” I said. “If an archbishop in full pontificals had tried to convert her, Florry would have shown fight.”

“Well,” said Grant, “this is just a case in point. There is a row in the streets of Bradford, and all the county newspapers will be full of it, and a great many excellent persons will con-gole with me on the disappointment. But a poor soul is rescued from a far worse abyss than Baker’s Bit, and no one will offer their congratulations, because no one will know of it; though the victory is ont of all proportion greater than the defeat.”

“Thank you,” I said, “I feel very much in Toby’s case myself; I can only say, with Florry, I shan’t forget my lesson.”

I shall not attempt to give my reader a journal of our week at Glenleven; though the week, indeed, stretched to a fortnight, the happiest of my life. Oswald’s description of the place had been something of an exaggeration; nevertheless, there was enough of outline to make it very unlike any phase of the world with which I had hitherto been familiar. Under the shadow of the great monastery a small population had gathered, which found occupation on the land, and in the various branches of industry which had been opened by the monks. Hither Leven had transferred individuals, and occasionally families, whose suitability for the purpose he had in view, he felt reason to trust; and though he neither hoped for, nor attempted the Utopian dream with which Oswald had credited him, yet he had taken advantages of the circumstances under which the little settlement had sprung up, to establish regulations which might restrain some, at least, of the worst social abuses, under whose influences the moral atmosphere of so many an English village becomes infected. His success, partial as it was, was sufficient to impart to Glenleven what, by contrast, struck a stranger as a distinctly Christian character. The early week-day mass was heard by many on their way to work; the streets were not filled with ragged children, nor were the houses dens of filth and disorder; the attractions of the ale-house were restricted, and recreations of an innocent kind provided at suitable times. It was a costly experiment, as Leven owned, but the results were sufficient to satisfy his heart, and he did not look for more.

In company with Werner, we inspected the schools and workshops of various kinds established by the monks, including carving in wood and stone, and in these artistic pursuits Werner had gathered together some able pupils. The completion of the church and monastery, according to the perfect plan, gave ample scope for the employment of artistic genius.

“All this is education,” said Leven, “and it gives the opportunity of education. Werner, here, holds that a man must know something about an angel before he can carve one, and before he can paint the legend of a saint he must have studied it, and prayed over it. I believe he gave a course of lectures to his pupils on the nature of angels before he let them touch so much as the robe of one of those you saw in the church.”

“Quite true,” said Werner, “and only common sense: a statue is a word, and, like a word, the image of a thought. Unless a man possesses the thought, he cannot express it by the image.”

“Well, some of these lads whom you see at work here,” continued Leven, “were orphans brought up in various houses and refuges up and down the country. They may or may not succeed in becoming artists; but can it be other than a benefit to them to learn, in a practical way, with the help of their chisels, that there is a world of spirit as well as a world of matter?”

“Yes,” I said, I can comprehend easily enough the possibility of these more cultivated pursuits expanding the intellect and admitting spiritual ideas; but it is more perplexing with the clodhoppers.”

“Taking it for granted that by clodhoppers you intend to signify the race of ploughmen and carters,” said Leven, “I admit the fact as regards the intellect, and totally deny it as regards the heart.”

“Be so good, then,” I retorted, “as to explain your machinery.”

“It is very simple,” said Leven, “and consists of two parts, one positive and the other negative: the positive is supplying them with clean, attractive, humanized homes; and the negative is the cutting off of the ale-house. Now, it must be frankly admitted, that the first of these desirable things can only be attained through the instrumentality of a wife; and, accordingly, I grant that to effect anything practical for the amendment of your clodhoppers, it is essential to keep up a supply of tidy wives. I assure you the subject has greatly exercised me; I believe that feminine slatterns have much to answer for in the sum total of social degradation. No man will spiritualize in a pigstye, and if no provision is made in the building of cottage residences for giving a laboring man any corner to live in which is not either a pigstye or a wash-house, he must perforce take refuge in the public-house."

"You have got him on his specialty now," said Werner. "What I propose to do by my lectures to my artists, he would effect among his ploughmen by model cottages and model wives."

"But how procure the latter commodity?" I inquired with no little curiosity.

"Peace, man," said Leven. "I do not admit all to my secrets; I have correspondents among half the Rev. Mothers in England, and you have not yet seen the Glenleven schools. How long it will last it is hard to say; but as yet neither School Board nor inspectors have shown their faces at Glenleven, and we train up our boys and girls to become very tolerable Christians."

"Well," I said, "I really wonder at you. After all your fine talking about the supernatural, you profess to regenerate society, or at any rate, the elodhopping portion of it, by no higher machinery than well-ventilated cottages and smart womankind."

"I beg your pardon," he replied, "but for a lawyer you are sadly inaccurate in stating a case. Here are a set of men and women who know their religion and their duties. I simply (acting as what you once called 'the secular arm') come in to supply humanizing, and cut off brutalizing, influences. Then we expose them to the action of all that can be done in the way of instruction, encouragement, personal kindness, and assistance in time of difficulty, and leave it to the grace of God to do the rest."

By this time we had left the workshops, and found our way into the garden, where the abbot joined us. For the first time I was able to take in a general view of the pile of monastic buildings, as yet unfinished, but in course of completion, which extended before me."

"Remember," said Leven, "that they had just raised in the home they left a pile as extensive, and created a work even more fruitful."

"Yes," said the abbot, "such would seem to be the rule of monastic life. What one age creates, another overthrows, and so the seed is broadcast; and we emerge from our ruins to commence all over again. It is a perpetual exercise of the virtue of Hope."

"Well," I said, "we owe something to Bismarck; but for his Falck Laws we should never have listened on English soil to the chant as I heard it yesterday."

"You must know," said Leven, "that you have made a convert of Mr. Aubrey; he came, an unbeliever in plain chant, and departs under the spell."

The abbot smiled. "I believe it possible that we shall make as many converts by singing as by preaching," he said. "Your friend Mr. Knowles for one."

"What? does he come here to gather ideas?"

"I don't know about that," said Werner. "The first time he came it was to disseminate some of his own. He was greatly distressed at the warming apparatus in the choir, and complained of our having no carvings of fox and geese under the Miserere seats, as in old cathedrals. The abbot explained that the said carvings were not always of the most edifying description, but he said the mediæval idea suffered by their omission."

We all laughed heartily.

"Poor Knowles!" said Leven; "he must suffer before he can be real. At present he plays with the truth as children do with pretty pebbles, which they like because they shine and please the eye. The day will come when he will need a rock to stand on."

"Yes," said the abbot, "he must suffer; or," he added, in a low tone, which struck to my heart, "some one else must suffer for him; it is the only way;" and his glance rested, as he spoke, on Werner. My eye followed his, but the countenance of the young monk evinced no particular response to his words: whilst on Leven's cheek I detected a faint flush; and as I beheld it, I asked myself what it might indicate. By one of those interior instincts which go beyond the knowledge we acquire by the senses, I seemed to understand that these three men knew more of one another than appeared on the surface, and I wondered that I had never wondered before, who Werner was, and what had been the history of that strong tie which had linked him with my friend, before he entered the cloister. I resolved to penetrate the mystery; and as Leven and I took leave of our hosts, and bent our steps homeward, my thoughts were busy how best to approach the subject. My readers will probably ere this have discovered that I am a poor diplomatist. I have acted on mathematical principle that the shortest line between two given points is a right line; nor has my ingenuity ever hit on any method of attack superior to a straightforward question. So, as we sat together in the summer twilight, the hour when it becomes so easy to ask and answer questions from which we would shrink under the sun of noon-day, I opened the trenches with the sudden question: "Who is Werner, Grant, and how did you first know him?"

Grant, for so I like to call him, appeared to brace himself to sustain the cross-examination with severe indifference.

"Werner is a German; his mother is Baroness Werner, a Bavarian; I made his acquaintance when I went out there for a month or two, the year after you left England. We got to be great friends; he is an excellent fellow."

"I wonder what the abbot meant by what he said."

"About the plain chant, you mean?"

"No, I don't mean. I mean about Knowles and the suffering."

"Well, I suppose a fellow must suffer before he takes to things in earnest."

"Yes, but about others suffering for him."

"Well?"

"Well, what did he mean?"

"How can I say? I suppose he considered Anglicanism a kind of demon that could be cast out only by prayer and fasting."

A pause.

"Has Werner ever had such a demon?" I asked. It was a bow drawn at a venture, but it hit the mark. It was impossible for Grant to conceal the deep emotion which my words called forth, and I felt there was nothing left for it but to apologize for unintentionally touching on a tender chord, which I did as awkwardly as possible. At last he said:

"I know, Jack, you have often been puzzled at me, and perhaps, in your heart have thought many thoughts."

"What thoughts?"

"Well, that I exaggerate, that I am taking a wrong bent about it all, following a whimsical fancy; and perhaps it has come to you to conceive the possibility of there being a something to explain it all. Well, there is, or was—in short, Werner's history is a chapter in my own."

"My dear Grant, I have no right to ask you, but can you tell it me?"

He smiled; and, after a minute or two, settling himself so that as he spoke his eyes could rest on the hills and the evening sky, and not on my countenance, he began.

CHAPTER XIV.

WERNER'S STORY.

"I WENT abroad the year after you left England. You know pretty well what I thought about things at that time. I had thought a good deal about money and society, and one's duty about such things, and how one could obey the Gospel, obey it to the letter I mean; but Jack, I had thought of these things as a poor man, and not as a rich man. When the wealth came, it was enormous. I felt the weight and the responsibility, and I tried to fix my principles, and be true to them; and the shape they took was something in this way: almsdeeds, encouragement of all undertakings to improve the laboring classes, founding of religious works, creation of a great circle of usefulness and edification, and myself in the centre of it. Pictures even of that family life we once talked of, sometimes looked in. I had thought for myself all you have thought for me, that to have weight, influence, character, a man must be at the head of a grand Christian household. Political greatness, too came in, and a dozen other fancies—you couldn't believe how many. Occasionally, whilst all these things were singing in my ears, a voice would whisper for a moment, that there was another way, a better way. Father Henry's words about riches, and giving one's life for the brethren—I can't describe it exactly, but it seemed like two things struggling in my heart—Usefulness and a great career, without much sacrifice, and the passing call (temptation, as I tried to think it) to forsake and abandon everything.

"I went abroad with the express purpose of seeing for myself what Catholic life in Catholic countries was, to study the reality of a Catholic nobleman's household, in the country where something of the great baronial influence still lingers—the Catholic States of Germany. Of course I had introductions and all that sort of thing, and it was so I first made acquaintance with Werner's family. His father holds a half a dozen forests and provinces—It was just what I wanted to see; his mother, the Baroness Werner, was a real old Christian—a sort of St. Elizabeth of Hungary—a famous woman. Just what your mother would be, Jack, if she was a Catholic and a German baroness. Franz Werner was her youngest son. A woman's youngest son is pretty sure to be her idol, and if he is her idol, he is her cross. She loved him as only mothers love their sons, and how could she help it? He was so gay, and gallant, aye, you may smile, but ten years ago that pale shaven monk was the handsomest fellow in all Bavaria. So clever, too, an artist, by intuition, only he never cared to touch a brush save for half an hour's idleness, and with a voice like an angel singing his own songs to his own improvised music, and a poet—(I'm a practical man myself, but I know what a charm it is to feel that gift in others)—and a rattling, merry bewitching companion, too; spoilt, of course, and equally, of course, with more than a dash of selfishness; but I could not help it, nor you couldn't, nor any body—it was impossible not to love him.

"He was the idol of his mother, and—her cross. He had the faith, oh! dear yes. Why, he volunteered into the Zouaves, and fought like a hero at Castelfidardo; was wounded there, and wrote to his mother, in raptures at the privilege of shedding his blood for the good cause; aye, and he meant it, too; but you know faith without works is dead, and in some respects Franz was very much of a Lutheran. I need not tell you what sort of scrapes his were; rather sad ones, some of them; but, then, he was so winning in his repentance, she always forgave him; and you could not but feel that had he been less charming, less engaging than he was, it would have been a happier thing for the poor boy.

"It was about a year after I had returned to England that I received a letter from the baroness, written in great grief. Franz was at Florence, had been there for months; he was well received at court, in all the gay circles of the gayest of capitals, and though often recalled by his father, he continued to linger and defer his return, and make excuses; in short they felt there was something wrong. Then she had privately inquired; and the long and short of it was, he was taken in a crafty snare. In certain circles abroad, just now, men fish for one another's souls to give them to the enemy. They use all baits, and not a few are caught and delivered over to perdition. The Marchese Zingari was just then a leading man among the Italian Liberals. It was a great object with his party to win over German proselytes, and so swell their German connection. Werner was worth the trouble of entrapping, and they played the game with cunning skill. The Marchesa was a bewitching woman, ten years his senior, and, on that very account, more dangerous. It was also safe, what could the world find to say against it? There was art and music, and flattery and beauty. An atmosphere too, such as even to us, dull Anglo-Saxons, is a kind of new existence, but which, to a poet like him, is inspiration, intoxication. They took him on his weak side, fired his imagination, and quietly sapped his moral strength. A little more, and only a little more, would be wanted to plunge him into some fatal step which would for ever destroy his self-respect, and sense of honor, and which would deliver him up bound and captive into the hands of those political Beelzebubs."

"Strong language, Grant."

"Not a bit too strong; why, I'm diluting the horrible story down to the strength which Christian ears can bear to listen to; but the thing goes on every day, in hundreds and thousands. The mother wrote all this; she had found it out; she hesitated to tell her husband, lest he should be betrayed into some violent, indiscreet act, which would forever cut off the hope of reclaiming the boy. So she wrote to me, to me 'who loved him so,' those were her words: 'would I not pity him, and if possible, try to save him?' I read the words, and they burnt deep into my heart. Did I not love him! Yes, indeed; I did not stop to ask why he was (and is) so dear to me; but it was a love 'passing the love of woman.' I did not stop to think what I should do, or could do to save him, but the next day I started for Florence.

"It is a good thing to find one's self a duke sometimes, Jack; makes it wonderfully easy to get into places where one has a mind to go. As Duke of Leven, I had no difficulty in entering the charmed circle of Florence society. People were glad to invite, and make much of the rich Inglese, and Werner and I soon met face to face. Oh! how his face was changed! What a stamp of evil was there? Not evil perfected, consummated past the hope of recall; but I thought I saw the claw of the enemy on him—loss of grace, less of peace, of innocence. Yet I loved him as I ever did; one cannot, somehow, change. Of course he welcomed me; but he was always too busy to find time to give me a morning to myself. When we met, it was always in the company of others, the most charming people in the world, no doubt; but what did I care for charming people, when what I wanted was his soul?

"At last, one evening—it was in the gallery of the Pitti palace—I seized on him, and held him fast. 'Werner,' I said, 'what are you about? Where are you going? Who are all these people among whom I find you?'

"'People? What people?'

"'Why, these Zingari?'

"'Who are they? Why, my friends. Is not that enough for you?' he said fiercely.

"'Friends!' I said bitterly. 'I thought I was your friend?'

"'Well, and what of that? I really don't understand you, Leven; don't keep me here; I must be going.'

"'You shall not go,' I said. 'You are deceived, bewitched, ensnared; that Zingari is a scoundrel; and as to the Marchesa—'

"'Say one word more, and you will repent it,' he answered. 'I can forgive you your folly as regards myself, but I will hear nothing that can touch the honor of a lady.'"

"I cannot repeat it all—my passionate appeals, his fierce rejection. At last he tore himself away from me in anger, and with a sick heart I left the gallery and the palace, and hardly knowing what I did, I found myself in the street, and walked on awhile, not caring whither I went my brain and heart in a fever. Yes, he was under a charm, a spell; I could not reach him, I could not save him. What misery! I saw an open door before me, and entered it; it was the Church of Sta. Maria Novella; such a change from the busy streets to find one's self in the dark, quiet church, only lighted by the lamps which hung before every altar, and were reflected on the marble floor as though in water. I knelt before the first altar I came to; and resting my fevered forehead on the marble balustrade, I shed bitter tears. Why did I love him so, and what was it I loved? His soul! that soul, the innate beauty of which had been revealed to me at our first meeting. Clouded over, and bespotted with many a stain, there it still was, a beautiful, a glorious soul, most dear to God, most dear to my heart, and, as I felt too surely, in the grasp of the Enemy.

"What could I do? With that one thought in my mind I raised my eyes, and they fell on a figure. If you know Italian churches, you must remember a certain image, not uncommon in some of them, representing our Lord crowned with thorns, and with his hands bound, as Pilate presented Him to the people. It is generally called Gesù Nazareno. Some of those figures are marvellously devotional, with soft, weary eyes that look kindly and pitifully on the worshipper. Such was the one on which I gazed. I met those Eyes, and they seemed to fix on mine. I repeated my words, speaking now as if in prayer: 'O Lord, what can I do?' Now, Aubrey, I don't mean to say that I saw or heard anything—don't think it; but in my heart I did hear a word, and in that Face I saw the thing it meant: 'Sacrifice.'

"Sacrifice?—What?—'All.'—What, all?—How? Then I began to think, and as it were, to listen. I listened to the voice within me, and this was what it said: 'You are not true to yourself. You have been seeking to strike a clever balance between God and the world—to satisfy your conscience and your high aspirations by doing good works, and to please yourself by doing them in a way that should cost you as little as possible. Hypocrite! choose between God and mammon. Let it be all God, or all mammon. You want to make a great name, to lead the Catholic body, to lead the country, to restore the prestige of your family, to be the Great Duke as well as the New Duke. You think you are indifferent to things like these, and you are not indifferent. You think the world has no hold on you, and its hold is tightening day by day. There is but one remedy—Sacrifice. And if you would save this soul, it is by Sacrifice you must save it. Give all for all, 'Sell all and give to the poor,' give ALL. Wealth, reputation, ease, time, pleasure, freedom, lay them all down, renounce them, abjure them, and forever!'

"I hardly knew what it was, I felt myself so powerfully urged to do, save that it was an absolute surrender of everything to which I could cling on the side of nature—if by such an act I could win the soul that was hanging in such a terrible peril. Nor could I hesitate, my heart answered for me: it accepted all, it sacrificed all; and taking out the little brass crucifix, which my father had held on his death-bed, and which has never left me, I promised, with all the earnestness of my soul, to give it all. Then there came a moment of profound interior stillness; I felt my offering had been accepted.

"I can tell you but little of the next two days. I saw and heard nothing of Werner; but on the evening of the second day I went to a reception at the English Embassy. It could not be helped. Every English visitor of distinction was there, and a good many foreigners. There was a great crowd; and as I was making my way among the uniforms and ladies' trains, thinking in my soul what disgusting trash it all was, I saw coming to meet me some familiar faces. There are some people, Jack, whom you are sure to meet everywhere. On the top of the Righi, at an English archery meeting, at the upper cataracts of the Nile, there they are, as sure as life, and to this class belong the Exboroughs. There she was, 'Lady Ex,' on the arm of Count Gallipot, the Hungarian Chargé d'Affaires, and Lady Florinda, under escort of Mr. Eustace de Something or other, a young diplomat of 'rising expectations.'"

"I say, Grant, you're getting rather fierce—are you sure of the names?"

"Well, if it wasn't Gallipot, it was something like it; you know what I mean. No help for it. We met, and then followed recognitions, and exclamations of surprise, and delight, and regret that we hadn't met before, only the Exes had been to the Baths of Carrara, for the last fortnight, and were only just back, and hadn't heard of my arrival. 'And had I heard Beppo, the new tenor? Then I positively must, there was nothing like him. And oh! how shockingly dreadful about poor Mr. Werner, wasn't it? Such a delightful person. Really, I'm immensely sorry.' 'What about Werner?' I said, choking. 'Haven't you heard?' He's dead of the black fever; so very sudden, too.' 'Dead?' 'Yes; didn't we hear Mr. Werner was dead, mamma?' said Lady Florinda. 'No, my dear, but I think he was dying: such a great favorite of mine, you know; quite a loss he'll be at Florence,' and on they swept.

"Werner dead or dying! Perhaps that was the answer to my prayer. Perhaps death would save him. But his soul! How was it with him? I could not bear the suspense; but getting free as soon as I could from the crowd, I left the house and drove straight to Werner's lodgings.

"It was all true. The very evening we had parted he had sickened of the terrible fever; far worse than typhus, a deadly thing; every one had fled the house in terror, except his faithful German servant, who had got a couple of Sisters of Charity to nurse him; and so I found him senseless, delirious, and as they told me, without hope of recovery. Had he seen a priest? Oh, yes, the parish priest had seen him, and anointed him; that was all that could be done; not a moment of reason for confession, and the end close at hand.

"I stayed by him that night; his incoherent words went to my heart; I gathered little comfort from them, it was all such wild talk, as though coming from a heart and brain that were ill at ease. And then even those words ceased, and there was stupor, unconsciousness. They told me this was the last stage, and he would never rouse again. But he did. On the fourth day, he opened his eyes, and murmured something; I thought he knew me, but could not be sure; but anyhow, the crisis was past, and he was alive—weak and shattered to pieces, but alive, and, as I thought, with reason unimpaired. That was all I could guess.

"Gradually he gained strength enough for me to move him out to Fiesole. I took him to a villa there, hoping that the sweet fresh air and quiet would restore him. And it did. He gained strength, and was himself, and yet not like his former self—so still and silent. As soon as he could speak coherently, he asked for a priest, and saw him several times. I knew no more, of course, except that afterwards, as I sat beside him, he stretched out his hand and took mine, and squeezed it silently. At last one day he said: 'I wish I could see my mother!' Then I knew it was all right with him, and I telegraphed for the baroness.

"And the Zingaris, what of them?"

"Oh! the black fever kept them off," said Grant, rather grimly. The baroness came, and Werner and she were like a mother and her baby. I knew nothing of what passed in his soul, but I felt it was all right: he was safe. My sacrifice had been accepted.

"What was best to be done?" He longed to get away from the place, to forget all that had beset him there. I proposed to take him with me to England, and his mother eagerly accepted the proposal, for she felt she could trust him in my hands. So, by slow stages, we travelled home to Oakham, and there he stayed. By degrees he regained health and vigor; not the old vigor or the old spirit; something had gone out of him—a good deal of the animal, I think—but it had left behind all his gifts of heart and mind, and imagination, deepened and vivified with a new life and sense. I knew not (and only imperfectly, and by degrees, did he let me know) all that had passed in his soul during those seemingly unconscious hours. Once he said: 'It is an awful thing to hang over an abyss, suspended by a single thread!'

"You were very near the end," I said.

"The end! I was not thinking of that; there was another abyss before that."

"I saw what he was thinking of; some tremendous false step to which he was hastening, when that blow from God struck him down and saved him. And in his long stupor he had seen and understood it all.

"So Werner and I were domesticated together at Oakham. It was then I began to discover the true worth of the soul I had saved—a soul, Jack, as far above my own in worth and beauty as those heavens are above the tree-tops. Most dear to God—no wonder! And now that it had waked to its true life, what floods of tenderness, what flights of lofty beauty—what a power, a strength, a keenness of spiritual insight! It was a happy month or two. It was then that he painted St. Alexis, and that we smashed the heathen deities.

"But there was a question for me to decide, and I could not delay it. I had promised: how was I to fulfil? I did not see my way. The idea that oftenest came before me was to make over my whole possessions to charitable and religious purposes at a dash, retaining £5,000, and with that, return to Australia, and begin life over again as William Grant. The monks had come to England about a year before, and had begun their settlement at Glenleven. Werner took a deep interest in it all, and his art was always at their service; and I liked the abbot, who is a fine fellow, Jack, and I determined to put the whole case before him. He asked for time; nine days, during which they had a novena of masses; at its close he sent for me, and I prepared to hear his decision as to my fate.

"No, what I had thought of would not do; there were other and better ways than that of 'selling all.' He drew a plan and showed me how I might retain the stewardship of this enormous property, and administer it as a trust, retaining all the burden, the work and the responsibility, doing the best for the souls and bodies of others; giving not my money alone, but my life. 'You vowed away not merely possessions,' he said, 'but life, freedom, time, ease, reputation. In Australia you will simply have shifted the heavy weight from your shoulders once for all. What God designs for you is a more complete sacrifice, and one which the world will never guess, leaving you externally as you are, but demanding every moment and every faculty of your entire being!'

"There is no need, my dear Aubrey, to say more about it, than that I comprehended it all, and saw what was asked of me. So it was settled."

I took his hand. "I see all about it, Grant; I understand."

"Ah! but you haven't seen it all just yet," he said. "That cost me nothing. It has cost plenty to do it, because, you see, such a life grinds a fellow to powder. But it was not the sacrifice."

"What was, then?"

"Well, I'll tell you. We set to work, Werner and I. He helped me in everything; he knew nothing of my secret reasons, or my vow, or what had moved me to it; but he understood that I wanted to realize that word in the Gospel, and he entered into the thought, and determined to help me in it. So, for a year we worked together: he was my second self; so full of thoughts, better, truer, more practical thoughts than my own; so full of ardor and unction, lifting up my heavy English lumpishness, and keeping it at the mark. Well, Jack, the day came when he told me he had something to say to me. I had seen a something—not a cloud, but a something on his brow. You can guess what it was. His call had come, and he must leave me. I had nothing to say, for had I not promised ALL? What right had I to say to God, 'not this,' 'everything but this?' You know I could not say that; and I thank God I did not. I gave him up, and he went away to Glenleven: but that was the real sacrifice."

The simplicity of the words touched me, and I think there was little more spoken between us that evening. I saw it all now clearly; the grandeur of my friend's character, the completeness of his sacrifice; it was not the result of whim or theory, but the outcome of one act, an act by which he had voluntarily given all all to save a soul; and God had accepted the gift. What more was yet to come? what would be the end of a life so true to the word which had given it the first impulse? That yet remained for me to see.

CHAPTER XV.

DUCE IN ALTUM.

The day was drawing near for us to leave Glenleven, and I beheld its approach with real regret. There was a charm of beauty, material and spiritual, which hung about the place, increased to my heart by the deeper knowledge and appreciation which I had gained there of the real character of my friend.

His simplicity, and his off-hand school-boy talk had veiled the sublimity of what lay beneath; and though I always felt that he was a noble soul, unsoiled by the touch and breath of the world, I had accustomed myself to regard what I did not understand as a sort of regrettable eccentricity. I knew better now, and alone among the hills, or by the rocks by the river side, or sitting at the window of his little study looking out into his simple garden, that great loving soul revealed itself to me in truth; always true to its one idea of serving God and man in the spirit of self-sacrifice, yet always seeking to conceal itself, and to do its greatest deeds in the simplest fashion, and clothed its noblest sentiments in the plainest words.

The last day came, and the last Mass, and the last Vesper under that noble roof; and the last grand tones of the chant carrying the words of Holy Writ home to the centre of my heart. It was Sunday, the Fourth Sunday after Pentecost (for give my dwelling on these little details, dear reader, they are so graven on my memory), and the Sunday Gospel was that which relates the story of the miraculous draught of fishes on the Tiberian Lake. "Duce in altum!"—"Launch into the deep. Who has ever heard those words without their waking a sense of dread, of hope, or of aspiration within his soul?"

When it was time to leave the church, Grant still lingered. I waited and watched, but I did not seek to hurry him. He knelt before the high altar long and wistfully; then paid a visit to the shrine of the Martyr; and last of all, entered the chapel in the opposite transept, and prayed beside the tomb. At last he rose and came away, and we left the church.

"Duce in altum! What words!" he said. "They knew not why or where—to launch into the deep—such a bold, fearful word it sounds! Such a call to trust in the dark!"

"Now, Grant, what are you thinking of?"

"I don't know; only it seems to me as if every to-morrow was a great mystery, and every morning we have need of courage to launch into its depths."

"I know the to-morrow that is waiting for me is a very disagreeable mystery; to exchange Glenleven for the express train for London is enough to gain the merit of martyrdom."

"Well, why do you go?"

"Because I must; the inevitable, Grant, is a mighty master. 'Anyhow, we shall travel together as far as Bradford, and you shall spend one day with me there.'

"To Bradford!" I exclaimed. "You don't mean to say you are going back to that place?"

"Ah! you're thinking of the effigy; why, that was a fortnight ago, and they've forgotten all about it by this time; and if they had not, it would only be a better reason for my showing myself. I presume you would not wish me to leave the field to Degg? But the fact is, I have business there which presses. I am to meet one of your London scientific friends, Professor Drybones. He is coming down about the ventilation affair, and I have to see if our plans on that matter can be perfected."

"He said some very civil things about your notions on that head when I saw him in Edwards'."

"Well, you shall judge for yourself; mine-ventilation was always a hobby of mine own, and there is fine scope for indulging it at Bradford."

The early train on Monday morning bore me away from the hills and valleys of Glenleven, from the gray minster, and the clear river bubbling among its rocks, and the granite peaks among quiet woods among which I had spent a fortnight so rich in bright and ennobling thoughts that it seemed to me as if I had been out of the busy world for a twelvemonth. An hour or two brought us to the smoke and ashpits of Bradford; and the spell was rudely broken. Grant twitted me a little on my pensive mood, and my reluctance to return to common life, and took me to the house of his engineer, telling me it was an excellent school for curing a man of day-dreams. He was so busy with plans and sections, and I could not but marvel at the versatility of his mind, which could so easily turn from subjects of profoundest interior interest to the practical details of machinery and ventilation. He spoke like a man who und ood what he was talking about, and evidently enjoyed the needless explanation of doors, and double shafts, and weight of atmosphere that sounded in my ears like a Shibboleth.

"Drybones will be here to-morrow," said Grant, at last; and before he comes I shall have an examination of the Hen and Chickens myself."

"The Hen and Chickens!"

"Yes, my dear sir, we name our mines hereabouts, and this particular mine rejoices in that name, owing to the multitude of cuttings proceeding from the main shaft. It was once considered the most dangerous mine of the district, but we have tried this plan of double shaft ventilation, and have redeemed its reputation. I think we shall teach Drybones a thing or two."

"How far is it from here?"

"About two miles, and the horses are at the door; so before turning to civilized life come and take your first lesson in mine engineering."

We mounted and rode off, and on the road he explained to me the system of ventilation which had been introduced into this particular mine, of which I retain only the general recollection that the air was admitted by one shaft and forced through the mine, leaving it by another; that these two shafts were at a considerable distance one from the other, and that the workings in the mine were, furthermore, divided into different compartments, or "panels," as they were called, isolated one from another by certain strong doors, the object being, in case of an accident occurring in one of them, to prevent its extending to the others. But the most important system of doors was at what he called the "Little Shaft," in a part of the mine which, for one cause or another, most often generated the bad air. It was the business for one gang of men to open these doors at certain hours and close them at others, according to the part of the mine in which the workings happened to be going on; and by a careful attention to the system and regulations he had devised, all accidents had now, for a considerable time, been prevented.

"The shaft we are going to inspect first of all," he continued, "is the great shaft; the little one is a mile and a half away on the other side of the hill; but Dymock, the engineer, tells me that the men are at work on this side, and I am anxious to ascertain if the whole thing is in order before Drybones begins his visitation to-morrow."

We reached what Grant had called "the Great Shaft." I am not a professor, dear reader, and can only explain this much, that when a mine is ventilated by two shafts, one shaft necessarily longer and deeper than the other, and the weight of the air column, therefore, heavier than at the shorter shaft, this causes the air to be forced in at the long shaft and out at the short one; and entering pure and wholesome, the air travels through the mine, issuing forth at the further end clogged with noxious gases. The "Great Shaft," then, was the one where the air was forced in. Grant inspected the machinery, received a number of details from the overseer in attendance, and was informed that one hundred and eighty men were actually at work on the northern side of the mine. The "Little Shaft" was on the southern side, and no miners were at work on that side; but a certain number of men were on duty here attending to the doors, for the purpose of ventilation.

Grant proposed a walk to the Little Shaft, leaving our horses under the care of the overseer; and we set out, climbing the hill (very different in its aspect from the heathy moors of Glenver), and descending on the other side to a spot where a few sheds, some machinery, and a signal house, with a telegraph communicating with the works at the other side, indicated the locality we were in quest of:

But where were the men? Not one was visible. "In the shaft, I suppose," said Grant, a supposition quickly dispelled as I approached the mouth of the aperture, which displayed the necessary arrangements for descending it, prepared and ready for use; no one, it was evident, had as yet gone down. Grant looked thoughtful, not to say perplexed. Presently he caught sight of a shock of hair and a ragged jacket in one of the sheds, and advancing to the spot, laid hands on a wild-looking boy, who seemed to shun observation.

"Hallo! whom have we here? Who are you, my lad?"

No answer.

"Where are the men on duty?"

"I doant know."

"Are they in the shaft?"

"Doant know, tell 'ee."

"Now, my lad, see here," said Grant. "The overseer will be here in an hour, and if he finds no one here but you, and you refuse to answer his questions, it will be the worse for you. Come, none of that," as the creature tried to free itself from the strong grasp; "you'll stay where you are; and if you don't want all the bones in your body broken when the overseer comes, think better of it, and tell me where Jones and the other fellow are at this moment."

The boy scratched his head, and fidgetted about in sore distress for a minute or so, and then came out the reply: "Well, I guess they're at the 'Feathers.'"

"The Feathers!"

"Aye, the public. Jones is father to I, and he bid we wait. I be Tim Jones."

Grant gave a groan. The little public house on the road to Bradford, rejoicing in the sign of the Prince of Wales' Feathers, had proved too strong in its attractions for the guardians of the Little Shaft. After a moment's silence he resumed his interrogatory. "See here," he said, "you'll just run off to the Feathers, and tell your father the Duke of Leven is waiting for him here. Now be sharp."

And leaving hold of his collar, Tim darted off down the hill, and disappeared in the road.

"Isn't it enough to break a man's heart?" said Grant. "Turn where you will, do what you will, always confronted with the country's evil genius, the curse of drink." And he paced to and fro with an air of deep pre-occupation. In a few minutes Tim returned in company with a big man, who, judging by his appearance, was not the better for his sojourn at the Feathers. He surveyed the Duke with an air of stupid amazement, and in reply to his questions gave an incoherent answer which too plainly betrayed the fact that the visit to the ale house had not been a brief or passing one. Grant turned to the boy. "Is this your father?"

"No."

"Then where is he, and why didn't you bring him?"

Then came the fatal reply: "Father's drunk." Yes, it was so; Jones, the responsible guardian and doorkeeper was drunk, his companion little better; and the small amount of sense retained by the latter was of little purpose, for he was not the responsible man in charge of the shaft; and by himself, even had he been sober, could not have been trusted to do the necessary duty. After painful questioning we at last gathered the alarming fact, that the shaft had not been entered nor the ventilation doors attended to that morning; that Jones, the only man of the two who understood the business, was past all efforts to recall him to consciousness, and that his comrade was capable only of working the machinery by which the bucket was lowered into and raised out of the shaft. Of the doors and management he knew nothing.

The situation was serious: Grant looked at his watch. "How long were we coming from the Great Shaft?"

"Three quarters of an hour or thereabouts,"

"And this fellow would get over the ground in half an hour. Well, we must try what can be done." He tore a leaf from his pocket-book, and wrote the following words: "The two men drunk; doors unopened. Signal all the men out of the mine. Send us a gang at once to see to things here."—LEVEN.

Folding it up, and directing it to the overseer, he gave it to the boy, with half-a-crown, and bade him run for his life with it to the Great Shaft. "If you are quick and faithful, you shall have the same sum when you return; now lose no time, but be off." The boy grinned at sight of the silver, and set off at a round pace.

I only imperfectly apprehended the state of things, but I saw that Grant kept an anxious look-out on the road to detect the first appearance of the relief party. But half an hour passed, and no one yet appeared.

"The boy is frightened," he said, "and has made off. Well, there is only one other chance. Here, you fellow," addressing the man, who by this time was partially sobered, "can you trust yourself to handle the winch, and lower the bucket?"

"Aye, sure, but who'll be going down?"

"I shall," said the Duke, firmly; and in another moment he had entered the bucket; and seizing the chain, gave the signal to lower away.

"Grant!" I exclaimed, "don't be so mad; why the fellows will be here in a moment; what can you do?"

"Leave go, Jack, it's all right; I must see to those doors."

"Is there danger, then?"

"To the hundred and eighty men on the other side of the pit there is, if they are not out of the mine."

"Let me go!"

"Stuff! What could you do? You don't know a door from a donkey."

"But you?"

"I could find my way blindfolded. Why, Jack, I have planned the whole business; I've been in and out here a dozen times at least."

I implored, but all in vain; he gave the signal, and the man lowered the winch: Grant nodded to me with his bright, frank, fearless look, "All right, Jack: say a Hail Mary," and he was out of sight.

I tried to still my fears—fears of what? After all, I knew not. I paced up and down, whether for hours or minutes I could not tell. At last, looking towards the hill, I caught the welcome sight of a dozen men descending the road towards the shaft. I waved my hat to urge them quicker, and in my impatience set out to meet them. We were nearing together when there was a low sound, as it were, far beneath my feet, a slight trembling of the earth, and a cry from the men. I sprang forward, crying, "The Duke! the Duke!"

"Where?" said the overseer, who led the party.

"In the shaft—alone."

"Then God rest his soul!" he exclaimed; "that was an explosion."

* * * * *

We hastened to the shaft, and whilst some telegraphed for more aid, others prepared to clear the shaft and descend without loss of time. Before long the whole gang were on the spot: for Leven's message to signal the men out of the mine had cleared the workings and saved the men from the danger. They were all there, the hundred and eighty men he had so nobly saved; many of whom a short week before had been burning him in effigy. And as the rumor of the accident spread, and women and children came hurrying in dismay to the pit's mouth, loud were the expressions of joy and thankfulness to find fathers, sons, husbands, all safe and sound. But how was it with Leven?

An hour or two of work sufficed to answer that question. The shaft was cleared, and when the working party who had volunteered to explore came to the surface, they bore him with them, and laid him on the grass, and in another moment I was kneeling beside him.

Yes, he was dead. Not a mark of exterior injury. The breath of the fire had not touched him. A sweet smile on his face, a smile of inexpressible peace, but life had been extinct at least an hour. The cause of his death was not the actual combustion, but what miners call the "after-damp," that is, the mixture of bad gases caused by the explosion, and resulting in suffocation.

They laid him in one of the sheds, and we telegraphed to Glenleven and Oakham.

I do not stop here to speak of my own feelings, or those of the men around me. Some sensations are not keenly felt from their very intensity. This blow had come with a shock which, for the time, stunned me. I could not act, and speak, and move, and give orders, but at first I could not think. Only gradually did the truth, the whole truth, break on me and deluge me with anguish; and I understood that a noble life had been consumed by a death of sacrifice, and that in very deed and truth he had given his life for his brethren.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE END.

WE carried him to Oakham. He was so completely the life of his family that we should have been perplexed as to what the direction of affairs had it not been for his secretary, Mr. Dymock, who placed in my hands a sealed packet which had been given into his keeping by the Duke the evening before he had last left Oakham. It was directed to myself, I opened it, and found his will, drawn up and signed with the usual formalities, and a brief document declaring Sir John Dymock, myself, and Oswald, his trustees and executors, and myself sole guardian of Edward Wigram, his heir.

This sufficed to enable us to act; and as we knew that he had already fixed on Glenleven as the place of his interment, in consequence of what had happened had already been sent to the monastery; and on our arrival at Oakham we found the abbot, Werner, and some others of the monks waiting to receive us.

Werner and the other brethren gently and reverently prepared him for his last rest, and then it was we came to know that not care nor toils alone had done the work of age, but that he, who had sacrificed his life to charity, had also been used to offer his body to God by the longer and more lingering sacrifice of penance. There were the rough hair shirt, and the iron chain, and the sharp crucifix. I beheld it all, and then, when I recalled the frank, joyous voice, and inartificial manner, I marvelled at the power of self-repression, the exquisite genuinity with which he had hidden from curious eyes every mark of his higher gifts of sanctity.

Until all was ready for his removal to Glenleven, we kept him in the little chapel, before the golden tabernacle, and there, hour after hour, we watched beside him whilst the country round in from all portions of the country round all whom he had served, and helped, and ministered to, young and old, Catholics and Protestants, gentle and simple, to look on him and pray beside him, and take their last farewell.

But there was one who came and would not go away; he knelt there like one who had been smitten to the heart with something more than sorrow. It was Wilfrid Knowles, who in the closing scene of that beautiful life, received the light of faith in his soul, and awoke to reality. The abbot's words regarding him had been an unconscious prophecy; he had been won by the suffering, not of himself, but of another.

I shall only touch on the last scene of all: the gorgeous ceremonial which bore to his resting-place the last Duke of Leven, followed by half the country, by all his tenantry, and by the colliers whom he had died to save, and who walked in the long procession, praying for, and blessing their benefactor. I will say nothing of all that, and of the bitter tears we shed as we laid him at the feet of his father, and felt that one had gone out from among us who belonged to a higher sphere than men of a common mould.

We read his will; and all were startled and amazed to find that there was little left to dispose of. Oakham Park, and a modest estate attached to it, were devised to Edward Wigram, certain other lands and properties were left to be administered in trust for the maintenance of hospitals, schools, and other charitable institutions he had founded; but the vast wealth he had once possessed had all but disappeared, and of his Australian millions there remained not a farthing.

The news spread about, and gradually the truth came to be understood. The Duke, the greatest millionaire of England had died worth comparatively nothing, because he had been steadily carrying out the purpose of his life to obey the precept of the Gospel: "to sell all, and give to the poor, and follow Christ." The truth, when known, produced a powerful impression, especially among his own young men at Oakham.

many of whom followed the example of Knowles, and embraced the faith. The domestic chapel soon became insufficient for the wants of the Oakham congregation; and gladly recognizing the opportunity thus given me of carrying out one of Leven's dearest wishes, I resolved to dedicate a portion of my own wealth to the erection of a church.

I chose a spot close to that part of the plantation where, years before, he had held me over the precipice and saved my life. There the new parish church of Oakham has arisen, dedicated to St. Alexis, and designed by Werner, who watched over every detail with loving eyes. It is my monument to the memory of my friend, and a thank-offering for that friendship which I number among the choicest graces of a not unhappy life.

In the completion of this undertaking I have been not a little assisted by the ardor of one whose story I have as yet left incomplete. The Duke's death hastened the work which the influence of his words and character had commenced in the heart of Florence Oswald. She was received into the Church within the same year, and my readers will not probably be greatly astonished to hear that two years later she became my wife. She shares with me the care of my little ward, to whom, as she often says, she owes, in no small degree, the gift of faith. And I think, if there be a desire in both our hearts, it is so to train him that in after years he may worthily fulfil the trust committed to him, and realize our dear Grant's ideal of "the Christian family."

THE END.

3
n
b s a n
d

y
l c e
o
I

137

THE VISION

OF

OLD ANDREW THE WEAVER.

---

AN unassuming little village is B—, in one of the Midland counties of England, seldom visited by travelers, as being out of the line of the greater thoroughfares, and possessing no feature of interest beyond the simple beauty of its fields and orchards. At present it consists merely of a few detached clusters of neatly thatched cottages, each seeming to repose amid the foliage of a luxuriant mass of fruit trees: and grouped, without any regard to order, around the lower slopes of a gentle hill, from the tops of which the taper spire of its good old church soars high aloft, as if protecting, at once, and asserting its authority over the abodes of its children there below.

The size and beauty of this relic of times gone by, seems to indicate that at one period a much more numerous and wealthy population must have been gathered around it than at present; and the same is evident from the extent of the churchyard, and the many grass-grown mounds scattered through the meadows, well known to be composed of the debris of masonry.

In fact, not so long since as that the existing generation had lost the tradition of its prosperity, B— had seen far better days than it could hope for again. Ere the revolutions of trade and the rapid perfection of machinery had concentrated manufactures in the large towns, a thriving fabric of linen cloth had furnished employment and happiness to its cottagers. And there was one yet remaining amongst them who could himself remember these better times, when from the church-crowned hill, from beneath the green lime trees that belted the grave-yard, it was pleasant to look down on the fields around, here blooming with the azure blossom of the flax, there glistening with the new-made cloth, spread forth in strips of dazzling whiteness, to bleach in the sun's rays; and to listen to the shock of the loom and the rattle of the shuttle, and the gay songs that came forth from the wide-open door of every cottage.

Old Andrew, the weaver, could well recollect those days and scenes; for, amidst that blithe and contented generation, he had been the blitheest. But he had seen the looms, one by one, grow idle; and his companions, one by one, go forth to seek their fortunes elsewhere; or, one by one, carried up the hill to their beds beneath the old lime trees, and now he was the sole remaining relic of those so happy times.

Yet he still clung to his loom, though year by year the importations of cheap machine-made linen kept diminishing the demand for his craft; he still tried to carol forth his old favorite ditties, though his voice was growing thin and rough with age—aye, and it must be said, with sorrow; and he loved to tell of the days when he was the first among the boys at football and the race, and the most admired, and the most favored, too, at the dance on the green on the summer evenings; but then, sometimes, the tear would steal down his cheeks whilst he was speaking, or he would break off suddenly in his tale, and hasten back to his once smiling but now desolate cottage, murmuring to himself, "It's all over now, it's all over now."

And the villagers one and all knew old Andrew, and they loved him, too; and they would stand for hours together to listen to his stories; and they wished with him that the good old times would come back again, but sighed with him, too, as they said, "There was no hope o' that." And it was they had given him the name of Old Andrew, the weaver, for he was in truth now the only one of the craft, where erst all had been weavers.

But the industry of even his loom had begun to flag. Days and days would pass by, whilst it was still; and these intervals of idleness kept growing more frequent and longer. Even when the old sound was heard in the cottage, it seemed languid and dull, and the shuttle flew less swiftly and less joyously.

Each day Andrew saw his bread diminishing. He had generally had a bit for any beggar that strayed to his door, and many a one had gone away blessing him for his charity; but now his cupboard was almost always empty, for his decreasing employment, even with the help of the charity which he was fain to receive from others, barely furnished him with his daily meal. He foresaw that soon he must come upon the parish—a galling thought at all times, and to all; for the pittance which the law forces men to dole out, brings with it none of the sympathies of charity to soothe the wounded feelings of him who receives it. But at this period, and for Andrew, it was still more terrible. In their mistaken philanthropy, or their worldly wisdom, the rulers of the land had just changed the laws for the relief of the poor; and caused in every district those unsightly piles to be erected, now so conspicuous in the vicinity of every considerable town, and which are at once recognized as the "Union Workhouses." One of these had, a short time before, been finished for the district to which Andrew's village belonged; but it was at a long distance, and if he was to make use of its shelter he must leave not only his cottage but the very lanes and fields that were so dear to him, to go into fresh and far less beautiful scenes, amid strangers. Then the neighborhood was full of surmises and reports about the misery of the new prison—for as such it was universally regarded by those for whom it was professedly built. The village rung with stories of the insults and hardships endured by some who had been forced to take up their abode in it. Doubtless there was considerable exaggeration in these rumors; still, in truth, there was much to startle a tottering old man in the prospect before him; and the addition, in this particular case, of a strict and unbending board of guardians and a harsh master at the workhouse, left him but little hope of exemption or comfort.

But there was yet another thing that pressed still more heavily on the old man's mind. Andrew was a Catholic; and, as far as conviction and a love for his religion went, he was a sincere one. We cannot say that, in his earlier years, he had shown himself a very pious one. The gaiety of youth, and his own village accomplishments, had led him into much dissipation of mind, and into many negligences which now he regretted. But he had always been punctual to his Sunday duties; he had occasionally at least, nay, with tolerable regularity, approached the holy sacraments; and though thoughtless and hasty, and over fond of amusement, still he had not been an habitual drunkard or a libertine.

There were, however, many things that he looked back to with sorrow. Now that age had taken away the wishes and the powers of youth, the old lessons of his childhood came back to his mind in a new light, and told him of the necessity of preparing for another change, and of doing it by making amends for the past. So it was now his delight to trudge, in the morning, to the little chapel on the opposite side of the hill; both to assist at the Holy Mass, and have a few words of consolation and advice from Father Peter: and at least once in the month he approached what he now regarded as his viaticum—the bread sent from heaven, to conduct old men such as him thither.

But the road to the workhouse lay just in the opposite direction from that to the chapel; and he felt that if once he entered its walls, he must give up all hopes of ever again assisting at the Holy Sacrifice. And though he knew that Father Peter would not fail to visit him, yet it must be seldom, and, perhaps, when he most wanted him, those at whose mercy he would be, would care little to send seven or eight miles for him. Oh! it was a bitter and a dreary thought; yet each day it grew upon him—each day the necessity of taking the fatal step became more pressing. Andrew had not been sufficiently schooled in the science of the cross to bear up against it like a true Christian, and his heart was filled with murmurings; and he almost cursed the mis-called charity, which, to preserve a man from starving, dragged him away from all that made life worth preserving.

At length his empty cupboard and empty table told him that the day was come; he must absolutely starve, or go into the workhouse. One hope alone remained; yet it was scarcely a hope. "He would go and speak to Father Peter about it; yet what could Father Peter do for him?"

It was in the afternoon of a sweet day of June that he locked his cottage door, and set off with the support of his trusty knotted stick, to go to the house of his old pastor. He had good reason to go, for he had had no breakfast; and he had waited till all his neighbors had finished their dinner, hoping that some chance might furnish him with a meal. But he had been disappointed; and so, with nothing better than a bit of crust, which he had begged to assuage his hunger, he trudged on along the well known path. It led across the church-yard. A lot of urchins, all well known to old Andrew, were enjoying a glorious game of romps amongst the tombstones, spite of the terrors of the sexton's stick, but they all ran at once to welcome their old crony Andrew, and as he seemed tottering in his walk, some offered even to lead him and assist him. But, no; he would not spoil their sports; time and care would soon enough do that; so he gave them a kind word, and sent them back to their merry game. For awhile he could not help standing to watch their gambols, as they leaped from stone to stone, and pursued each other round the trees, and dodged about the iron-palisaded monuments; and he thought of many hours which he had spent like them, and, perchance, of some which he wished had been spent better; and wiping a tear from his eye, he tottered onwards.

The good priests's house was reached. His first care was to give his old friend a hearty meal, for he soon found out how much he needed it. And then came the consultation.

But Andrew was right in his forebodings. "What could Father Peter do for him?" He felt, in sooth, the old man's situation as deeply as himself could do; but he was but a poor country missionary, dependant upon very precarious means; he had many to weep for as destitute as Andrew; and though he might eke out of his own poverty a little alms for each, yet the aggregate would be far from sufficient for the entire support of only one.

What, then, could he do? Why, only give the poor old man such consolation as lay in his power. He well knew the cruelty of the boasted poor-laws, and the grinding hard-heartedness of those who administered them; but to have joined Andrew in deploring these, would not have diminished his horror at encountering them, nor blunt his feelings when suffering under them. He strove, therefore, to represent things in the best light he could; and promised often to come and see him in his new abode; and then added something about the consolations of religion, and the blessings of poverty, and the advantages of suffering, especially when applied to the expiation of the past, and directed by the love of Him, who "suffered for us, leaving us an example."

The old man could not gainsay anything of this; still he felt cast down, and half inclined to murmur, when this last prop of his hopes was taken away from him. He had, indeed, foreseen that such must be the result of his conference with his pastor, and had felt that it could not be otherwise; still, the hope, however baseless, that perhaps Father Peter might advise him to remain in his cottage, had stood between him and the dreaded workhouse. But now that it was gone and the pauper's death-bed, and the pauper's grave, presented themselves to him, without the most distant chance of escaping them, the desolation that came over his senses was almost stunning.

Sorrowfully then, most sorrowfully, did he turn his steps—we were going to say, homeward, but alas! he had no home now. Sorrowfully did he cast his last look on the little cross now gilded by the warm rays of the setting sun, that stood on the gable of the chapel; and slowly and painfully did he climb the hill leading up to the old churchyard. Arrived there, beneath the lime trees, he paused to take one last and lingering look around. The sun had set, but there was sufficient light for him to recognize each well remembered spot; and fondly, though sorrowfully, did he dwell on the recollections that each awakened. At length his eye sought his own cottage. The chimney only could be seen, amidst the trees; but he knew it was his. There was smoke curling up from the chimneys of most around, harbinger of the evening meal; but none came out from his; and his eye seemed to penetrate into its cold looking and desolate interior, where his now idle loom formed almost the sole remaining furniture.

He could not bear the thought of returning to it. It seemed to him even colder and more comfortless than the grave. He was standing at the foot of one which had long been undisturbed, and over which the grass and thick curly moss had spread a bed far softer than he had pressed for many a year. It seemed far more inviting to his weary limbs, than his hard mattress on the floor there below. The evening was calm and mild—so at length he laid down his stick, and seated himself on the yielding turf. By degrees the inclination to lie down came stronger upon him, and at last he reclined himself entirely upon it, and rested his weary and anxious head upon the mossy pillow.

But his cares diminished not; and, do what he would, he could not bring himself to bow down, as he well knew he ought, to the dispensations of Providence.

"Patience," he said to himself, "yes, I must have patience. Well, I know it! but I fears I haven't got it. It's all very well to read about patience, sitting by a nice fire, with a good quarter loaf and a lump of cheese beside one, but it's not so easy to practise it, when they are catchen up, and there's no hope of any more coming in their place—aye, and it's all very well to preach about patience to other people. O, Father Peter, I dare say you believe what you say—and I dare say it's all very good and true—but, change your snug little parlour for my cottage yonder, and let's see how you'd be able to preach then. Oh I think then you'd be a little more indulgent with such poor old creatures as me, and not chide us for want of resignation.

"Well, but ain't I ungrateful to say so? for your chidings was always that of a father, and you've well made up for it by many a good meal to poor old Andrew. May God bless you for it, and keep you from such a sore trial as mine is."

"So then," his thoughts went on after a pause, "there's no hope left. I must go to the workhouse, and be locked up, and have a pauper's dirty-looking dress put on me, for fear I should run away; and never be allowed to wander amongst the grave-stones, to read the names of my old cronies, who lie here at peace.—Ah! you were happy to be taken off before these sad times. I wish I was with you. I wish I was lying here below the quiet sod, with the wind singing sweetly through the lime trees, and all my cares and sorrows buried beneath five feet of earth—'twould be a more comfortable and happier place than one of the coarse beds in the big house over yonder." * * * *

How long he went on in his reverie 'twere hard to say, for occasionally it was broken by short fits of forgetfulness, when the weariness produced by his morning's fast and his walk brought sleep upon his eyelids.

Suddenly, however, he was awakened from it, by an apparent movement of ground beneath him. He lay for a moment trembling and quite paralysed with terror, wondering if he had been dreaming, when the upheaving of the sod became too sensible for him to doubt of its reality. He started to his feet, and would have fled, but fear took away, in the instant, the energy it had imparted, so that he clasped hold of a grave-stone for support, and stood gazing in intense affright at the spot on which he had been lying.

Slowly the turf was pushed up until it burst open, and disclosed a human form, endeavoring, as it were with difficulty, to extricate itself from some entanglement below, and gradually making its way out. It soon succeeded and stood before him.

"Glad I've got free from that old fellow's coffin at last," was its exclamation, as it drew its last foot out of the grave; "positively I think my legs are growing more bent every year with its weight. Ha! how do you do Andrew, my old boy? hope your rheumatism is no worse for sleeping on the grass! Do pray now, just knock the dust off my coat behind. It isn't much the worse for wear, is it? It only comes out once a year, you know, so it ought to last."

Andrew stared in bewildered terror, unable to move a joint or utter a word—nay, hardly to breathe, and well might he be astonished.

The figure before him was that of a young man, somewhat faded, however, evidently from dissipation. He was dressed in a very antique style, such as Andrew had never seen, save in some very old pictures that were in the manor house, before it was pulled down. His coat was somewhat of a claret color, reaching to the knees, and, if the phrase be allowed, full bot-tomed, and garnished moreover with lace and embroidery; his waistcoat was richer still, with long lappets half covering his thighs; and his nether garments were of a bright colored silk, adorned at the knees with ribbons and silver buckles, the latter rather tarnished. There were buckles too, very large ones, on his shoes, which were extremely pointed at the toes. And on his head he wore a three-cornered pinched up hat, with a shining jewel and a long jaunty feather stuck on one side of it.

There he stood surveying himself as best he could from head to foot; brushing off every particle of dust he could detect on his habiliments, arranging his frills and ruffles, and, above all, examining the symmetry of his legs—eyeing them in every direction—now front, now back, even stroking them down gently with his hands, as if to feel if there were any excrescence.

"What a thing it is," he said, when he had completed his survey, "to be buried under a fat alderman! Why didn't he leave his body, as he did his money, in London? What with his corporation and his lead coffin, he has fairly pushed out a hunch in my back-bone;" and he threw back his elbows, as if to reduce the fancied excrescence; "and, what is even worse, he has given me a pair of bandy legs. Do you think I've straightened them enough, Andrew?"

But as if doubtful on the matter, he proceeded to insert, first one, and then the other, between two grave-stones that were very near neighbors to each other, and essayed to improve their symmetry, much as you may have seen a lad try to straighten a crooked stick.

Poor Andrew!—he stood stock still in unmitigated terror, unable to move or speak—his mouth wide open, yet gasping for breath; his eyes dilated, and his old knees knocking against each other, as if the concentrated violence of a twenty years' palsy had come upon him. At length, however, his extraordinary visitor perceived his agitation, and at once tried to calm it.

"Don't be afraid, Andrew," he said, "I'm very harmless; always was to everybody but myself—else, perhaps, I might have carried more wrinkles to the grave than you can see in my face now," and he stroked down his cheeks with apparent complacency; though, all the while, Andrew could not help remarking a certain air of anxiety in his countenance, quite at variance with his lively tone of voice and free and easy manner.

"To tell you the truth, Andrew," he went on, "I laid my lungs to rest a little earlier than quite suited my own inclinations, and having heard you wishing to lie by, the fancy to breathe a little more of this air, that you are opening your mouth so wide to catch, came upon me, and the thought, too, that perhaps you wouldn't be unwilling to change places with me. Eh! what say you to it, my old boy?"

"Heard me wishing to lie by!" at length stammered forth Andrew. "Why, I never spoke at all!"

"No, not with your lips," was the reply. "But, as you laid your head on my grave, the thought that passed through it, seemed to echo very clearly even through the lead and fat of the old alderman. Now, you would like, wouldn't you, to get rid of rheumatism and the workhouse, and to sleep quietly beneath the green sod, with the lime trees whispering sweetly overhead? Only look now, this is the very spot to suit your fancy. Is it a bargain?"

"But," again faltered Andrew, "do you corpses there below always hear the thoughts of those who sit upon your graves? and are you allowed to come up and speak to them at your will?"

"Why no! not always, at least," replied the other. "But one night in the year a little liberty is permitted us to stretch our legs on the turf, and get rid for awhile of the rather uneasy position in which some of us are lying. Ugh! I think I feel the corner of that big fellow's coffin pressing into my chest even now. Have you never heard, Andrew, the sexton say, how he has sometimes found corpses turned round in their coffins? Poor man, he was terrified to think they must have been buried alive. Nothing of the sort, I assure you. They had only shifted their position when they went into their graves again, after their yearly night of freedom. I have tried every possible position myself, under the gouty alderman, but have at length returned to my first one, though it does so grievously incommode my back-bone and my shins. I hope the hunch is not very visible. Is it?"

Andrew, by degrees, had been recovering his courage, and now the lively voice of his extraordinary visitor seemed to awaken in his breast somewhat of the shrewdness that had characterized him when younger.

"If you are as uncomfortable as you describe," said he, "I think yours would hardly be the bed I should choose to lie in. One 'ud think there were many resting-places here better worth having than yours."

"As for that, I don't think you'd find much difference in reality," replied the ghostly fop, with a strange grimace, half disappointment, half waggishness; "for you know, except on this one night in the year, we don't feel much of the incommo-diousness of our lodgings. It is only when we get on the top of our graves, and find our joints all so put out of shape, that we wish to shift our quarters. But that would be no great annoyance to you; for the old alderman could hardly set your legs awry, or bend your back more than rheumatism and old age have done already."

"But why," asked Andrew, "are you so solicitous to appear elegant on this one night? There's no one here, is there, to see and admire you?"

"Oh!" said the visitor, hesitating, as if to find out some evasion of the question, "I told you I was in hopes that you would change places with me, and, of course, I should like to make an impression on my re-appearance in the world.

"I faith, and you would make an impression," said Andrew, venturing even to laugh, "if you were to go down into the village yonder in your present dress. But that ain't it," he pursued, taking a malicious pleasure in pressing a topic which he clearly saw the other wished to avoid. "You have some other reason for wishing to be so spruce. You expected to meet other company to-night, very different from old Andrew, the weaver."

The poor fellow looked puzzled, and unwilling to reply. The anxious expression of his face grew more marked—but at length, with a shrug of his shoulders, as much as to say, "Well, I can't help it," he went on.

"True, Andrew, you have guessed right. I do expect to meet some other company. The church-yard is full of them already. Every grave has by this time sent forth its inmate, and they are engaged on every side of us, in the sports and pursuits that suit them best. I do intend to pay my respects to some of them before renewing my acquaintance with the alderman's coffin, if you won't do that for me."

It was Andrew's turn to look awkward now, for his fears began again to get the better of him. It was not at all comfortable to think that he was alone, at midnight, surrounded by whole generations of dancing corpses.

"Don't be alarmed at what I tell you," said his companion perceiving his trouble. "It isn't often we catch a really live body amongst us, at this our revel, and if we do, he is seldom wide awake like you. Sometimes, indeed, a drunken pig of a fellow has been found asleep among the graves; and, I must confess, we have delighted in tweaking his nose, and pinching his shins, and have given him some marks of our frolics, which he has been unable to account for the next day. But, in general, we ghosts are very civil; especially to those who wish, like you, so soon to join our company."

Andrew shuddered a little—his wishes in that respect were undergoing a change, but he said nothing about it at present, for policy and curiosity, too, counselled a different mode of tactics. So again mustering up his courage, he resumed his attack upon the ci-devant fop.

"Why can't I see all these fine folk you tell me of? If I am so soon to take up my abode in the churchyard, it is but fair that I should suit myself with lodgings. Can't I have the opportunity of asking a few others what they have to say for their tenements?"

The disappointment of the ghost grew deeper; but he said, "As you have asked me, I can't refuse," and he stretched forth his hand towards the old man. He shrunk back from his touch, but after repeated assurance that no harm was intended, allowed his mysterious companion to lay his finger on his eyelids.

In an instant what a change came over the scene. Although the sky above was murky black, yet was the churchyard most brilliantly illuminated. It was not the light of the sun, it was not the light of the moon, it was not possible to see whence it proceeded, or how it was produced; but it pervaded every part, and was everywhere equally diffused, so that every grave-stone was distinctly visible, and even the inscriptions legible to a considerable distance.

The church, too, stood forth more majestically than Andrew had ever seen it. The pinnacles and battlements which had been sadly dilapidated, were all perfect; the carved work that had seemed so time-eaten, was restored in all its sharpness and beauty; the sculptured monsters in the string courses looked truly hideous, in fact, almost endowed with life; the niches were filled with saintly statues, and the tracery of the windows, which had been quite removed from some, and in others hidden by brick-work and plaster, was all renewed and the interstices of their varied patterns were filled up with colored glass of the richest dyes, through which there streamed a light, far surpassing in brilliancy even that which illuminated the churchyard, and decking the turf and the trees within its reach with all the colors of the rainbow.

But the chancel—it was scarcely possible to gaze upon its windows; and Andrew was obliged to shade his eyes with his hand, to be able to look at them. They were filled with the effigies of saintly bishops, and priests, and statesmen, and warriors, and queens and virgins—and the old man could scarcely tear away his eyes from the glorious vision. He thought that heaven itself could not show anything more beautiful. But he was at length disturbed from his contemplation of it, by the ront which was growing wild around him. He turned to look—everything for a moment seemed dark in contrast with the brilliancy he had been gazing upon, but soon his vision grew clearer, and he could see it all.

Men and women of all ranks and ages, and of every variety of dress and manner that fancy could depict, were engaged in the wildest tumult of pleasure. The churchyard seemed indefinitely enlarged to hold the motley multitude, yet still its belt of gigantic limes encircled it. The most extravagant pictures of fairy or hobgoblin revels, Tam-o-Shanter's dance of witches, or the midnight orgies witnessed by Faust in the Hartz mountains, were nothing compared to what now met Andrew's astonished eyes. Nine-pins, and bowls, and skittles, and hockey, and a thousand other games that he had never dreamt of, were going on with an ardor and eagerness such as had never entered into the hardest struggles of his youth. Now a party at football swept past him, regardless of grave-stones, or rails, or monuments; madly they dashed over every obstacle in pursuit of their headlong game; anon he was enveloped in a whirl of dancers, who circled round him with a rapidity that would put to shame the giddiest waltz; and as the sport went on it grew wilder and madder, till in their efforts to outdo each other in their freaks and gambols, Andrew thought that some of them must have gone clean over the tops of the lime-trees, and come tumbling through the roofs of the cottages at the bottom of the hill. Yet, withal, whenever he could catch a glimpse of any of their countenances, he could not help remarking in them the same expression of eager anxiety which had struck him in his first ghostly acquaintance. And frequently, too, in the midst of their boisterous mirth, he saw them look fearfully upwards, and instantly avert their eyes as if they had met some most unwelcome object. He too looked up; and the cause of their apprehension was at once apparent. The clock dial, high up on the steeple, seemed swelled out to proportions quite gigantic. The figures on the disc glowed like living coals, and the huge fingers streamed from the centre like jets of livid flame, as they pointed to the passing hours. It looked to Andrew like the face of some huge monster, the presiding demon of these unholy revels, grinning on the scenes below, and mocking with malignant delight at the chagrin of the revellers, as they saw the hours of their joy fly so swiftly away. His countenance too grew troubled at the sight, and he turned away with a shudder. Hitherto none of the boisterous crew around him had seemed to notice Andrew, so he turned to his spruce companion who was still at his side, his face growing longer and more melancholy as he watched the progress of the glowing index over the fiery dial-plate, and begged of him to introduce him to some of the company.

He did so, stating the wishes of the old man, as he understood them, to exchange places with one or other of them, if he could suit himself. He was immediately overwhelmed with offers. One would have him to go here, to see what a lovely view was commanded from the spot where his grave was situated, but he remarked how it was trodden completely bare by the numerous visitors, who had made use of it to help them to enjoy the prospect. Then he was dragged away by another to see his beautiful monument: but he had that very day seen the lads jumping across it; aye, he had himself when a boy, danced on the slab that covered it. Now he was pulled here, now there, till his old limbs seemed to partake of something of the agility of the goblins that surrounded him, and his blood ran young again through his veins, as he was carried over the top of the highest grave-stones without an effort. But he had some fault to find with every locality; so in succession they left him in despair to join again the mad revel.

At length an imposing old gentleman, in a flowing wig and richly embroidered coat, saluted him with the greatest politeness, requesting that he might have the honor of offering him a truly comfortable bed inside the church. "We cannot go to see it just now," said he, "but, no doubt, you recollect the beautiful marble tomb at the end of the south aisle, where the disconsolate widow, surrounded by her lovely children, is weeping over the urn of her dear departed husband. I am that husband; and he covered his face with his hands, as if to hide his tears.

But Andrew doubted whether there were any tears to be hidden, for he well recollected the tomb. In his boyish days he had many a time followed parties of sight-seers into the church, and had heard the sexton descant on the merits of this identical tomb, which covered the remains of one of the possessors of the manor house, where, as has been said, he had seen the old pictures. In fact, he thought he recognized the old gentleman, as the original of one of the portraits, though, if it were a correct effigy, he must have been much more stiff and formal in life than now.

But Andrew recollected, also, a little bye anecdote connected with this same monument, to the effect, that the disconsolate widow, who looked so sorrow-stricken in marble, had so much flesh and blood in her real constitution, that almost before the cement of the tomb was dry, aye, in less than six months from the death of her first, she had cast herself into the arms of a second husband, and had afterwards combined with him to strip the very children, who, in the marble, were seen to cling to her so affectionately, of all their property. This had been the ruin of the family. For law and extravagance soon pulled the estates to pieces, and, within Andrew's own recollection, had pulled down the house.

But all this Andrew kept to himself. He merely signified to the polite old man, that he well knew the tomb, but expressed his surprise that he should be willing to surrender so respectable and comfortable a resting place, in exchange for one of the poorest cottages in the village below.

"Why, as for the matter of that," he replied, "I have no particular reason to be dissatisfied with my position in the south aisle. The family pew is by the side of it, and the fireplace there keeps it very dry, and not altogether uncomfortable. Indeed, I don't know if it is not quite as pleasant as the old hall there used to be."

Andrew thought, perhaps he was not far out there, for there was a rumor afloat, that the disconsolate widow was about as kind to her spouse before his death, as she was faithful after. But again he held his tongue and listened.

"I assure you, my dear Andrew," the old Gent. went on,—all seemed as if by inspiration to know his name—"I was always fond of doing a service to others, and shall be most happy to offer you my monument as a resting place for your sorrows."

Andrew did not exactly understand this disinterestedness. He had a vague notion of having heard his grandfather say, that one of the very disinterested lords of the old manor house, had contrived, by lending money to his neighbors amidst the greatest professions of friendship, to gain possession of many of their broad fields, and, among others, of some belonging to his (Andrew's) own family. And he had a shrewd suspicion, too, that this very affectionate old gentleman was the identical personage. So he could not help imagining that there was something in the back ground which he was unwilling to have known, and he was confirmed in his surmise, by seeing lurking amidst his smiles, that anxious look which he had observed in all, and the quick and troubled glance at the fiery clock.

So he pressed the old fellow with a few more questions. He soon became awkward and embarrassed, and at length, to avoid a direct explanation, made a most profound and obsequious bow, and disappeared behind one of the buttresses of the church.

And now Andrew stood alone. The revel continued around him. It had grown wilder than ever; and the laughter more loud and boisterous. But, at the same time, it seemed to Andrew's ears to sound hollow and lugubrious; there was something in it inexpressibly discordant, and ever and anon, he was doubting whether he were listening to bursts of merriment or despairing shrieks. The light, too, appeared to have changed. It was as bright as ever, but had become sickly and overpread everything with a paleish blue, like that produced by the flame of spirits of wine—and the demon-like face of the clock-dial above, grown more gigantic than ever, poured forth a flickering flame from the figures and hands, which now moved visibly onwards with a hissing sound.

Fear, such as he had never experienced before, came creeping over the limbs of the old man, and seemed to be curdling his blood. He turned round, with the intention of escaping from this scene of unholy revelry, for such he now regarded it, when he once more encountered his friend of the claret colored coat. But, how changed! His dress hung loose about him. A great hump had grown out on his back; and his legs were truly distorted. His ruffles and frills, and his long hair had become lank and spiritless, and the feather in his hat drooped mournfully over his now ghastly features.

"I see, you have made up your mind, Andrew," he said, despondingly. "I boded little good from introducing you to our revels; but I could not resist the laws of the Church-yard, when you asked to see them. My hopes are all over now, and I must soon lay my bones again in their low and loathsome bed, to await another"—a shudder ran over his limbs as he spoke this, making the long feather in his hat quiver like an aspen leaf—"and a more fearful waking."

"What can all this mean?" cried Andrew, himself quaking scarcely less than his companion. "Why have you become so sorrowful; and why is everything so changed?"

He looked into the eyes of the poor fellow as he spoke. They seemed like balls of rolling fire; yet could he see in them the working of a grief such as tongue might not utter.

"Listen," was his reply. "Again, I am constrained to speak, since you have asked. All these bodies that you see, as it were, endowed with life, have souls belonging to them—but they are not here."

"Then where are they?" exclaimed Andrew, gasping for breath.

"In Hell."

Andrew almost sunk to the ground with affright. "In hell!" he said, with a convulsive start. "How is it possible, then, that you are all so joyous and full of mirth?"

"Were we not joyous and full of mirth," replied the miserable form before him, "whilst we were in this life? And yet, did we not know even then, what must be our portion? Are there not thousands now, who strive to drown, in the tumult of worldly things and worldly pleasures, the voice that comes up from below, to tell them of the abyss of eternal torture that is yawning beneath their feet? What wonder then that we should spend these few hours of freedom allowed to our bodies, in such revelry as you have witnessed! Useless would it be for us to spend them otherwise; we cannot reverse the doom that is upon us. But those who are still in life, are they not truly insane, as once were we? For they may escape our miseries if they will, but they will not, and yet seem joyous. You have wondered, too, that we were all so anxious to exchange places with you, but do you wonder now? Oh! Andrew! Andrew! if we could have only one of those days—only one of those hours, that you are so anxious to get rid of, how would we not rejoice! How would we not employ them in doing penance! how would we not welcome your poverty and your sorrows, if we might use them, as you may, now! Farewell—forget not what you have seen and heard—and may we never meet again."

Quite bewildered between pity for the unfortunate beings, of whose revels he had been the unwilling spectator, and fear for himself, Andrew stood for some time rivetted to the spot; and a confusion came over him as if he had fainted, which took from his sight all the strange objects that were around him. By degrees, however, his senses seemed one by one to awaken, and when at length his eye-sight grew clear, he found himself standing opposite to the western door of the church. It was partly open; and through it there gushed forth a flood of light, as intensely brilliant as that which bursts from the smelting furnace, when the cake of clay is pierced to let forth the liquid iron. He could see too, from a shadow on the gravel pathway before the door, that some one was standing just within the threshold, and a strange curiosity, mingled still with a little apprehension, impelled him, as it were irresistibly, to approach. As he drew near the figure, whose shadow he had remarked, hastily took hold of the door, as if to close it, to prevent his entrance; but, on looking at him, only threw it wider open, and invited him to enter.

It was an old and apparently wayworn man, who was thus acting the part of verger; and judging from his appearance, Andrew thought that poverty had weighed upon him even heavier than on himself. His face was wan, and marked with deep-drawn furrows; he was lame too, and in his gait there was something that told of intense and long-continued pain. His clothea were old and tattered, and evidently had not been made to his measure; for while one article of dress hung loose and flabby about his limbs, his coat strove in vain to reach his nether garments, and the cuffs of his sleeves nearly touched his elbows. Still there was a cheerful, though subdued serenity in his countenance, and an inexpressibly sweet hilarity in his voice, very different from the forced mirth of those among whom Andrew had been spending the first part of the night.

"I thought it was one of that wretched crew without," he said, "that wanted to intrude into the holy place. But I see it's you, Andrew. Come in—you're welcome here."

Andrew stared.

"You're surprised that I know your name," continued his new acquaintance, "but it's not the first time we've met. Do you recollect, some two or three years ago, a tottering old man coming to your door to beg a bit of bread? You made him sit down with you and share your dinner. You didn't know I was a Catholic, nor did I know that you were one of my faith; but you gave me charity for the love of God, and I blessed you in my heart; and He, for whose love you shared your meal with me, has heard my blessing. That was the last meal I ever tasted. I was, after that, rejected from door to door, till I sunk down exhausted, and was discovered by some countrymen, only time enough to be carried to some cottage near, and to have the assistance of your good Father Peter before I died. Now I can give you some return for your charity. I am the last comer here, so am by rule the verger. Come in, you will see what will do you good."

Andrew followed him, and he closed the door. But what a sight presented itself to the sight of the old weaver! It was with difficulty he could recognize the spot where he was standing—yet he knew that it was beneath the tower; he had often been there when a lad, for he had been rather fond of coming to assist his old cronies in tolling the funeral bell. But then it was a dark and dingy hole, strewn about with grave-tools, and coals, and faggots. There used to be a dilapidated bier standing in one corner, and a gaily painted fire-engine in another, with its uncouth black leathern buckets dangling in a row on the wall above it. Then the ceiling was low, cutting in two parts its solitary narrow window, and it was nothing better than the rough uncased beams and boards of the belfry floor. There was also a brick unplastered wall to divide it from the church, through which a door of unplanned boards led into the nave; and the walls, and beams, and boards, and every nook and every crevice were coated with a groundwork of dust, and festoons of cobwebs, which seemed not to have been disturbed for centuries.

But now all that was unsightly, or betokened negligence, was gone. The ceiling of black old oak, panelled and deeply moulded, had ascended high up into the tower, above the top of the great west window, which, half blocked up, had hitherto lighted only the belfry, but now stood forth in all the imposing grandeur of its matchless tracery. The dust and cobwebs on the walls had made way for quaint inscriptions and pious emblems. The unplastered brick wall was quite cleared away, revealing to view an arch of noble yet graceful proportions; massive, as well it should be, to carry the tall tower and spire above; but, at the same time elegant, from the well-marked and numerous lines of its deep sunk mouldings. And now the eye ranged unobstructed through the whole length of the pillared nave. But here too, how was not everything changed! A lofty screen of the most delicate tracery now stretched across it, separating it from the chancel. It was of oak; but little of the bare wood was visible, for it seemed one blaze of burnished gold, relieved, and its splendor heightened here and there by the brightest colors. The arch above had been formerly blocked up with plaster, and on the surface thus obtained, the Queen's arms, supported by the fabled lion and unicorn, together with the names of the churchwardens under whose auspices the church had once been whitewashed, were rudely painted. But these emblems of a national religion had given place to the more universal one of Christianity. The screen was now surmounted by a majestic cross which reached almost to the centre of the arch. It was exquisitely carved, and glowed with gold and colors, and even, as Andrew thought, with precious stones. He had never before seen one so large, except in pictures, and it at once absorbed all his attention. Yet not the cross; for there hung One upon it with his arms outstretched, disfigured and distorted, yet beautiful to look upon even in his agony; and this it was that rivetted his eyes to the spot. It was not like one of those brass or ivory representations of the crucifixion of Jesus, which he had often seen, and by many of which he had been greatly affected. The impression which they conveyed to the mind was feeble, as compared with what he felt as he gazed on that before him. It seemed to be of real flesh and blood. He could fancy the eyes looked steadfastly upon him, at once in sorrow and in love; that the breast was heaving in agony, the limbs quivering and convulsed, and that the blood was actually trickling from the wounds! And, oh what wounds! Though deep, and wide, and jagged, they excited no horror, no repugnance. They were most pleasant to behold; yea, they shone with a radiance mild, yet brighter than the ruby. And beside the cross, as if substitutes for the lion and unicorn, stood Mary and John, but with such an agony of grief depicted on their countenances, that the tears ran down the old cheeks of Andrew when he looked at them.

Ranged along the screen were seven other figures. At first Andrew took them for groups of lamps or candlesticks, so brilliant was the light that streamed from them; but, by gazing steadfastly, he saw that they were mysterious figures like angels, with wings above closed over their heads, and wings below hiding their legs and feet, and wings expanded on each side as if supporting them; and all these wings seemed filled with eyes, whence came forth a brightness too dazzling to be long looked upon. Behind the screen a mass of light was spread, like a cloud of more than meridian brightness, but it was impossible to recognize anything within it.

Having at length satisfied himself with this glorious scene, the old man turned to look around the church, though ever and anon his eyes wandered back to the mild countenance of the crucified Saviour and his resplendent wounds. Here, too, he found everything changed. Galleries, and pews, and pulpit, and reading desk, and all the appurtenances of modern worship and modern comfort were gone—here, as beneath the tower, the old beams of the roof had shaken off their dust and cobwebs, and instead were decked out with varied colors, vying in brilliancy with the rainbow. The ceiling, reaching up to the very apex of the high pitched roof, was of a deep azure, sprinkled over with stars of gold. The bosses were all restored and gilded. The corbels and projecting heads of the beams were held up by angels, arrayed in flowing vests of white and gold, and bearing shields charged with the emblems of sorrow and redemption. Numerous coronas of antique form were suspended from the roof—they, too, glittering with gold and colors, and filled with lighted tapers, which diffused a soft yet intense light over the whole of the church. Even the walls were resplendent with azure and vermilion, and green and purple, harmoniously blended together in graceful and flowing patterns, intermingled with rich ornaments in gold and touching emblems—among which the monogram of mercy and of love, the name of Jesus, and that of hope and purity, the name of Mary, both surmounted by shining crowns, were most frequent and conspicuous. Statues, too, of holy saints, standing in gorgeous niches, were disposed at intervals along the walls; and the very pillars were entwined with glowing fillets of red and blue, surcharged with moving legends—"Jesus, mercy;" "Mary, help." The font had been carried back to its old situation, near the south porch. Its chaste tracery was all restored, and a carved canopy of gilded oak had replaced the uncouth lid that Andrew recollected to have seen upon it.

As he continued his survey, he found that all the tombs of modern days had also disappeared; even that which had stood in the south aisle, and which the old gentlemen, its occupant had so kindly offered to him. But on the floor, opposite to where it had stood, and hitherto probably concealed by the boarded floor of the family pew adjoining, were two full length effigies of a knight and his lady of polished brass, beneath elaborate canopies of the same metal, the interstices and lines being all filled up with wax, tinted in various colors. On the spot formerly occupied by the tomb itself, just beneath the window, there was now an altar with all its ornaments and appurtenances; the fire-place mentioned before being transformed into a sacarium; and a cupboard for books, which was stuck against the pillar on the opposite side, into a canopied niche containing the statue of the patron—that is, the patron of the altar, not of the living—the sainted Edward.

At the corresponding end of the north aisle, an equally striking change had taken place. There had formerly been the churchwardens' pew, and behind it a graceful arch had been walled up, so as to cut off a portion of the aisle, and form the vestry by the side of the chancel. But the pew and the wall, and another too which had filled up an arch opening into the chancel itself had vanished, and been replaced by screens, if possible, of more delicate and fairy-like tracery than the great one beneath the rood: and now this desolate looking recess, in which an uncouth iron-bound chest and sundry pegs on which to hang the parson's gown and surplice had been the only furniture, had become a chapel, where ornaments and enrichments had been bestowed with a more lavish hand than in any other part of the church which Andrew had as yet seen. Nor was it difficult to guess the reason—the tower of ivory, the mystic ark, the star, the lily, and many other emblems of her whom all generations were to call blessed, and which were scattered over the walls, the beams, the rafters, and the screens, would have sufficiently shown to what sweet saint this spot was dedicated, even if there had not been just outside, beneath a canopy of azure and gold, the statue of this most blessed amongst women, holding in her arms the thrice blessed fruit of her womb.

Just opposite this lovely chapel, but a little way removed into the centre of the aisle, was a figure of one who seemed to have chosen this spot for his resting-place, that so he might sleep secure beneath the glance of Mary. Andrew well recollected the ponderous tomb; but it had been sadly dilapidated, and almost hidden too by cumbrous pews. But now it stood alone in the centre of the aisle, protected by a low railing of curiously wrought iron, with sockets at the angles for wax tapers, which even now were there and burning brightly, as if emblematic of the hope that had lighted them. The tomb itself was polished black marble, divided at the side into compartments by canopied tracery; and in each compartment was the hooded figure of a headman engaged in prayer. Upon the slab was the recumbent effigy of a knight, all clothed in armor. His bare head rested on his plumed helmet, his feet were supported by a noble dog, the emblem of fidelity, and his hands were clasped upon his breast as if in prayer.

But what most astonished Andrew, who, in his admiration of the changed aspect of the old church, had unconsciously wandered to the Lady chapel just described, was, to see by the side of his tomb, a little in advance of it, so as to be directly opposite the statue of the Virgin Mother, a kneeling figure the exact counterpart of that on the monument. It was clothed in dark but shining armor, that reflected back the light of the candles that burnt around the tomb; its hands were clasped as in the marble effigy, but its face was upturned towards that of the blessed Mary, with an expression of most ardent supplication.

The curiosity excited by this spectacle, made Andrew look round for the old verger to ask for an explanation, when, for the first time, he perceived that the bewilderment caused by the unlooked for burst of glory which he had been surveying, had hindered him from observing that the church was full of people. It was really thronged, with the exception of a narrow space down the middle of the nave, which served at once for a passage and to divide the sexes, for the men were ranged on the epistle side, the women, with one exception, that of the mail-clad knight, on the other. Like him all were on their knees; like him, too, all seemed engaged in silent but no doubt most earnest prayer, for they seemed insensible to everything around them; their hands were clasped firmly together, and their breaths were heaving, not rapidly indeed, nor convulsively, yet with an energy that told better than words of the desires that were pent up within.

They were of all ages and conditions in life, and dressed after a strange variety of fashions; but Andrew could not help remarking, how, generally speaking, those who wore what he fancied to be the most ancient costume, were nearest to the chancel, and that the dress gradually became more modern as it approached the door, so much so that at the very bottom of the church he fancied he could recognize some cloaks and bonnets which were quite familiar to him, yet he could not call to mind who had been the wearers of them.

He would very much have wished to draw closer to some of these and speak to them, but he dared not, for it seemed to him as if it would be a cruelty to disturb their devotions. He contented himself, therefore, with looking at them, till their devotion seemed to become contagious, for the desire to join in it came strongly upon him, and he would have knelt down by the side of the black knight, before the shrine of Mary, had not the old verger, who was still at his side, touched him, and whispered to him, "Not yet, Andrew, your turn is not come yet."

The sound of his voice, though he spoke in a whisper, startled Andrew for a moment, so discordant did it seem with the silent devotion of the mute figures around; but still it broke the magic of the scene, so that he himself no longer feared to speak, and to ask the meaning of what he saw.

"It is given to us, Andrew," his companion replied, "to know many things that go on in the world we have left, especially if they concern us in any way; and this is permitted to us both as a punishment and a consolation. You have wished to die, that you may escape the troubles that threaten you. You have been holding converse with those who have been condemned, but cannot find any one among them with whom you would like to change places. Another trial is now permitted to you. Is there any one here with whom you would make an exchange, I suppose I needn't mention myself; the poor verger, who has only just entered upon his office, cannot hope to give up his charge so soon. Well, God's will be done." And he cast a look of unbounded resignation on the rood, where hung Jesus between Mary and John.

"What!" said Andrew, "you don't mean to say that any one here, aye, even yourself, would be willing to change places with me. Would you leave this glorious church to return to the rough world—to live in such a cottage as mine is? You have seen it, you say, then you know how poor it is, yet it is changed, aye sadly changed, ever since then. O, for my part, I would wish for nothing better than to live and die here."

"Yet," his guide proceeded, "there is not one here who would not joyfully change places with you. Aye, if your cottage and your lot were ten times worse than they are, only the more joyfully would they be welcomed."

"How!" cried Andrew. "Why," and he began again to be afraid—"who are you?"

"O, no fear," said the verger, "we are your brethren, and loving ones too, and grateful."

"Grateful, for what?" asked Andrew, "what can I have done to deserve your love?"

"Have you not often," replied his venerable guide, and he looked at him with an expression of the most thankful affection as he spoke, "when you knelt before the altar of the little chapel there down in the valley, prayed, 'May the souls of the faithful departed rest in peace?'"

In an instant the truth flashed on the mind of Andrew. These whom he beheld kneeling before the image of Him who died for them, were the bodies of souls in purgatory: and they were employing this their night of freedom, not like the condemned wretches outside, in gaiety and and jollity, but in earnest prayer, if so they might move heaven to shorten the period of imprisonment.

How did he not now look upon them with an increased interest and a loving pity. A feeling of veneration even came over him, for he knew that though they were now barred from heaven, yet was their salvation secure; that soon, some of them perhaps in a few days, would be reigning amongst the saints in bliss; and that, at the day of judgment, every one of these bodies, even that of the ragged and limping verger at his side, would be seen shining brighter than stars and clothed in garments more brilliant than the sun.

Aroused by the thought, he once more cast his eyes around, to see if he could recognize any of the old frequenters of the chapel amongst the congregation. For he himself had followed many to their last home, under the north wall of the church, yard, where most of the Catholics had been buried; but, as before, his curiosity was foiled. Many a dress of very modern ent did he distinguish, but with the exception of the old beggar at his side, he could not recognize the lineaments of even one. But as he looked his countenance gradually fell, and it was plain that some unpleasant thought was taking possession of his mind.

The assembled crowd was very great, and he would have wondered how the old church could hold it, had it not seemed to him as he began to think of the difficulty, that, like the church-yard, it had accommodated itself to the congregation; still, however, retaining its original characteristics, for there was not an arch, nor a pillar, nor a window more or less than usual. But what troubled Andrew was this. He had before observed that those who wore a more ancient form of dress were nearest to the chancel; as he looked now more attentively, he began to reckon how long a time some of them must have been here, for he was close beside one who must have lived when noble knights went forth to court or battle-field all clothed in iron armor; and he thought too that several others whom he saw in the crowd wore a no less antiquated garb than his. "Now," he said to himself, "it must have been a sight of years since they died. Do people then remain in purgatory so many hundreds of years?"

But as he looked lower down the church, his train of thought became still more dispiriting. For he remarked that very few who wore anything approaching to a modern dress had advanced beyond the middle of the church. They must have got on very slow.

He could no longer repress his desire to know the meaning of this, so at length referred the matter to his guide for explanation.

"In the main you're right, Andrew," he replied, "some have to spend a weary long while in purgatory, and perhaps we of modern times get through it more slowly than our ancestors."

"But why is this," exclaimed Andrew; "I have ever heard that God's mercies are above all His works; is He less merciful to us than to our ancestors?"

"No, not so," rejoined the old man, "God is truly merciful, and His mercy does not change with times and persons; but then He is just too, He must have His due. Don't you recollect having heard about the prison from which no one is let out till he has paid the utmost farthing?"

"Yes," said Andrew despondingly; for he thought of his own debts, and sighed at the prospect of having to pay every farthing of those. "Yes, I see it now, we are more cold and negligent, and more wicked than those of old. It is just that we should have more to pay."

"No, not exactly that neither," answered the verger. "People have been pretty much the same for wickedness in every age. I don't mean to say there haven't been some variations here and there in that respect, but that ain't it has made all the difference. Look you now at that knight in armor, he is one of the ancient times, and his sins were big enough oven for our days, Andrew. And only that he repented just in time, and made what amends he could for his plunderings, and his burnings, and his robberies, he would be this night outside with those miserable revellers."

"O, I see," said Andrew, "his power and his riches have made him a heavy debtor. It would have been better for him to have been poor like you and me."

"Listen," continued the verger. "He did every thing he could to repair his faults when God gave him grace to repent. But his time, you see, was short. He couldn't find out all that he had injured. He had made for himself a large estate by oppressions and frauds upon his neighbors; it was no easy matter to split it up again, and to give to each one his own; not to mention that many had gone away never to return, and others had died, and their families perished and been forgotten."

"Then," said Andrew, "why did he not make restitution to the poor and to God's Church? I have always learned that that is what should be done, when the rightful owners cannot be found."

"As for that he did his best, Andrew. But still, after all, he had much to pay. For he had wronged God as well as man. He had robbed Him of his honor himself, he had given scandal to others both by his provocations and by his bad example, where he ought to have been a guide to goodness; so when the short time allowed to him was over, and after he had done everything in his power, there still remained much for him to pay, both to God and man."

"Yes, yes," cried Andrew, more sorrowfully than ever, "God is truly merciful and just. It was merciful in Him to accept the repentance of such a man at all; but then He has been just too, for He has required three hundred years of punishment."

"After all," resumed the old verger, "his long stay amongst us is not entirely his own fault."

"How so?" asked Andrew; "who is to blame then? surely not God, for you told me how just He is."

"Wait a bit, and I'll explain it to you," was the reply, "and perhaps then you'll understand what I see has puzzled you, why people now-a-days get so slowly through Purgatory. It isn't entirely their own fault neither. You see that tomb there, with the monks around it praying, that tells you something of what he did to help him to pay the debts which he owed to God.

"He made rich gifts to the chapel there, and left money for a priest to offer up a mass every day for his own soul and all the souls in purgatory. He gave great moneys to the poor also, and ordered that every poor person that came to his funeral, should have a cloak and a dole of bread and meat; and so you may guess that his was a funeral worth talking of. For his sudden conversion was noised abroad, the more so as before so many had suffered from his cruelty and his hard-heartedness. So people came flocking from all sides, some for curiosity, but most to pray for his soul; for they knew that he would have much need of prayers. And of these some came in gratitude, because they had received back part at least of what he had taken from them; some came for the warm cloak and doles for the poor, but more from pure Christian charity, because they had been taught that it was good to pray for the dead.

"Seldom even in those days, had such a procession been seen as that which wound through the valley from the hill over yonder, where stood his castle, to the church. There was an almost endless train of poor men and women, all carrying lighted tapers and wearing the cloaks that had been given them; there were the bareheaded monks of more than one monastery with their processional crosses and lamps; there were the parish priests and curates for miles around, all in long white surplices, and each with his goodly torch of wax; and the retainers, and friends, and mourners that followed, were too many to be reckoned. And as they wound along through the lanes, and across the green fields, and up the path to the church-yard, the murmur of their prayers and the sound of the chanting, as it rose from the lengthened line, seemed to float up to the clouds as if determined to obtain some mercy. And without a doubt it did obtain some mercy for him and some relief; and if all his designs had been carried out in the same spirit, and with the same fidelity, he would long since have passed in there," and he pointed with his finger towards the glowing chancel. Andrew was too much absorbed in the history of the black knight to observe the gesture, so he only asked the verger to proceed.

"He left in his will," the old man went on, "directions for the building of twelve alms-houses, and funds for the support of twelve poor men, in honour of the twelve poor fishermen whom our Lord chose for his apostles. He would have built the houses himself before he died, if time had been allowed him. He ordered one of his memoirs to be given to a community of Cistercian monks, and a monastery to be built. You know the spot, Andrew, it is called Monks' Farm even now. O, if it were existing still, I should not have been left dying by the way-side, nor would you have to go to the work-house. All this was punctually done by his heirs, for men in those days were afraid of interfering with the last wills of their relations, especially if they gave any thing to God's poor or His Church. And many a fervent prayer went up to heaven from those alms-houses, and that cloister for him who had built them for the good of his poor soul. And if they had continued till now, such prayers would long ago have helped him into heaven."

"And it is because he built the monastery I suppose," said Andrew, "that those monks are placed round his tomb. How pious they look, even in the marble, but I never observed it before, they seem to be holding something broken in their hands."

"Ah," sighed the verger, "it used to be their rosary, but these, like their prayers, are wanting now; and it would have seemed a mockery to restore them, when that of which they are emblems is passed away. In the days of which we are speaking, all England was, as it were, one great rosary; its villages and hamlets were like so many little beads, its cities with their cathedrals and monasteries were the greater ones, and they were all bound together by the communion of saints. But it is broken to pieces now, like those that used to be in those marble hands, and that poor knight and all of us are the sufferers."

"It was the Reformation, as it is called, I suppose, that did all this," answered Andrew.

"Yes," his companion answered. "And it was not long after the poor knight was dead that it began. The little monastery was one of the first to be seized on by king Harry the Spoiler; the alms-houses followed in the next reign; then the daily mass in the Lady chapel was abolished as superstitious, and the knight has been left ever since to pray for himself, as you see him, one night in the year and to suffer every other day and night, till he had paid the long debt that he owes to his master. Nor is his a solitary case; there is more than one here, and many elsewhere, who would long since have gone from among us, if the institutions of the old times had not been swept away, and their funds put into the pockets of those who care more for the living than the dead."

"But how is it," asked Andrew, in some astonishment, "that you know all these things so pat, and can talk about them so finely? You were only a miserable beggar, and have only just come in here you say, where have you of a sudden got all your learning?"

"I told you before," was the reply, "that we are allowed to know many things whilst we are here, whether they be past or present, especially what affects our own interests. But this, though it may seem a privilege, often only increases our sufferings; and in my own case, I must confess most justly."

"How so?" Andrew inquired.

"Why, you see, when I was in life I was rather given to grumbling, a fault which in truth is too common with us poor folk. Most of the sins for which I am now in Purgatory have arisen from this failing, and very probably a part of my punishment consists in having these motives for grumbling constantly before me."

"Ah," said Andrew, "just as I have heard it sometimes said, those who are so fond of grumbling, ought to have something to grumble for."

"Precisely so," replied the verger. "And so now I feel all the trouble and vexation, if I may say so, that would arise from knowing these things if I were still alive on earth; but still I am not really vexed at them, you will understand; I know too well the value of resignation now to do that even if I could; but yet I suffer as much as if I were as vexed as I used to be."

"Well, but," argued Andrew, "even so I don't see how the recollection of such a funeral as you have described can afflict you; for my part, it delights me to think of it. How can it at all affect you now?"

"How?" the old man somewhat sharply asked; "by the contrast of the things that were with the things that are. Such a funeral as that was a common gain to all the souls in Purgatory, but especially to those lying in the church-yard through which the procession passed. The prayers that were said, the psalms that were chanted, were not intended merely for him who was being carried to the tomb, but for all who rested beneath the sod. But who ever heard of such a funeral now? or what good is a modern funeral to any one but the undertaker? Instead of cloaks for the poor, there are gloves, and silk scarfs and hat-bands for the rich—instead of doles, a feast for the relations—instead of prayers, common-place condolences, too often laughter, and even riot and debauchery. O! the many footsteps of a procession of old, slowly pacing through the church-yard were beautiful, for you know it is written, "How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel of peace, of them that bring glad tidings of good things;" (Rom. x. 15.) Their sound was truly like glad tidings whispered through the regions of the dead. But the measured tread of a modern funeral falls dull and heavy on the soil, and finds no responsive echo in the hearts of the sleepers.

"Now-a-days they carry us to the grave without a cross to guide our way, or a torch to light us on our dreary path; all is cold and meaningless, and dark, and gloomy. Aye, and Catholics too, though they profess to believe in Purgatory, are little if any better than the rest. They place us in unconsecrated mould, without a blessing, without a prayer, because it is too far to go to a Catholic burial ground, or because in the Protestant one there is some other mouldering carcass to which we were once supposed to be related. Perhaps they put up an unsightly tombstone, and think they have done wonders, if they carve a cross upon it, or add at the bottom three letters signifying a wish that we may rest in peace. But there they stop, and we may rest in peace for them, for they will trouble themselves no farther about us.

"If any come to the church-yard now, it is to saunter about in idleness, or to find out which is the oldest grave-stone, or to read the doggerel rhymes that have taken the place of the good old charitable inscriptions; and if they chance to light upon one where they see a cross, they say 'O, he was a Catholic,' they see the words at the foot begging for peace for the weary soul, but even in repeating them they mean not to pray; they forget that in the grave below, there is probably a brother or a sister who needs their aid, and who cries out to them by the only emblem which at one time a persecuting age permitted to them, 'have pity on me, at least you my friends.' Grave-stones, and tombs, and monuments, were not intended to be merely ornaments, or memorials of mortality, or the trumpeters of pride, but they should be humble suppliants for prayer, and such they were once; but who, even among Catholics, looks on them as such now? who, when he reads the epitaph of a brother in the faith, ever thinks of uttering a De profundis, or a single Pater Noster for the welfare of his soul?"

"I understand it now," said Andrew. "This is why modern Catholics get so much slower through purgatory than those of old—and why so few—why, I do believe not one of the bonnets and hats of my days, have as yet got beyond the first pillar."

"You were not altogether wrong, then, you see," the verger went on, "in attributing this to the negligence and coldness of modern Catholics. They are truly cold. Their faith in Purgatory is cold, and so they do little in life to escape it themselves; Their charity is still colder, and so they altogether forget and neglect us, their poor brethren, who are already suffering there. How often do you think is Father Peter asked to say a Mass for the souls in Purgatory? I'll be bound the alms he receives for this charitable work in a year, would barely furnish him with a week's subsistence; and probably if all that has ever been given him for it was put together, it wouldn't buy a new black vestment for him.

"Just look at those two chapels of our Blessed Lady and St. Edmund; they were built and endowed in times gone by, that Masses might be offered up daily for the souls of the founders and their families, and for all suffering souls; and there were alms, too, and clothes to be given away at stated days to the poor, for them to pray for the same picnic end. Formerly no one ever thought of passing through a church-yard without stopping to kneel before the cross to say a prayer for those who lay around it; no one ever entered a church and went out unmindful of the dead—but now, though a man's own father, or mother, or brother, or sister, or wife, or child, lie beneath the they had none), all the demesnes of the late earl passed to the next male heir, and who that was would be a case for the lawyers. Mr. Wigram, of course, was disappointed; but the will was clear, and the executors knew their business.

"The next male heir!" exclaimed Mr. Edwards. "It will take a lifetime to trace out the pedigree!"

"Not quite so long as you think," said Sir John; "I believe it is not so very long since the heir of Oakham has been within these very walls."

"Not Grant! exclaimed my father; "no, not possible!"

"Ay, not only possible, but most certain," said Sir John; "William Grant Carstairs, only son of Lord Carstairs, and grandson of the old Duke of Leven. His father never took the ducal title, and even dropped that of Carstairs when he settled in Australia; but I have undisputable proof that Mr. Grant, of Glenleven, was really the man; indeed it was well known in the colony, when I was governor. Carstairs died about a year ago, and his son, this William Grant Carstairs, is really Duke of Leven. He came to England to pay off the last remnants of his grandfather's debts, and as he could not do this without putting himself in communication with the Commission of Creditors, of which I am chairman, I became acquainted with his real name and history."

"Then Mary was right," I muttered to myself, while Sir John continued:

"We shall place the necessary evidence of these facts before the right tribunals, and, meanwhile, Mr. Grant must be communicated with."

"He leaves England in a fortnight," said my father.

"He will do no such thing," said Sir John. "It will be a case for the lords, and he will, no doubt, have a subpoena to appear and give evidence."

It all happened as he said; there was no difficulty about the proofs of identity, for there had never been any concealment of the fact, and every one in Queensland knew well enough who "Grant of Glenleven" really was, and why he chose to drop the family name and ducal title. Then as to the heirship, that was equally plain. There were but the two male branches of the family, of both of which Grant was now the sole surviving representative. When all this had been sifted and proved, and every legal form gone through which could be demanded by the House of Peers or Doctor's Commons, then, and not till then, did Grant consent to appear at Oakham, and receive from the executors of the late earl all that was necessary to constitute him its master. It took more than a year to constitute all this, and when at last the day was fixed for the new duke to take possession, not Oakham only, but the entire county prepared to give him a worthy reception. I had my share of the law business, and went down to assist my father in the heavy work which the occasion brought on him. I shall not easily forget it. All the gentlemen of the county had assembled there, lords and baronets; but I need not give a list. There were triumphal arches and processions of school children, and the Exborough Volunteers, and a dozen carriages to meet him at the station. I remembered how at that same station he had stood alone a year before, looking in vain for some one to carry his bag to the White Lion; I remembered that, as I saw him now step on to the platform, and shake hands with the Marquis of Exborough, and when I heard the loud cheers that greeted him. How the bells rang out as the array of carriages drove through the village! What a bright gala day it was! The old family restored to Oakham, the old property given back to the eighth Duke of Leven.

But I don't intend to dwell on all this further. When the fuss of the grand reception was over, he sent for me to come to him. "Aubrey," he said, "what is to be done about the Australian business? Harry keeps on pressing for some one to go out. Can you find me anywhere an honest man with a clear head, and I'll engage he shall make his fortune."

I thought, and I hesitated.

"Will you go yourself?" he said, at last. "Mind, I don't ask you to go; but if you decide on accepting the post, I believe you will not regret it."

I consulted my father, and he urged me to accept the offer. There did not seem much chance of making my fortune by English law, and so, to make a long story short, before Christmas I left England, whither, as things turned out, I did not return for ten long years that were full of changes.

I have no intention, dear reader, of troubling you with my personal history during that eventful period. It was a busy part of my life, and the duke was right in saying that I should not regret it. My concern just now is to tell you my friend's story, and not my own; and my ten years in Queensland were certainly not without their utility in advancing his interests. I won't bind myself to say to a shilling the sum which I sent over to England as the produce of his gold fields at Glenleven, but Harry Gibson had not been far wrong in calculating their value at millions. If any one will bear in mind the fact (which is a fact) that in those ten years the produce of gold in this one colony exceeded £104,000,000, they will easily understand what must have been the value of a single property which extended over some thousands of acres; for when Lord Carstairs first settled in the colony, an enormous tract of sheep-feeding land could be bought for a comparative trifle.

My own interests, of course, were not forgotten; the duke's terms were more than liberal; and, when the whole estate had been finally disposed of, I was able to return to England a wealthy man. One commission, entrusted to me by the duke, spoke well for his heart; it was the removal to England of his parents' remains, which had been laid to rest in the little cemetery of Ballarat.

Yet I own there were some things in my home correspondence which gave me a secret anxiety. Much was said in praise of the new duke, of his generosity, his manly principles, his care for his property and his tenants; but expressions were now and then dropped which showed me he had the character of being eccentric. I was sorry for this, though not much surprised; in my brief intercourse with him in former years it was impossible to deny that his originality looked in that direction. What did surprise me much more was that, judging by his own letters, far from despising money, he seemed to care for it a good deal. He took his millions from Australia with a very good grace, and made no objection to the proposals I submitted, whereby a larger revenue could be raised from the property. And after all, I sometimes said to myself, this is but natural. Men theorize on gold and like to call it dirt, so long as their hands are clear of it; but let them feel its magic touch and the dirt becomes marvelously pleasant. Leven desires to get as much as he justly can from his property, and so do I, and so does everybody. And yet the sigh with which I closed my meditations showed me that my imagination had painted the "Grant" of former days as something higher and more unselfish in his aims than "everybody."

There was another thing that struck me as odd. A year or two after I came to Glenleven I became a Catholic. I had never thought much of these subjects in early youth; but many things which Grant had said had gone home; and the impressions first received from him were deepened in Australia. There, for the first time, I saw the Catholic religion at full work; I felt its mastery of souls, its reality as a Divine power, and to that power I submitted. It was only natural for me to imagine that the Catholic Duke of Leven would have been leader of his co-religionists in England. I had the English papers, Catholic and Protestant, sent out to me pretty regularly, and after my conversion I looked with some eagerness to see what part he took in parliamentary debates on questions affecting Catholic interests, education questions, workhouse questions, church-building questions, and the rest, I looked for his name, and I generally looked in vain. In my perhaps romantic imaginings about his probable course I had pictured him as the founder of benevolent institutions through the length and breadth of the kingdom; I thought he would acquire a distinguished name and achieve great things for the poor and the laboring classes; but if he did so, the papers, at any rate, had nothing to tell me about it. There is no denying, it was a disappointment, but I gradually grew used to regard the whole subject as one in which the fancy of youth had cheated me with its wonted delusions; and who is there who reaches middle life who has not to look back at one thing or other as having been the slave of his imagination?

I returned, then, to England, spending a week or two in London before going down to Oakham, where my parents still lived; for though my father's age had obliged him to give up his post as steward into younger hands, the duke would not hear of his leaving the Grange. Mary had become the wife of Charles Oswald, a small squire of the neighbourhood, and was still able to be a good deal of comfort to her father and mother, and to find an ample sphere for all her capacities of usefulness. In returning to Oakham, therefore, I was still returning home, though I had formed no plans as to my own final settlement.

In London, I found plenty of old friends to welcome me, and, perhaps, the less kindly from the fact that rumor had credited me with having brought home an Australian fortune. Some of those whom I had left just entering on their profession, had fought their way to legal eminence, and some had earned their silken gowns and a certain share of reputation.

Sir Clinton Edwards, the brother of our Oakham vicar, was now a judge, and at his table I met a group of men more or less distinguished in the world of politics and of letters. The world has many phases, some more, and some less pleasant to come in contact with. A London dinner-room, filled with refined and intelligent people, who know everything and everybody worth knowing, is, no doubt, a very agreeable sample of polite society; but mark well this truth, dear reader, it is still the world, and anything higher and better than what savors of the world, you must not look to extract from its conversation. Sir Clinton had a fancy for well-mixed variety in his company, so on the present occasion I had the good fortune to meet a Solicitor-General, and a Home Secretary; the editor of a popular philosophic review (whose theology, by the way, was not predominantly Christian), two men of science, and a county member. Including our host and myself, we numbered eight. It is needless to say that our dinner was irreproachable. For the passing moment I found myself a lion; for the gayest and wittiest circles so soon exhaust the sources of their gaiety, that any person who, for one half hour, can stimulate a new curiosity, may calculate for exactly that space of time on enjoying a fair amount of popularity.

The conversation in such a circle was as graceful and varied as the forms in a kaleidoscope. Home politics, the state of the colonies, Hapirock's last pamphlet on the Council of Ephesus, the Vicar of Oakham's long promised, and recently published, work on Roman Antiquities, the last cartoon in Punch, and the University boat race, all passed in review, till for my sins I fell into the hands of the philosophic editor, who was, of course, profoundly ignorant of the creed of his next door neighbor. He was engaged on an article which aimed, I will not say at proving men to be well-developed monkeys, for I have never found that writers of this particular class ever aim at proving anything whatsoever, but at throwing out pleasant theories of the possible probability of their being nothing better. The intellectual inferiority of the Australian aborigines was the point on which I was subjected to cross-examination, and every fact elicited was bagged by my tormentor for future editorial purposes. But the county member who sat opposite charitably stepped in to my relief.

"I tell you what, Ford," he said, when he could get in a word, "you needn't go to Australia to look for intellectual inferiority; no, nor for savages either, nor for that matter for heathens; you'll find the whole stock-in-trade ready for inspection in a good many of our manufacturing towns, only nobody comes to inspect them."

"Very true," said Sir Clinton; "when I am Lord Chancellor, I shall introduce a bill for obliging all members of Parliament to spend one calendar month in a colliery district, say Bradford, for instance."

The familiar name struck on my ear and raised a host of recollections.

"Ah," said one of the men of science, "I've been down there lately. You know the improvement of the mines is one of the duke's hobbies."

"And not merely mines, is it?" said the secretary; "I've heard a good deal of his work among the people."

"Just so," replied the scientific gentleman, "he's always at something; you know it would puzzle the calculating boy to number his hobbies; but the last thing has been the mines, and really his ideas about ventilation are very creditable."

"You are speaking, I presume, of the Duke of Leven?" I inquired.

"Ah, yes, you would have known him, of course, before going to Australia. Curious history his has been, certainly."

"He is really an excellent fellow," said Sir Clinton, "but not long for this world, I fear; I never saw a man so altered."

"Well, he is a very good fellow, of course," said the county member; "but he carries things too far, to my mind."

"How so?" I ventured to ask.

"Oh, I don't know exactly; lives the life of a hermit, which, in his position, is a mistake, and does mischief; and then he's always sporting some social view or other; setting himself a little against the current. One thing, you know, he's a Catholic."

"Yes," observed the second man of science, who till now had spoken but little, "it's a great pity that. Cuts a man of his standing so completely out of everything. He can't take his proper place in general society, parliament or anywhere."

"Well," began the editor, "of all the idiotic absurdities a man can be guilty of, I should say that was the primest. I declare it would justify a commission of lunacy."

"I'm afraid that's the real explanation of the whole thing," said the county member, looking sagacious, and touching his forehead; "there certainly is a touch in the top story."

"Touch or no touch," said Sir Clinton, "he has done wonders at Bradford. I know it by the results at the sessions."

"And may I ask what he has done?" said the editor, with the slightest possible tone of sarcasm.

"Changed the whole system of wages, shut up about twenty public-houses, and, really, I don't know how he has managed it, but they're not so brutalized by half since he's had the manor."

"And if I am rightly informed (you'll correct me, of course, if I am in error), but I understood he had brought over a lot of German monks and built them a monastery."

"Ah, yes," said Sir Clinton, "that's at Glenleven, on the moors, you know." Well, it's one of his crochets, and, perhaps, not the most sensible."

The secretary shook his head, and looked disgusted. "I know this, we shall have to put a stop to all that sort of thing some day," he said, "and the sooner the better, in my opinion."

Then the conversation, by an easy change, flowed into foreign politics, and I was left to digest all I had heard, and form my own conclusions. Was Leven really a little touched? Was he unpopular? Or was he dying? Had his ten years of boundless means produced as their whole result an improved system of wages and mine ventilation, and the building of a monastery? And did he fritter away his genius and his undoubted powers in a quick succession of profitless hobbies?

I should go down next day to Oakham and judge for myself.

CHAPTER VII.

RETURNING HOME.

My first week at Oakham was given to my family. I had to be introduced to my new brother-in-law, Oswald, who had brought Mary over from Exdale manor, that we might all be once more together. The duke had been called away to Scotland, and, to tell the truth, I was not sorry to have time and opportunity for rectifying my ideas on the new order of things before meeting him. My father praised him highly, for was he not a Leven? That single fact sufficed for him; nor would I have disturbed the simplicity of his loyalty to the representation of the duke's hobbies.

out it, but with tenfold vividness and beauty. Life seemed to have been breathed into every thing. Even the material ornaments of the roof and walls, though retaining their forms as flowers and bosses, and letters and monograms, most unaccountably to Andrew, all seemed to live. The very colors glowed with a warmth and significance, as if they, too, were emanations of living spirits. Above, the ceiling was spread out like a sea of azure, full of motion, yet at rest; it was transparent, too, so that the eye could penetrate far, far into its inmost depths—yet beyond it nothing could be seen, save only a deeper, and deeper, and brighter, and more dazzling blue. The gaze seemed lost in its interminableness, but not fatigued; for it had, as it were, a voice that penetrated through the eyes even into the heart, to whisper there of a repose eternal, undisturbed. The golden stars scattered through the expanse, which, strangely, seemed to be the firmament, yet all the while bore the form of the old chancel roof, showed like eyes of celestial spirits, all bright and joyous. But if Andrew looked more intently on any one of them, it was still a star. So was it with every ornament; the bosses and the roses all around seemed to him to be cherub faces smiling on him, but if he fixed his eyes on any one amongst them, it was a carved flower still; and so on every side and in every direction, these beings of a higher sphere, brilliant yet undefined, were swarming; they seemed to hang in groups and clusters amid the tracery of the roof; to run like twinkling meteors along the beams and rafters, to sparkle amid the letters and emblems on the walls, to circle in glowing wreaths around the names of Jesus and Mary, and to be entwined together in the crowns above them—all, all was life. They mingled in the radiance of the golden coronas, and flitted hither and thither in the air like fire-flies in the dark of a quiet evening.

On either side of the chancel, carved stalls of ebony, and gold, and ivory, were ranged row beyond row, each upheld by angelic forms, rejoicing as it seemed, in the task assigned to them. But what a company occupied those radiant thrones! Were they men and women who had ever trod this earth? Is it possible that this gross flesh of ours can shine so bright, can put on such majestic beauty? They stood not, but floated softly just raised above the ground, each in his appointed place. Their robes, though made after the fashion of this earth, such, in fact, as they might be supposed to have worn in life, yet seemed worthy of kings and queens, yes, far richer and more graceful than had ever adorned king or queen on earth. Their countenances cast forth a radiance too dazzling for human eyes to look upon, unless preserved from blindness by some supernatural power, and a halo of golden amber played around their heads. Their bodies seemed to have lost all weight and substance, and all the grosser attributes of matter, for though every lineament of their faces, and every fold of their garments, and the colors and patterns woven into them were clear and distinct, yet withal they were quite transparent, so that through them the tracery of their stalls and all the beauties of each receding range of saintly figures were perfectly visible. Yet was there no confusion, no mingling of objects into each other, but the eye without difficulty separated them and gave to each one his place and attribute. Above them, poised in air, were angels clothed in flowing robes of the purest white, supporting over their heads what at one moment appeared to be fretted canopies of burnished gold, and the next crowns in which were combined the tints and all the brilliancy of the pearl, the emerald, and the ruby, and the sapphire, and the diamond.

As soon as the first surprise occasioned by the burst of this unlooked-for vision had a little subsided, Andrew turned to look for the old verger, but he found that the mist which had hitherto obstructed his view of the sanctuary was now behind him, hiding from his sight the nave and its congregation. And he now also for the first time perceived two angelic figures, one on each side of the chancel door, who stood with swords of flame in their hands, as if to guard the entrance.

They smiled benignly on him when they saw that he had observed them and motioned to him that he must advance no further, but kneel down there upon the threshold, and at the same time they pointed towards the high altar. He sank down instantly on his knees, and looked in the direction indicated by the gesture, but it was some minutes before he could comprehend what he saw.

The altar was prepared as he thought for Mass, yet it seemed to him that some church office had just been concluded, of which the "Amen" that he had heard was probably the close. The candles were all lighted, the Missal lay open on the epistle side, and it was evident the saintly congregation were awaiting the approach of the ministers. Andrew understood also at once that the Mass about to commence was for the dead; for before the altar was a frontal of black velvet embroidered in gold, and richly brocaded curtains of the same color and material hung on either side. Behind it, covering the reredos and the great east window up to the very roof was suspended a pall, likewise of black velvet, with a huge crimson cross upon it inscribed in golden letters, with verses from the "De Profundis," and other prayers for the dead.

But what puzzled Andrew was, that those sombre ornaments though they covered, did not conceal the glories of the altar, or of the reredos, or of the gorgeous window behind, for they seemed in some strange manner to be transparent, so that through them the sculptured and jewelled altar front, and the canopied reredos blazing with precious stones, showed forth in all their magnificence; and though the light within the chancel was brighter than a summer day, there seemed to be a yet more intense light without, for the tracery and the colors of the window, notwithstanding the sable veil before it, were as distinct and vivid as if the morning sun had just cast its first beams upon it.

But Andrew had not the time, even had he been able, to unravel this mystery; for a door, now for the first time observed by him, was opened towards the middle of the sanctuary, and forth there came a procession of sainted men, if possible more lovely to look upon, than those who occupied the ivory stalls.

First came the thurifer, followed by the candle bearers and a long train of acolytes, all youthful forms, who seemed to have been conveyed to heaven, whilst their souls, unsoiled by earthly contaminations, were pure and spotless as the white surplices they wore; then sub-deacon and deacon, and one wearing a gorgeous cope, and last the priest, a venerable and stately old man, with looks of unconquered meekness, and his silvery hair glittering in the nimbus of glory around his head.

Andrew had never seen a High Mass, but he had learnt sufficient of it from description and pictures to know that such was the service about to commence, and to assign in his mind to each one of the ministers his proper rank. He looked on, therefore, with intense interest, and his old blood tingled with delight at the idea of being allowed to assist at this most august of Christian rites.

But he could not help remarking, that the vestments were of a fashion new to him, yet withal having a more antique look than those he had been accustomed to. They were much larger and more flowing, and they folded round the wearer's form far more gracefully than the stiffened chasubles he had seen Father Peter wear; and instead of a sprawling ill-formed cross the representation of Jesus crucified was beautifully depicted on it in rich and glowing needle-work.

Slowly and majestically did the procession move towards the altar steps, amid a fragrant cloud of incense, which seemed to Andrew's eyes to consist entirely of wreaths and prayers springing from the golden censer, and ascending up, and up, and up—quite through—and far—far beyond the farthest depths of the blue firmament above.

They ranged themselves at the lowest of the altar steps, and Andrew could see the priest raise his hand to his forehead, and was listening with almost painful earnestness for the sound of his voice, when a flood of harmony, it could be called by no other name, broke the deep silence that had hitherto reigned around him, and was poured into his ears from every part of that wide sanctuary. It was as if every one of the cherub faces which in thousands were clustered and flitting around him, and every one of those angel forms that at once upheld and adorned the gorgeous roof, the stalls and canopies, aye, and every one of those beaming stars above, sent forth their voices in unison with that sainted congregation at whose devotions they were assisting.

Slow and solemn was the strain and plaintive, breathing at once of hopes deferred, and of earnest and trustful prayer, embodying together, as it were, the feelings of those two classes of God's saints, whom Andrew had this night been permitted to behold; the one suffering, assembled there behind him in the nave, the other triumphing, yet full of sympathy for their less fortunate brethren, and therefore met together in the chancel before him to intercede for them. Now it was as the voice of one pleading his cause with tears, and bowing down to the very dust to sue for mercy, and now it was as the united efforts of thousands determined even to do violence to heaven, and clamorous before the throne of God, "that eternal rest might be given to the souls in prison, and perpetual light be made to shine upon them;"* and anon the full chorus would burst forth joyously, as if its prayer was heard, for truly it was proper to raise up a hymn of jubilation in Sion, and to pay vows in Jerusalem, to Him who had heard the prayer of His children and granted their petition.†

Andrew listened as one in a trance. Every faculty seemed to be absorbed in the sense of hearing; and when at length the harmony suddenly took up another mode expressive of dismay and anguish, and the voices even of saints and angels grew tremulous, as they sung of "the day of wrath, that dreadful day," he bent down and pressed his hands over his eyes, as if at once to shut out the fearful images that rose up before him, and to exclude every sight that could mar the effect of the sublime strains that were searching into his very soul. And thus did he remain quite absorbed in that wondrous hymn, alternately terrified, and consoled, and filled with hope and love, as the deep meanings of its stirring words were infused into his soul by the changeful voices of that unearthly choir.

At length the chanters ceased, and Andrew raised his head to watch the ceremonies at the altar. He perceived that the deacon was just about to chant the gospel, and instinctively stood up to listen to it. He easily recognized the words, for it was the Gospel of the Mass for All Souls' Day which he knew was the account of the conversation between Jesus and Martha just before He raised her brother Lazarus from the tomb. But never had its meaning come so home to his heart as now. To hear those words of Jesus, "thy brother shall rise again, believest thou this?" and the reply of Martha, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection of the last day," thus sung by lips that for ages, perhaps, had been mouldering in the grave; and to look at the same time at the shining bodies of so many who had believed in Jesus just risen from their tombs, did indeed give a force to the narrative of the Evangelist, that might well strike a far more tutored mind than his.

At the conclusion of the Gospel, there was a pause. Andrew had been told that this was the proper time for the sermon, but he could not imagine what instruction saints, already immersed in glory, such as the congregation before him, could want; so he stood wondering what new scene might be preparing.

But for a few minutes all was still, until he seemed to hear a voice, that came, he fancied, from one of the angels at his side, yet not from his lips, nor did it enter through his own ears, though it was clearly audible in his heart.

"Child of clay," it seemed to say, "hast thou not some request to make? Now is the proper time for it."

He was bewildered by the question, and began to ransack his memory to find out what he stood most in need of, when gradually the wish that he had uttered, of changing places with some one in the church-yard, came back to his mind. But so extravagant did it seem to be renewed here, that he hesitated whether to dare even to whisper it.

* Requiem eternam dona eis Domine; et lux perpetua luceat eis.—Introit of Mass for the Dead.

† Te decet hymnus, Deus in Sion; et tibi reddetur votum in Jerusalem; exaudi orationem meam.—Ib.

"Make haste, if thou hast aught to ask," the voice resumed, "or the ceremony will proceed."

"I had a wish," the old man now replied, "but I think it is worse than useless to speak of it here."

"Thou shalt see," was the rejoinder, and at a motion of the Seraph's hand, one of the occupants of the stalls gently glided from his place, and stood before the astonished and now trembling weaver.

He had the appearance of a man somewhat past the prime of life, and might have been thought toil-worn and emaciated, but for an inexpressible glow that seemed to radiate from his features, lending a charm to those wrinkles and deep marked furrows, that told of cares and labors long endured, and would have made a face less glorified painful to look upon. He was dressed in a coarse brown habit reaching to his feet, with a hood of the same material thrown back behind. A rough cord formed his girdle, and from it hung a rudely carved rosary, with its wooden cross and skull. His neck and feet were bare, the latter being protected only by leather sandals. His head too was uncovered, and entirely shaven round the crown. But his coarse habit and girdle, and rough formed sandals, everything in fact that he wore, though conveying an idea of the lowest poverty, seemed interwoven with threads of gold, and glittered as if powdered over with diamonds.

His arms were crossed upon his breast, his head bowed downwards, and his eyes cast upon the ground, and his countenance and whole demeanor spoke of such a deep humility and of such pure benevolence that old Andrew's heart leaped up into his throat for love of him as he gazed upon him.

"What would you with me, brother?" he began, seeing that Andrew was abashed and confused. His soft and winning voice quite reassured the old man, and he ventured to mention the wish of which he had already repented, adding "that he would not have thought of speaking of it here, only for the angel. For, of course, no one would be willing to exchange heaven for earth, when once he had got safe there." "Not so much a thing of course," the saint replied, "if a christian's soul can be saved thereby."

"But you wouldn't have me believe," asked Andrew, "that any one would give up such bliss as yours to come again to earth, even for the salvation of a thousand souls?"

"It has been done," was the reply, "by one whose bliss surpassed even that which the highest of the saints enjoys; and He has told us to learn of Him. Why should this lesson, of which He set us the example, be the only one left unpractised?"

Andrew fixed his eyes upon the speaker to see if he was really in earnest. But everything in that glowing countenance showed that what he said was from the heart, and that he was ready, if it were allowed him, to make a sacrifice such as this.

"But—is it possible!" faltered the old man; "would you—no I cannot believe it—I daren't ask the question."

"Would I, you mean to say," the holy man proceeded, "consent to exchange my lot for yours?"

Andrew scarce dared to express his assent, but the saint replied, as if to his thoughts: "Yes, willingly; if Jesus will permit, and your salvation can be secured thereby."

He cast his eyes for a moment up to the rood above, as if it were to ask to be allowed to forego the privileges of his glorified state for the sake of charity, and it seemed to Andrew, as if his look was responded to by a new and brighter flood of glory descending on his head.

But he was still incredulous. "Excuse me, sir," he began, "if I make bold to say, that either the world's mightily changed since your days, or else you don't know what poverty is, nor how poor and miserable I am."

"The world is and always has been much the same," was the reply, "as far as trials and crosses go. And as for poverty, look at my dress. Suppose it to be divested of the beauty which the goodness of Jesus has shed upon it, and then tell me, would not the poorest of your cottagers think it too coarse and thread-bare to be worn? It was my dress on earth, and is a good sample of everything that was about me."

"And would you then," again asked Andrew, "leave heaven and all this glory that is shining about you, to be again as poor as you were before?"

"Yes," was the triumphant reply, "if Jesus wills it, and there are souls to save," and again a ray of intense glory came down from above to play around his brow.

"Well," said Andrew, rather talking to himself than to the sainted man before him, "this beats all I have ever dreamed of. Why, here have I been wishing these forty or fifty years, to get rid of poverty, as the greatest of all evils; while a saint in heaven rejoices at having been poor, and likes it so well, that he has no objection to be poor again. I can't understand it. It may be that a man who has been poor once, and has got rich, may like to think and talk about it, though that ain't the way with all; but for him to want to be poor again! That gets over me. And were you always poor?" he asked abruptly.

For a moment the saint bowed his head even lower than before, as if unwilling to reply. But the angels seemed to whisper, "Do not hesitate! There is no fear of pride in heaven! In telling of thy virtues, thou dost but glorify Him who gave thee strength to do them."

Obedient to the suggestion, though still with some embarrassment, and in a lower tone, he answered, "It is not indeed expedient, but for your sake, I will confess, that I was not always poor. Indeed, I was nobly born and softly bred. I abounded in power and dignity. I had much gold and wide lands, and many men to wait upon me. But I heard the words of the wisest of teachers, 'if thou wilt be perfect, leave all and follow me.' I saw Him, though Lord of all things, choosing for Himself the lowest and poorest state; and, helped by His graces, I tried to do the like: and I found more happiness in poverty and humiliation, than I had ever done in riches and in honor. What I did then, if such be His will, I am ready to do again."

Andrew gazed at him in still greater astonishment. He was almost at his wit's end for something else to say, yet he could not altogether get over his incredulity. Of a sudden a new thought seemed to strike him, for he exclaimed, "But, Sir, excuse me if I make too free, but I think you mistake the thing. You may, perhaps as you say, have been happier in poverty than you were before in riches, though I don't quite understand even that. But, you can't fancy that you would be happier if you were as poor as I am, than you now are in heaven."

"It was not," he replied, "because I thought that I should be happier, that I chose poverty, though afterwards I found such to be the reward of my choice. No! I only wished the more perfectly to follow Jesus, and so, at some future time when He should appoint, to possess real happiness. And now, if I were permitted to return to earth, I should not look to be happier than I am at present; but it is the love of Him whom now I know even as I am known, makes me willing again to take upon myself that humble state which He so loved, that I may be thus more and more like Him in His abjection. For now I know—the experience of centuries has taught it to me—that the more we resemble Him on earth, the nearer do we approach to Him in Heaven; and every privation we endure for the love of Him, and every year, or day, or hour we pass in pain or poverty for the love of Him, is requited by our overwhelming increase of glory. I know what He has given me for the few years He permitted me to spend in my poor cell. Eternal thanks to Him for having let me count so many. If then He offer to me now more of these precious years, shall I not, both for the love of what He has loved, and that I may add fresh brightness to my everlasting crown, O! shall I not gladly embrace the opportunity?"

Andrew could not but feel affected by the fervor of these last words, still he was unwilling to give up his argument; and something which his saintly instructor had said, seemed to give him courage to proceed.

"I begin to understand something of your history now. I recollect having read about great and rich men, who have renounced their dignities and gone into a monastery. And as you mention your cell, I suppose you were one of these. I don't say that it wasn't a great sacrifice; but I have always been told, what a happy life, after all, is the monk's. And so I think it must be. To be shut out from the cares and temptations of the world; to have nothing to do all day long, but to serve God and say one's prayers; for any one who has a liking that way, I am sure there couldn't be anything more pleasant. At any rate it's very different from the workhouse, where I am to go to-morrow; I know, that, to escape it, I would go into the poorest monastery that ever was."

"You mistake, greatly brother," did the good monk reply, "if you fancy that the walls of a monastery can shut out care and temptation. There are enough of those to be met with everywhere. Still more do you mistake, if you suppose, that to the nobleman of my days, who was in reality the king of his neighborhood, it was any thing but a most serious sacrifice, to give up his liberty for the confinement and strict obedience of the cloister, his riches for its poverty, his pleasures for its austerities. Not that I wish you to believe, that in my own case the sacrifice cost much. Besides, the world often broke in upon our peacefulness, and bad men, who had the power often sought to despoil us of the little that was left to us, and to drive us from our cells, humble and wretched as they were. We too, on the other hand, had often to mingle with the world, to preach against its follies, and strive against its wickedness."

"O! you were a priest too, and a preacher were you?" said Andrew, interrupting him, "that would make the matter still easier. For priests are always honored; and have many a consolation in their ministry. How do not their people love and reverence them! How grateful to them are those whom they have converted. I know how I love Father Peter, and he has often said to me that my gratitude helped to repay him for the anxieties of his office. Perhaps he only said it to please me, but anyhow he must be happy to be so loved. Ah! believe me, Sir, such a life as this is very different from that of a poor man like me; again I say, it's very different to live as you did, in a monastery, and to have to go to a Union Workhouse. There were no Union Workhouses in your time, so you can't know what they are; if you did—if you had tried one, you wouldn't be so ready to give up your fine castle, much less heaven, to go into one. No, no, you little know what a Union Workhouse is."

"Be it what it may," answered the saint, "for the love of Jesus, and of the souls He died to save, I would encounter it."

"What," asked Andrew, "and be locked up, and not allowed to see any one of your friends, but once a week?"

"Yes! for I would remember that Jesus, with all His faculties about Him, was locked up for nine months in His mother's womb."

"Ah! but there's the bad food into the bargain, and little enough of it!"

"Not so nauseous still, I would think, as the gall and vinegar which He was forced to drink."

"Well, then, the surly master and his brutal assistants!" urged Andrew.

"Not more surly or brutal surely than the Pharisees and their assistants, the executioners who nailed Him to the cross," was the reply.

"But there's such wicked company in the Workhouse," Andrew again said, "and they are so quarrelsome, and so fond of cursing and blaspheming."

"Not more so, I think," quietly rejoined the saint, "than were the servants of the High Priest, and the Roman soldiers, who struck Jesus on the face and head and quarrelled with Him for His very meekness, and called Him a blasphemer."

"But to seem to be deserted by every one," said Andrew, as a last resource, "aye, even by God. No friends to console or help one, no good priest to comfort one, no Mass, even on Sundays, no time for prayer, unless you would be scoffed at for ever by a lot of ignorant bigots, little chance of having the sacraments even at the hour of death. Ah! in your monastery, you had kind brothers ever ready to assist you; and the Blessed Sacrament always near you, and lots of spiritual blessings to console you; how would you bear with such a change?"

"I would try to recollect," replied the saint with more of solemnity and feeling than before, "Him who was deserted by all, even His most cherished friends; who was denied by the most favored of His apostles—nay, who complained, whilst He was hanging in the very agonies of death, that He was left to die without the consolations of His Father and His God."

"Well, I see I must give it up," said Andrew, still, however, hesitating. "I've got nothing else to say; I'm fairly beaten."

"Why not say convinced?" asked his saintly instructor, "convinced that these things, which you have hitherto looked upon as such evils, are, in reality blessings; which, if you know how to profit of them, shall one day shine like diamonds in your crown, as you see the very threads of my coarse habit shining now. Jesus has told you, that not one hair of your head shall fall to the ground, unmarked by your Heavenly Father; much less shall one care, or one pang, or one privation, however trifling or unimportant, if borne in patience for the love of Jesus, fail of its reward."

The saint paused for a moment, but Andrew was silent, he clearly had got no more to say, so his lovely monitor went on.

"Remember, too, that the greater the affliction that threatens you, the greater opportunity is there of heaping up treasure on treasure in heaven, so that by one month spent patiently in a workhouse, such as you have described, you may gain as much as by years spent in a monastery; especially, if, as you seem to suppose, there would be nothing there to disturb your peace. Yea, even the loss of spiritual consolations is not without its own peculiar recompense. For such loss, borne with patience and in obedience to the will of God, will have more merit in heaven, than any masses ever assisted at in the spirit of self-gratification. For obedience is, and ever has been, 'better than sacrifice.'"

It was at length plain that Andrew began to falter. He hung down his head and became more thoughtful, whilst the saint resumed:

"You just now spoke of the happiness of preaching to and converting sinners. There are great consolations in it. I have experienced them, and let me tell you, the hope of experiencing them again, has had some share in making me so willing, if heaven permits, to resume the office by exchanging with you."

Andrew could no longer keep silence. "Small chance of your doing that in the workhouse," he said; "you'd find few listeners there, even if the master didn't stop your mouth. They won't let any one but the church parson preach there."

"There is one mode of preaching," replied the saint, "which none can hinder and few resist, that of good example. Forbearance under injurious treatment, meekness towards all, and patient resignation in pain and suffering, would make converts even in a workhouse, and disarm the cruelty of the most hard-hearted master. And no one could hinder that."

"True, true! I see you're right," said Andrew. Then as if communing with himself, he went on, "It's very strange, I've always been grumbling and making myself miserable about my lot—aye, I was half inclined to quarrel with Father Peter yesterday, when he said, I might be worse off, and that if I have troubles, I have also advantages more than many others, and I laughed—that I did—when he told me many a one would be glad to change with me. Little then did I dream of what I've heard this night. Now I find there are millions who would be glad to make the exchange; the lost in hell, that they might have time for penance; the souls in purgatory, that they might get to heaven all the sooner and easier; and even the blessed in heaven—this is the strangest of all—that they might show their love of God more, and earn more merit and a higher reward. And then, only to think it, the very things I've been grumbling at are those that make them more anxious to get into my place. Well, well, I'd never ha' believed it, if I'd heard it in a sermon." He stopped, and the saint, who had listened with a complacent smile to the old man's reverie, resumed.

"What say you now, brother? Will you exchange with me? Will you give me the opportunities now in your power, of adding to this happiness which I enjoy, or will you keep them for yourself? Thereby, when God shall summon you from your place of trial to join us, to be placed on a brighter throne, and made more glorious than any that you see even here."

He raised his eyes as he spoke, and fixed them full on the countenance of Andrew. The glory that was poured forth from them, and his own tears which now began to run fast down the furrows of his cheeks, for a moment blinded the old man, and choked his utterance, but at length he spoke.

"If your eyes were as persuading when you used to preach hereabouts as they are now, I trow there were no discountened people to be found in our village. At least you've persuaded me so, I'll try to remember what you've told me when I'm in the workhouse, and that's likely to be to-morrow; and if I feel impatient, I'll just fancy I see you looking at me as you do now; and if that won't make me patient, I don't know what will."

"Rather think," said the holy monk, "that He who hangs there above us is looking at you; His eyes are brighter far, and carry in them more persuasion than mine, or those of all the saints, and cherubims, and seraphims united."

"I'll try then to think of both," said Andrew.

"Then you've made up your mind not to change."

"Yes," replied, Andrew, "I think I have."

"Then can I do anything further for you?" asked the saint.

"O, yes!" cried Andrew, sinking down on his knees before him, "give me your blessing now, and promise to pray often for me, that I may make as good a use of poverty and afflictions as you have done." The saint stood for a moment with eyes uplifted to the rood above as if in prayer, then stretching forth his hands over the old man he said:

"You have chosen well and wisely. May He, who to show his love of poverty, was born in a stable and died naked on a cross, bless you; may He confirm your choice, and make you every day more and more like unto Himself. May He strengthen you and support you, and console you, and teach you the secrets of that heavenly wisdom, which He so often conceals from the great and proud, but reveals to the little and lowly. Such, brother, is the blessing I wish you now; and thus will I pray for you every day and hour, until—and I trust I shall not have many prayers to offer up before the time shall come—until we meet here again."

He ceased, and folding his arms upon his breast, glided quietly to his place amid the golden stalls. The Mass at once proceeded, the ministers took their places at the altar, and the choir of saints and angels once more burst forth.

The strain had in it a more beseechful energy, if possible, than any which had preceded it, and Andrew could plainly recognize the words of the Offertory. "Lord Jesus Christ, King of Glory, deliver the souls of all the faithful departed from the flames of hell and from the deep pit. Deliver them from the lion's mouth, lest hell swallow them, lest they fall into darkness; and let the standard-bearer St. Michael bring them into Thy holy light, which Thou promisedst of old to Abraham and his posterity. We offer Thee, O Lord, a sacrifice of praise and prayer; accept them in behalf of the souls we commemorate this day, and let them pass from death to life, which Thou promisedst of old to Abraham and his posterity."

Andrew listened overwhelmed with emotion, but ere it was concluded, the voice of one of the angels seemed to speak in his interior. "Thou must retire, for thy errand here is ended. Until thou hast passed the gates of death, thou canst not be permitted further to behold the mysteries of this night."

Obedient to the intimation, the old man rose from his knees, sorrowful indeed at the disappointment, but resigned. As he raised his eyes to catch a last glimpse of the glories of the chancel, he found that the mist was again closing around him, and the altar, with the splendor that surrounded it, was already growing faint and indistinct, like some beautiful and glowing object seen in the distance.

He turned round to leave the place, when the music ceased, and at the same moment it appeared to him that a number of persons thrust their arms past him, as if eager to grasp some object outside the mist, and almost as instantaneously a form flitted by him into the chancel, which he fancied could be no other than Lady Esther. No sooner, therefore, could he again see the nave, than he looked for her in the place where she had knelt, and true enough, she was no longer there. Another had taken her place, however, and Andrew felt a gush of joy through his veins when he saw that it was the knight of the black marble tomb.

"I thought," he said to himself, "that the choir was singing those last words with more earnestness than ever, and now I see God could no longer refuse their prayer."

But he did not stop to look if there were any other changes in the nave, for he felt that the admonition of the angel applied to this part of the church, equally with the chancel. He had no business here, now that he had refused to change places with any of those who had come in before him. So he hastened as fast as he could towards the door, merely turning his head for a moment to take one more look at the great crucifix above the screen. It seemed to him more glorious and touching than ever. The wounds were flashing with a soft and soothing radiance, the countenance wore a benignant and encouraging smile, and the eyes were fixed upon him with an expression the same as that of the saintly monk, but ten-fold more moving and inspiring. Andrew's impulse was to cast himself on his knees and protest that that smile and that glance should cheer him through all the trials that awaited him, but he again recollected where he was, and turned to the western door.

There he found the friendly verger with his hand on the massive lock ready to let him out. He looked as resigned, and old Andrew thought happier than before, for he smiled as he said to him, "There's no need asking you what you determined to do. Did'n't I tell you that you'd see here what would do you good? Try to make good use of it then."

As he spoke these words, Andrew had just stepped over the threshold, and he closed the door.

It was pitch dark, and the sudden transition from the intense light of the church, had a bewildering effect upon the old man; for he seemed to himself to stumble and to strike his head against some hard substance, and then he completely lost his recollection.

He was roused by a shake from no very gentle hand; and a rough voice at the same time called out, "What do you mean by lying here all night, you drunken vagabond?" He started up in terror. It was broad daylight, and by his side the sexton of the village was standing with his spade and mattock on his shoulder.

"What Andrew, you!" he exclaimed, as the old man turned his face towards him; "I had a better opinion of you than this, but I've found you out at last it seems. I saw you come tottering up the hill last night, and pitied you. I little thought you'd been to your old Popish priest for the sake of his ale. You must have been precious drunk. And only to think how you were thumping your head just now against the grave-stone there. Why you look daft man! Ain't you sober yet?"

Andrew felt nettled, and was going to reply sharply, when the recollection of the lessons he had heard came back to his mind, and he checked himself, and simply thanked the sexton for having waked him. His meekness was not without its reward, for the surly fellow was immediately softened and walked away, hoping that he had'n't taken cold by sleeping on the grass.

Andrew now sat up and began to collect his scattered thoughts; but it took him some time, for his head was aching violently, evidently from a bruise. He was sitting on the very grave where he had rested himself after his walk the preceding evening. The church-yard and everything about him looked precisely the same as they had ever done; the grave beneath was undisturbed, except that the grass and moss were flattened, as if he had lain there all the night.

Yet he could'n't bring himself to believe that all he had seen was only a dream. He examined more closely to see if there was any crack or crevice below the grass, but no, all was firm as if it had not been moved for years. He read the lines on the tomb-stone, but it bore rather a recent date, and there was no mention of an Alderman upon it. So for awhile he was sadly puzzled, till at length, he concluded that the lesson he had learnt was a good one, come how it might, and he resolved more-over to put it in immediate practice.

"So, here's to the Workhouse, since it is the will of God," he said, as with some difficulty he got up and hobbled away. Yet he did not forget the parting admonition of the old verger, for before he had reached the wicket gate leading down to the village, he had offered up to heaven more than one fervent prayer for the souls in purgatory.

THE END.

THE TWO VICTORIES.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTORY AND APOLOGETIC—FATHER EUSTACE.

IT was a bitter night in the dreary month of November! "What an unromantic beginning!" we hear some young ardent reader exclaim; and we are bound to admit that it really does sound very prosaic and common-place. Sitting down to peruse some "romantic story of thrilling interest," our breath (of course we mean our intellectual breath), is usually taken away by the overpowering grandeur of the opening description. Gradually, however, we rally; and, collecting our scattered faculties, become able to devote them to the due appreciation of the treat spread out before us. Of course we expect to be entertained with labored descriptions, and astonished with romantic adventures. We should scarcely spend our money on "The Knight of the Iron Hand, or, a Romance of Blood," if we expected to find in it either truth or probability. Again, when we invest half-a-crown in Mrs. Mollop's celebrated book, "Father Crossbones, or the Confessor," are we at all astonished when we find that delicate and truthful writer displaying a much more intimate knowledge than we ourselves possess of the manner in which our families are governed by certain secret influences, etc.? or, are we in the least startled when we find her narrating a certain number of astounding incidents which take place every day in our households, but of which we, although living in the very midst of them, are in a state of the most profound ignorance? No, surely, we are neither startled nor astonished. It is all just as it ought to be. We do not look for truth. We do not even look for probability. We merely look for romance. We pay our money for the article, and it is supplied to us, and, consequently, we are not at all surprised when we find our book commencing with a thunder-storm rolling along the Alpine hills, threatening destruction to the dwellers in some secluded valley; and when, at the proper moment, our hero makes his appearance, we are quite prepared to welcome him as the very gentleman whom we expected to meet in such a situation. Or, we are equally ready to be transported in imagination to the abodes of wealth and luxury, and to be treated to an elaborate description of the gorgeous upholstery, the priceless paintings, and the eastern plants. We feel quite certain that, however much the circumstances may vary, we shall in due time be introduced to our hero, or our heroine, or to both, as the case may be. After their excellent qualities and perfections shall have been sufficiently expatiated upon, we know that we shall have the felicity of making the acquaintance of the smiling villain, or the stern old uncle, as the story may require, and that, after the usual amount of unmerited sufferings, thrilling incidents, and dramatic situations, the whole affair will conclude in the legitimate and recognized manner. The three volumes are made up and sent forth to seek their fortune. The publisher is satisfied if the book sells. The author is satisfied if the publisher has paid him. The public is satisfied if it obtains a sufficient amount of romance in return for its money, and is treated to the history of a certain number of events which could never by any possibility have happened; and thus, everybody being satisfied, there is an end of the matter, and the author sets to work again at "conception, concoction, and completion," as Sir Abel Handy would style it, of another work, at once as clever, as popular, and as probable as the last one.

And so, dear reader, if in this little book of ours we were about to give you some romantic story of thrilling interest, we admit that you would have reason to complain at our opening sentence. But, alas for romance! ours is but the repetition of an old story, "an ower true tale." We have no romance, but the romance if you wish so to style it, of real life. We have no incidents to narrate but such as really happened, and, therefore, how unromantic soever you may think it, we must beg your leave to commence with no more ambitious preface than by repeating the very ordinary observation which stands at the beginning of this chapter, viz., that it was a bitter night in the dreary month of November. The streets of London (for it was in the modern Babylon that the events we are about to record occurred) were deep with mud, and as it was splashed by the passing vehicles over the stragglers who happened to be abroad, it impressed them with a very unpleasant conviction of its filthiness and its consistency; for not even the rain, which was driven upon them by a violent east wind, sufficed to remove it, or to wash away its stains. The city was enveloped in one vast cloud of damp and mist, through which the lamps shone with a strange, sepulchral glare; and his business must, indeed, have been urgent who was abroad on such a night. And yet there were many wanderers; many who were abroad on this bitter night because they had no home to shelter them, although they were surrounded by wealth and luxury on every side—many who glared with the eye of hunger and the scowl of fiercest hate on the equipage that, as it rolled by in all its luxury and gay appointments, drenched them with the mud which its wheels whirled aloft—many who knew not where to lay their aching heads, or how to satisfy the cravings of their gnawing hunger. But we digress, and must now beg our readers to accompany us to the snug little parlor of a rather mean-looking house, in a street leading from one of the great thoroughfares of the city. The fire was burning brightly in the grate, and the closed curtains and lighted lamp showed that it was arranged for the night. Its only occupant was an elderly man of grave, yet gentle and attractive appearance. His long white hair was combed back from a lofty forehead, full at once of intellect and benevolence; and as he listened to the howling of the storm without, the expression of his countenance revealed that his thoughts were with the homeless and the wanderer. His dress, and the various articles that were scattered about this room, at once proclaimed him a Catholic priest. It was, indeed, Father Eustace, the venerable priest who had charge of the numerous congregation attached to the chapel which he served. He had grown grey in the service of the poorest of the poor. Day and night he had worked amongst them, elevating them by the example of his own virtues, encouraging the weak, and reproving the wicked and the thoughtless: ever at his post, regardless alike of the scorching fever or the deadly cramps of cholera provided one of his flock was to be succored or prepared for death—prepared as the Catholic priest alone knows how to prepare the trembling soul for its awful change: elevating their poverty as far as his own scanty means allowed, and sharing his little all with those who stood most in need of it. Thus, living amongst them, at once their father, their guide, and their dearest friend, his poor and struggling congregation had, indeed, become to him father and mother, and brother and sister, and all the world besides. Loving them as he did, it is little wonder that, as the storm howled without, he ever and anon rose from the chair where he was resting after the labors of a long and fatiguing day, and opening the curtains, peered out long and anxiously into the gloom outside—less wonder still that the murmured "God help them" rose so frequently to his lips, as he thought of the suffering and the poverty which were the lot of so many of his flock. His simple tea stood untasted on the table by his side. There was an air of sadness and anxiety about him, which seemed at variance with his mild and benevolent face. His book had fallen from his hand and was lying unheeded on the carpet at his feet. After his last visit to the window, he sat so quiet and still, that, but for the sigh which every now and then escaped him, and the tear which a close observer might have discovered coursing down his cheek, we might have supposed that, overcome by the fatigues of the day, he had fallen off into a gentle slumber.

He had sat thus some half-an-hour, when a sudden ringing of the bell recalled him to himself, and told him, but too plainly, that his labors were not yet over.

Now, naturally speaking, it is not a pleasant thing, after a day of hard and laborious work, to be called out again into the cold damp streets just as you have settled yourself down for a comfortable night with some favorite author. Under such circumstances the most general answer, which the unwelcome messenger would receive, would be a decided "Not at home." But not so with Father Eustace. He was the father of the poor. He was their servant, and ever at their beck, and, therefore, the book was at once laid aside, and before his aged servant knocked at the door of his room, he was already preparing for the "call" which he knew full well awaited him.

"Well, Margaret, another call to-night. What is the matter now?"

"Oh sir, poor Mr. Stanhope is sinking fast, and he would like to see you again before he dies, if you would kindly visit him."

"Poor, poor fellow," involuntarily murmured the priest, as a tear slowly trickled down his cheek. "Beati qui in Domino moriuntur," "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord," he continued, in a low voice, as if unconscious of the presence of his servant. Then turning to her, he said, "Say that I will be with him in a few moments. And, Margaret," he added "don't forget to say your beads for him, for his death-bed though blessed in the sight of God, is but lonely and desolate as far as this world is concerned."

"Oh! many, many is the Rosary I have said for him, poor suffering child," answered the old woman, weeping, as she spoke, "and although he little needs the prayers of such as I, still I shan't forget him now, when he is passing away from this world of trouble, to receive his reward for all that he has suffered here."

By this time the priest had completed his hasty preparations, and passing for a moment into the chapel which adjoined his house, he took from their repository the holy oils with which the priests of the Church are ordered to anoint the sick in the name of the Lord (St. James, v. 14, 15), and then opening the door of the tabernacle, where the love of the "Adorable" keeps him, night and day, waiting with anxious longing to minister to those for whom He has done and suffered so much, he took from it the Most High, in order to administer the Viaticum to the dying man, and carefully placing It in his bosom, in a moment more he was in the cold wet street, struggling with the blustering wind as he hurried on his way.

Out in the cold dark night, hurrying through the searching wet and mud, bending his head towards the earth to shield his face from the driving rain, with It in his bosom—and yet there is no light to accompany It—there is no bell to tell of Its approach—there is no hymn—no prayer, but what is uttered by the priest as he hurries on. The passengers, as they brush past him in the street, know not that they stand in the very presence of their God, but hasten by, all unconscious of the mystery of love and sacrifice. Oh! for the days gone by—the good old times—when the priest of God would not have had to pass along with It within his bosom and none to pay It homage; but when blazing lights, and sounding bells would have told the dying man that the pledge of his redemption was already coming to him—that the Adorable was near at hand to waft his trembling soul to the home of its eternity—when from every house along the way would worshippers have come forth to swell the grateful train that was but too blest in being permitted to accompany Him on His journey of love. Oh! for the good old times, when, when will ye return—when shall for coldness and neglect, and the victim of love be no longer left to bewail the base ingratitude of those whom He came to save?

But whilst Father Eustace is hurrying on as fast as the violence of the storm will permit him, we will take the opportunity of introducing our readers to some of the other personages who will figure in this story of real life.

CHAPTER II.

INTRODUCES MR. STANHOPE, A LONDON MERCHANT.—LOVE AND PRIDE.

MR. STANHOPE was a London merchant of great wealth and influence. When comparatively a young man he had been left a widower, with two children, a boy, named Edwin, and a girl, named Maria. He was a stern, hard man; possessing to all appearance, but few of the gentler and better feelings of our nature. In all matters, whether appertaining to his business or to the management of his large and magnificent mansion, he was a perfect model of exactness and precision. His calm, cold, self-possession was never for a moment disturbed, and wherever he went he spread around him an atmosphere of chilling coldness, which was at once so painful and so apparent that few sought to mingle with him in those more familiar relations which are so dear to most of us. His will was inflexible, and woe to the clerk in his house of business, or to the domestic in his mansion, who dared to question it. For years he had reigned (so to speak) with absolute sway in his own sphere, and the self-will which naturally formed so prominent a part in his nature, had become so strongly developed by the unreserved submission of all about him, that he himself was scarcely aware of the fearful strength which this unrestrained passion had acquired in him. Cold, haughty, passionless, as he seemed to be, there was, however, one tender feeling within his breast, and that was an ardent love for his children. The only times his haughty brow relaxed were when his children climbed his knee, or hung around his neck in all the trusting confidence of childhood. At such times he would smile, and kissing them, try to speak to them with love and tenderness; but it was a failure, and he felt it so. The words fell strangely from his lips; the cold, stern man was too much frozen to melt so easily, and putting them gently away, he would often sigh heavily and bitterly as the conviction forced itself upon him, that he could not be tender; and whilst they, timidly withdrawing from him into a distant part of the room, would amuse themselves, but always quietly, and with an unnatural fear of disturbing him, his brow would grow darker and darker, his lips would become more and more tightly compressed, as he gazed upon them, the bitter conviction all the while burying itself deeper and deeper in his heart, that his own children were afraid of him; and yet, how he loved them! They were the only objects in the world for which he cared. Men said he cared for gold, because they saw him so exact in his attention to the business transacted by the house of which he was the head; but they did not know him. He was concerned for the prosperity of his house, and watched over it with the utmost care and exactness; but it was not so much on account of the immense wealth it laid at his feet, as because it was his, because his name was mixed up with it, because it was a part of his importance and standing amongst men. The mere gold he despised, and he would sign the papers transferring thousands of pounds with a kind of refined disdain which it would be difficult to analyze. He used it, he disposed of it, he scattered it about; but he never seemed to forget that it was as the fruit of his intellect, the offspring of his calculations, and of the unbending power of his will; in a word, he loved and esteemed it, inasmuch as he could see that he owed its possession to himself—for itself, he despised it.

Such was Mr. Stanhope, a cold, stern man, with but one tender feeling at all strong within him, and even that one almost crushed by the freezing influence of his pride and nature towards his children; and yet pride conquered even that, and he felt ashamed to show it. Often, often, during the day, amidst the distractions of business, his thoughts wandered away to his home and his children; and he would long for the moment when he could turn his steps homewards. Yet, when the time came, and he was at liberty, as he approached his home his pace would often become slower and slower, and the dark, haughty face would grow darker still, and the contracting brow would show that a bitter thought was feeding on his heart. And, in truth, it was so; for, he felt and knew his presence would throw a dark shadow over his home, and that his children would be less free and less happy because he was there. He felt—and, oh! how bitterly—that they feared almost as much as they loved him; and, writhing under the bitter pangs which such thoughts awakened, the gloomy face would pass into its home, and the dark shadow would fall for the rest of the day upon the domestic hearth; and the hours that had been so anxiously looked forward to would come laden with bitter disappointment, because they taught him more and more plainly still, that he knew not how to make others love him—that there was no heart in the world that beat entirely in unison with his own.

Many, perchance, will think this picture overdrawn; but, in very truth, there are too many such men as the one whom we have endeavored to sketch,—men who have allowed pride and self-will to extinguish all the better feelings of their nature; and who, made to love and be loved, are tyrants, even where all should be love and gentleness, at the domestic hearth.

Reader, have you never met a Mr. Stanhope? If you have not, either the circle of your acquaintance has been very limited, or you have been especially fortunate. If you have, and still more, if you have met him in the family circle, and in social intercourse, you will recognize the character, and will be able to join your testimony to ours, that such an acquaintance is not at all conducive either to the comfort or the happiness of those amongst whom his lot may be cast.

CHAPTER III.

BROTHER AND SISTER.

We have already mentioned that Mr. Stanhope had two children. Two years before the stormy night on which the incident related in the beginning of this story occurred, the boy was a fine manly fellow of seventeen, his sister being two years younger. Mr. Stanhope had never been able to bring himself to part with his children, and, consequently, they had been educated under his own roof by the most eminent professors whom wealth could procure. This peculiar training had, of course, been attended with the effects naturally to be expected from such a method of education. They were retiring and bashful, almost to a fault, and like all others brought within its influence, almost living on the will of their father. Fearing their father almost more than they loved him, and having no mother on whom to lavish their affection, it is not surprising that they loved one another most deeply and tenderly. They were children on whom a parent's eye might well rest with pride. Edwin, at the age of seventeen, was a fine manly fellow, as we have remarked; but there was something in the fire of the dark black eye, and in the shape of the thin delicately-moulded lips, which reminded one of Mr. Stanhope; and it was but too evident that there was much of the father's nature reflected in that of the son. Intellect was stamped on the swelling forehead, but pride was there too; and those who knew them best hoped that father and son might never be brought into collision, or cause of disagreement spring up between them. Such natures may break, they seldom bend. There was all the freshness of early youth about Edwin at the age when, now-a-days, the boy is swallowed up in the embryo man; and on the slightest cause the blood would rush into his face, and his open countenance would be covered with burning blushes. The secluded life he had led since infancy had produced, or rather strongly developed, the romantic in his nature, and at seventeen he was both a poet and an enthusiast. He was enthusiastic, but as yet his enthusiasm had not found an object on which to fix itself—it was vague and general. He was full of adoration for the grand, the noble, and the sublime, but it was in the abstract,—in the concrete, it had not yet come home to him. Friends of his own age or position he had none. He had met comparatively few boys of his own age, and they had all been so far below the standard which his enthusiastic nature had pictured, that he had made no friend amongst them. He loved his father, but it was with a strange kind of love too. It was, if we may so speak, a love of the intellect more than of the heart, for there was too much of fear, respect, and awe in it for it to be a heart-love. Such was Edwin, and no wonder that his father almost idolized him in his own cold, reserved way. He watched over his health with the most jealous care. If he did but look a little paler, or if his eye were a little duller than usual, Mr. Stanhope was all anxiety and nervousness. Nothing was too costly or too rich for him, and of books, which were the only luxuries for which the boy seemed to care much, he had as many as would have furnished a library large enough for at least ten youths of his own age. His father would sit for hours watching him as he sat buried in some favorite author, his brow seeming to expand with thought, and intelligence, and the fire which he caught from the page he was perusing beaming out from his dark full eye. At such moments the face of the father would flush, too, with the excess of his pride and admiration, and the loving words which his pride seldom allowed him to utter would hang upon his lips, waiting to be expressed. But the shadow would pass over the haughty face, and the rising sigh would stifle the gentle feeling, and the cold stern man would be himself again. Yet, how he loved the boy; and could he have analyzed his own feelings, he would have found, perchance, that he loved him none the less for perceiving that so much of his own proud nature was reflected in him. He felt that the boy was mixed up with the deepest feelings and aspirations of his heart, but as yet even he scarcely knew how much his own life was wound up in that of his son. Oh! could he have seen what was coming, he would almost have slain him with his own hand, that the idol which his pride had built up in his heart might have remained there for ever unchanged. It would have been easier to kill him in his youth and beauty, than it was afterwards to tear his image from the heart where it had so long reigned almost supreme, and trample it in the dust with scorn and withering rage.

Maria was a gentle trusting girl, with a love for her brother that was almost childish in its tenderness. She had little of her father in her, as she more resembled her dead mother, and she clung consequently to her brother's stronger nature all the more closely on this account; and while she loved him much more tenderly than Mr. Stanhope ever could hope to do, it was with a pride scarcely inferior to his.

CHAPTER IV.

NATURE.—RESPECTABLE RELIGION.—FIRST ASPIRINGS.

WHEN Edwin Stanhope had reached his thirteenth year an incident happened which changed the whole course of his life. Up to this time one could scarcely say of him that he had been a religious boy. He was too intellectual and too full of lofty and romantic thought ever to be gross or animal, but he had led an essentially "natural" life. He had never pierced the cloud which nature, unenlightened by grace, interposes between man and the mysteries of the unseen world. He had never learnt how to commune with his Creator, and to walk through the world united to his God by that wonderful and constant union, which constitutes at once the happiness and the perfection of those who have begun to walk in the ways of Divine love. He had never learnt how to refer his actions to the Almighty God, and, consequently, he had naturally enough referred them to his own intellect; thus fostering in his heart, but almost unconsciously, a pride of the most refined nature.

He had never learnt how to analyze with the eye of faith the promptings of his heart, and the inclinations of his nature; and, therefore, he had indulged them as far as the pride of his intellect had allowed. He was a stranger to vice and yet he was full of evil, and he "felt" it. He felt there was a something wrong about him, and he knew not how to remedy it: he felt his heart to be void of holiness, and he knew not how to fill it.

Mr. Stanhope was a strict member of the Church of England. Not that he was a religious man. He and religion, in its true sense, were perfect strangers: but, he, nevertheless, attended his parish church most regularly. Morning and evening, on the Sunday, his haughty proud figure was to be seen advancing with slow steps towards the pew where he sat. The haughty, cold face—the slow, measured tread—the powdered footman following respectfully behind with gorgeously-bound prayer-book, until Mr. Stanhope was within a few steps of his seat, and then hastily advancing to open, with an obsequious bow, the door of his pew—all tended to remind one, most unpleasantly, of the Pharisee in the Gospel. In fact, you could see that even here Mr. Stanhope was worshipping self as much, or, to speak more correctly, a great deal more than God. It was respectable to be religious, and, therefore, he was religious; but here his religion ended. His father before him, and his grandfather, too, and their fathers and grandfathers, had all been good Protestants ever since the time of the "blessed reformation," which had so nearly swept Popery (as they imagined) from the face of the land: and, therefore, he was a Protestant too. His ancestors, had, every Sunday, for at least a hundred years, attended the same parish church, and, therefore, he attended it too. They had at stated periods approached what they styled the Table of the Lord, therefore, the cold haughty man who now represented the race, approached, too, at certain periods of the year; and this was probably the only reason he could have given for the faith that was in him. In a word, as an eminent American writer has so happily expressed it, "on Sunday he took off his hat, and made a distant bow to Almighty God," and in this his religion consisted.

Edwin always accompanied his father to church. To him Sunday was a day of gloom and bitterness. He was not permitted to read his favorite books, for the Sunday was too well observed in Mr. Stanhope's household to admit of such a desecration. Then it was so tedious to sit for three long hours or more in the gloomy old church, listening to a service which did not fall upon his heart, which never spoke to him as a reality. As far as the old church itself was concerned, he rather liked it than not. It was so old, so gloomy, and so romantic. There was a mystery about its old walls, and in its little nooks and corners, which, pleased him and, at the same time, awoke his curiosity; and, whilst the officiating clergyman was holding forth—to his own satisfaction no doubt, whatever his hearers might think—young Edwin's thoughts were often far away, and his vivid imagination would people the long dreary aisles with forms and figures of other days. Then the thought of his own dead mother would come into his mind, and he would wonder whether she were an angel in heaven, thinking of him, and watching over him, and whether she knew how great a void there was in his young heart, how much he had loved her, and how dearly he cherished her memory still. His large black eyes would grow lustrous with feeling as he thus communed with the world his imagination had created around him, and something so unearthly seemed to light his features at such times, that his father would gaze upon him with feelings little short of awe. After leaving the church he would sometimes, too, ask questions which would puzzle his father to answer. On one particular Sunday the preacher had taken as the subject of his discourse the beautiful history of our Divine Lord seeking the lost sheep. The child had listened with reverence and awe to the loving history, but there was something inexpressibly sad and melancholy in his face as he sat with his little hands tightly clasped in an attitude of the deepest attention. As soon as the service was over, and they had left the church, little Edwin said, quite timidly, but so sadly that Mr. Stanhope was both alarmed and astonished, "Dear papa, do you think I am a lost sheep? Oh, I am so much afraid. I wish the good Jesus would come and take me on His shoulders and carry me home to Himself, for I am very, very wicked; and, oh! papa, I don't think that I love Him at all. O dear papa, do tell me; do you think I am a lost sheep?" and the tears gushed from his eyes, and his voice trembled with the excess of his feelings.

Mr. Stanhope was so overwhelmed with astonishment that, for a moment, he could not answer. It was so entirely out of the range of his experience. He had gone to church for years, and he had heard this very same sermon, but it had never occurred to him that he could be a lost sheep—he was too rich and respectable for that; and here was this mere child asking such extraordinary questions, his whole frame trembling with the intensity of his feelings, and his large dark eyes dilated with the eagerness with which he was waiting a reply to his question.

Mr. Stanhope fondled the little hand that was resting in his, and drew his boy closer to himself, as if he felt afraid of losing him. This strange language of Edwin's filled him with an indefinable dread. He had often felt, with bitterness of heart, how little real sympathy there was between himself and the child he so fondly loved, and these remarks of the child showed him still more clearly how far they were separated on such points as these. His emotion was scarcely less than that of the child, as he answered:—"My darling boy, what can have put these extraordinary ideas into your mind?" You who have been so carefully educated and so tenderly brought up. You make me quite uneasy, my child, and I hope you will not indulge these strange fancies any more."

"I hope you are not angry, papa; but indeed I could not refrain from asking you this little question. I have often, oh! very often thought of these things, and I have felt what a wicked child I was, and to-day, when I heard the preacher speaking of the sheep that had wandered away from the fold, oh! I knew, dear papa, that he meant me, and I thought, perhaps, you would tell me whether the good Jesus was seeking me, and whether He would ever find me, and take me up and carry me home to heaven. You are not angry, papa? I do not want to leave you, but I should like the good Jesus to find me, and teach me to be a good child, and take me home to Himself, if you would not be angry or sorry, dear papa." And again the large, dark eyes filled with tears, and the little hand trembled as it rested in that which pressed it so fondly.

"I am not angry, my child; but you must not talk in this manner. You must not talk of leaving me, for you know it would kill your papa to lose you, my darling, darling boy." And the cold, dark man softened more than he had ever done before. "I will invite Mr. Grant to dine with us, and you can speak to him about these things."

"Thank you, papa. But I don't care to see Mr. Grant; I cannot open my heart to him. Do you recollect when he dined with us a few Sundays ago? He had preached a very nice sermon in the morning about sin, and what a shocking thing it was to be a sinner, and when you were called out of the room in the evening after dinner, he took me on his knee and began to talk to me about the sermon, and to ask me whether I recollected it; and when I said that I did, and that I knew he was preaching about me, and that I was very sorry to be so wicked, he laughed, and, calling me a foolish little boy, he put me down from his knee, and began drinking his wine; and when I came to him again, and asked him to teach me how to be good, he laughed still more, and, offering me some fruit, told me to go and play with my little sister. But, papa, I went away very sorrowful to my own room, and I cried for a very long time, and I felt, oh! how sad I felt; and I do wish, papa, he had taught me how to be good. I would have been very attentive, and I would have tried very hard to learn; but he only laughed at me, papa, and I could not ask him again. But I do wish some one would teach me how to be good.

On several other occasions Edwin started similar questions, but his father always turned the conversation as soon as possible. In fact, he was afraid of the subject, but yet he could not help loving his boy all the more deeply as he watched these aspirings of the lofty mind to something higher and more noble; and, with a kind of jealous awe, he marked the longings of the youthful heart to be more intimately united with its God. And he, poor child, grew up from childhood to boyhood, from boyhood to early manhood, with no one to teach him what he craved to know, with the noble instincts of his fresh young heart stretching themselves out to something to which he could not give a name, and no one to tell him what that something was,—with no one to tell him that the aspirings of his heart were after its God,—with no one to teach him that the proud passions that were in his nature were to be rendered subservient to those higher aspirations,—with no one to teach him how to be good. But let him take courage. The good Jesus is already seeking him to take him upon His shoulders, and carry him home to Himself.

CHAPTER V.

THE FIRST DOUBT.

WHEN Edwin was about fifteen years of age, it was announced one Sunday that in a few weeks the bishop of the diocese would visit the parish in order to administer confirmation to the younger members of the congregation, and they were told to prepare themselves to receive it. Edwin tried hard to understand what confirmation was, but he could not succeed. He felt that it would be useless to question his father on the point, and confidence between himself and Mr. Grant, the rector of the parish, had been so effectually crushed in his childhood by the incident mentioned in the last chapter, that he could not make up his mind to speak to him. He listened eagerly every Sunday, hoping to hear from the pulpit some explanation of the rite, or whatever it might be; but no explanation came until the Sunday preceding the day on which the bishop was to administer it. Then, indeed, Mr. Grant spoke about it; but Edwin could make nothing out of it. Mr. Grant was very "low church," and, consequently, looked upon confirmation as a mere rite, without sacramental character or efficacy attached to it, and in explaining his views he succeeded so perfectly in lowering that which he undertook to explain, that very few, indeed, of his hearers could have been much impressed with a feeling of awe or respect for that which they were to receive, or have felt much obligation of preparing themselves very exactly or carefully for its reception.

Edwin felt that there was something wrong in all this. He endeavored to make himself believe that confirmation was something more holy and of higher character than Mr. Grant's teaching seemed to suppose. Young as he was, and with the passions of his strong nature so little disciplined and brought under, he felt that he was unworthy to receive the sacred rite, for such he thought it. His active mind began to work, and he used to wonder whether confirmation had been always looked upon in the same light in which Mr. Grant seemed to regard it, and whether our forefathers had always had such a mean opinion of it, and if so, how it was that they had ever begun to practise it. These ideas, without taking any very definite shape, were continually flitting through his brain, filling him with uneasiness and doubt, and his conviction of the holiness of the whole proceeding was rendered complete, when Mr. Grant called one day, and after asking him a single question in the Catechism, gave him a certificate to be given to the bishop, or his attendant, certifying that he was duly prepared and fit to receive confirmation.

Edwin felt that he was not fit to receive it, and, moreover, that no one had taken pains to teach him how to prepare himself. How, then, could Mr. Grant certify that he was worthy to receive the sacred rite? Or, if he were worthy, what could be the dignity of that which he was to receive, if his preparation sufficed to receive it worthily? and, as his acute intellect pondered over all this, the first doubt which prepared the way for all that followed was implanted in his youthful mind.

On the appointed day, however, Edwin knelt before the bishop, and had the tips of the fingers of that reverend personage placed for a moment on his head. In the evening Mr. Grant and a large number of his friends dined with Mr. Stanhope in honor of the event. They were all lavish with their congratulations to Edwin, and he was quite the hero of the day; but he was very sorrowful. His heart felt quite empty, and he would often, during the evening, have wished to retire to his own little room to relieve himself by tears. Why did they congratulate him? What had he done worthy of congratulation? And finding no answer to these questions which continually presented themselves to him, he felt himself more lonely than ever, more dissatisfied with himself and all around him, and the old feeling of his early childhood came back with renewed intensity, and he longed and wished and prayed for some one to teach him how to be good—for the good Jesus to take him on His shoulders to carry him home, for he felt as if this latest act of his religious life, so to call it, had but tended to render the gulf between himself and God wider and more apparent than ever; and, young as he was, natural as he was, unenlightened as he was, he knew that it ought not to be so.

On the Sunday preceding the confirmation, Mr. Grant announced that it was his wish that all the recipients should, on the Sunday following, approach the communion table. If poor Edwin had been perplexed about confirmation, his perplexities and troubles were now increased a thousand-fold. Mr. Stanhope "received" three or four times a year, because most respectable people did the same; but he had no fixed and clear notion of the nature and character of the action he performed; and Mr. Grant's views were of the very lowest kind. Edwin had frequently heard him declaim with violence against what he called the idolatrous and blasphemous doctrine of the "real presence" of our Lord in the sacrament. He had heard Mr. Grant frequently declare that there was nothing but the mere bread and wine present, and that it was impious and wicked to believe anything else, and consequently he was inclined to believe it must be so; but ever and anon the solemn word came flitting through his mind: "This is My Body," (St. Matthew, xxvi. 26); and also, "This is My Blood of the New Testament, which shall be shed for many unto remission of sins," (ver. 28), and he could not see how to reconcile them with the teachings of Mr. Grant. Not that he thought Mr. Grant could be wrong, or be teaching what was false, Edwin knew nothing of religion but what he had learnt from his father and Mr. Grant, and he thought it certain that they were right; but, nevertheless, there was something in their teaching—and especially on this point—with which his intellect refused to be satisfied. Moreover, as the day drew near when he was to approach the Lord's table for the first time, he sat for hours with his Bible before him, pondering over the passages relating to the Eucharist, and becoming more and more perplexed, and more and more uneasy. With an ardent desire to do what was right, he meditated on the words of St. Paul: "Therefore, whoever shall eat this bread or drink the chalice of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. But, let a man prove himself: and so let him eat of that bread and drink of that chalice. For, he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh judgment to himself, not discerning the body of the Lord" (1 Cor. xi. 27, 28, 29); but the more he thought the more bewildered he became; and he asked himself how he could be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord, if that body and blood were not present in the Sacrament? or how he could eat and drink judgment to himself for not discerning the body of the Lord, if the body of the Lord were not present? Then, at times, he would seem convinced that Mr. Grant was right, and that there was nothing present but bread and wine; but the awful denunciation of the apostle would present itself in all its dreadful clearness to him, and his cheek would blanch, and he would tremble with fear and excitement as he murmured the solemn words: "Therefore, let a man prove himself. . . . For, he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh judgment to himself, not discerning the body of the Lord."

In this state of perplexity and doubt—with no one to counsel or instruct him—with no one to whisper in his ear the words of truth—with all the instincts and feelings of his nature prompting him to take the words he so often pondered in their plain and literal sense, and with these instincts crushed and beaten down by the teaching to which he was a constant listener—at one moment trembling as he thought again and again of the inspired words: “Therefore, let a man prove himself. For, he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh judgment to himself, not discerning the body of the Lord,”—at another moment stifling his difficulties by the remembrance of all he had heard from Mr. Grant—with no fixed idea or belief, but with his mind one vast chaos of uncertainty and fear, poor Edwin approached his first and last communion in the church where his forefathers had so long worshipped. We say his last, too; for, he approached no more. He was so utterly wretched after receiving the bread and wine—there was such a feeling of misery and desolation in his heart, such a want of reality and truth about this action, which should have been so sacred and so full of holy joy and consolation—that Edwin could never bring himself to repeat it. Several times Mr. Stanhope reminded him that the following Sunday was a “communion day;” but Edwin received the announcement so coldly,—merely saying, “Papa, I think I shall not approach;” that his father did not press him on the matter, attaching, as he himself did, so little importance to it.

Thus Edwin grew up to his seventeenth year, his romantic nature developing itself more and more every day, and his aspirings after something more holy and grand than anything he knew becoming daily stronger and more marked. Frank, open and ingenuous, it was impossible to know him without loving him and admiring him; but his uneasiness on the matter of religion, and the state he was in, had grown upon him every day since the incidents we have already mentioned, and the workings of his active mind had left a languor and paleness on his fair young cheek, and imparted a weary, anxious look to his large dark eye, which were painful to look upon, telling, as they did, of a young and loving heart not at peace—speaking, too, through the hectic flush which now so often came upon him, of such pain, and care, and grief, as youthful trusting hearts like his should never know or feel.

But, again, let him take courage. Light and comfort are at hand; brightness is near. The good Jesus is looking for His lamb, that with loving hand and mercy breathing voice He may take it on His shoulders, to carry it home forever to Himself.

CHAPTER VI

A CHRISTMAS PARTY.—CHRISTMAS THOUGHTS AND FEELINGS.— A PROPOSAL.

We have already mentioned that about the time Edwin reached his seventeenth birthday an event occurred which altered the whole course of his life. It was Christmas time, and an invitation had been sent to Edwin to spend a few days at the house of Mr. Seymour, an old friend of the Stanhope family. Edwin had almost determined to decline the invitation, as he felt every day less and less fitted for society; but Mr. Stanhope, who had marked with much uneasiness, the increasing languor of his son's appearance, and the depression of spirits under which he so frequently labored, pressed him so earnestly to go, that at length he rather unwillingly acceded.

Mr. Seymour was a fine specimen of the English merchant. Bluff, generous, and hearty, he loved to be happy himself, and to see happy faces smiling around him. He had, at this particular Christmas, gathered round him a large party, principally of young persons, and every preparation was being made to enable them to spend a “merry Christmas” in the fullest sense of the word.

When Edwin arrived on Christmas Eve, he found the house of Mr. Seymour decorated from top to bottom with such a profusion of holly, ivy, and evergreens of all descriptions, that it appeared a perfect wood. There was a mistletoe hanging from the roof of every room, the gorgeous mirrors were framed with wreaths of the graceful ivy, and every statue or figure, with a hand to hold it, held within its grasp something green to tell of the happy time. In the evening as they sat, a merry band, round the ample hearth, with no other light than the sparkling flames which burst from the yule log, with the fresh red berries glimmering and twinkling so brightly and cheerfully in the flickering light, while the song, and the jest, and the tale went round, with young hearts laughing so gaily and so free from care, the weariest grew glad and the sorrow-stricken were beguiled for a moment from their griefs, and the drop that was about to fall into sorrow's cup was arrested for awhile. When one of Mr. Seymour's sons, a fine open-hearted fellow, during the evening sang the following Christmas song, there were few present, either young or old, who were untouched, or who remained unmoved as visions of the past or future flitted before them. There were few who remained insensible to the deep feeling, affections, and sympathies which Christmas time, and Christmas thoughts, and Christmas songs never fail to awaken. There were few of the young whose glowing hearts did not glow warmer still, and out of whose bright eyes the happiness of their hearts did not shine too plainly to be mistaken. There were few of the old who were not carried back to times gone by, when they sat in childish gladness round a well-remembered hearth, one of a happy band now scattered far and wide; and what wonder if their hearts grew full, and their eyes grew dim, as the light of their mother's smile seemed to play about them once again, and the tones of the father's voice re-echoed in their souls; and, at the moment memory had beguiled them, and in thought they were heedless children again, the vision vanished, to be replaced by the old churchyard and the turf-covered mound, with the Christmas chime wailing a sad and plaintive air around the graves, like the song of the surging sea as it breaks for ever on the sounding shore. What wonder that they forgot that the chime wailed but for a moment round the graves of those who might listen no more to its song, ere it went its way on the frosty breeze, to carry its message of love to young and old,—ringing so softly and with such magic sweetness through the sacred place, where at midnight hour the kneeling crowd is wrapt in silent prayer, as blazing lights and sweetest scents and music's thrilling strains are all employed to greet in humble love and praise the God-made Man, as once again He descends upon the altar of His love—speaking to the schoolboy's heart of his mother's love—telling the weary of rest to come, filling the hearts of all with love, and joy, and hope, and bliss.

“I love thee right well, with the merry swell
Of thy brave old cheery voice;
As thou comest again, 'mid the hail and the rain,
And biddest thy children rejoice.
I love the soft sheen of thy holy green,
And I love on its leaves to gaze;
I love the glad sight of its berries bright,
As they gleam in the yule-log's blaze.
I love thee, I love thee, I love thy brave chime,
I love thee right dearly, thou old Christmas time.

“I love thee right well, thou old Christmas bell
As thou swellest adown the vale;
I love thy sweet song, as it filleteth along,
And telleth the Christmas tale.
Cold, cold is the heart that taketh no part
In the joy of the Christmas time;
That groweth not light, with glad visions, and bright
At the song of the Christmas chime.
I love thee, I love thee, I love the brave chime,
That greeteth thee loudly, thou old Christmas time.

“I love thee right well for the tale thou dost tell
Of days that are v'rye'd and gone;
When hearts true and dear met at least once a year
Round the hearth, when thy gladness e'er shone;
Where the yule-log's soft gleam reflected each beam
Of the eye, as we sat in its light;
Where the tale and the song in mirth pass'd along,
And looks in thy presence grew bright.
I love thee, I love thee, and long for the chime,
That greeteth thee bravely, thou old Christmas time.

“I love thee, old bell, though a tale thou mayest tell
Of hopes that are wither'd and dead;
I bless thy glad peal, though its notes may reveal
The absence of those who have fled.
Then linger awhile around yon old pile,
And murmur above their cold clay;
I'll shed the hot tear for the lost ones so dear,
Then joy with the friends of to-day.
Oh! still do I love thee, and love thy brave chime,
And e'er will I love thee thou old Christmas time.”

The evening was far spent, in fact it was close upon midnight, when one of the party proposed that they should go to the midnight Mass, which was being celebrated in a Catholic chapel close at hand. The younger members of the party received the proposition with acclamations, and at once prepared to set out. It appeared to most of them, young and giddy as they were, as a very appropriate finish to their evening's entertainment. Most of them had never been within the walls of a Catholic church during their lives; none of them knew anything about the doctrines of that church but what they had learnt from the teachings of their own pulpits, and that teaching, we need hardly say, had been of no very correct nature. They had constantly heard Popery described as a worship of forms and ceremonies without meaning or significance, a mere empty form intended to delude weak people, and calculated to bring eternal ruin upon its deluded votaries. It was, therefore, with feelings of mingled contempt and curiosity that they prepared to set out in order to finish their evening's amusement by this visit to the Catholic chapel. Edwin alone of the young people made no preparation to accompany the party.

"Why, Edwin," cried young Seymour, "won't you come with us? You don't mean to stay at home, do you, and refuse to join us? I'm sure you'll like it, for I have been told that this Mass, or whatever they call it, is one of the most amusing things in the world; so many genuflections, and crossings, and bowings, that you can't understand what its about at all; besides, their music is generally very good, and it would be a pity to miss the sight; so do come with us, there's a good fellow."

"My dear Frank," answered Edwin, very calmly, but very sorrowfully, "I think you don't know what you ask me to do. I know very little about the belief or profession of these Catholics; and would to God I understood more clearly even my own belief. I have often heard Mr. Grant say they are idolators, but I do not believe it, for I know that educated men, such as the Catholic body has within it, would never be guilty of such a deadly sin. My French master was a Catholic; and although he never spoke to me on religion, I know he was a good man,—so gentle, so humble, and so meek, when papa was cross and angry with him, as he sometimes was without much reason. I repeat I know nothing of Catholic doctrine or belief, but I am sure charity obliges me to believe them to be sincere in their professions as we are in ours; and yet you ask me to accompany you to one of their churches (where they are assembled to worship God according to the best of their power and knowledge), just as you would ask me to accompany you to the theatre, or any other place of amusement. No, Frank, I will never do it; I will not make the house of God—for even their churches are the houses of God—a mere place of vain amusement and idle curiosity. I will never insult the religious belief of any of my fellow Christians by such impertinent intrusions upon them as that which you now ask me to join you in perpetrating. No Frank, I will not go with such motives as these; and knowing me as you do, I am astonished you should have asked me."

"Why, my dear fellow, how warmly you do take this matter. I am sure I didn't ask you to join us with any such motives as those which you ascribe to us. I confess I have some little curiosity to see the High Mass, but I trust I am as incapable as yourself, Edwin, of entering any place of worship whatsoever, with the motives you so justly repudiate. I trust I am as incapable as yourself of insulting the convictions of any class of professing Christians, and now I hope you won't refuse any longer to come with us."

As he finished speaking, Frank Seymour held out his hand and looked at Edwin with so much sympathy and generous feeling in his face, that Edwin at once took the proffered hand, and shook it warmly. The others gathering round and protesting their innocence of any such unworthy motives as those he had mentioned, Edwin allowed himself to be overcome, and prepared to set out with his friends.

As Edwin and Frank were passing out of the house, arm in arm, the latter jokingly remarked,—“Why, Edwin, my dear friend, you got so warm just now that I think you must be half a Papist already. Is it so? Do tell me.”

The tears rushed into Edwin's eyes as he answered,—“No, Frank, I am not a Papist, as you style it. I have never read a Catholic book in my life, and I am now about to enter a Catholic Church for the first time; but if I thought it would make me a better man, or bring me nearer to God, I would willingly become a Catholic to-morrow, for I cannot—I really, really cannot remain as I am,” he continued with the tears streaming from his eyes. “I cannot remain the cold, worldly, tepid creature that I am—it will kill me, it is killing me already, for I have read, and prayed, and thought until my brain is almost worn out, and yet there is nothing but darkness, and fear, and uncertainty on every side. Oh! would to God I knew what to do.

But, again, let him take comfort, for light is at hand.

CHAPTER VII.

INTRODUCES THE CRITICS AND DISPOSES OF THEM—A MIDNIGHT MASS, AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

AND NOW, whilst Edwin Stanhope and his friends are making their way to the Catholic Church, situated a little distance from B—square, no doubt many of our readers are grumbling, and declaring that we have altogether overdrawn the hero (if so we may style him) of this story. Bluff old Mr. Brown, whose “sumum bonum” appears to be contained in the three magic letters, £ s. d.—“the Roman initials for pounds shillings and pence,”—declares that it is all stuff and nonsense, and that the young puppy ought to have had something better to think about; and, moreover, that a good horse-whipping would have been the greatest boon that could possibly have been conferred upon him; and the rosy face of the good old man becomes quite purple with indignation as he conjures up the idea of his son, Tom Brown, taking any such ridiculous notions, and thinking about religion and that sort of thing; “and I should like to find you, sir,” says Paterfamilias, across the table to Tom, “getting any of these hairbrained notions into your head about becoming better, and desiring something more perfect. Trash, sir! Nonsense! Humbug!” And poor old Brown waxes quite warm, especially as he thinks of all his own virtues and perfections.

“Be as good as your father, sir, and you will do. Be as clever and longheaded as your grandfather, and you will be perfect. But as to getting any of Master Edwin's fanciful notions, I should like to catch you at it; that is all, sir. I do not believe a word of it.”

Old Brown, however, need not be afraid of Tom; for Tom, a fine specimen of the “animal,” with a decided taste for showy vests, chains, and pins, quite agrees with the “old boy,” as he irreverently styles his father, that it is all a humbug, and that he does not believe there ever was such a person as Edwin Stanhope; and that if there were he was a lack-a-daisical fool, who wanted ducking in a horse-pond to give him some spirit and manliness—by spirit and manliness Tom meaning drinking, smoking, swearing, and the other fashionable and more objectionable amusements in which honest Tom and his class find their pleasure and perfection.

Then there is Miss Simper, who has read novels until she fancies herself surrounded by an atmosphere of mystery and romance, and who, when she hears a rap at the door, rises from her book with such a graceful air, and swims along the narrow passage of the dwelling which she poetically describes as “her childhood's home,” thinking of the knight in disguise who is seeking his “lady faire,” and is only recalled to sublunary things by finding at the door, instead of her trusty knight, the milkman, or the butcher's boy with the sheep's-head for the daily broth, little thinking or reflecting, poor thing, as she takes it with a jaunty and abstracted air, how many sheep's-heads there are planted on human shoulders. Miss Simper has read our description of Edwin, and she is sure he must have been a dear creature; but then he was so very foolish to trouble himself about these matters, which after all were of so little importance, as he was doing the best he could; and even Miss Simper cannot help thinking that we have overdrawn him, and that his affections and desires would necessarily have fixed themselves on objects more in accordance with her ideas and experiences, and that it is so unnatural to suppose him thinking so much about religion and such abstract things.

We have a great (but qualified) respect for old Brown. In any question relating to turtle soup, or an investment in the funds, we should be proud to have the advice of the old gentleman. If there were question of dogs, tobacco, or other such matters, we should be equally glad to have the advice of his son Tom. We should submit at once to Miss Simper on all matters which naturally fall under the head of romance. We are sorry to incur their disapprobation, but we can only assure them again that our story is true, and that if their experience refuse to recognize any such person as Edwin Stanhope, we have nothing more to say, except to repeat that our story is a true one, and that we have merely sketched Edwin as we knew him. We would beg them always to recollect that we have never said that he was perfect, but merely that he was aspiring after something better. We would remind them, too (although old Brown will probably say that it is all trash and nonsense), that there is wide difference between the aspirings of the heart and intellect, and the reducing those aspirings to practice—that it is one thing to see and desire to do what is better, and another thing to do it; in a word, that, in morals, the intellect is often converted long before the will, and that many a one who desires something better, who is dissatisfied with his state, and who to a certain extent despises himself for his own weakness, remains a slave to those passions which at once degrade and defile him.

But leaving the Browns, and Simpers, and the rest of our critics, to pursue their own reflections, we must follow Edwin on his way to the Catholic chapel, or rather church; for, thank God, the day is gone by when we were compelled to confine ourselves to mean, paltry chapels; and the church to which Edwin and his friends were wending their way is truly worthy of the more exalted name. Its beautiful proportions, the graceful arch of its noble roof, the delicate tracery of its windows, are such as to strike the beholders with pleasure and admiration, despite the disadvantage under which it labors on account of its unfavorable position. Beautiful as is its exterior, it is far surpassed by the interior. The chastened light that streams through its richly-stained windows tones down and mellows what might be otherwise considered the excessive splendor and richness of its decorations, and standing about the middle of the church, with its magnificent and costly altar before you, with saints and "mighty men of old" looking down upon you from every wall, with gold and richest colors to greet the eye wherever it may fall, the tout ensemble is one, which, to use the hackneyed phrase, it is easier to imagine than describe.

When Edwin and his friends, leaving the darkness outside, suddenly entered the church, they involuntarily paused for a moment, dazzled by the splendor of the scene which met their eyes. Service had already commenced, and the altar, which was the first object which met their gaze, was literally a blaze of light. Numberless tapers, their brightness mellowed down by the choice plants and evergreens intermingled with them, lighted the church with a clearness, distinctness, and soft beauty which were perfectly enchanting. The sanctuary was full of priests in gorgeous vestments, and youthful acolytes, but too proud to minister at the altar of God. Clouds of fragrant incense were floating slowly to the roof of the sanctuary, and shedding their sweet odours through the whole edifice; and when the organ pealed forth the "Gloria in excelsis Deo," Edwin felt his heart grow hot within him, and he almost trembled to find himself already so much moved and so much pleased. With eager, yet with reverent curiosity, he drank in the whole scene. He looked around, and he saw every one wrapt in silent prayer, from the poor woman who was telling her beads with such fervor, kneeling on the stone floor of the aisle, to the young boy of nine or ten, who was kneeling by his side in the bench to which he had been courteously beckoned by its occupiers. He watched them narrowly, and he saw that they were absorbed in prayer. He saw the old woman throw out her arms and raise her eyes in a manner which for a moment he thought theatrical; but he looked again, and his noble mind bent itself in humble reverence to the poor old woman for he saw her devotion was real and true, and that she was neither thinking nor caring whether human eye saw her or not. He saw the tears rolling softly down the cheek of the boy who knelt beside him; he marked the clasped hand and the closed eye, and the gentle and angel-like look of the innocent child, and he could have fallen down and kissed his feet. He saw what he had never seen in his life before—he saw warm gushing piety; he saw real and true "heart worship;" he saw the packed and crowded congregation worshipping like one man; his fine taste recognized and drank in all the beauty of the ceremonial which was going on; he contrasted it with the cold formality of his own worshipping; he contrasted the deep and earnest devotion of those around him with his own coldness, his own doubts, and the unreality of his own dealings with God; and despite the genuflections, &c., which did seem a little strange to him at first, he felt that he was in the house of God, and that he was amongst those who were worshipping God as he had never seen Him worshiped before. The long looked-for light was coming at last, and lowlier and more humbly still he bent his head as he felt that God was working in his heart, and as the first strains of the sweet old Christmas hymn, "Adeste Fideles," fell upon his ear, he hid his face in his hands and gave full vent to the tears which he no longer sought or wished to restrain.

Yes, thou sweet old Christmas hymn, there is something in thee which speaks to most hearts, telling, as thou dost, of loving, trusting joy, that dares to go at Christmas time to the humble crib, and looking on the smiling Babe as He lifts his tiny hands to bless the gazer-in, dares to join the swelling song, and dares to utter with its sin-stained lips the glorious strain which angel tongues were first to sing—which dares to forget its own weakness, its own misery, ay, even its own sin, in the all-sufficient mercy of the Infant's smile. Oh! again do we say, "God speed thee," thou dear old hymn, for thy message is one of love, and joy, and hope! We have heard some say that thou art hackneyed, but thou art as dear to us, thou comest to us laden with as much joy and comfort as thou didst some dozen years ago, when after wandering long in the mazes of error, we heard thee for the first time on one never-to-be-forgotten Christmas night, and when, like Edwin, we were fain to bow our head and hide our face that men might not see the gush of tears which greeted the message of love and rest which thou didst bring to our weary, fainting soul.

It was, however, at the time of the Holy Communion that the greatest impression was made upon Edwin. He looked with reverence, not unmixed with awe, upon the crowds who thronged to the altar to receive the bread of life; and even he felt the majesty of "the Presence." He saw the faith of all speaking in the face, the eye, and the reverently-clasped hands of every one who approached the altar, and he marked with something like envy the calm, mild, and smiling joy which lighted each countenance, as the receiver turned away with his God within his breast. He felt that faith such as that which he now beheld for the first time was worth any price that could be paid for it; that it was, in truth, the hidden pearl of the Gospel; and with fervor and deep sincerity he besought the Almighty God to enlighten him and make known to him His holy will, that seeing what was right he might embrace it at any cost or suffering to himself; and so absorbed was he in prayer, and so lost was he in the contemplation of all he had seen and heard, that when the service was over and the congregation slowly separating, it was not until Frank Seymour had twice touched him on the arm that he bethought himself of where he was, and, wiping the tears from his face, rose to follow his friend. As he passed out into the night, its coldness and darkness seemed to him to envelop him, as it were, with a pall; and the howling wind seemed to find a voice to tell him that he had left peace, and faith, and rest, in the bright and cheerful church behind, and that the cold, the darkness, and the withering feel of the winter's night, were the fitting emblems of his own poor heart—fitting emblems of that to which he was now returning—fitting emblems of the care, the pain, and the grief which must press so heavily upon him should he ever take the step, which even now he felt he must sooner or later be compelled to do. But, again, let him take courage; the Infant has smiled upon him from His cr. b, and all will yet be well.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE FIRST STEP.—STUDY AND CONVICTION.—THE FAMILY DOCTOR AT FAULT.

CHRISTMAS passed away, and Edwin returned to his father's house. His ideas had as yet taken no definite shape, but that Christmas night, that midnight Mass, were ever present to him. When he accompanied his father to the usual Sunday service, he continually contrasted its coldness and formality with the warmth, the grandeur, and the gushing gladness of that never-to-be-forgotten night, and his heart yearned to know more of the doctrines of the Catholic Church.

At length, one day, when walking out alone, he remarked the establishment of a Catholic publisher, and, entering, timidly asked to be supplied with a few works containing a simple exposition of Catholic doctrine. The attendant selected for him "Challoner's Catholic Christian Instructed," and a few other simple works of the same kind, and Edwin hastened home, that he might, in solitude, learn more of the faith to which he already felt so favorably disposed. To say that he read these works, would give but a very imperfect idea of the eagerness and avidity with which he made himself master of their contents; he literally devoured them. Morning, noon, and night, when he could steal away to his room, he sat down to the task now so dear to him, and, as the grand and impressive claims of the Catholic faith to his sole allegiance were unfolded to him, his fine intellect at once recognized the justice of those claims, and the truth of her pretensions. He recognized at once that for which he had been so earnestly looking during the last two or three years—a clear, simple, defined rule of faith. He found everything laid down with the utmost precision, leaving no room for doubt, wavering, or hesitating belief.

He had studied with the most profound and prayerful diligence the portions of his works treating of the Church, and the marks by which the true Spouse of Christ is to be known. He saw that Christ instituted a Church to carry on the work begun by Himself for the salvation of souls, and that this Church should have commenced at once her operations. He saw that she was to be "One," "Holy," "Catholic," and "Apostolical." He saw that she must be infallible in her teachings, since men were bound, under pain of damnation, to listen to her; and all this being proved, then came the all-important question, which of the churches, calling themselves Christian, could show that they possessed the marks which were to point out to all men the one true fold. Having seen that unity of faith and belief on all points—that sanctity proclaimed by miracles and other supernatural gifts—that Catholicity embracing all times and all ages, since her foundation, and all peoples—that apostolicity derived from a regular and most clearly defined succession from the apostles themselves, pertained to the Church of Rome alone, he was fain to confess that she must be the spouse of Christ, "the mother and mistress of all the churches." He considered most attentively, too, the claims of the church in which he had been, at least nominally, baptized. So far from any unity of belief, he saw that she was tossed about by every wind of doctrine, and that there was not a single one of her doctrines which had not been denied by some one who called himself a Protestant, and who still remained a member of her communion. He saw some upholding, and others denying, the divinity of our Lord. He saw some maintaining, and others rejecting, the necessity of baptismal regeneration; and so with every other doctrine, and yet he knew that our Lord had said that those alone should be saved who observed all things (St. Matt., xxviii, 20), and he knew equally well that neither our Lord nor his apostles could have taught contradictory doctrines. He saw that she could not point to a single miracle, or other supernatural gift; whilst, on the other hand, the miracles and other supernatural gifts of the Catholic Church were too palpable and plain to be called into question. Her claims to Catholicity and Apostolicity were still more weak and untenable; and so far from professing to be infallible, she openly repudiated the very idea, and yet Edwin asked himself, "how can I safely remain a member of a church which admits that she can lead me astray, or which, at all events, will not admit that she cannot. The Church of Christ," so he reasoned, "must be infallible, because I am bound to listen to her even as I am bound to listen to Christ himself." (Luke, x, 16; Matt., xviii, 17; Matt., xxviii, 18; and St. Paul to the Ephesians, iv, 11). "Now, the church of which I am a member rejects the very idea of infallibility; how, then, can she be the true church?" Time after time, and day after day, poor Edwin read and pondered, and pondered and read, always finishing with a clearer and more firm conviction that there must be one true church, and that the Church of Rome alone could claim the title.

As he finished one set of books he procured another, but always with the greatest secrecy; for, the dreadful thought was ever present to his mind—what would his father say when he discovered what was going on; and the bare thought of his father's anger caused poor Edwin to tremble and grow pale. For six months he read and studied in this manner. It would be almost correct to say that he was now convinced. The claims of the Church had come before him in all their grandeur, and he had recognized those claims. All minor difficulties of teaching had been at once disposed of by the thought that she was the true Church, the infallible Church, which could not lead him astray; and he longed for the time when he might lay his poor, weary, aching head upon her motherly bosom, and find full light and rest for his fainting soul. He thought of her doctrine with regard to her sacraments, so clear, so well defined, and so full of consolation. He compared them with his own confirmation and communion, and he longed for the time when he might imbibe from those channels of grace strength which he felt so much to want. He had at once admitted the truth and beauty of the Church's teaching in regard to Mary and the saints, and he had already procured a print of the Divine Mother, which he carefully guarded as a dear treasure. Alone in his chamber at night, and secure from observation, he always unlocked his desk, and taking thence his treasure, knelt before it, and, with all the fervor of his young heart, begged the sweet Mother to take him under her protection, and obtain for him strength to do what was right, and he never doubted how much he owed to her aid and intercession.

So he went on for six long months, becoming every day more weary and more careworn, with his young cheek becoming every day paler and more wan, and the languor which weighed him down heavier and more painful to bear. As yet no one had learnt his secret. His sister, with all the quick perception of love, had long seen that there was something weighing upon his mind, and more than once had begged of him to tell her what it was; but she had not urged him when she perceived how painful the subject was. Mr. Stanhope looked with anxiety and foreboding upon his son, and trembled lest anything should befall him. The family physician was frequently called in, but he was unable to state what ailed Edwin except that he was very weak and feeble, and that his mind seemed to be uneasy. He recommended change of scenery, company, &c.; and so Edwin was hurried about from place to place, but with no fruit. He returned home from every excursion as weary and careworn as when he had set out; for everywhere he carried with him his mind, so ill at ease for the present, so anxious and fearful for the future. He read with avidity his books on Catholic doctrine. He was virtually convinced, and he longed to be received into the bosom of the Church. At times he fancied himself a member of the Church, and, forgetting everything else in the pleasing thought, he would be happy for a moment; but in an instant the illusion would vanish, and his father's cold, stern face, would rise before him, and the rage of the will which he had never yet dared to contradict, would appear ready to overwhelm him in the intensity of its madness when he should discover all; and poor Edwin, shuddering and trembling, would hide his face in his hands, and beg of God to give him strength to be faithful when the fearful struggle should arrive.

Six months passed away, and Edwin felt that he could not bear it much longer. He had never entered a Catholic church since the memorable Christmas night, and he knew no Catholic to whom he could speak; but he felt that he must soon take some decisive step. At length, after much anxious thought, he came to the determination of writing to Father Eustace, whom he knew, from inquiries which he had made, to be the priest of the neighboring chapel. He briefly stated his position; that he had read Catholic works and was virtually convinced of the truth of that religion; that he was anxious to know more and to fulfil the will of God, but that he was entirely dependent upon his father, whose anger he knew would be terrible when he should discover all this, and he concluded by begging Father Eustace to counsel and advise him what to do.

Father Eustace wrote to him immediately, advising him first of all to make everything known to his father, as that gentleman, being a member of a church which is always so loud in its professions of liberty of conscience, could not complain of his son's following that which his conscience pointed out to him to be right. Poor Father Eustace! he little knew Mr. Stanhope when he gave this advice; for, with men of Mr. Stanhope's class, liberty of conscience is all very well when it concerns yourself, but it is a different thing when it concerns your children, your dependents, &c. In the second place, he pressed Edwin most earnestly to come and see him as soon as he possibly could, as they would be able to see their way much clearer after a personal interview, and when they knew each other better; concluding by again pressing upon him to mention all to his father, but assuring him that, until he did so, his secret was perfectly safe with him. Edwin would have given worlds to be able to follow Father Eustace's advice, and time after time in imagination he went through the interview, in which, after telling his father all, he was to fall upon his neck and beg of him not to spurn him. On more than one evening, on which Mr. Stanhope had been unusually kind to him, Edwin actually rose to his feet to go down stairs to his father's room to tell him all, but again the cold, stern face rose up before him, and, groaning aloud, "O God! O God! I cannot, I dare not do it," he threw himself on a chair, and wept as if his young and loving heart would break.

CHAPTER IX.

NEW FRIEND AND A TRUE ONE.—STOLEN INTERVIEWS.—A CRISIS APPROACHES.

ONE Sunday evening in June, when Mr. Stanhope was dining out, Edwin set off to pay his first visit to Father Eustace. He had dropped a line the day before, saying that he would seize the opportunity, and begging the priest to make arrangements that they might be perfectly private, as he was as much afraid as ever of his father acquiring any knowledge of that in which he was engaged.

Edwin's heart beat very fast, indeed, as he entered the street in which Father Eustace dwelt. He felt that he was now about to take a decisive step, and he trembled as he contemplated it. Several times he was about to turn back, and he even felt glad when he experienced a difficulty in finding the house he sought. He wavered for a moment, and was about to return, when, looking once more down the street, his eye fell upon the cross surmounting the gable of Father Eustace's church, and hailing the sacred emblem, courage returned to his heart, the moment of hesitation was over, the demon was vanquished, and, in another instant, he was at the dwelling of the priest, had knocked timidly at his door, and was warmly clasped in the embrace of him whom he sought. In a few minutes he was sitting in the easy chair in the priest's little room, and had time to look upon Father Eustace, who sat opposite to him. He was at first rather disappointed, for Father Eustace did not quite come up to the ideas he had formed of a priest. Edwin, who, to a great extent, had formed his notions of a priest from books and from his own rather romantic ideas, thought Father Eustace was scarcely pale enough, and that there was not sufficient mystery about him; in one word, that he was rather too matter-of-fact; but when he looked into the kind bright eye, and saw it glistening with sympathy and interest, and when he listened to the pleasant and encouraging voice, he forgot the romance in the reality, and the reality was that he had found a real, true, sincere, and kind friend.

Yes, dear Father Eustace, the grave has closed over thee now, and thou hast gone to thy reward. Like the very best of us when we are gone, men very seldom mention thee; but there is, at least, one heart which misses the pleasant twinkle of thy bright black eye, and the joyous gladness of thy sunny smile, telling, as it ever did, of the overflowing goodness of thy own great heart. There is one who never will and who never can forget that when he came to thee, like Edwin, for advice, he found thee a kind and prudent counsellor, and who, when he, later on, came to thee an outcast from his home and friends, for daring to do that which was right, found in thy dear and gushing love that which repaid him to the full, and which made him forget all that he had left behind. There is, at least, one who will never forget the pride with which thou didst watch his onward steps in the way of God; one who will never forget that thy sympathy was ever deepest when his need was greatest; one who, so long as it shall be given him to ascend the altar of God, will never forget thee, nor allow thy honored and revered remembrance to pass from out his heart, but who will cherish to the last the memory of his best and dearest friend. Peace be with thee, dear Father Eustace.

The interview between Edwin and Father Eustace was long, for they had much to say to each other. Edwin opened his heart most freely to his newly-found friend, and concealed nothing from him. Father Eustace found him perfectly well read up in Catholic doctrine, and requiring but very little more instruction before being in a fit state to be received into the Church. His efforts were, therefore, principally directed to inspiring him with courage and confidence to take the desired, but at the same time, dreaded step. To say that Father Eustace was at once most deeply interested in the generous, high-minded boy who had thus come to him would be superfluous. He saw how the mighty hand of God had brought the work about in its own mysterious way, and he determined that nothing should be wanting on his part to perfect what had been so happily begun; but his open brow became clouded and sadly thoughtful as he contemplated the difficulties to be overcome.

Finding that he could not prevail upon Edwin to mention this matter to his father at present, he selected from his small, but choice, library several works which he deemed would be useful to his young friend, counselled him to make himself more intimately acquainted with the Catholic religion, and placing himself in the hands of God without reserve, to trust to the loving Providence which "reacheth from end to end mightily, and disposeth all things sweetly," to bring everything to a favorable issue in its own good time. He besought him to be fervent in prayer, that God might dispose his father to receive the information with less anger than Edwin dreaded, and assuring him that he would daily remember him at the altar, begged that he would come and see him as often as possible.

During the four months that followed, Edwin had several stolen interviews with his friend, whom he loved more and more. Father Eustace was urgent with him to take the dreaded step, and throw himself, unreservedly, into the arms of Providence; but Edwin, although quite convinced and anxious to do so, still held back. The cold, stern face for ever rose up before him, and he shrank with fear and trembling from the conflict with it, and let us not dare to censure him. Let not us who are in the full light of God Almighty's Church, and strengthened by His holy and special graces, dare to blame the young and fearful boy who hesitated, and trembled, and held back, when he thought of all that would probably come upon him when he should have taken the dreaded step. His father's fearful rage—his own utter dependence upon him, and his probable expulsion from his home, the wrenching asunder of all old ties, the utter chasm between himself and all that had been that must follow; in a word, the probable poverty, desolation, and misery—all, all rushed upon him, and what wonder if, deprived as he was of the special graces of God's holy sacraments, the poor boy trembled and held back. Put yourself in his place, my good, cozy, but somewhat censorious friend, and tell me what would you have done.

Although Father Eustace labored to inspire Edwin with confidence, and to persuade him that Mr. Stanhope would not be so much enraged as he imagined, still, when he considered that gentleman's pride, and how much he would consider himself degraded by his son's forsaking his religion, and embracing one which gentlemen of Mr. Stanhope's class always identify with "those low Irish"—when he considered, too, all the projects which that gentleman had formed for his son, and how much, in spite of his cold, stern nature, he was bound up in his boy, he trembled for the consequences, doubtful, as it was, whether the pride or the affection of Mr. Stanhope would gain the mastery, and fearing very much that his pride would gain the day.

Father Eustace still exhorted, and Edwin still hesitated, when an accident brought about the so much desired, but so dreaded explanation. Edwin inadvertently one day left exposed upon his table a book on the Catholic Church, belonging to Father Eustace, with that gentleman's name on the title page. On returning to his room he was much alarmed to find that it was gone, and finding, on inquiry, that neither his sister nor any of the servants had removed it, he came to the conclusion that his father had entered the room in his absence, had found the book upon his table, and had taken it away. The belief was confirmed by the conduct of his father when they met as usual at dinner. Mr. Stanhope scarcely spoke during the meal, but Edwin, without daring to look at his father, felt that his eyes were continually fixed upon him in a sad and very painful manner, and he heard him sigh deeply several times. As soon as dinner was over, Mr. Stanhope retired at once to his private room, and as Edwin and Maria sat together in mournful silence, they heard their father pacing hurriedly backward and forward in his room, which adjoined the one in which they sat. Poor Edwin listened with a beating heart to the tread that seemed to him to announce that the stern, cold man within was steeling himself for the coming battle, and crushing every more tender feeling as ruthlessly as the hasty foot trampled upon the ground beneath it. Backwards and forwards, backwards and forwards, without cessation and without rest, crushing and strangling without mercy the promptings of the father's heart—fighting the battle of pride and haughtiness, even against his own flesh and blood—feeding the evil passions of his own stern, undisciplined heart, holding converse with the busy devil at work within him, till pride and haughty rage were boiling up in his soul, and every fall of the impatient foot cried out to the trembling boy in the adjoining room: "Oppose me not, dare not to place your will in opposition to mine, or I will crush you; crush you even to the dust, were you ten times dearer to me than you are; crush you, though my own heart wither and perish with you. Crush!—crush!—crush!"

For four long hours Edwin listened to the pacing of that foot with its never-varying tale of pride, and power, and will. Maria tried in vain to soothe him. He kissed her when she came and hung over him; but he put her gently away, and turned to the communion of his own sad thoughts. When she begged of him to tell her what was wrong between himself and papa, he could only answer that she would soon know all now, and beg of her never to love him less, whatever might come between them. He had retired to his own room for the night, and was sitting buried in thought, thinking of nothing, perhaps, in particular, but weighed down and oppressed with the dreary foreboding of what was about to happen, when a servant came to tell him that his father wished to see him before he retired to rest.

For a moment Edwin felt sick and dizzy. He then threw himself upon his knees, and besought the Almighty God, with all the fervor of his young heart, to give him strength to be faithful, now that the dreaded moment had come, and, after spending some moments thus, he rose and waited for a short time, in order to try to compose himself a little, and still the beatings of his anxious and fluttering heart, before he entered his father's room; and God be with him now to strengthen and sustain the brave young heart against the iron will that is determined to conquer or to crush it.

CHAPTER X.

FATHER AND SON.—THE CONFLICT.—A FATHER'S CURSE.

On entering the room, Edwin found his father seated at his table, with a large Bible open before him, and the lamp shining full upon his face. It was deadly pale, and looked so cold, so stern, and so passionless, as it turned towards him as he entered that it seemed more like the face of one who was dead and who had passed away from worldly cares, than of one whose heart was at that very moment a volcano of burning and consuming passion. He did not speak, but motioning Edwin to a chair, for a moment father and son sat gazing on each other without the power or the will to utter a word. There was, however, a twitching about the bloodless and compressed lips of Mr. Stanhope, that told too well of the struggle that was going on within, and that was gnawing his very heart, as he sat looking on the pale and trembling boy before him. He looked like a man who, under the mastery of some strong and ruling passion, had grasped with an iron hand everything that was nearest and dearest to his heart, and tearing it ruthlessly and mercilessly away, had stamped upon it in the wildness and extremity of his madness, leaving himself all weak and fainting from the very violence of the conflict. He had thought that he had mastered himself perfectly; but he was wrong, for his voice quivered and faltered for an instant as he addressed his son—the centre of so much pride, and of so many hopes, about perchance, to be withered and blasted for ever.

"Edwin, my child," he commenced, I have sent for you in order to question you on a subject of the greatest importance, and with which my happiness certainly, and I would fain believe yours are very intimately connected. Some two months ago I heard, much to my surprise, from my friend, Mr. Seymour, that whilst staying at his house last Christmas, you had accompanied his son and some other young people to the Popish chapel on Christmas eve. I say I was surprised to hear this, because I know you too well to suppose that you would have gone there out of mere idle curiosity, and I could not think how you could have been so foolish as to expose yourself to the slightest danger of being led astray and perverted by those ensnaring and captivating ceremonials, with which the Romish Church too often entraps young and ardent imaginations such as yours. Since then, I have been warned by several friends to have an eye upon you, as your tendencies are decidedly Romish, and that you are in danger of perversion. I did not mention these reports to you, Edwin, because I felt sure that no member of my family, much less my own son, could so far forget what was due to me and to himself as to become a miserable apostate from the church of his baptism in order to join one so fallen, so degrading in its doctrines and practices, and so idolatrous, as that of Rome," continued Mr. Stanhope, in his most lofty and haughty manner, "I could not believe either that my own boy upon whom I have lavished all my love and tenderness, could be guilty of such an utter want of confidence towards me as all this supposes, and that he could accompany me to church on every Sunday and yet be a pervert and an apostate in heart. I noticed with deepest concern your worn and anxious look for some time past, and I was often alarmed lest it might be caused by this affair; but still I could not believe it, and I endeavored to account for it by your delicate health and constitutional weakness. Hence though I heard these reports, and though I was both alarmed and pained by them, still I had too much confidence in you, and I did not mention them. But,"—and he grew paler as he proceeded—"I this morning entered your room by accident, and, to my astonishment, and I will say horror, I found upon your desk this book, containing an exposition of the doctrines of the Romish Church, underlined, and with notes in your hand-writing. It would be impossible for me to tell you all I felt for I trembled to see what appeared to be such a confirmation of what I have heard. I took the book to my own room, I have waited until I was calm and composed before I spoke to you, and now I am waiting and anxious to hear you disclaim all that has been said, and explain how it was that I found such a book as this in your room."

He paused and looked steadily at Edwin, who raised his eyes, full of tears, to his father's face, as he answered:—"Excuse me, papa, but I cannot explain this; or rather," he added, as his voice faltered more and more, "I hope you will not press me to do so at present."

As Edwin uttered these words, so confirmatory of all that he dreaded, Mr. Stanhope turned deadly pale with suppressed passion, and bit his lip to repress the angry words that were about to rush forth. He was, at least externally, calm, but his voice was fearfully stern, and his look most determined, as he answered:—

"Edwin, I am still your father,—at least yet; do not trifle with me, for I am determined, and nothing shall move me. Dearly as I love you, and God alone knows how dearly that is, although, perhaps, I have never been able to show that love as much as I could desire, I would not allow even you to question my authority, and by that authority I request, nay, I demand to know where you obtained the book I found upon your desk, and why I found it there?"

"Since you insist upon knowing," answered Edwin, very slowly, and with a voice trembling with fear and anxiety, "I am bound to answer. The book belongs to a Catholic priest of the adjoining chapel, and it was borrowed by me in order to assist me in prosecuting my inquiries into the nature of the doctrines held by the Catholic Church."

Mr. Stanhope started as though he had been stung by a serpent, but, although his fingers twitched convulsively as he grasped the arms of the chair in which he sat, he kept down as yet the raging passion that was in him.

"And may I ask, sir, how you made the acquaintance of this Popish priest, who, true to his creed, seems about to rend asunder the members of this hitherto happy family?" demanded Mr. Stanhope, in his sternest and coldest manner.

"Papa," answered Edwin, who, now that the ice was broken, began to feel more collected and courageous, "papa, you do Father Eustace grievous wrong. The acquaintance commenced from me. You do me wrong, too, in supposing that I have been influenced in the change which has come over me by the grandeur of the ceremonial of the Catholic Church. It is grand," he continued, "but it has but little share in my change of feeling, for I have witnessed it only once. From my childhood I have been dissatisfied with the state I was in. I have been chilled and beaten down by the coldness and emptiness of the religion I professed. I have been perplexed and alarmed by the contradictions and discrepancies of her belief. For years I have found none to counsel me, none to explain what perplexed and alarmed me. When I received the rite of confirmation, when I approached the communion, I had no definite idea of what I was engaged in, and I could find none to enlighten me. I wept, and I thought, and I prayed, and still all was doubt, and dread, and darkness; and what wonder, then, if, when, for the first time I entered a Catholic Church, and beheld at least the appearance of that which I had so earnestly sought and desired, I took means of investigating and discovering whether the appearance were indeed the reflection of the reality? With every prejudice against it, with the fear of your anger, dear papa, before me, with every natural instinct to remain as I am, I have studied, oh! how deeply, the claims of the Catholic Church to my allegiance, and, in spite of myself, I have been driven to confess in my own heart that there must be one true Church on earth, and that the Catholic Church alone can claim the title. O dear papa," he continued, his cheeks flushed with excitement, and his large, dark eyes gleaming with animation, "if you knew the sleepless nights this has cost me, if you knew how I have wept and prayed, if you knew how I have striven at times against this, if you knew how I have trembled as I thought of your anger, if you knew half my sufferings, my own dear papa, you would take pity on me and forgive me; you would not look upon me so coldly and so sternly; you would not turn away from me as you do. In all my life before, you know, papa, that I have never contradicted you, that I have never crossed you, and I tremble as I do it now; but I cannot help it, oh! indeed, I cannot. I cannot stifle my conscience; I cannot be deaf to its voice, and that voice tells me that I must be a Catholic, whatever it may cost me. I have not been a hypocrite, for I have longed to tell you this, but I durst not do it—I durst not, dear papa; and oh! forgive me for it. I durst not face your anger; and, moreover, I had not made up my mind, and I was not sure that I should ever become a Catholic. Father Eustace has always pressed me to tell you, and I have often crept down part of the way to your room to throw myself at your feet and tell you all; but my heart has always failed me, and I have had to turn back, weeping and sad, to my own room; but now that you know all, O dear papa, say that you forgive me—say that you will not cast me off. I will try to love you more and more, and to be more obedient than I have been. I will never cross you again, and it shall be the sole object of my life to render you happy. O papa, my own dear papa, don't look at me so sternly, but say that you forgive me, or it will kill me."

For the dark stern face was awful now—awful as it worked and quivered in every feature, as the eye glared upon the boy, who sat before it with his face buried in his hands, and the tears streaming down upon the floor—awful, as the forehead swelled as if it would burst—awful, as the lips, which were bitten till they bled, twitched and quivered even then—awful as the perspiration ran in cold drops along it, giving it an appearance still more ghastly and dreadful to behold.

And thus they sat for a moment, father and son, neither of them speaking, and the heavy silence only broken by the sobs of Edwin, who wept as if his heart would break, as he trembled beneath the gaze that was bent upon him—a gaze that told of pain and bitter grief—of blasted hopes and blighted expectations—that spoke but too plainly of the fearful struggle that was going on within, rending his very heart as he grappled with it—but telling, above all, of a fearful, withering pride, that would crush whatever opposed it, but never! never! bend or yield.

When Mr. Stanhope broke the painful silence, it was with a voice that was hoarse and husky. "Edwin Stanhope," at length he exclaimed, in a low and quivering tone, "have you done, sir? I was not prepared for this, and you have taken me by surprise. You have learned your lesson well, sir, and you do credit to your instructors," he added, sarcastically. "Yes, you have taken me by surprise; for, when I summoned you here, I did not expect to find you so far gone in your delusions. I did not expect to find you so far lost to your duty, sir. Of course, I shall not presume to enter the lists of controversy with you, as you are, doubtless, much more learned than I am in these matters; but, at least, rash boy, allow me to call in Mr. Grant, he may drive these mad and foolish notions from your mind.

"Papa," answered Edwin, weeping, but still firmly, "again you wrong me. I have learnt no lesson—I have received no instruction, save the recommendation to treat you with every respect and confidence. If I have failed in this, as, perhaps, I have, the fault is all my own. I must decline to see Mr. Grant, as I cannot perceive any good result to be attained from such a meeting. Surely, after seventeen years of study, I ought to know the religion I have so long professed; and though Mr. Grant might beat me in argument, as no doubt he would, still he would never convince me. No, papa, no power on earth could do that, and therefore why should I see him?"

"Your pride and presumption are intolerable, sir. You dare to pass judgment upon me, and upon your ancestors. We have all gone wrong, forsooth, and you, and you alone, are right. How dare you use such language to me, sir?—how dare you speak to me in such terms?—how dare you so utterly forget and despise all that is due to me, and to those who have gone before me?"

"Dear papa, I do not forget what is due to you. I love and I honor you above all the world. There is nothing that I would not do to show my love and reverence for you, and when you accuse me of having failed in this, you wrong me; you wrong your own heart too. I pass no judgment upon you, papa, or upon any one. Your belief is a matter between yourself and God, even as mine is. No, I pass no judgment upon you, I only judge myself, and I know and feel—oh! how intimately,—that I must either become a Catholic or lose my own immortal soul; and I know—oh! I am sure, dear, dear papa—that you who have ever loved me so much, can never ask me to do that?"

"Enough, sir,—enough of this. My soul ought to be as dear to me as yours is to you, and I have no doubt of being able to save it, even in the church which you, in your wisdom, so much despise," responded Mr. Stanhope, coldly and haughtily. "But," and his voice involuntarily faltered as he spoke, and the tears rushed into his eyes, despite all his efforts to restrain them, "but have you well considered the consequences of the mad step which you seem so determined to take? Have you well pondered the strength of my will? And do you suppose that I will ever submit to the degradation you are about to heap upon our hitherto unsullied name? Have you considered my pride and my position, and do you suppose that I will ever put it in the power of a jibing mob to point at me with the finger of scorn, and to say of me that I allowed my own son to become a miserable apostate? Have you considered how many hopes, how many expectations are concentrated in you, and are you prepared to blast them all for the gratification of a mere whim? Are you prepared to throw away, as a thing not worth having, the love that I have ever lavished upon you? Have you considered that I will die rather than yield to your folly? Tell me," he continued, passionately, "tell me, have you considered all this, and are you prepared to take upon yourself the consequences of this act?"

"Papa," cried Edwin frantically, falling upon his knees, "I have considered all this, and the thought has nearly killed me. I cannot bear it much longer, and indeed I am willing to die. If you cast me off, it will kill me, oh! indeed it will. I cannot live without your love, and in the knowledge that you have disowned me; but," he continued, sobbing till his voice was hardly audible, "I must become a Catholic. Oh! indeed I must—I must—I must; and may God support me in the struggle."

"Enough, sir," cried Mr. Stanhope, rising madly from his chair, and stamping passionately upon the ground. "Enough sir! go your way, and I will go mine. You have cast me off for a mere whim, and now I disown and disclaim you. You are no son of mine. Henceforward we are strangers. I will tear the very image of you from my heart; or, if ever I think of you, it shall be but to nourish my hate for the vile apostate who has forsaken and betrayed me. I will trample upon every feeling of love that may linger in my heart towards you, and I will cast it from me as a base and loathsome thing, and by the God that is above us, I will never look upon your face again."

And roughly disengaging himself from the arms that sought to wind themselves about his knees, and spurning the falling boy with his foot, as though he were something infinitely hateful and loathsome to him, with the fearful curse that seemed to blanch the very lips that uttered it, he rushed madly from the room, where his only son was stretched, faint, and bleeding upon the floor.

A short time, and there was a great hurrying to and fro through the stately house, for the servants, hearing a heavy fall, had rushed into their master's room, and found him in a fit upon the floor; whilst Edwin was laid upon his bed, with the blood trickling from a cut in his temple, and only sufficiently conscious to know that a gentle hand ever and anon stanching his wound, and that two loving arms wound round his neck; that a soft young cheek was resting by the side of his, and a dear and well-known voice whispering in his ear, "Edwin, my own darling, whatever may happen, there is at least one heart will remain faithful to you, and love you dearly as it ever did."

And once again, may God be with the brave young heart that has been stricken down even by a father's hand, but that is neither crushed nor conquered yet.

CHAPTER XI.

COMFORT IN GRIEF.—A MINISTERING ANGEL.—THE PROUD MAN'S PAIN.

It was a month before Edwin was sufficiently recovered from the shock occasioned by the interview with his father, narrated in the last chapter, to be able to leave his room. He had received, too, a rather severe, though not dangerous cut on the forehead, by falling against a chair as his father cast him from him, and this, added to the intensity of his feelings, had acted very strongly on his already weak and enfeebled system; and for three weeks he was unable to rise from his bed. During the whole of this time there was a soft and genial face for ever hovering round his bed like an angel of comfort and consolation, smoothing so softly and soothingly the pillow which supported his weary and aching head, dressing with such a light and skilful touch his wounded forehead; holding such cool and pleasant draughts to his parched and burning lips, kissing him with such deep and heartfelt love, and ever and anon, when he groaned the most heavily, and tossed the most restlessly, whispering so lovingly in his ear the comforting words he had heard on that dreadful night, "Edwin, my own darling, whatever may happen, remember that you can never be less dear to me than you are now." And, oh! how often during the time he lay upon his bed of pain, as the stern dark face rose up before him as he had seen it last when it was quivering with rage and indignation, and the remembrance of that fearful course came thrilling through his frame, would he turn to the fair young girl that watched beside his bed, and laying his poor weary head upon her bosom, would wind his arms around her neck, and as her golden ringlets fell upon him as she bent over him, would sob himself to sleep upon that gentle, faithful heart; and, after dreaming of angels and of rest, would wake to see those same mild eyes looking into his, with such a depth of love and faithfulness in every glance, and to feel those pure and gentle lips pressed to his, with love so holy and so innocent, that even pitying angels, as they hovered round, might fear no danger to their own unsullied holiness as they gazed upon the brother's and sister's love.

Maria knew all now, and had received from Edwin a full account of his own change, and of the interview with his father. She listened calmly and quietly to his story, with his hand clasped in hers, and only interrupting him by stooping down to kiss him when his voice faltered more than usual, or when, with all the quickness of a woman's perception, she perceived that he was coming to something painful and distressing. When, after describing his interview with his father, and their dreadful parting, he finished his story and turned away his head to hide his tears, she bent her face down to his as it reclined hidden by his hands upon the arm of a couch on which they sat, and after a moment's silence began to cheer and comfort him.

"Edwin, my own dear brother," she commenced, "I am both surprised and sorry to hear your story. I am sorry, my darling," she continued, seeing that he was about to speak again, "because I cannot conceal from myself how much suffering there is in store for you, and if for you, for me too, without you forsake these opinions, which I know you too well to suppose that you will do. I am sorry, of course, that you should deem it necessary to take this step and become a Catholic, because I necessarily think it a false one, and one which is not required. Why cannot we be as we have been? However, Edwin, I pity you, but I do not blame you. I have heard your story, and I could as soon question the fact of my own existence as your sincerity; and whatever you may do, I, at least, shall never blame you. You little know, my own darling, darling brother, how dear you are to me, and how proud I have ever been of you; and believe me," she continued, weeping as she spoke, "you never can be less dear to me than you are at this moment. Others may forsake you—I never can. Others may cast you off—I never can. You may become less dear to others, but to me you can never be anything but my own dear, darling boy, my pride, my love, my joy." And again the pitying angels looked gently on as she sealed the promise of her fidelity. "I am very much afraid of papa's anger," she continued, "for I know it to be dreadful. He knows that you are ill, for he sees the doctor as he calls every day; but he has never been to your room, and he has never mentioned your name since that dreadful night. You know, dear, that he had a fit on the same night, but he soon recovered; but I know, we all know and see, how deeply he feels this. He looks much older, and his face is so deadly pale and wan, that it is painful to behold. Several times when I have been sitting with him during your illness, I have watched him and marked the workings of his features, and I know, oh! how well, that he was thinking of you; and I have waited until I saw his features soften, and the tears begin to trickle down his pale face, and then I have gone over to him, and putting my arms around his neck, I have taken courage to whisper your name, but, oh! Edwin, he has always turned upon me a look so cold, so stern, so unforgiving, and so wild, that I could not utter another word, but only throw myself upon a couch and weep, as I saw him rush hurriedly from the room. Several nights he has never gone to rest at all, for I have heard him pacing his room during the live-long night, and once, when you were asleep, I stole down to his room, and I laid my face against his door and listened, and I heard him sigh and groan so deeply and so bitterly, that my poor heart was almost broken as I listened. I hope he will relent, but, dearest, we must be prepared for the worst; and you know how stern and inflexible he is. Mr. Grant, too, has been here several times, and I know that he has advised papa to be very firm—firm is the word he used; but, oh! I know that it means something more severe. But, my own dear," she continued, as Edwin began to weep and sob again, "do be comforted. We will throw ourselves at his feet, and I will plead for you; he cannot reject me; and we shall all be happy yet." She tried to speak in a gay and cheerful voice, but, poor girl, it was a sad failure, and so she only clasped the weeping boy nearer and closer to her faithful heart, and bent over him to kiss his wounded brow; her golden hair, as it fell about him, seeming to shine with a reflection of the glory that was shed around them by the pitying angels who were gazing on the scene.

CHAPTER XII.

CHRISTMAS DAY, AND NOT A "MERRY ONE."

It was Christmas Eve again, and Edwin, who was stronger and more composed, after many trembling and anxious consultations with Maria, had come to the determination of going down stairs the next day, in hopes of meeting his father, whom he had not seen since the night they had parted in so painful and dreadful a manner. He was full of anxiety as to this meeting, and during his recovery it had formed the subject of many conversations between himself and his sister. Maria was, or feigned to be, very sanguine as to its results. She tried to persuade Edwin that when his papa saw him again, and saw that his mind was made up, he would relent and forgive him, and that everything would be as it had been before this unhappy disagreement. Poor Edwin was less sanguine; but encouraged by Father Eustace, to whom, as soon as he was sufficiently recovered, he had sent a detailed account of all that had happened, he determined to meet his father as if nothing had occurred between them.

Christmas Day came, and a dark rainy day it was. From the window of his room Edwin watched his father descend with the old haughty tread the steps of the house, and enter his carriage. He saw the servant place the large prayer-book upon the cushion, and as his father bent forward, for a moment, to give some trifling direction to the attendants, Edwin peered anxiously into his face, to see whether, perchance, the Christmas time might not have left some mark of softening pity and forgiveness on it; but he turned away with a sickening heart. Much paler, much more wan and careworn, but colder, sterner, prouder than ever. He saw his father's eye fall, for a moment, on the empty seat which he had always been accustomed to occupy on those occasions, and as he seemed to fall like a pall upon the newly-formed hopes of a reconciliation. When the carriage had driven away, and he was sitting in his silent room, listening to the rain that was beating with such a wailing sound against the casement, and with the events of the last twelvemonths all crowding upon his mind at once with a fearful distinctness, one figure, however, always being foremost in the picture—a cold, stern face, which suddenly changed and became livid with passion, as it uttered a fearful curse that froze his blood as he did but think of it, poor Edwin grew so melancholy and so sad that he was fain to leave the companionship of his own bitter thoughts. He was fain to think about the smiling church and its cheerful lights, the fragrant incense, and the swelling strain, and sweeter, holier, and fuller of consolation than all the rest, the lowly crib that seemed to beckon him to draw near and look upon the smiling babe who raised His little hands with such a look of pitying love, and as he gazed he felt his heart grow light and strong. He felt that the good Jesus had, indeed, sought out His wandering lamb, and when he arose from his knees he felt that now he could leave all beside to follow the Good Shepherd, whom he had sought for so long, but was about to find at last; and as the dinner hour drew nigh, it was with comparative calmness that he descended to the drawing-room.

Maria rose to meet him as he entered, and greeted him cheerfully as she led him to a chair. They sat counting the minutes with palpitating hearts, though they tried hard to seem cheerful and unconcerned. The happiness of two young hearts is now depending on a father's word, and surely at this Christmas time the icy heart will melt, the iron will unbend; and recording angels shall gladly write the words that will bring comfort and joy to those that so much need it. He was at church this morning; he heard the sacred words, "Glory be to God on high, and on earth peace to men of good will;" and he cannot steal his heart and close the bowels of compassion against his own offspring. There has been too much of rigor and of suffering already, and on this day of universal love and happiness, he, too, will relent, and give the kiss of peace, and there shall be merry Christmas at the hearth which is now so lone and desolate; and the gratitude of two young hearts shall amply pay him for his conquered pride and vanquished will. A step is heard approaching; it must be he. Poor Edwin turns deadly pale, and rises, as the hand is already upon the latch of the door. He faintly approaches to meet him as he enters, with the kiss upon his lips, and the prayer for pardon upon his tongue, and his eyes looking more than tongue can ever express. Another moment, and—oh! let the recording angels turn away with very shame and sorrow. Let them not write it down that the father's heart is unforgiving yet, and that his children are less dear to him than his own devilish pride and never-unbending will. Let them not record the cold and haughty message which the menial enters to deliver; but let them leave him in the room which he will not forsake. Let them leave him, even on a day like this; leave him in his coldness, and his darkness, and his pride; leave him to the thoughts that are gnawing away the heart upon which they feed; leave him, even to himself, and let them rather record, with pens of gold, how the brother and sister, locked in each other's arms, wept over their ruined hopes as if their hearts would break, and wept for the unbending harshness of an unforgiving heart. Let them rather record in brightest letters the words frequently murmured during that bitter night, "Edwin, my own darling, I, at least, will never forsake you—never love you less, my poor, poor boy." And now that the evening bells are ringing through the air, and men are taking advantage of the clearing weather to hurry to the house of God—now, while many a hearth is bright and gay, and love is speaking in many an eye, let the cold, stern man think of the "Merry Christmas" that is held around his hearth. Let him gloat over the work of his hands, and exult in the strength of his will; but, for God's sake, let him forget that it is the Merry Christmas time. Above all, let him forget the solemn words he heard not many hours ago: "Glory be to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men of good will."

CHAPTER XIII.

A VICTORY AND A NOTABLE ONE, IF IT BE WORTH THE PRICE.

After the death-blow to his hopes which he had now received, we may easily imagine that poor Edwin passed a wretched and sleepless night. He arose next morning weak and languid, and had scarcely finished dressing when he received a message summoning him to his father's private room. He obeyed at once, and entered the room comparatively calm, for he felt that the worst was passed, that he had nothing to hope, and that it only remained for him to support anything that was to follow with as much resignation as possible.

With the sweet names of Jesus and Mary upon his lips, he turned the latch and entered the room. His father was standing behind his desk, very pale, but to all appearance perfectly calm. He gave no sign of recognition as his son entered the room, but stood motionless and rigid as a statue. He did not even look at him, but, with his eyes fixed upon the opposite wall, in a cold, harsh voice, as if he were transacting a piece of business of the very least importance, and one which was scarcely worthy of even so much attention, he merely said, "I have sent for you, sir, to learn from your own lips whether you are determined to persevere in the absurd and outrageous line of conduct which you have thought fit to embrace?"

"Dear papa, if——"

"I desire no explanation, sir; I merely wish an answer to my question."

"Papa, I am determined, because no other course is open to me."

"Then, sir, the sooner you seek another home the better, for henceforward you are a stranger here."

And so they parted, father and son. Edwin would have taken his father's hand, but the proud man turned haughtily and sternly away, and so, without another word, without another look, with all the love of so many years cast away and trampled upon by the demon of pride and sectarian intolerance, he allowed the door to close upon his son, and listened to the retreating footsteps which told him too plainly, alas! that he was alone, and that he had needlessly cast away from him the priceless jewel of a young heart's love and tenderness.

And yet he had scarcely expected that it would have come to this. He had persuaded himself that, by speaking thus briefly and harshly to his son, he would have succeeded in breaking down Edwin's determination to embrace the Catholic faith, and he found himself mistaken. He had thought it impossible that his son would take him at his word, and give up everything rather than that which he felt himself bound to embrace; and for a moment he felt stunned as the door closed upon Edwin's retreating figure. He would have given worlds to recall those words, "Henceforward you are a stranger here;" but his pride would not submit, and he could not do it. Even now he could scarcely believe that they had parted; he could scarcely believe that Edwin would leave him, and he sat listening most anxiously to every step that he heard in the passage outside, thinking it to be that of Edwin, who was coming to announce his submission to his father's will; and, oh! how his proud heart sickened at the step passed on and he found himself still alone—alone, thinking of his boy and of all that was past. One, two, three hours, and now he knew that Edwin would not submit, and he rang his bell. He sat down, with a strange calmness upon his face, to his desk, and slowly and methodically opening it, took thence a note for a £100, and put in an envelope. He was about to direct it, when a sudden thought seemed to strike him, and he threw the pen hastily away, and left the envelope without any address. When the servant entered, although he peered curiously into his master's face to discover how the proud man bore his trouble, he could find no mark of discomposure; all was cold, and stern, and proud, and his master's voice was firm and steady as usual, as he handed the envelope to him.

"Johnson," he said, "take this to——" My son, he was going to add, but he suddenly stopped as if something were choking him. "Take this to Mr. Edwin Stanhope, and inquire from him when it will suit his convenience to depart hence, in order that you may procure a conveyance for him; and, Johnson," he continued, as the servant was leaving the room, "you will remember that Mr. Edwin Stanhope is henceforward a stranger here; and, should he call, you will not admit him without my express orders and permission."

"Henceforward a stranger here!" He was glad when the servant left the room, with a low bow, for he had marked the pitying look of the man's face; and with all his pride and haughty self-will he felt himself humbled and abased; he felt himself degraded even to the feet of his own menial, and he was glad to be alone.

We shall not attempt to describe the parting between the brother and the sister. There are things too holy and too painful to be described by any human pen, much less by a pen so weak and feeble as ours. We will rather draw a veil over the sorrowful scene, and leave to angel hands to record the parting vows of faithfulness which they uttered, clinging round each other's necks—leave to angel hands to record the love and watchful care with which she packed his books and all his little treasures—and promised so faithfully to write to him as often as she could. Above all, we will draw a veil over that parting moment, when their young lips were pressed so wildly in long and pure embrace: whilst their weeping eyes spoke all that which their sorrow stricken tongues refused to say.

And now, if bluff old Mr. Brown has condescended to follow our little story so far, we have no doubt that the worthy old gentleman is in a state of great satisfaction, and that he is loud in his commendations of the firm and determined manner in which Mr. Stanhope has acted in regard to his rebellious and undutiful son.

It cannot be denied that Mr. Stanhope has gained a great, a notable victory. Rather than sacrifice one iota of his pride and haughty will, he has sacrificed and ruthlessly cast away from him the dearest object he possessed in the world; and for what? That he might not appear to have given way in this conflict with his child—that men might not be able to say that he had allowed his own son to thwart him, even in a matter where salvation was at stake. A great victory, surely! a notable victory! His own heart may wither and grow cold—his son, his only son, may be cast out upon the world, and there be none to take his place; but what of that? He has conquered—the supremacy of his will has been vindicated, his pride has not given way, his character is unblemished in the eyes of the world; and what is his own happiness, or that of his own child, in comparison with such a victory as this? A great victory, surely! Poor fool! Well may old Brown rub his hands, and chuckle till he be black in the face. Well may he go about from house to house amongst his friends, to tell them this wonderful tale of a father who loves his pride better than his child. Yet it is not such an uncommon tale after all. It has happened before, and probably will happen again; and therefore old Brown need not chuckle quite so much over it, nor expose himself to be carried off by an attack of apoplexy resulting from the exuberance of his feelings. Spite of all his commendations, could the worthy old man transport himself in imagination to Mr. Stanhope's lonely room, and see how that proud face quivers and grows pale as he listens to the suppressed voices that are bidding a tearful and sorrowful farewell to their dear young master, and could he see how, as after listening to the very last to a carriage as it drives away, Mr. Stanhope locks the door of his room, and lays his weary head upon his desk, and groans and weeps through the live-long night for his lost, lost boy, even he, worthy old Mr. Brown, might, perhaps, begin to doubt whether such a victory was worth purchasing at such a price.

CHAPTER XIV.

A NEW HOME—FATHER EUSTACE FINDS IT TOO MUCH FOR HIM.—
AID IS NEAREST WHEN NEED IS GREATEST.—FRANK SEYMOUR AND HIS TALE.

POOR Edwin, half dead with grief and sorrow for the present, and with anxiety for the future, after leaving the house which was now no longer his home, drove at once to the residence of Father Eustace, to whom he had despatched a hurried note containing a brief account of what had happened. He had had no time as yet to think of the future. He felt that all that had been passed away, and that there was a broad chasm between himself and most of those who had been nearest and dearest to him. He felt that the world—the dark, dreary world—was all before him, and he saw not where he should find a resting-place for his weary feet. Bashful and retiring as he was, so little fitted to fight his way in the world which was now before him, so full of the enthusiasm and romantic feeling which are necessary ingredients in natures such as his, it is little wonder if he were anxious and distressed. And yet he felt happier than he had been for some months past. The step had been taken, and had been taken for eternity; the rest was merely temporal, and he felt that God would carry him through it all. His deepest, keenest sorrow was for the unforgiving harshness of his father; but it was a sorrow without anger, a sorrow which had for its object not his own wrongs, and the harsh treatment he had received, but the thought that past love could be so easily put away—that the memory of the happy days gone by could be so ruthlessly trampled upon, and himself cast upon the world so sternly and so proudly, for daring to do that which he found himself bound to do under the pain of his own damnation. Now that they had parted, his heart warmed more than it had ever done before in their happiest days towards the proud, stern man; and if he wept as he thought of him, they were, in truth, tears of forgiving sorrow—tears that in the sight of God heaped burning coals on the unforgiving heart that had cast him forth.

The sudden stoppage of the vehicle recalled him to himself from the thoughts in which he had been plunged, and, looking from the window, he saw that they had arrived at the door of the residence of Father Eustace. Edwin knocked very timidly; for, although he knew much of the goodness of Father Eustace, he felt very shy and awkward in coming to him thus, an outcast and a wanderer. He knew very well, however, how kindly the good old priest would receive him, but he was altogether unprepared for the reception which he did receive. He saw the door open quickly; he saw the benevolent pitying face of him who opened it; he saw the outstretched arms and the eager look; he felt those arms fold him again and again to as warm a heart as ever beat in human breast, and he saw and felt no more till he found himself in Father Eustace's little room, sitting in the softest place on the simple couch, with the same kind arms clasping him closer and closer still, and pillowing his aching head, as tenderly as his own mother might have done, upon his breast. It was too much; and, as he listened to the soothing voice that whispered so gently in his ear, "My poor boy, my dear, dear child, you are at home here. There, there, don't cry so my child; don't give way so much; you will be happy here; this is your home till you can find a better; Father Eustace will never forsake you;" and as he felt the arms that pressed him so tenderly again and again, the forced restraint gave way, and, after trying several times to kiss one of the hands that clasped his, but trying in vain, it was always most perversely drawn away, he laid his head down upon the friendly breast and sobbed without restraint. Father Eustace did not endeavor to check him, for he knew that it would do him good to relieve his feelings in this manner; very soon, however, it became too much for Father Eustace too, for, after his countenance had undergone some very curious contortions, he several times blew his nose very loudly and very ostentatiously, as if he had suddenly discovered that he had taken a very bad cold; but, finding this unavailing, he very simply put his handkerchief aside altogether, and allowed the tears to run down his kind old face without control, as if he were not in the least ashamed of them, and as if they were not a disgrace to his gray hairs; only, ever and anon, as poor Edwin sobbed more violently, he made a mighty effort to recover himself, and succeeded so well that several times he was able to articulate, almost audibly and distinctly, "My poor boy, my brave child, you don't know how dearly poor old Father Eustace loves you. There, there, there; don't cry, that's a dear child." But, unfortunately for the value of his advice, whenever he got thus far he infallibly began to cry himself harder than ever, and so at last he gave it up as a bad business, and did not attempt to speak at all, but contented himself with soothing the weeping boy as best he might without the use of his tongue, which, as is usual with that unruly member, had become altogether rebellious, with this difference, however, that where it generally will not be restrained from speaking too much, in this case it absolutely refused to speak at all.

We have often heard, and we believe it to be true, that there are angels always waiting to carry to the face of God such tears as those shed by Father Eustace and poor Edwin on this occasion; but we must wait until we shall have entered "the better land" before we can know how dear, how precious, and how holy they are in His sight, and how carefully the remembrance of them is treasured up in the Divine mind.

Father Eustace would not allow Edwin to speak all that day of what had happened, but next morning, when they were both more composed, they had a long chat about Edwin's future prospects. Edwin told his friend that ever since he had thought about becoming a Catholic he had felt a very strong desire to devote himself to the service of the altar, but that he saw no immediate prospect of carrying his desire into effect; but that whatever he might do at present, he would not willingly lose sight of this object. The answer of Father Eustace filled him with gratitude and joy.

"My child," began Father Eustace, "you have acted throughout this affair with noble courage and resolution, and having thrown yourself so devotedly into the arms of Divine Providence, He, who does not allow a sparrow to fall to the ground without His permission, has not been behindhand with you. Yes, my child, you may say with the holy Psalmist, 'My father and my mother have cast me off, but the Lord hath taken me up.' I confess I have sometimes trembled for your resolution, when I considered the fearful odds opposed to you in this struggle. I dare say you have sometimes wondered that during our intercourse I have never held out to you the slightest prospect of any temporal help or assistance in the event of your father casting you off, should you become a Catholic. I did so advisedly, for I was anxious, my dear child, that your merit and your crown should suffer no diminution, but that your triumph should be for God alone, and that no man might be able to say that you had one single earthly object to gain in becoming a Catholic. But I did not forget your interests. A few weeks ago, when I perceived that matters were coming to a crisis, and feeling that after the wonderful way in which God had shown His love towards you, that He would most probably call you to the service of His holy altar, I wrote to my ecclesiastical superior, and put your case before him. I, yesterday, about an hour before you came to me, received, providentially I may say, his answer. The first thing you have to do is to get as strong as possible, for you are sadly shattered, my poor child," continued Father Eustace, with some asperity of tone, as if he were thinking rather severely of him who had caused poor Edwin's weakness by his hardness. "Yes, you must get quite strong and well as soon as possible. I'm sure I need not tell you that you are as welcome as a prince to all that my poor dwelling can give you, and for the next few weeks you will live virtually with me; not a word now, or I will not say another syllable of what I have to tell you. I say you will live virtually with me; for, thinking that your father might say that I had entrapped you away did you come to me altogether, I have thought it better to take for you a nice little parlor and bedroom in the next street to this, in the house of a good old widow, one of the most fervent members of my congregation; and poor old Mrs. Martin is so proud at the bare notion of having you for a lodger, that she is scarcely able to restrain her exultation within due bounds. She has been here three times already this morning, to ask me when you will be going to her, and what day she is to have everything ready for you. You will come here to mass every day; and of course you will stay and breakfast with me. Then we can take a little walk, and come home for our simple dinner, and if you don't stay to tea with me, why I will go with you, and give poor old Mrs. Martin an opportunity of bringing out her best set of china; and so you see, my child, we shall be always together, whilst at the same time you will be living in your own lodgings. Now, dry those tears immediately," continued Father Eustace, in a very suspicious tone of voice, as Edwin began to show unmistakable signs of breaking out afresh, "or I shall be quite cross, I declare I shall," he added, getting up and going to the window, which was in itself rather a strange and suspicious proceeding, as the street outside was perfectly quiet, and nothing whatever going on to justify him in looking out so intently. He seemed, too, to experience a slight return of the sudden cold he had taken the day before; for, before he returned to the side of Edwin, he had found it necessary to make a very noisy use of his handkerchief, and when he did return at last, his eyes looked quite red and moist; but we all know that this is one of the effects of a bad cold, and so we have no sufficient grounds for concluding that Father Eustace had been crying again. Perhaps, however, the angels could tell us; and even supposing he had, although no doubt our good friend, bluff old Mr. Brown, might blame him for it, we scarcely could.

"Yes, my child," resumed Father Eustace, "you must spend the next few weeks in quietness and repose. During this time you can prepare yourself to be formally received into the Church, and for the great happiness of your first communion. Then, when you are quite strong and well, you can go to the College of——, which I am authorized to tell you is open to receive you whenever you think fit to enter it. You can spend a few months there, and if you should find that your vocation is not for the Church, it will have done you no harm to have spent some time in the seclusion and retirement of college life. If, on the contrary, you are called to the service of the altar, you can complete your studies there; and so you see, my dear child," continued Father Eustace, as Edwin pressed his hand, and looked all the grateful thankfulness which his tongue refused to speak, "so you see how Providence has been watching over you all this time, and has provided you with another home in place of the one you have so courageously forsaken for His love. Oh!" continued the good old man, "the wonderful, wonderful ways of Providence—the Providence that reacheth from end to end mightily—that ordereth all things sweetly."

At this juncture the old servant opened the door, and Frank Seymour hurriedly entered, and running up to Edwin, took both his hands in his own, and embraced him most affectionately. After the first salutations were over, Frank turned and paid his respects to Father Eustace.

"I really must apologize sir, for this apparent intrusion, but I am sure you will pardon me; for, having heard of what had happened, I could not rest until I had found my friend Edwin, and taken the first opportunity of assuring him of my deep sympathy with him in his trials and affliction. The fact is papa went up yesterday to call upon Mr. Stanhope, and at once perceived that something serious had happened. When old Johnson, the butler, answered the bell, papa was astonished to see that his eyes were quite red and inflamed, as if he had been crying. 'What is the matter, Johnson?' said papa, 'are you ill?' 'Oh! no, sir, I am quite well,' answered Johnson, laying a strong emphasis upon the 'I'; but poor master Edwin, sir,' and here the honest old fellow began to blubber to such an extent that papa declared that it became quite infectious. 'Master Edwin,' cried papa, in great alarm, 'for God's sake what has happened? Is he ill? Is he at home?' 'No' sir,' answered Johnson, 'he isn't at home; he has no home now; this is no longer his home, sir, leastways', he added most emphatically, 'so Mr. Stanhope says, sir.' Papa was so astonished that he could scarcely speak, but after a time he begged Johnson to sit down, and tell him what had happened, Johnson, however, refused to sit down; but turning away his face from papa, and appearing to discover that the brass handle of the door required polishing very much, for he continued rubbing it incessantly, he managed, with many interruptions, to tell papa the whole story. 'You sees sir,' concluded Johnson, 'I have lived in this family nearly thirty years now, and I hope I know my place, sir. I don't presume to judge Mr. Stanhope, sir,' he continued, in a tone of voice which insinuated that he did judge him, and severely, too; 'of course, he knows what is best; but you see, sir, that when Master Edwin was a little boy I have carried him on my back so often, and have heard him say so often, too, 'O Johnson, you are a dear old fellow, and I like you very much,' that I cannot help loving him, sir. When his poor mamma was lying dead in the house, and I took him up to see her for the last time, I can't forget, sir, how he put his poor little arms round my old neck, and kissed me, and said that I was very good, and that his dear dead mamma would not forget me, now that she was a bright angel in heaven, and that he would always love me very much; and I can't forget, too, sir,' continued poor old Johnson, blubbering as if his heart were broken, 'how on the night after the funeral, when Mr. Stanhope was locked up in his room, as he is now, poor Master Edwin stole down to me, and fell asleep in my arms, and whispered ever so often in his sleep, 'mamma, dear mamma, poor old Johnson is very good to me, and I love him very much,—'—and here Johnson went behind the door, and papa saw him take his handkerchief from his pocket, and cry like a little child. Papa declares that he was almost as much affected as poor old Johnson during this conversation. 'Yes, sir,' continued Johnson at last, very emphatically, 'I hope I know my place, sir, as I said before, and that it doesn't become me to judge my master, as he ought to know what is best; but although they say that Master Edwin is going to be a Papist, and I am sorry for it, still I can't forget and I don't want to forget how good and loving he has always been to me, and if he had become a Turk, I wouldn't have turned him out: but of course Mr. Stanhope knows what is best; but you see, sir, I can't forget, and I don't want to forget. Oh dear! Oh dear! Poor Master Edwin, poor Master Edwin, my poor boy, my poor young master!'

"When Johnson had finished his story, papa sent up a message desiring to see Mr. Stanhope, but, although the servant knocked repeatedly, and although he heard his master groaning inside, there was no answer; and papa came home after asking old Johnson if he knew where you had gone, and learning from him that he had given orders for the cab to drive here by your directions. I saw that something was wrong with papa, for he scarcely spoke during dinner, and instead of staying some time in the dining-room, as he usually does, he came up almost immediately to the drawing-room, and when we were all sitting round the fire, wondering what had happened to make papa so silent and gloomy, even at the Christmas time, he suddenly said, 'Frank, my boy, come over here and sit by me, whilst I tell you all a very sorrowful story,' and then in his own dear, hearty, simple way, he told us poor Edwin's tale; 'and, Frank,' he added, clasping my hand, and pressing it very tightly, 'Frank, my boy, I should be very sorry to see you follow Edwin's example; but if you did, I should still be more sorry to see myself following the example of his father. I couldn't do it; God knows I couldn't, and I'm very glad that I couldn't; and go the very first thing in the morning and find out this poor boy, and tell him that he must come here, and stay as long as ever he likes, and that mother and I will make him as welcome and happy as though he were our own;' and thus, sir," concluded Frank, turning to Father Eustace, "you have a true history of the reason of my intrusion on you this morning, and I hope you will use all your influence with my friend, Edwin, to induce him to accept dear papa's invitation."

It would be useless to endeavor to say how much poor Edwin felt this act of spontaneous kindness and consideration; but he was firm in his resolution of remaining where he was for the present, as he knew it was the best position for him in every way; and when Frank had seen more of the kindness of Father Eustace towards Edwin, he ceased to press him, after his friend had promised to come and see them very often.

The two friends and Father Eustace then had a long talk, on various matters, Father Eustace and Frank vying with each other in their efforts to amuse Edwin, and to render him more cheerful and happy; and Frank willingly consented to remain and dine with them, as the good old priest pressed him to do.

The wine-cellar of Father Eustace was not very extensive, either as regarded the quantity it contained, or the variety of his stock; but still, by dint of groping and searching, he managed to produce a bottle of his best; "that," he remarked, "which he brought out only on the very greatest occasions;" and by the time it had gone round once or twice, poor Edwin felt more happy, cheerful, and composed than he had done for many months; and when, next morning, he sat down to write to his sister, he was able to do so in a tone comparatively cheerful and full of hope.

CHAPTER XV.

LIGHT AT LAST.—FEARS.—FRANK SEYMOUR IS VERY RASH.

AFTER remaining two or three days with Father Eustace, Edwin, to the great delight of old Mrs. Martin, removed to his own lodgings. They were very snug and comfortable, and the honest old creature was unwearied in her attention to his wants. Like most of her sex she was a little given to gossip, and when she happened to fall in with any of her friends (and, somehow, this did happen very frequently), the warm-hearted old woman used to wax quite eloquent on the subject of her lodger, and his many virtues, and not a little indignant when she spoke—as she usually did rather freely—about the harshness and pride of his father.

Edwin remained with her about three months, and, with the drawback of his father's continued unrelenting, and his separation from his sister, he began to feel very happy. The tempest had passed away, and the sky was already clearing, and growing very bright. He was in almost hourly communication with his dear friend, Father Eustace, and after having received conditional baptism, and otherwise prepared himself, he had had, on the festival of the Purification of our Blessed Lady, the inestimable happiness of making his first communion.

We might, indeed, endeavor to describe in some feeble way what Edwin felt on this joyful occasion; but such of our readers as have experienced the same blessing, and more especially such as may have made their first communion in circumstances somewhat similar to those under which Edwin made his, will understand the emotions of his warm young heart on that happy day much better than we could describe them. Those who may not have had this happiness would not understand us, did we take up pages in attempting to portray the feelings of a heart in which faith and love are bright and warm, when, for the first time, its Lord and its God comes to take up His abode within it, comes to make it wholly His, comes to draw it entirely to Himself, to make it the object of His own divine complacency, and the recipient of His choicest graces. Suffice it to say, that when an hour after he had received, Father Eustace softly approached the kneeling boy, and gently touched him on the shoulder, to warn him that he was about to depart, there was a look on his face, as he raised it for a moment from his hands, which the good old priest never forgot,—a look in which faith, and love, and angel-like innocence seemed striving for the mastery,—a look which told of more than words can express; and it was with something very like awe that Father Eustace gazed upon the upturned face, and the gushing eyes, and his own tears flowed fast upon the child of his affections as Edwin softly whispered:—

"Dear Father Eustace, a little longer,—a few moments more,—all is brightness now,—the winter is past, and the rain is over and gone,—I have found Him whom my soul loveth, I have held Him, and will not let Him go,—my heart is breaking with very love and joy,—O leave me with my God. O my Jesus, my God, my all," he murmured, again burying his face in his hands, and bowing himself almost to the earth, as Father Eustace turned softly and even reverently away, leaving the poor lamb with the Good Shepherd, who had sought it out in so wonderful a manner, and brought it home to Himself, to rest upon His gentle breast, and to find there its solace and its recompense for all that was past and gone.

Edwin was most anxious to depart for college as soon as possible, but Father Eustace would not allow him to set out.

"No, my child; you must get very strong and very well before I can allow you to depart," was the continual answer of Father Eustace to all his entreaties to be allowed to go at once. "College life is very severe, and only strong men must undertake it; but rest content awhile, and I and poor old Mrs. Martin will nurse you, and make you strong; and then I will go down with you, and you shall commence your ecclesiastical studies at once."

But although they nursed him tenderly and with never flagging care, poor Edwin found it hard work to get well. He sometimes felt so weary, and his bones ached so much, that he wondered what it could be, and whether he should ever be quite well again. Although Father Eustace pretended to be very confident upon the point, and labored very hard to deceive even himself, still, as he watched the unearthly brilliance which so often shone in the large dark eyes, and the sudden flush which so often mantled on the fair young cheeks—as he listened, too, with sad apprehension to the labored breathing, which was brought on by the least exertion, and saw the struggle which threatened to ensue between body and soul for the conquest of the brave young boy—even he, in the solitude of his own chamber, would often wonder, too, whether poor Edwin would ever be quite well again, or whether the trials and anxieties of the past few months might not have altogether broken down the naturally weak constitution of his young friend. "God forbid that it should be so," would he often whisper to himself, "yet, O my God, he is in Thy hands, and Thou art a loving Father, do what seems best to Thee;" and drying his eyes, he would rejoice his friend—his child as he called him—with a smiling face, and talk to him with a confidence which he himself was far from feeling.

At the end of three months, however, he seemed something stronger, and at last Father Eustace gave way to his entreaties to be allowed to depart. He had not seen his sister since they parted, for Father Eustace had advised Edwin not to endeavor to do so, for fear of irritating Mr. Stanhope still more. Old Johnson, however, had several times come to see him, and brought him a thousand tender messages from Maria, and had taken back to her a full account of all his future designs, and how happy he was. There was seldom an evening on which Frank Seymour did not walk down to the house of Father Eustace to see his friend, and the three were very pleasant and happy together.

"You see, Edwin," Frank would often say, laughing as he spoke, "I consider that you have been a very foolish, headstrong fellow, and if I treated you as you deserve, I should never come to see you at all, nor expose myself to the danger of being converted against my will by Father Eustace there, who is smiling at the very idea of making a convert of such a stanch Protestant as I am. Your papa declares that it is all the fault of Father Eustace, who has seduced you by his Jesuitical wiles. He declares, too, that when you know more of your adopted religion you will soon be disgusted with it, and that you will be at his feet in less than six months, begging his pardon for your apostasy, as he calls it. I confess that I don't share his opinion on this point, and that only goes to prove what an amiable fellow I must be to come here almost every evening at such a risk, and with so little prospect of gaining you back. But I was always too soft-hearted by half, and you know how much I always liked you, and so, you see, as poor old Johnson says, I can't help it, and I don't want to help it; and if you are only half as happy in your adopted religion as I pray you may be, you will be happy indeed. Meanwhile, I give Father Eustace there full warning that he need not endeavor to try any of his arts on me, for he won't succeed; so, sir," shaking his hand playfully at Father Eustace, "you had better spare yourself any unnecessary trouble."

"God knows, my dear young friend," Father Eustace would answer; "and we shall see. Although you won't let me try to convert you, you can't prevent me from praying for you; and Edwin there, is, I know, determined to take heaven by storm, so you had better take care too, for I am one of those old-fashioned folks who have great faith in the power of prayer, and, perhaps, we shall convert you after all. Take care, my young friend, take care."

CHAPTER XVI.

HOPES REALIZED.—UNRELENTING STILL.—THE PROUD MAN PAYS ANOTHER INSTALMENT OF THE PRICE OF HIS VICTORY.

Edwin was charmed with his college and its peaceful regular routine of life. He entered at once with all the enthusiastic eagerness of his nature into the spirit of the state to which he fondly hoped Almighty God had called him. It was the realization of all that he had desired and longed for during his former life, and now that he had found it, it is no wonder that he took it up most warmly. Perhaps nothing had produced such an effect upon him as the conduct of those amongst whom he had now been thrown. The self-restraint, the modesty, and the retiring but constant piety of his fellow-students, were so different from what he had been accustomed to see in the conduct of the few youths with whom he had mingled, that it produced a most deep and lasting impression upon him. Father Eustace had come down with Edwin, and when he was on the eve of departing, after a stay of a few days, and they were taking leave of each other, Edwin, in answer to a question from Father Eustace, as to whether he felt sure that he was happy said, "Father Eustace, my more than father, I cannot tell you how happy I am; happier far than I ever hoped or deserved to be. If by any chance I could have come here before I was converted, I don't know of anything which would have had such an effect in converting me as the sight of my dear fellow-students; and as a last and parting prayer, I have to ask of you, dear Father Eustace, that you will often implore for me grace not to dishonor the holy state I have chosen,—grace not to be blind to the bright examples of virtue which I see around me. I shall never forget your goodness, my own dear, dear father, and I pray God to give me an opportunity of showing how much I value and appreciate it."

"My dear child," answered Father Eustace, taking Edwin in his arms, "farewell, farewell. The little kindness that I have shown you is but a tithe of what I would do for you, my noble, brave-hearted boy, were it in my power. God Almighty have you in His holy keeping, and fill you with His grace. Don't forget poor old Father Eustace in your prayers; take great care of your health, and write to me every week. God bless you, my child! God bless you!"

Week succeeded week, and month succeeded month, and they passed away so quickly, because so happily, that Edwin was almost astonished when Father Eustace reminded him, in his usual weekly note, that he had been at college four months. The change of air seemed to have had a beneficial effect upon his health; for, although still very weak and delicate, he thought that he was decidedly better. The only drawback to his happiness was the continued harshness of his father, who continued as unrelenting as ever; but his sorrow for this was now chastened and subdued, and applying himself with all the fervor of his soul to the acquiring of the perfection of his state, he left his troubles about his father confidently and lovingly in the hands of God, knowing that He would bring everything about as should seem best to His infinite wisdom.

Whilst Edwin's days are thus gliding away in peace and tranquil happiness at his college, what of the proud man who has spurned him from his heart? A little more bent, his hair a little grayer, and his form a little thinner, but prouder, sterner, and more unforgiving than ever,—nursing his evil feelings as he broods over his imaginary wrongs, till at times the unfeeling devil, who is his master, is rampant in his proud heart, goading him on almost to madness, as he whispers his evil suggestions to him, torturing his proud soul with his black insinuations, bringing before him, as he sits in the gloom of his dark room, the picture of a fair young boy hanging about his neck, and whispering a thousand innocent endearments in his ear. Changing, then, the scene, as a gray-haired old priest comes in and leads the boy away, a thousand mocking faces seem to rise before him laughing him to scorn, till he can bear it no longer, but rising madly from his chair, is fain to pace his room with gnashing teeth, if thus, perchance, he may still the raging passions that are almost strong enough to kill him.

For three days after Edwin left him no one saw him, as he remained locked up in his own room, and even Johnson, who took up what simple refreshments he required, always found him in his inner room, whence he did not emerge until the servant had retired. How he spent those days he and his God alone know; but that they were days of fierce and awful conflict with himself his face bore testimony, as on the morning of the fourth he came forth, with a step more stately and prouder than ever, and entered the carriage which was waiting to convey him to his place of business. He met with an unflinching eye the pitying looks of such of his friends as he encountered, for the story had gone abroad; but though his face was perfectly unreadable in its pride and sternness, each look went like a dagger to his heart. For the first three months after their parting there was a hope lingering in the bottom of his heart that his boy would still return to him, and his heart would palpitate violently at each knock at the hall-door, or at the sound of any strange feet in the passage outside his room; but when he found that he did not come, and, most of all, when he learnt that he had gone to college to study for the priesthood, his fury knew no bounds, and he gave full vent to his evil passions. "To think," he would mutter to himself—"to think he could leave me so easily—me, who have loved him as scarcely father ever loved son; leave me for a wily old priest and an idolatrous creed; leave me to the scorn and contempt of a jibing world. My curse upon him for a vile apostate as he is! I will never forgive him, by the God that made me; never, never!"

And thus he fed the sense of the wrong he fancied he had sustained—never thinking for a moment that it was himself who stood most in need of pardon and forgiveness—never for a moment thinking of his boy with feelings of forgiveness and reconciliation, except in union with that submission to his will and that rejection of his adopted religion which he knew in his heart that Edwin would never make.

There was in his study, hanging over the fireplace, a large full-length portrait of Edwin taken when he was about fifteen years of age. He would sit for hours, almost unconsciously gazing upon it, and plunged into the deepest and most bitter thought. About a month after Edwin had gone to college, and when his bitter feelings were keenest, he had come home from the city one day more irritated and passionate than usual. Walking straight to his room, he locked himself in, and throwing himself upon a chair, his eyes rested as usual upon the picture. He sat thus for nearly an hour, and whether it were that his good angel was at work trying to soften the proud heart, or whether the remembrance of bygone days was fitting round him with a chastening influence, we know not; but the tears began to flow quickly down his pale cheek as he sat with his head resting upon his hand. Suddenly coming to himself, he started to his feet, and stood for a moment with clenched hands and contracted brow; then pulling the bell violently, as the old butler hurriedly entered the room, he said, pointing with his hand to the picture, but with averted face—"Johnson, take that—that—thing—away; and mind that I never see it again. No," he muttered, pacing backwards and forwards with hasty steps, "I will never forgive him—never—never—never." And then he sat down again, looking for awhile upon the blank space where the picture had been, till he turned away and hid his head upon his desk, and wept for his poor empty heart—wept in the stillness and darkness of the night, even for his lost, lost boy.

He received several letters from Edwin, who wrote to him in a most affectionate manner, begging his pardon if he had shown any want of due respect and deference towards him, candidly telling him, that were the step to be taken again a thousand times, he would feel equally bound to take it—and when he came to this part, Mr. Stanhope cast the letters passionately away from him—but that, in the manner of taking it, there was, perhaps, something to beg pardon for, asking him to remember the days gone by and all their former love, telling him how happy he was, and that the only thing needed to render his happiness complete was his father's forgiveness, assuring him that, whatever might happen, or wherever he might be, he could never forget his duty and love toward his dear father and his sister.

These letters were never answered, but were always returned to Edwin with a formal note from one of the clerks, intimating that he wrote, by Mr. Stanhope's orders, to Mr. Edwin Stanhope, to inform him that Mr. Stanhope had no desire to enter into any correspondence with him, and begged not to be troubled with any more letters.

And so he went his way, nursing his pride, even whilst it steeled his heart against his own son. He was kind, as usual, to his daughter, but would never allow her to introduce the mention of her brother's name. He had quarrelled with Mr. Seymour, who had spoken to him very freely on the subject of his son. Whilst the warm-hearted old man was in the middle of an eloquent, because warm and honest, expostulation with him, Mr. Stanhope interrupted him, coldly saying:—"When I require your advice on the management of my domestic affairs, sir, I will ask you for it. 'Till then I will trouble you, sir, to keep it to yourself." And, turning on his heel, he stalked proudly and haughtily away. He transacted his business as usual; he frequented the church as usual; he was in the world almost as much as usual, and casual observers remarked but little change in him, and wondered to see him bear his troubles so well. But, in the midst of his business, at church, or in the world, there were moments when, although a shadow that was dark and very gloomy flitted over his countenance, still the face grew less stern and haughty, and his pride seemed to be giving way,—moments when he looked so worn and weary, that in very truth it rent the heart to see him,—many, many moments when that old look came over him, telling in an instant its tale of grief and pain,—telling, although he flattered himself that he had conquered, of the bitter, crushing price of the victory he had gained.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE SHADOWS THICKEN.—OLD JOHNSON CAN'T HELP IT, AND DOESN'T WANT TO HELP IT.

One morning, towards the middle of September, Father Eustace, who had become very uneasy at not having heard from Edwin for several weeks past, received a letter from the Superior of the College, informing him that his young friend was very unwell, and begging him to run down as soon as possible to see him.

Father Eustace turned very pale as he read, and when he had finished the letter, he put it aside with a very sad and troubled air, and covering his face with his hands, remained some time buried in sorrowful and foreboding thought. He had long felt that it would be so, and somehow he was not at all astonished at receiving this news; but for a moment he was crushed. He gathered from the letter that Edwin had about a month before caught a very severe cold; that it had baffled all the skill of the physician, and seemed to have settled upon the lungs of its victim, who was in a very weak and debilitated state. Edwin's courage at the time of his conversion, and his gentle and affectionate demeanor during their subsequent intercourse, had so endeared him to the good old priest, that he felt this illness of his dear young friend more keenly than even he himself liked to admit. He was resigned to the will of God, but he felt that it would be a very heavy blow to him, should the Good Shepherd take the innocent boy for ever to Himself. He felt that there would be one tie more, and that, perhaps, the strongest, loosed between himself and the world; and although he felt, and felt most surely, that his own loss would be the eternal gain of his young friend, still it would be a loss to him, and nature shrank and trembled as she contemplated it.

He sat down to his desk with a moist eye and an aching heart, and wrote a few lines to Maria, breaking the sad news to her, but speaking of it as lightly as possible, and describing it as probably a mere passing illness from which he might soon recover. Father Eustace had a sad presentiment that it would not be so, and he feared that he was hoping against hope. He started at once for the college, and as soon as he saw Edwin his worst fears were realized. Edwin was up and dressed, reclining upon a couch, and as Father Eustace hurriedly entered, he stretched out both his hands, with the same gentle, innocent smile upon his face that Father Eustace had so often seen before, and putting his arms around the old man's neck, kissed him upon both cheeks, and then laid his head upon that breast which had once before pillowed it so gently and so lovingly, and burst into tears. Father Eustace looked for a moment upon the eye, at once so sunken and so bright. He saw the flush upon the drawn and hollow cheek. He saw the blue veins in all their painful distinctness upon the broad and white brow, and in the poor shrunken hands. He listened with all the quickened perceptions of love to the slow, heavy breathing, and he saw at a glance that his child was the victim of that dread and treacherous disease, which, seizing as it ever does, upon the fairest, purest children of the earth, snatches them away from us, even then when it has so refined and purified their grosser part that we can least afford to lose them;—snatches them away from us after it has made them most angel-like and heavenly, and whilst we would gladly lay down our own lives to keep them with us, laughs at our impotent efforts to cheat it of its prey;—snatches them from us when the eye is brightest and the cheek most rosy—leaving us, when all is over, but a poor, wasted, shrunken form, as fair, but as fleeting and as fragile, as the pure white flowers which affection's hand is wont to strew around it.

At one glance Father Eustace took in all that was and all that was to be. He knew it; he had watched its progress often before, and he felt that though care and loving watchfulness might keep him to them for a time, it would be only for a time, and that ere long poor Edwin would most surely sleep the sleep that knows no waking. He tried hard to restrain himself for the sake of the sick boy, but as he held him in his arms, and all these thoughts rushed in an instant through his brain, it was too much, and he could only clasp him closer and closer to his breast, and try to whisper something about his soon being better.

"No, dear Father Eustace," answered Edwin, who had caught the words, "I shall never be better. I have long felt this coming on, and I know very well that I shall soon die. But, O Father Eustace, my own best friend, why do you weep so bitterly? I am happy, very, very happy. If I had died a year ago, it might have been different; but now; oh! now; oh! why do you weep? Am I not going to my God, and was it not yourself, my own dear father, who first told me of His goodness and His love? and now you weep to trust me to Him. Dear Father Eustace," he added, fondly looking into the face of the poor old priest, who was sobbing like a child; "dear Father Eustace, I love you very much, but not half as much as you deserve for all your kindness to me. I shall be very sorry to leave you, but I can leave you all for God. I am very, very happy; but," he added, drawing the old priest quite close to him, and whispering in his ear, "take me home, dear Father Eustace, take me home, if you please, for I should like to see my sister once again;" and lowering his voice still more, "I should like to die near him. Oh! don't cry so much; I cannot bear to see you. There, lay me down, for I am very weary. God bless you, dear Father Eustace, God bless you;" and with a pleasant smile upon his face, he fell asleep in the arms of the weeping old man; and as he slept so peacefully and calmly, he surely dreamt of angels and "the better land," if the gentle happiness that smiled upon his fair young face were a faithful index of his visions.

As he had a fancy to return to London, they thought it best to humor him, especially as the physician was of opinion that his native air would be of service to him. They tried to get him away as quietly as possible, but it had gone abroad, and his fellow-students, to whom his gentle manners and ardent piety, together with his sad history, had greatly endeared him, crowded around the carriage as it was about to drive away. He shook hands with all of them, but could not speak. As they drove away, he took a long lingering look at the happy home where he had spent so many pleasant months, and where his example had drawn many a thoughtless heart nearer to its God. "I can bear the rest now," he whispered, as he sank back in the carriage; "I can bear the rest, for the hardest trial is over."

They travelled by easy stages, and he bore the journey pretty well. As they drew near London, although Father Eustace was most urgent with him to go home with him, he, in his thoughtful consideration, persisted in refusing to do so. "No," he answered very quietly, but firmly, "perhaps papa may soften towards me now, when he hears how ill I am; and you know dear Father Eustace, that he would, perhaps, feel awkward in coming to see me at your house. I will go back to poor old Mrs. Martin, who will nurse me very tenderly. Besides I am quite rich, for I have a great part of the £100 left which papa so thoughtfully sent me after we parted. It will be better for us all," and as he seemed anxious about it, Father Eustace consented to the arrangement, more especially as they would be close together. He had only been a few hours in his own lodgings, when Maria, who had been apprized of his arrival by Father Eustace, came, attended by old Johnson, to see him. Once before, during the course of this simple tale, we had to beg our readers to allow us to draw a veil over a certain scene, and we must beg the same indulgence now. Others, perhaps, might be able to do it, but, for our part, we must confess that our mind can neither conceive, nor our pen describe, the holy and sacred scene when the brother and sister looked into each other's eyes once again, and when without uttering a single word, heart spoke to heart, with an eloquence in its language which our feeble pen shrinks from endeavoring to portray.

Meanwhile, poor old Johnson, who had left the sick chamber after the first sad greeting, was sitting, with his eyes very red, in Mrs. Martin's little back room. They had both been crying, and they commenced afresh, as old Johnson said—"You see, Mrs. Martin, I hope I know my place, and it doesn't become me to speak too freely about my betters. Mr. Stanhope has been a very good master to me, and of course he knows what is best; and when I see him so pale and sad, and with such a worn, weary look about him, I feel very sorry for him; but then, when I see poor Master Edwin, and think that in a short time he will surely be an angel in heaven, and when I think of him, as I have known him all these eighteen years, I can't help it, but I must give way. God help me, I can't help it; and," he added more emphatically than ever, "I don't want to help it!"

"God help him" answered Mrs. Martin, rather sharply, "who has caused all this, and soften his proud hard heart."

"Mrs. Martin," responded Johnson, "I hope I know my place, ma'am. It doesn't become me; but," breaking out again, "I can't help it; God help me, I can't help it."

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE END APPROACHES.—THE FATHER'S VICTORY COMPLETE AT LAST.

FOR the first two or three weeks after his return to London, the sick boy was able to go out for an hour or two in a carriage during the heat of the day, but he soon became too weak even for this. He sank very rapidly, and towards the end of October was unable to leave his bed. The faithful hearts that watched around him, began to see but too plainly that hope was gone, and that he must very soon close his eyes upon the world. He had wasted away under the influence of his disease until it was most painful to look upon his poor shrunken form and be obliged to think that his brave young heart must so soon succumb to the insidious foe that had seized upon him, and that no power of man, no force of love, no ardor of devotion could save him. But upon his face, even when his sufferings were the greatest and his pain the most intense, there ever rested the same gentle smile, sadder, perhaps, and more chastened in expression, but loving, patient, sweet as ever. There was the same quick appreciation of every little service rendered to him, and, when he was too weak to speak his thanks, there was something so grateful, so loving, and, above all, so heavenly in the look of his large, dark eye, rendered doubly brilliant by his disease, which went at once with so much force to the hearts of those around him, that there was not one of them who would not willingly have died to save the gentle, patient boy, who never uttered a hasty word in all his pain. From the first moment of his conversion, he had labored most earnestly, and with unflagging diligence, to correct the natural defects which he found within his own heart, and now, when his disease had so purified, and, as it were, so spiritualized his mere animal part by its wasting influence, he was so angel-like, so immaterial, that they moved about his bed with something very near akin to awe, as if they felt that he had already put on some part of that immortality which was so soon to enshroud him in its eternal brightness. He was too weak to speak much, but whenever he saw his sister (who was with him every day) or Father Eustace turn away to hide the tears they could not restrain, he would beckon them to his side, and, as they stooped down to kiss him, would whisper to them,—“I am very, very happy; oh! pray don't weep for me.”

One day he saw poor old Johnson sitting weeping at the foot of his bed, and he beckoned the old man to come nearer to him. When the faithful old servant had seated himself upon the side of the bed, Edwin put out his poor wasted arms, and taking him round the neck, laid his head upon the old man's breast, as he had so often done in his childish days. "Poor old Johnson," he feebly whispered, "you have been very good to me, and I love you very much. I recollect the night you took me up to see my dead mother; I hope to see her soon in heaven now. Johnson, dear Johnson," he continued, very earnestly, "be very careful of poor papa. When I am dead, ask him to come and kiss me before they lay me in the ground, and tell him that I always loved him very much. Poor, poor papa; I know you will be very sorry when I am gone."

Poor old Johnson tried to speak, but in vain. Though his hands were but rough, he laid the sick boy down as tenderly as an angel might have done, and, withdrawing into the next room, sat for a long, long time behind the door, with his face between his hands, refusing to be comforted.

Maria came every morning after Mr. Stanhope had left for the city, and, remaining all the day with Edwin, returned home in time to meet her father at the usual dinner hour. The sick boy used to follow her with his eyes as she moved softly about the room, performing a thousand little offices of love, and a happy smile always passed across his pale face as she came over to the bed, and, smoothing his pillow, sat down by his side. When his pains were greatest he always turned his face to her, and laid his head upon her bosom till they had passed away. When she was about to leave him for the night, and bent over him to kiss him ere she went, for the last few nights of his life, he always drew her quite close to him, and, in addition to his usual "Good bye, dear, good bye," softly added, "Poor, poor papa; give my love to poor papa." When she had left, her place was usually taken for the night by Father Eustace; so that, night or day, there was always a gentle hand for his to rest in, and a loving eye to meet his gaze as it looked its never-varying tale of grateful thankfulness.

Mr. Stanhope had never asked a question, but he knew very well that his son had returned to London and was ill. How ill he knew not, and his pride would not allow him to inquire. He knew, too, that Maria was in constant communication with her brother, and he did not attempt to forbid it. He was, in fact, more tender than ever towards her, as if he were anxious—as in his innermost heart no doubt he was—to show his gratitude for her love towards his lost boy. He would fain have gone himself to the bed-side of his child, but pride was his master even yet. Had he not sworn never to look upon his face again, and should he—he who had been so cruelly wronged—be the first to submit? What would men say? What would the world think? It could not be. Maria often essayed to speak to him of Edwin, and he listened, oh! how eagerly, to hear whether he retracted and sent the expected message of submission; but, as soon as he had heard that his boy was steadfast yet, he would hear no more, but hurry away to his own room, whence he would come forth no more that night.

During the day, on the evening of which this story opened, Edwin had appeared so much better, and had spoken so cheerfully and hopefully, that Father Eustace, who was quite worn out, left him in charge of Mrs. Martin, and, promising to return very early in the morning, had gone home.

It was but the last expiring flicker of the lamp ere it went out; and Mrs. Martin, observing, about an hour after Father Eustace had left, a very serious and unmistakable change in Edwin, had, at his request, hurriedly sent for the old priest. Upon his arrival, Father Eustace saw at a glance that the time was come, and that the fatal change was near at hand. The flush had departed, and the bright eye was closed; the perspiration stood in cold drops upon his brow, and his breathing sounded with a painful distinctness through the still, quiet room. He was almost unable to speak, but was perfectly sensible, and as Father Eustace took his hand and whispered in his ear, "My dear child, would you like to receive once more your Lord and your God—the Good Shepherd who is about to take you to Himself for evermore, and to carry you away to never-ending bliss?" he pressed the hand that held his own, and opened his eyes with an anxious, longing look. The last whispered confession was over; the innocent young soul once more absolved, and left in solemn communion with the God who had come to be Himself the pledge for all that waited for his coming in the land above.

After some minutes he opened his eyes again, and with some difficulty managed to whisper, "My sister; my poor, dear papa."

Father Eustace interpreted his wish, and hastily leaving the room, called a cab, and bade the driver hurry with all possible haste to the house of Mr. Stanhope. The distance was very short, and they soon arrived. Bidding the driver wait, and giving Johnson, who opened the door, a hurried account of the state of Edwin, Father Eustace followed him to the drawing-room, and entered almost simultaneously with him.

Mr. Stanhope and his daughter were sitting together, and both turned pale and started to their feet as he entered. Mr. Stanhope frowned haughtily upon him, and seemed inclined to leave the room. Father Eustace heeded him not. "I come, sir," said the old man, with the tears trickling down his face, "from the deathbed of your son, and that, I trust, will be a sufficient apology for my intrusion upon your privacy. As pure and noble a heart as ever breathed upon earth is even now growing cold, and the last word your boy uttered was your name. Surely you will now forget all that is past, and not allow the last wish of your own child to remain ungratified? Surely you will come and see him ere he die; and if you would do so, you must indeed use every haste."

Mr. Stanhope's lips quivered, and his face grew ghastly pale. He tried to appear firm, but he failed, for he trembled with the excess of his feelings. He tried to be haughty and sarcastic as he answered Father Eustace; but he failed, too, in this most miserably.

"I am astonished," he gasped rather than spoke, "I am astonished at your assurance, sir. By your arts and wiles you have deluded and led my boy astray. You have robbed me of my child," he continued most bitterly; "you have made me a laughing-stock to the world—you have made my home desolate—and now you dare to come to me with this story, which I dare say is false. You—you, who have done all this, dare to appear before me with this plausible tale, that to-morrow you may proudly boast to your fellows how you brought us together—how you finally conquered me, and laid me at the feet of an apostate. You don't know me, sir," he continued fiercely, and trembling with passion; "you don't know me, sir, or you would not thus appear before me."

"Sir," answered Father Eustace, struggling hard to keep down his indignation, "I scorn your insinuations, and I pardon your harsh expressions. This is no time for bandying words. I call to witness the God who is to judge us both," he continued, solemnly, and raising his hand to heaven, "that your only son is dying, perhaps even now is dead. Will you come with me or not, for I cannot delay?"

"No," he muttered hoarsely, "no, he has gone his way, I will go mine."

Father Eustace turned away to leave the room, and Maria followed him. As they went out at the door Mr. Stanhope stood watching them, with a face like that of a man in fearful agony. His brow grew knotted, and the cold sweat rolled in large drops down his face. He bit his lip till the blood gushed out, and his clenched hands quivered and trembled like aspen leaves. He stood thus until he heard the hall-door close and the cab drive away, and then with a fearful groan he threw himself into a chair, and grasping its sides till all the blood rushed from his hands with the force of the pressure, sat wrestling with the evil passions that were killing him. He knew that his son was dying. He had seen it in the face of the priest, and in the face of his daughter. He felt it in his heart, and he yearned towards his child. He could have given half his fortune to anyone who would have taken him out by force and carried him to the bed-side of his son; but he could not move himself. The devil in his heart was too much his master to resign his dominion so easily. He had held undivided sway too long to give way now, although his victim struggled fearfully beneath his clutch. He sat, deadly pale, listening to the ticking of the clock as it sounded so distinctly through the quiet room, listening to the winter wind as it moaned and howled 'round the house, seeming in every gust to toll of death and blasted hopes. One hour—two hours—and still she was absent. When would she return to tell him that his boy was better, and the danger over? No footstep yet—no carriage drawing near and stopping at the door; nothing—nothing but the moaning, sighing wind with its tale of death, and the hurried beating of his own withered heart.

Death! death! death! sighs the wind without, as he starts from his chair at last, and with his head uncovered, rushes madly from the house into the cold, wet street.

* * * * *

CHAPTER XIX.

ANOTHER VICTORY, AND A REAL ONE.—PEACE.

They hurried back with all speed, and hastened to the room of the dying boy. As they softly entered he opened his eyes for a moment, and as he recognized Father Eustace, his sister, and old Johnson, his eyes lighted up for an instant with something of its old fire, and he greeted them with the loving smile which they were so soon to see no more. He looked anxiously past them as if expecting some one else, and for a moment a shadow flitted across his face as he saw they were alone. It passed away, however, in an instant, as he made an effort to raise his hand, which held a crucifix, to his lips. He was too weak, and the hand fell back listlessly upon the coverlet; but Father Eustace, interpreting his desire, raised it to his lips, and he kissed the crucifix with all his remaining energy. They knelt around his bed, for they felt that the solemn change was at hand. They watched the awful and mysterious shadow as it crept across his face, and they knew that the young heart would very soon be cold and still. Slower and slower still, each breath more labored, more heavy, and more painful than the one before. The storm outside is lushed, and the wind has died away to a solemn moan, as it seems to wail for the brave young heart that is passing to its God—wails for the hopes that are dead, for the stricken hearts that are ready to break with very grief. Earth to earth! Dust to dust! Ashes to ashes! Slower and slower still. God be with him now! Another feeble smile as he seems to recognize a well-known voice, which strives, but almost in vain, to utter the Church's parting prayer: "Go forth, O Christian soul; in the name of God the Father who created thee; in the name of God the Son who suffered for thee; in the name of God the Holy Ghost who sanctified thee; in the name of the angels and archangels, the cherubim and seraphim; in the name of the patriarchs and prophets, of the holy apostles and evangelists, of the holy martyrs, confessors and virgins; in the name of all the saints of God; let thy place be this day in peace, and thy abode in holy Zion." Another look full of faith and love, and peace ineffable, as he gazes for the last time on the crucifix which the old priest holds before his glazing eye; another effort to form with his pallid lips the saving names, and a pure and brave young heart has passed away to his eternal rest.

Earth to earth! Dust to dust! Ashes to ashes! But the SOUL; and, oh! let us thank God as we say it, the free, the immortal soul, into the loving hand that gave it, to be taken up and laid so gently on that mercy-breathing breast, to be carried home for ever to Himself.

Now, whilst a solemn voice is sounding through the room, striving with the sobs which choke its utterance, "Come to his assistance all you saints of God, meet him all you angels, receive his soul, and present it now before its Lord;" close with a gentle and a reverent hand the bright young eyes that have looked their last upon the world; fold his arms, meekly and humbly, across his breast, and place in the cold still hands the crucifix which in life he loved so well; let the heavy curtains fall, and draw them closely around the sacred presence of the dead. Yet, pause a moment—that the pale and haggard man who is rushing in at the door, with such a fearful cry upon his lips, may gaze for an instant upon the work of his own hands ere he throws himself with frantic grief upon the lifeless form.

Leave them alone, the father and son. Leave them alone as the wind howls, and moans more sadly than ever; leave them alone through the darkness of the night, and as the shadows thicken round them, each time that he dares to raise his eyes and look upon the calm and placid face of the dead, let him think of that other fearful night when he swore by his Maker's name never to look upon that face again; and let his proud heart wither, and bend, and break, as he thinks how faithfully he has kept his oath.

And, for thee, poor boy, peace be with thee! Though our hearts were heavy as we laid thee in thy early grave, and though we often, even yet, are forced to drop the silent tear as we muse upon thy sad and painful tale, still as we compare thy little loss with thy unspeakable gain, we are forced to confess that, even were it in our power, we could never have the heart to bring thee back again into this cold and dreary world of ours. Oh! no, we would rather leave thee in the old churchyard where thou sleepest so calmly and so free from care. We will tend with a loving hand the flowers that bloom above thy grave; and when our own hearts grow weak and faint, we will steal in the softening twilight to the holy spot, that we may gain strength and courage from the hallowed memories that flit around us there, telling us as they do of a brave young heart that is blessed with bliss eternal, because it knew what it was to do all and dare all for its God. Peace, peace be with thee!

CHAPTER XX.

MORALIZES AT AN UNPARDONABLE LENGTH.

AND now, dear reader, we have nearly finished. When we commenced we warned you that we had no romantic story, or tale of "thrilling interest" to tell you, but that ours was merely the repetition of an old story—the cost of a conversion—and that our object was to bring under your notice one phase of that which, more or less modified, is passing around us every day. The Catholic Church in England has gone through a severe ordeal, and all the brightness of the hopeful Future is needed to make us forget the darkness of the Past. For many a long year the English Catholic was a stranger in his own home, and an exile even in the land of his birth. Yet he never ceased to love her. The love of country is woven round our hearts like the love of our mother, and is mixed up with the purest, holiest, and best feelings of our nature. Providence may place us in foreign lands, our lot may be cast amongst those who are strangers to us, and the sweet music of our native tongue may seldom gladden our ear, but the old feeling still remains, and our minds wander with fond regret to our native land. We may visit sunnier lands, and walk amid richer flowers than those which deck our own, but somehow we cannot love them half so well, and the grandest dwelling that we see in foreign climes possesses not for us half the charms which twine around "the old house at home." If we have never left the land of our birth, how sweet is the thought that we shall rest in the old churchyard which we love so well, where we have so often strayed in childhood, and where we saw them lay the parents of our love! If we are exiles from our home, how intense our desire of returning thither, how enduring the hope, how buoyant the confidence, how fond the love, made fonder still by absence.

It was with feelings somewhat akin to these that the English Catholic, in the by-gone days, ever looked upon his deeply-erotic, but still deeply-loved land. Years of persecution and suffering could not drive them from his heart; nay, they but increased and made them stronger. He kissed the hand that struck him, no matter how unjust the blow might be, for the hand that inflicted the punishment was the hand of his country, and although, perchance, tears were mingled with the kiss, it was, nevertheless, the kiss of love. Exile could not banish from his heart the image that his love had enshrined there, and in sorrow he prayed that happier days might dawn upon the land he loved so well, and that he might no longer be a stranger in his father's halla. He loved her much with the love of regret for the days gone by; he loved her, most of all, with the love of desire for the days to come. In the heart of the English Catholic the present and the future are inseparably wound up with the past, for, when our minds wander back through the long vista of 1800 years to the days of Peter, and when we place modern events side by side with the foundation of Catholicity, it seems indeed but yesterday, and England, through all her length and breadth, was bright and blazing with the light of the brave old faith. Her cathedrals and her minsters had their altars and the presence of their God; and her rich lands were richer still, and her teeming fields were still more fertile, when the seed that was cast into them had been blessed by the hands of her monks. It seems indeed but yesterday, and the abbeys that are now in ruins, or the habitations of the beasts of the field, were alive with holy men; and as the gentle evening sun would sink to rest, the notes of their vesper hymn would steal along the smiling valley, and whisper to the weary husbandman of heaven and of rest; and the brawny hand was none the less manly because, as those sweet sounds would fall upon his ear, it was raised to sign himself with the sign of faith. In those good old times, if old age found the poor old man unprovided for, or if poverty surprised him, there were asylums where he might find refuge and rest, and those asylums were not parish workhouses. If sickness had laid him low, he was not thrown upon the tender mercies of a parish doctor; but his languid eye would fall upon the soft and gentle nun fitting round his bed of pain like some sweet spirit from a better land. If perchance his course was run, he went his way right cheerfully. In those days there was a heaven for poor Englishmen as well as for rich ones, and they did not throw him into the grave like some dead dog, but they bore the cross before him, and the vested priest followed on behind, and the dirge was sung, and the Mass was said, and they laid him in the ground with a careful and reverent hand, and they planted the cross above the place of his rest; and though he was but a poor man, they remembered his soul for many a day as that of a brother who had gone before them. Oh! it seems, indeed, but yesterday, and England had saints for her kings, saints for her bishops, saints in every grade of her society; and the heart of the English Catholic warms within him as he thinks of the days gone by—as he remembers the glories of St. Edward the Confessor and St. Edmund the Martyr—as he murmurs the name of St. Thomas of Canterbury, St. Wilfred of York, and St. John of Beverley—as he thinks with pride of St. Anselm, St. Dunstan, St. Edmund Rich, the Venerable Bede, and the hosts of saints whom England has given to heaven. He thinks of the good old times when England was in truth “merrie England,” and he weeps for the days when she could support her poor without consigning them to a workhouse—without tearing in twain those whom God had made one. He weeps for the days when “Westminster Abbey would fill without a coronation ;” for the days when countless thousands knelt to worship God in York Minster; for the days when every village had its church, every church its altar, and every altar was blessed by the presence of its God. He thinks of these things, and he cannot but weep that they should have passed away; for, alas! pass away they did. Tyranny and lust were seated on the throne of Edward the Confessor; and because their vices and Catholicity could not be reconciled, they strove their best to smother the faith of ages. They scattered the relics of St. Thomas of Canterbury to the winds of heaven, and placed apostates and renegades in his archiepiscopal chair. They did then what they would do now, if they dared; they drove the monk from the monastery, and sent the pure and consecrated virgin of Christ forth into a world that she had solemnly foresworn. They threw down the altar, and put out the lamp of the sanctuary. They desecrated the temple that had been built for the worship of the one true God, and the mighty piles which had so often echoed the hymn of praise were left mere material fabrics—bodies without a soul. The grand old temples of our fathers were left, with nothing of a church about them but the name; and now-a-days, as the gaping sight-seer wanders into them, he inquires in astonishment for what end they were built. He sees not what their use can be. He sees St. Wilfred of York and St. John of Beverley looking down upon him from the grand old stained-glass windows of York Minster; and he knows very well that they were not of his “persuasion,” and that he or they are intruders. He cannot conceal from himself the fact that they were looking down from the very same spot hundreds of years before his religion was invented, and that, therefore, the presumption of right is in their favor, to say nothing of possession. For many a year the rack, the knife, and the gibbet were the lot of those who clung to the faith of their fathers in England. There were times when the very existence of Catholicity in England appeared to depend on some one individual, some sainted bishop, or some hunted, persecuted priest, and then all the efforts of her enemies would be concentrated upon his capture. With fiendish jibes and hardened hearts they would lead him to the scaffold, thinking to quench in his blood the last spark of the faith, but forgetting, in the blindness of their hearts, that the blood of the martyrs has ever been the fruitful seed of the Church, and as they spilt his blood, it fell, indeed, upon the feeble flickering flame of the faith, but it fell not to extinguish it. No; as the martyr's blood trickled drop by drop from the executioner's knife, it fed, with its heaven-born fuel, that flickering flame, and again it blazed forth; again, phoenix-like, it sprang into a new existence from its own ashes, and the faith of Peter and of Rome laughed its enemies to scorn. For three hundred long years, sufferings, penal laws, disabilities, and every persecution that herey and religious rancor could devise, were heaped upon the English Catholics. But these things have now begun to pass away too. The cloud that has so long enveloped the mountain's top is breaking at last. Within the last thirty years a wonderful movement has taken place in the English Church—a movement calculated to fill every Catholic heart with feelings of gratitude for the past and joyous anticipations for the future. Many of the best, purest, and most learned of the Protestant establishment have left, and are daily leaving, the wreck upon which they were sailing, and are scrambling, as best they may, on board the bark of Peter, but too glad to escape with the loss of everything else. These conversions come before us as a great fact, and, perhaps, we think no more about them. Did each one come before us in its own individual bearings, we should, probably find a romance, that is, a romance of real life, attached to almost every one of them. The story of Edwin Stanhope, which we have told you in this little work, is the story in a higher or lower degree, according to different circumstances, of almost every conversion which happened in these countries. We would fain hope that few are to be found so harsh and unforgiving as Mr. Stanhope was; and you yourself, dear reader, perhaps, know many whose sufferings have been scarcely inferior to those of poor Edwin. If you do not, we could tell you many such a tale. We could tell you of young and delicate girls driven from their homes, and exposed to all the dangers of the world, for daring to do as poor Edwin did. We could take you into places where, perhaps, you are seldom wont to go, and engaged in low, ay, even in menial offices—in offices far below their merit or their educational capacities, we could point out to you men who have sacrificed station, prospects, and everything which the world could offer them, and are obliged to earn their very daily bread in drudgery and toil such as you little conceive. Yes, we could tell you many such tales, and in our own simple way we have endeavored to tell you one of them. Yet simple, unromantic, matter-of-fact though it be, we would fain persuade ourselves that our story has not been tedious, or altogether uninteresting to you, for whose amusement and instruction it was written. We would fain persuade ourselves, that, although we might not draw the tears from your eyes—for our feeble pen claims no such power—yet that you turned away from the death-bed of poor Edwin with at least a little feeling of sorrow and compassion in your hearts, and with a deeper and more grateful appreciation of that greatest of all blessings—the blessing of the Faith—which has been given to so many of you gratuitously, and for which, perhaps, you have never been called upon to suffer. We are but too apt to undervalue advantages which we have obtained without suffering or difficulty; and if it be true in general matters, that we prize a thing in proportion as it has cost us dear, how much more does it hold when Faith is in question! It is the poor struggling convert who, in general, has the keenest appreciation of the glorious gift of Faith. Again, we assure you that the story of Edwin Stanhope is no made up tale. If you doubt our assertion, we will tell you how to prove it. If you happen to meet any of those—and, thank God, they are not rare to meet with now-a-days—who are converts to our holy Faith, try to get them to tell you their story, and if you do not meet with some tale, at least substantially the same as ours, we are content to let you rank on the side of old Brown, as one of the most implacable of our critics. But if you meet with such a one, greet him with a friendly voice and a hearty grasp, for he is a true brother, and he has proved it; and if his portion be scant, and his lot be hard, help him if you are able, and you will do a good work, and one which God will bless; for, the same God knows well how much such fervent hearts, such generous souls, are needed to make some atonement for the cold, dead manner, in which too many of us, good, comfortable souls, take, as a matter of course, the blessings we have received, and for which we, perhaps, sometimes think that we pay a dear enough price if we are but ordinarily faithful to our religious engagements. Bear patiently with his little peculiarities, if perchance, he have them, and remember only the cost at which he has proved his sincerity. If you deem him too zealous, and consider that he is sometimes scarcely prudent in the efforts which he makes to bring others to the Faith, take care lest you be scarcely zealous enough, and remember that an excess of zeal is better than a want of it. Yes, again we say, greet him with a friendly voice and a hearty grasp, and do your best to make him feel that, if he has had to turn his back on many an old friend, that he has found many a new one; and, thank your God, that his trial has never been yours, for it may be, that it would have been a grievous temptation if you had been obliged to purchase your Faith by the renunciation of everything which is nearest and dearest to the heart of man. And for you, dear brother, long a wanderer, perchance, but safe in the haven at last, we, at least, bid you a hearty welcome. Bear your trials with a steady and manly heart. The priceless jewel of the dear old Faith is worth purchasing at any price, and if you be but faithful to the end, your reward shall be exceedingly great.

CHAPTER XXII

VALEDICTORY.—A PARTING WORD WITH THE CRITICS.—THE PROUD HEART BENDS AT LAST.—UNAVAILING REMORSE.—FRANK AND MARIA.—FATHER EUSTACE IS CHARGED WITH A MESSAGE TO THE OTHER WORLD.—WHO SHALL TELL A LITTLE PRATTLER "WHY POOR GRANDPAPA IS SO SAD, AND WEEPS SO MUCH?"

As we have no doubt that the Browns, the Simpers, and the rest of our critics, are greatly disgusted with our story, we cannot conclude without a few parting words to them.

Brown is full of compassion for poor Mr. Stanhope, and declares that he was very badly used both by his son and the wily old priest; and Brown thanks God that there is no danger of his son Tom's playing any such tricks upon him; and, although we cannot thank God for it, we are very much afraid that there really is very little danger of it. Miss Simper declares that our story was not so very bad, but that it was so shocking to kill poor Edwin in so unromantic a manner, instead of keeping him alive, and after carrying him triumphantly through all his troubles, disposing of him in the legitimate and only way which is recognized by every writer who knows how to compose a story; and Miss Simper casts our poor little story away quite indignantly, as if we had done her some wrong, when she finds that it concludes with a death-bed, instead of with orange blossoms and white favors. We hope the old gentleman will not be very angry, but, in fact, we are content to be treated with the contempt and scorn which we know he will hurl at us; for candor and sincerity compel us to confess that we care very little for old Brown or his opinion. We confess we feel more sorry to offend Miss Simper, but hope she will forgive us; for, although we might have made our story to conclude in such a manner as to please her, still we should have been obliged to conclude it by distorting facts, and ours is substantially a true tale. We have, too, so much confidence in her good nature, as to be persuaded that she will not be offended, even if we remind her, that, after all, there is something grander and greater than orange blossoms or white favors; and that some, who are favored above the rest, are called to follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth, and to sing a song which none else can sing; and why they are so called, Miss Simper surely has often heard; and as she thinks of this, we believe her heart will soften, and that she will become reconciled to the unromantic ending of our little tale.

We ought, too, no doubt, to make a Catholic of Mr. Stanhope. Would to God we could; but twelve years have rolled away since the death of Edwin, and he is not a Catholic yet. He is a white-headed, feeble old man now; but although still stately, and even stiff in his manner, you would look in vain for the pride and unbending self-will of other days. He buried them at last, but it was only in the grave of his son.

On the morning after the death of his boy, when they timidly entered the room, almost fearing to be repulsed, they found him still kneeling by the lifeless form, and with one of the cold hands pressed tightly to his heart. He allowed them to lead him away as meekly as a little child, and sitting between Maria and Father Eustace, listened to the sad story of how his boy had sickened and died the death of the just. He did not speak, even when the tale was done, but rising with a look so utterly broken and miserable, that it rent their very hearts to see him, walked slowly back to the room where the corpse was laid, and throwing himself upon his knees, kissed again and again the lifeless form, repeating ever and anon, "My own bright boy—my own heart's darling! Where was there ever such a boy as mine?—and I have killed him—I have murdered him—I have destroyed him! O God, forgive me! Would that I had died for him—my poor, poor boy." So long as the corpse was in the house he never left it; and, although he insisted upon the interment taking place in his own church, he made no objection when Father Eustace requested his permission to perform the private service which the Church orders to be celebrated over those of her children whom circumstances prevent from being interred in her own consecrated ground. As soon as possible after the funeral, he retired from the active management of the affairs of the establishment of which he was the head, and retired to a country residence some miles from London. He lives there still, a feeble old man, but bent much more by the secret sorrow which has written itself upon his face and in his form, than by weight of years.

On the first anniversary of the death of his boy, he and his daughter were sitting together, and when she rose from her seat, and coming over to where he sat, put her arms about his neck, and told him, with many tears and kisses, that she must follow the example of his boy, and be a Catholic, too, he said not a word, but kissing her very tenderly, put her gently away, and retired to his room, and cried through the livelong night. On the morning she made her first communion, and came to kiss him and tell him so, he took her in his arms, and placed round her neck a magnificent diamond cross, which he had purchased for her. Four years later, when she became the proud and happy wife of Frank Seymour, who, after all, was caught by Father Eustace, he blessed them both most fervently, and by a powerful effort restrained his tears until she had driven away; but when she was gone he cried again for his lost boy, and for the void that can never be filled up in his withered heart.

The conversion of Frank Seymour took place about eighteen months after the death of Edwin. He was much with Edwin during his last sickness, and the patience and gentle piety of his friend had its due effect upon Frank. The midnight mass at which he had been present with Edwin had not produced the same effect upon him as upon his friend, still he had never entirely forgotten it, and the seed which was then sown began to produce its fruit when he was brought into direct intercourse with Catholicity in the person of Edwin and Father Eustace. Before he became too weak, Edwin spoke much with his friend on the blessing of religion. His own appreciation of the blessing he had received was so intense, and his heart was so full of the subject, that he found it hard to speak on any other with those whom he loved. When the end was evidently drawing nigh, Edwin became still more urgent with his sister and Frank to promise him that they would examine the claims of the Catholic Church. There was little need to make such a request to Maria. She had been so constantly with the sick boy and his director, and had, almost unconsciously, learnt so much of Catholic doctrine, and what is much more efficacious, seen so much of Catholic practice, that she was half a Catholic before poor Edwin's decease; and the lesson conveyed in his calm and happy death was almost the only thing required to complete the work. Father Eustace, however, with his usual prudence, would hear of no hasty steps. He insisted upon her examining calmly and dispassionately the claims of the Church to her allegiance; and although the conversion of her intellect was almost as rapid as that of her heart had been, still a severe fit of illness which came upon Mr. Stanhope after his son's death, and which lasted several months, with several other reasons, combined to delay her formal reception for some time. She chose the anniversary of Edwin's death, as we have seen, to make the announcement to her father; not that she had any fear of meeting with any opposition from him, but because she thought he would feel it less on such a day, when so many chastening thoughts would be working in his heart. The conversion of Frank Seymour was a little longer delayed. When he took leave of Edwin the day before he died, and when the sick boy was too weak to speak much, Frank found himself altogether unable to restrain his feelings, and throwing himself on his knees by the bed-side of his friend, he sobbed aloud. Edwin managed to whisper:—

"If you knew how happy I am you would not cry, Frank; and if you would only promise me to keep up your intercourse with Father Eustace, and sometimes speak to him about religion, my happiness would be complete. Oh! promise me this, my dear friend, and I shall be happy."

Frank contrived to sob out a promise, and he nobly redeemed it. He had many conversations with Father Eustace, and the result of them was a step which Frank declares he has never regretted, and which he attributes to the prayers of one whom he is sure is a saint in heaven. Soon after the death of Edwin, Frank entered the establishment of Mr. Stanhope, at the urgent request of that gentleman, who seemed to find his chief happiness in heaping his favors upon every one whom his son had specially loved. With such an influence at his back, it is scarcely necessary to add that Frank rose fast. When he and Maria were united, he was made a partner in the firm, and for the last half-dozen years he has been its responsible head and manager. Wealth is pouring in upon him and his, and the use to which they turn it makes us wish them more of it. In him the struggling priest, who may be striving to build a chapel or a school, finds a generous friend. His alms are always accompanied with the same request. "I beg of you," he invariably says, "to pray for the eternal repose of one very dear friend, and for the conversion of another. I have no doubt that my friend is in heaven, still, I shall not, on that account, neglect my duty; and if your prayers have any influence in bringing the mind of one who is very dear to me to think of Catholic Truth, I shall indeed be most grateful."

He and Maria are naturally very anxious about Mr. Stanhope. If they speak to him on religion he listens patiently, but seemingly without sufficient interest to enter into the subject. During the lifetime of Father Eustace he was never so happy as when the priest was by his side, narrating to him all the little incidents connected with the sickness and death of his boy. It was a subject on which Father Eustace was almost as pleased to speak as Mr. Stanhope was to listen; and many and many a time, when Father Eustace had told him how fervently his boy had loved him, and how constantly he had thought of him, the tears would flow down his pale face, and he would seem almost happy. "Tell me again," he would sometimes say, "Tell me again that he forgave me;" and then, when Father Eustace would reassure him that the last words of his boy were words of love and duty, he would lay his head upon the old man's shoulder, and gently murmur, "Tell me now, dear Father Eustace, if you please, tell me once again, the closing scene;" and, when the story was told, he would rise without a word and walk away into his own room, where they never followed him at such times; for, now that the first remorse and grief were over, they knew that it was better for him to be alone. Several times he said, "I am quite reconciled now, Father Eustace. I am not sorry that my boy became a Catholic. If it had pleased God to have left him to me, I should have been very grateful; but I know that he was too good for me, and that God took him from me to punish my pride and break my self-will; but I am not sorry he became a Catholic. No, I am not sorry. You know, Father Eustace, that I cannot help feeling my loss," he would add, as the tears streamed out afresh; "and you will pardon me, but I am not sorry. My boy is with God, and I am satisfied, only my heart is very empty without him, my poor, poor boy." At such moments Father Eustace sometimes endeavored to lead him to speak of religion, and the happiness which Edwin had found in the one he had embraced, and how cheap he had held the price at which he had purchased it, but it was of no use. He would not enter into the subject, and Father Eustace saw that nothing would be gained by annoying him. He, therefore, deemed it better, and his plan was the one adopted by Frank and Maria after his death, to surround him as much as possible with the influence of Catholicity, and to leave the rest to God. What an inscrutable thing is the human heart! Young faces are now to be seen in the home of Frank and Maria; and as the old man often insists upon their reciting their prayers to him, and watches to see that they make the sign of the cross properly they begin to hope that his mind is gradually turning toward Catholicity, and that, at least before his death, they may have the happiness of seeing him a member of the Church. God grant that it may be so.

The union of Frank Seymour and Maria was one of the last acts of the ministry of our dear old friend, Father Eustace. He soon after caught, in the discharge of his duties, a horrible fever, which was raging fearfully amongst the poorer members of his congregation. He recovered from the immediate effects of the fever, but he never thoroughly rallied, and about five years after the death of poor Edwin, Father Eustace died, in the fullest sense of the word, the death of the just, leaving behind him a name to be held in benediction, and a memory very dear to many, besides him who pens these lines. There was a gentle hand to smooth his dying pillow—a hand that was guided by the magic influence of a grateful heart, and of a memory that could never forget all that the old priest had been to one who had been dearer to her than all the world beside.

During his last sickness he was frequently visited by Mr. Stanhope. Several of their interviews were of a very painful nature, and it required all the skill of Father Eustace to soothe and pacify the repentant father. "I am truly grateful to you, dear Father Eustace," said he, "for all your goodness to my boy." When I in my pride cast him forth upon the world, he might have died in the streets had he not found in you a second and a kinder father than the one who disowned him. I can never thank you as I ought. I will not even endeavor to do so, but I beg your pardon from the bottom of my heart for all the harsh treatment both to him and you; and when you meet my boy in heaven, tell him of the heartbroken old man who is left in his desolation upon the earth, and who, were it to be done again, would rather cut out his tongue than utter the awful curse which has cast a blight upon his life. Tell him, dear Father Eustace, how I grieve for all my cruelty to him. Tell him that his image is never for a moment absent from my heart, that my only consolation is the hope of meeting him again, if the goodness of God may pardon me my grievous sin." The desired pardon Father Eustace heartily accorded. He did his best to soothe the poor old man, and lead him to think of brighter things, but in vain. Since the death of Father Eustace he seldom speaks of his son, even to Maria, but there is that in his heart which can never pass away. There is a sorrow graven on it which time and loving care may perhaps soften, but which can never be effaced. There is in it a remorse which is all the more bitter because the cause of it can never be remedied. Oh, how often do we learn such lessons when too late! A little submission, a little forbearance in the beginning, and how much grief, how much bitter remorse, might often be prevented! But we cannot make the lesser sacrifice. The proud will may not bend until the evil is done, and then the remorse of a whole after life cannot repair the mischief, cannot recall the loving heart which has been cast away and sacrificed at the shrine of some unholy passion, cannot call back the smile which has fled, or light up the eye which has become dim, though we would willingly lay down our own life to be able to accomplish it. How true are the words of the poet—

"They parted—ne'er to meet again!
But never either found another
To free the hollow heart from pining;
They stood aloof, the scars remaining,
Like cliffs which had been rent asunder:
A dreary sea now flows between,
But neither heat, nor frost, nor thunder,
Shall wholly do away, I ween,
The marks of that which once hath been."
COLERIDGE.

* * * * *

Young voices are prattling round the old man's knees, whilst a venerable white-headed servant is ever at his elbow, anticipating his slightest want, and ever most careful of him, and most solicitous to amuse him, as a certain mournful anniversary comes round. One little prattler, the oldest and boldest of them all, often climbs his knees, and sometimes says to him, "Dear grandpapa, do tell me why you cry so much when I speak to you about poor uncle Edwin. Johnson says he is a bright angel in heaven, now, and I know that old Johnson would not say so if it were not true; and if dear uncle Edwin be an angel, I cannot tell, grandpapa, why you cry so much, and are so sorry for him. I should like to be an angel too, if mamma would not be very sorry to lose me;" and as Johnson comes quickly forward, and leads the little fellow softly away, the wondering look grows deeper on the fair young face, as he whispers to the faithful old man—"Poor grandpapa, poor grandpapa—oh! do tell me, Johnson, why poor grandpapa is so sad, and weeps so much."

* * * * *

Alas! who shall tell the innocent child the tale? Who shall answer him his question?

The Wounded Grenadier of the 49th;

OR

THE FIRST STONE OF A CHURCH.

THE town of Briangon is the dullest garrison in France, so that the regiments dread it like another Siberia;—above all, in winter, when the north winds blow furiously amongst the large trees of the neighboring forest; when the rough pavement of the streets is hidden under a thick bed of snow, and cold, 20° below freezing point, besieges the sentinel in his box. Thus it was always with extreme delight our brave soldiers saw, piercing through the foggy atmosphere, the first rays of the spring sun, which announced to them, with the arrival of fine weather, a reprieve from their arduous duty. The sun's rays to them was what the breeze is to the mariner, whose impatient sails have remained so long inactive amid the ocean calms. It was on a fine day in the year 1845, that, after a long winter, the 49th Regiment of the Line advanced, with drum and flag, to the esplanade of Chauvet, the accustomed theatre for military evolutions. Like the sky, the countenances of the soldiers were unclouded; they were going to use their arms once more, and have a mock fight. The colonel, in fact, had chosen this fine day to exercise the artillery. The Grenadiers and Voltigeurs rivalled each other in skill and precision.

Not far from the spot, walking slowly along, was a man clothed in black. His eyes were fixed on the book he held, and his serious countenance reflected the pious thoughts of his soul: he was a man of peace, and holy life, whom God had chosen as His earthly representative—the modest curé of the village of Chauvet, who was reciting, in a low voice, the psalms from his breviary. Indifferent to the noisy tumult which surrounded him, he seemed absorbed in his devotions, when suddenly loud cries were heard;—a gun had unfortunately burst, and a grenadier was grievously wounded. The curé was soon at his side. This good man was not only the physician of souls, but inspired by charity, he had consecrated the leisure hours of his priesthood to the study of medicine, and was able to apply the secrets of the learned science to the ordinary ailments of the country people. He now acted for the surgeon-major, who was detained at Briangon from indisposition. The grenadier, transported to the curé's humble dwelling, was laid on the priest's own bed, and received every care and attention from the good man. As the wound was too severe to allow of his being removed to the town, even on a litter, the curé asked and obtained leave from the colonel to keep the sick man, and nurse him at the presbytery.

"I will soon return him to you quite cured," said he; "that is, if Providence, in its mysterious designs, has not resolved to call him hence. At all events, I will prepare his soul for a better world."

An instant after, the drum beat, and the regiment returned to Briangon. The illness of the grenadier was long; for more than a month the good curé tended him with that skill and devotion science, sanctified by religion, alone can give; for more than a month he never left him but to attend to the exercises of his holy office. It was a touching sight to see this poor priest, rich only in charity, bending by day over the sick man's couch, and at night extended at his feet on a simple mattress; his only covering a cassock—a noble uniform, worn out in the functions of his ministry.

His cares were at last crowned with success: at the end of five weeks the grenadier could sit up, and some days after rejoined his corps. Thus, as he had said, the good curé accompanied him to Briangon, and returned him completely cured.

The following Sunday, the colonel of the 49th, and all the officers of the regiment, came to Chauvet to offer their thanks to the good priest.

They had scarcely arrived at his house when one of those violent storms, so common in mountainous districts, came on suddenly; vivid lightning accompanied by deep atmospheric sounds, burst from the clouds; rain, mixed with hail, penetrated the roof of the humble dwelling. The officers wished to seek shelter in the church, but the temple of the Lord was in no better condition than the house of His minister; enormous sheets of water inundated the aisles of the sanctuary. The colonel could not avoid expressing his surprise at such an unexpected sight. Was it the result of culpable indifference or of deplorable poverty? The curé satisfied him on this question by saying, that for a long time he had entreated the assistance of government, for the resources of the church were not sufficient to undertake the necessary repairs.

"But nothing seems easier to me," replied the colonel; "you have all the materials under your hand; wood in abundance; and stones sufficient to construct ten capitals as large as Paris."

"It is the workmanship we want," said the curé; "and we are not rich enough to procure it from abroad."

Just then a captain approached the colonel, and spoke a few words in a low tone, to which the latter replied by a mute pressure of the hand. How quickly noble hearts understand each other! In the meanwhile the storm had ceased; and the colonel, giving the signal for departure, took leave of the curé, who was delighted with a meeting which honored him as much as it did his grateful visitors.

The next morning, as the good curé of Chauvet was reciting his breviary before the door of his house, all on a sudden he saw in the distance, marching in good order, but without drums, a strong body of soldiers, armed with all sorts of instruments, and preceded by sappers opening the march with their hatchets on their shoulders,—some carrying pickaxes, some sacks, others trowels and hammers; all with merry faces and hearts, approaching the priest's dwelling, singing the popular air:—

De courage
A l'ouvrage,
Les amis sont toujours là!

"Good morning, monsieur le curé," said the eldest of the band, making a military salute, and presenting arms. He was an old non-commissioned officer,—his lip set off by a fine grey moustache; and he bore on his arm three honorable badges.

"Good morning my friends," answered the curé, closing his book of devotions; "what are you going to do, in these parts, with those workmen's tools?"

"We are coming to cancel a debt of gratitude, monsieur le curé; that is to say, to pay a bill of exchange which is owing from the 49th Regiment of the Line."

"What debt, my children?"

"That which we contracted towards you on the day you tended and cured our poor wounded comrade."

"I only did my duty."

"And we are doing ours in coming to build a church for the good God, and a house for His minister."

"Can it be true?" said the curé, uttering an exclamation of joy.

"Nothing more so; and to-day we begin the work!

De courage,
A l'ouvrage,
Les amis sont toujours là!

On that very morning the soldiers of the 49th, transformed into masons, joiners, carpenters and stone-cutters, bravely commenced their task. The little esplanade of Chauvet was soon converted into a vast timber yard. The neighboring forest, and the rocks in the environs, furnished excellent materials. Every evening the soldiers of the 49th, happy and pleased, returned to Briangon, and came again on the morrow to continue their undertaking. Their zeal, stimulated by generous devotion did wonders. A lieutenant, filling the office of architect, directed the works with intelligence. "In a few days," said these brave men, "the good God and His minister will have a church and house free from the storms and inclemency of the weather."

This thought redoubled their strength; they advanced rapidly in what they called their work of gratitude. Two months had scarcely passed since the first stone, blessed by the curé, had been laid, when an enormous nosegay, formed of fir branches, crowned the church destined to the worship of God, and the white house for the curé. Some days later, the ornaments for the interior were completely finished. The satisfaction of the curé was then so great that his heart seemed too narrow to contain his joy. Great happiness sometimes produces the same effect as great grief. The good priest fell seriously ill one Saturday evening—the evening of the day when the 49th Regiment assisted, in full uniform, at the benediction of the church so rapidly constructed by their zealous charity.

A poetical non-commissioned officer—or rather, a non-commissioned officer who was a poet—taking advantage of the illness of the poor curé improvised a vaudeville, and appropriated the characters to his most intelligent comrades. Six days sufficed to learn and repeat their different parts. On the seventh, the town of Briangon was invited to assist at the first representation, the profits of which were to be consecrated to the decoration of the new church at Chauvet. For the first time, perhaps, God had become, according to the naive expression of the drum-major, the receiver of the profits of a comedy. The whole village responded to this charitable appeal. The first representation was as brilliant as it was productive; in fact, the actors collected, amidst immense applause, an important sum, which was doubled on the morrow, and by the evening of the next day, amounted to 1800 francs. The officers, and the soldiers themselves, increased it by a general and voluntary subscription of 700 francs.

These 2500 francs were entrusted to two officers, who immediately set off for Lyons, to make the necessary purchases for the embellishment of the church. During this time the curé, admirably tended in his turn by the surgeon of the 49th, began rapidly to amend, and in a few days would be able to resume his duties. The soldiers—from masons, become decorators—took advantage of this delay to ornament the interior of the new church, and to arrange artistically the purchases made at Lyons. Stations of the cross divided the white walls into fourteen spaces; beautiful gilt chandeliers were arranged on each side of the altar, which was covered with a new cloth; a handsome tabernacle was placed between the candelabras; a rich remonstrance, supported by two angels, and also an elegant pyx shone in the mysterious shade of the tabernacle; a banner, in various colors, bearing the image of the Immaculate Virgin was hung opposite the pulpit; and a picture, eight feet high, representing the Patron of the Commune, was suspended over the high altar. Nothing had been forgotten—flowers, vases, candlesticks, a new missal censers, &c.; a beautiful woollen carpet on the altar steps, completed the general effect of this work of piety, and did honor to the taste of the valiant sacristans. A deep-toned bell at the top of the tower replaced the old cracked one, which had become hoarse, the troopers said, with so often sounding the Alleluia on fête days, and the De Profundis on the days of mourning.

At length the great day arrived. One Sunday morning the 49th Regiment ranged themselves in military order before the church; a detachment of honor lined the nave, and the choristers placed themselves before the desks. The delighted inhabitants knelt in different parts of the holy building; all was happiness and joy; the faces of the soldiers were radiant; you could see by their looks they had performed a good action. At ten o'clock the good curé of Chauvet—pale, and still bearing the traces of recent illness—appeared at the altar; tears shone in his eyes, but they were tears of joy and gratitude. On seeing him, the military band commenced the Te Deum and all united in singing this hymn of triumph.

Some weeks after this imposing ceremony sad news reached Chauvet: the 49th Regiment of the Line was going to leave Briangon;—it was ordered to proceed to Africa, to join the French army in Algeria. The regiment was to depart in forty-eight hours.

There is not a moment to lose, thought the curé of Chauvet, inspired by a sudden impulse; and taking from a dusty drawer two silver dishes, which never saw daylight excepting on most important occasions, he set off for Lyons, where the regiment was to arrive on the fifth day. The good curé had not an instant to lose, if he wished to execute the project he had conceived. His first care on arriving at the ancient capital of Gaul, was to seek out a jeweler on the quay of the Saône. This person could scarcely forbear smiling at the sight of the venerable priest, covered with dust, carrying in his hand a thick nut stick, and wearing enormous iron-soled shoes.

“From whence come you, monsieur le curé?”

“From Chauvet, monsieur.”

“I do not know that seaport; where is it situated?”

“In the mountains of the Alps, near to Briangon. But I am not come here to give a lesson in geography,” said the curé, slowly unfolding the paper in which he had wrapped his treasure. “I have undertaken this journey to Lyons to sell these two covers—will you buy them?”

“You have taken a long journey for so small a thing.”

“The smallest often possesses a hidden value, monsieur. Now, answer—will you buy my dishes?”

“Their ostensible value is not great,” replied the jeweller, weighing them in his hand, “for they have been, like your cassock, long in use.”

“How much are they worth?”

“Thirty-three francs.”

“That is very little,” said the curé, as he searched in the pocket of his black velvet trowsers: “and this silver watch—how much will you give for this?”

“But very little, monsieur; for it has also seen long service. Ah! are all your household on the invalid list?”

“That does not signify. How much is this watch worth?”

“I begin to comprehend, monsieur le curé; you are working for the poor, just now, are you not?”

“No, monsieur,” said the curé smiling; “those for whom I destine the profits of the sale are much richer than you and I. Once more—how much is the watch worth?”

“Twenty-five francs.”

“Give me eighty-five and the watch and two covers are yours.”

The jeweller immediately counted out the sum, and the priest, relating the history of the building of his church, informed him also of his intended project; he wished to offer his kind friends of the 49th a slight remembrance of his gratitude. The jeweller, who possessed a good heart, though his manner was brusque, resolved to associate himself in the priest's generous intention.

“You are a worthy minister of God,” said he. “I will complete the sum you desire to realize, if this is not sufficient to carry out your project.”

The same day that the vanguard of the regiment arrived at the city, the curé of Chauvet had departed in the morning to meet the brave men to whom he owed his church and his dwelling.

“How! you here?” cried Peyre, the commander, perceiving him on the plain of St. Fond; “by what happy circumstance are you come?”

“You will soon know, commander;—in the meantime, I have a favor to ask you.”

“Two, let it be, sooner than one; I can refuse you nothing.”

“You will attend at my mass to-morrow?”

“Willingly we will accept your invitation, monsieur le curé. What say you, monsieurs?” added the commander, turning towards the officers of his battalion.

“We will be there also, commander.”

“Well, then, messieurs, to-morrow I will meet you at the Church of St. Irenæus.”

“Be it so. And now, you must remain with us; you must be our chaplain, and you shall share half my lodging.”

So saying, the commander dismounted from his horse, took the arm of the venerable priest, and walking at the head of the column, made his entrée into the good old town of Lyons. On the morrow, the battalion of the 49th, in full uniform, preceded by drums, marched towards the church. The curé of Chauvet was waiting for them at the door of St. Irenæus. “You see we have kept our word,” said the commander, pressing the good man's hand.

“Thank you, commander. Now, before celebrating mass, and imploring for you and the whole regiment the benediction of the God of Armies, I have to ask you the second favor you promised me yesterday.”

“It is granted, monsieur le curé. What is it?”

“Will you permit me to offer you a medal that the inhabitants of Chauvet have charged me to present to the regiment as a memento of their eternal gratitude? Here it is.”

At these words he offered to the brave commander a large and elegant medal bearing this inscription on the side:

Religion, Honor, and Our Country, and on the reverse:

From the Inhabitants of the Village of Chauvet to the 49th Regiment of the Line.

A token of gratitude.

The good commander, Peyre, threw himself into the good priest's arms, saying, “Come, monsieur le curé come and bless this medal, so that it may be the most precious treasure of the regiment.”

“And do not forget us in your prayers after we are gone,” added one of the officers, a tear standing in his eye.

“Let us pray for each other,” said the worthy curé; “and if it be the will of Providence that we see each other for the last time, may we meet in a better world.”

The Sisters.

ONE evening I saw, by the advertisements, that the next day was a holiday at Sèvres, and that the china manufactory would be open to the public. I was tempted by the beauty of the morning, and suddenly decided to go there.

On my arrival at the station on the left bank, I noticed the crowd hurrying on in the fear of being late. Railroads, besides many other advantages, will have that of teaching the French punctuality. They will submit to the clock when they are convinced that it is their master; they will learn to wait, when they find they will not be waited for. Social virtues are, in a great degree, good habits. How many great qualities are grafted into nations by their geographical position—by political necessity—and by institutions! Avarice was destroyed for a time among the Laedemonians by the creation of a copper coinage, too heavy and too bulky to be conveniently hoarded.

I found myself in a carriage with two middle-aged sisters belonging to the domestic and retired class of Parisians. A few civilities were sufficient to gain me their confidence, and in a few minutes I was nearly acquainted with their whole history.

They were two poor women, left orphans at fifteen, and had lived ever since as those who work for their livelihood must live—by economy and privation. For the last twenty or thirty years they had worked in jewellery for the same house; they had seen ten masters succeed one another, and make their fortunes in it, without any change in their own lot. They had always lived in the same room, at the end of one of the passages in the Rue St. Denis, where the air and the sun are scarcely known. They began their work before daylight; went on with it till after nightfall; and saw year succeed to year without their lives being marked by any other events than Sunday mass and vespers, a walk, or an illness.

The younger of these worthy workwomen was forty, and obeyed her sister, as she did when a child. The elder looked after her, took care of her, and scolded her with a mother's tenderness. At first it was amusing; afterwards one could not help seeing something affecting in these two gray-haired children—one unable to leave off the habit of obeying, the other that of protecting.

And it was not in that alone that my two companions seemed younger than their years;—they knew so little that their wonder never ceased. We had hardly arrived at Clamart before they involuntarily exclaimed, like the king in the children's game,—they did not think the world was so great! It was the first time they had trusted themselves on a railroad, and it was amusing to see their sudden shocks, their alarms, and their courageous determinations. Everything was a marvel to them! They had the remains of youth within them, which made them sensible to things which usually only strike us in childhood. Poor creatures! they had still the feelings of another age, though they had lost its charms.

But was not there something holy in this simplicity, which had been preserved to them by abstinence from all the joys of life? Ah! how wrong was he who first had the bad courage to attach ridicule to that name of old maid, which recalls so many images of grievous deception, of dreariness, and of abandonment! how wrong is he who can find a subject for sarcasm in involuntary misfortune, and who can crown gray hairs with thorns!

The two sisters were called Frances and Madeleine. This day's journey was a feat of courage without example in their lives. The fever of the times had infected them unawares. Yesterday, Madeleine had suddenly proposed the idea of the expedition, and Frances had accepted it immediately. "Perhaps it would have been better," she said, "if she had not yielded to the temptation offered by her younger sister;" but "we have our follies at all ages," as she philosophically remarked.

"We really must amuse ourselves," said Madeleine; "we do but live once."

And the elder sister smiled at this Epicurian maxim.

In truth, it would have been a great pity if any scruple had interfered with their happiness, it was so frank and genial! The sight of the trees, which seemed to fly on both sides of the road, causes them unceasing admiration. The meeting a train passing in the contrary direction with the noise and rapidity of a thunderbolt, makes them shut their eyes and utter a cry;—but it has already disappeared! They look round, take courage again, and express themselves full of astonishment at the marvel.

Madeleine declares that such a sight is worth the cost of the journey, and Frances would have agreed with her if she had not recollected, with some little alarm, the deficit which such an expense must make in their budget. The three francs spent upon this single expedition were the savings of a whole week of work. Thus the joy of the elder of the two sisters was mixed with regret: the prodigal child now and then turned back her eyes towards the back street of St. Denis.

But the motion and the succession of objects distract her. She the Bridge of the Val, surrounded by its lovely landscape: on the right, Paris with its splendid buildings, which rise through the fog, or sparkle in the sun; on the left, Meudon with its villas, its woods, its vines, and its royal castle! The two workwomen look from one window to the other with exclamations of delight. One fellow-passenger laughs at their childish wonder: but to myself it is very touching, for I see in it the sign of a long and monotonous seclusion: they are prisoners of work, who have recovered liberty and fresh air for a few hours.

At last the train stops, and we get out. I showed the two sisters the path that leads to Sèvres, between the railway and the gardens, and they go on before, while I inquire about the time of returning.

I soon join them again at their next halt, where they have stopped at the little garden belonging to the gatekeeper. Both are already in deep conversation with him while he digs his garden borders, and marks out the places for flower-seeds. He informs them that it is the time for hoeing out weeds, for making grafts and layers, for sowing annuals, and for destroying the insects on the rose-trees. Madeleine has on the sill of her window two wooden boxes, in which, for want of air and sun, she has never been able to make anything grow but mustard and cress; but she persuades herself that, thanks to this information, all other plants may henceforth thrive in them. At last the gate-keeper, who is sowing a border with mignonette, gives her the rest of the seeds which he does not want, and the old maid goes off delighted, and begins to act over again the dream of the milkmaid and her can of milk, with these flowers of her imagination.

On reaching the grove of acacias, where the fair was going on, I lost sight of the two sisters. I went alone among the sights. There were lotteries going on, mountebank shows, places for eating and drinking, and for shooting with the cross-bow. I have always been struck by the spirit of these out-of-door festivities. In drawing-room entertainments people are cold, grave, often listless; and most of those who go there are brought together by habit or the obligations of society. In the country assemblies, on the contrary, you only find those who are attracted by the hope of enjoyment. There, it is a forced conscription—here, they are volunteers for gaiety. Then, how easily they are pleased! How far this crowd of people is yet from knowing, that to be pleased with nothing, and to look down on everything, is the height of fashion and good taste! Doubtless their amusements are often coarse; elegance and refinement are wanting in them; but at least they have heartiness. Oh, that the hearty enjoyment of these merry-makings could be retained in union with less vulgar feeling! Formerly, religion stamped its holy character on the celebration of country festivals, and purified the pleasures without depriving them of their joyousness.

The hour arrives at which the doors of the porcelain manufactory, and the museum of pottery, are open to the public. I meet Frances and Madeleine again in the first room. Frightened at finding themselves in the midst of such regal magnificence, they hardly dare walk: they speak in a low tone, as if they were in a church.

"We are in the king's house," said the eldest sister, forgetting that there is no longer a king in France.

I encourage them to go on: I walk first and they make up their minds to follow me.

What wonders are brought together in this collection! Here we see clay moulded into every shape, tinted with every color, and combined with ever sort of substance.

Earth and wood are the first substances worked upon by man, and seem more particularly meant for his use! They, like the domestic animals, are the essential accessories of his life; therefore there must be a more intimate connection between them and us. Stone and metals require long preparation: they resist our first efforts, and belong less to the individual than to communities. Earth and wood are, on the contrary, the principal instruments of the isolated being who must feed and shelter himself.

This, no doubt, makes me feel so much interest in the collection I am examining. These cups, so roughly modelled by the savage, admit me to a knowledge of some of his habits; these elegant, yet incorrectly formed vases of the Indian, tell me of a declining intelligence, in which still glimmers the twilight of what was once bright sunshine; these jars, loaded with arabesques, show the fancy of the Arab rudely and ignorantly conied by the Spaniard. We find here the stamp of every race, every country, and every age.

My companions seemed to be little interested in these historical associations;—they looked at all with that credulous admiration which leaves no room for examination or discussion. Madeleine read the name under every piece of workmanship, and her sister answered with an exclamation of wonder.

In this way we reached a little court-yard, where they had thrown away the fragments of some broken china. Frances perceived a broken saucer, almost whole, of which she took possession, as a record of the visit she was making. Henceforth she would have a specimen of Sèvres china which is only made for kings. I would not undeceive her, by telling her that the products of the manufactory are sold all over the world, and that her saucer before it was cracked, was the same as those that are bought at the shops for sixpence! Why should I destroy the illusions of her simple existence? Are we to break down the hedge-flowers which perfume our paths? Things are oftenest nothing in themselves: the thoughts we attach to them alone give them value. To rectify innocent mistakes, in order to discover some useless reality, is to be like these learned men who will see nothing in a plant but the chemical elements of which it is composed.

On leaving the manufactory, the two sisters, who had taken possession of me with the freedom of artlessness, invited me to share the luncheon they had brought with them. I declined at first; but they insisted with so much good nature, that I feared to pain them, and with some awkwardness I gave way. We had only to look for a convenient spot. I led them up the hill, and we found a plot of grass enamelled with daisies, and shaded by two walnut trees.

Madeleine could not contain herself for joy. All her life she had dreamt of a dinner out on the grass! While helping her sister to take the provisions from the basket, she tells me of all the expeditions into the country that had been planned, and put off. Frances, on the other hand, was brought up at Montmorency, and, before, she became an orphan, she had often gone back to her nurse's house. That which had the attraction of novelty for her sister, had for her the charm of recollection. She told of the vintage harvests to which her parents had taken her; the rides on Mother Luret's donkey, that they could not make go to the right without pulling to the left; the cherry gathering; and the sails on the lake in the innkeeper's boat.

These recollections have all the charm and freshness of childhood. Frances recalls to herself less what she has seen than what she has felt. Whilst she is talking the cloth is laid, and we sit down under a tree. Before us winds the valley of Sèvres, its many-storied houses abutting upon the gardens and the slopes of the hill;—on the other side spreads out the park of St. Cloud, with its magnificent clumps of trees intersected by glades—above, stretch the heavens like an immense ocean, in which the clouds are sailing! I look at this beautiful country and I listen to these good old maids—I admire, and I am interested; and time passes without my perceiving it.

At last the sun sets, and we have to think of returning. Whilst Madeleine and Frances clear away the dinner, I walk down to the manufactory to ask the hour. The merry-making is at its height; the blasts of the trombones resound from the band under the acacias. For a few moments I forgot myself with looking about; but I have promised the two sisters to take them back to the Bellevue Station. The train cannot wait, and I make haste to climb the path again which leads to the walnut-trees.

Just before I reached them I heard voices on the other side of the hedge; Madeleine and Frances were speaking to a poor girl whose clothes were burnt, her hands blackened, and her face tied up with blood-stained bandages. I saw that she was one of the girls employed at the gunpowder mills, which are built higher up on the common. An explosion had taken place a few days before; the girl's mother and elder sister were killed; she herself escaped by a miracle, and was now left without any means of support. She told all this with the resigned and unhopeful manner of one who has always been accustomed to suffer. The two sisters were much affected. I saw them consulting with one another in a low tone;—then Frances took thirty sous out of a little coarse silk purse—which was all they had left—and gave them to the poor girl. I hastened to that side of the hedge; but, before I reached it, I met the two old sisters, who called out to me that they would not return by the railway, but on foot. I then understood that the money they had meant for the journey had been given to the heggar. Good, like evil, is contagious;—I run to the poor wounded girl, give her the sum that was to pay for my own place, and return to Frances and Madeleine, and tell them I will walk with them.

I am just come back from taking them home; and have left them delighted with their day, the recollection of which will long make them happy.

This morning I was pitying those whose lives are obscure and joyless; now, I understand that God has provided a compensation with every trial. The smallest pleasure derives from rarity a relish otherwise unknown. Enjoyment is only what we feel to be such, and the luxurious man feels no longer. Satiety has lost him his appetite, while privation preserves to the other that first of earthly blessings—the being easily made happy. Oh! that I could persuade every one of this! that so the rich might not abuse their riches, and that the poor might have patience. If happiness is the rarest of blessings, it is because the proper reception of it is the rarest of virtues.

Madeleine and Frances! Worthy sisters! whose courage, resignation, and generous hearts are your only wealth, pray for the wretched who give themselves up to despair; for the unhappy who hate and envy; and for the unfeeling into whose enjoyments no pity enters.

THE STRAW-CUTTER'S DAUGHTER.

BY RAOUL DE NAVERY.

Translated from the French by Lady Georgiana Fullerton.

CHAPTER I.

THE FARM OF CADIORNE.

IT is a glorious August morning. The sun has risen red and glowing, and as he mounts higher and higher, the rich cornfields shine like a golden sea as the light breeze moves the billowy mass. The lark darts upwards from the furrow, straight as an arrow—the first of God's creatures to sing its Maker's praises; the hum of insect-life begins; and all the pleasant country sounds mingle in sweet confusion; the cattle-bell, the herdsman's song, the barking of dogs, the lowing of cattle, the shrill crow of the cock proclaiming that the business of the farm has begun.

"Hurry on, my lads," cried cheery Péré Patriarche, the rich farmer of Cadiorne, to his sons and laborers, "we must all set briskly to work. Must have a good lot of corn got in before night; and you know that those who work well are paid well."

Yves and Aubin, the farmer's sons, harnessed the wagon-horses; Robert, the head man, gave out the sharp sickles; and the reapers bound large checked handkerchiefs under their straw hats.

Marthe, the farmer's wife, stood at her door looking on at the bright busy scene, a quiet motherly woman, yet the main-spring of the household as well as its sunshine. She managed everything with the help of one lame servant, who had grown old in her service, and whom every one called Limping Louison.

Marthe was turning away as the last of the reapers disappeared, when her youngest son, Aubin, came jumping over the blackthorn hedge, and running up to her for one more kiss. She gave at least a dozen to the sunburnt face and curly black hair, and then asked whether he would not be missed in the field.

"I really had forgotten my very own little sickle, mother dear."

"Very well, darling, be off again, and work hard."

"And, mother, you will come to the field when the Angelus rings?"

She nodded a promise; and Aubin was off like a shot, starting the birds in the hedge with his leap and whistle.

Aubin was soon back with the rest by the side of his favorite black bullock, a noble creature, with dewlaps that nearly touched the ground, and large soft eyes that turned slowly on his young master as if to thank him for keeping off the flies with an oak branch, which he flapped about his head.

On reaching the field, Aubin and Yves, like the others, set to work at once, and the ripe corn fell quickly and silently as the reaping-hooks cut their way farther and farther into the field.

And now it is noon; there is no shadow cast by the trees; the chirp of the grasshoppers and cicadas comes short and sharp in the midday heat. A bell rings, every man stops work, and the master, uncovering his head, recites the Angelus with all his men, after which all seek the group of oaks and walnuts at the bottom of the field, for the welcome hour of rest and refreshment. For the hundredth time some laborer bids his comrades beware of falling asleep under one of the walnut-trees; for there, three feet underground, according to Breton superstition, lurks a poisonous snake, "le sourd," they call him, whose very presence is fatal to the luckless sleeper. So they all lie down under the oaks, all but Yves, who is afraid of nothing, and takes a pride in setting tradition, custom, and unhappily, holier things than these, at defiance.

Jean Patriarche, the father of the two lads, whose acquaintance we have made, was a very good specimen of a Breton farmer. He had married young; and Marthe was his own choice as well as that of his parents. Both families were well off, and well thought of in the parish of Saint Aubin du Cormier; the young people had been taught by the old curé, who had known them from their birth; and both were good, simple, industrious, and sincerely attached. Marthe was quite an heiress in her way, with the three splendid cornfields which made her dowry; and Jean's famous speckled cattle grazed in pasture land where the grass grew breast-high. Two years after her marriage Marthe was the mother of two sons. Aubin had his father's black hair, open brow, and honest eyes, and his mother's calm, gentle nature. Sincerely religious, he had a great love for the poor, and, when quite a little fellow, delighted in cutting great lanches of bread for them, which he could scarcely carry. One day he met a little barefooted boy, and instantly taking off his sabots gave them to the child, while he bound the straw which lined them, on his own feet. On his return his mother asked what had become of the sabots; she kissed him tenderly when the story was told, and next market-day she bought him a smart pair of buff-leather shoes, while the impromptu slippers were carefully put away in her press. "So," thought Yves, "the way to get easy shoes is to lose one's sabots." And next he came in barefooted and his face covered with blood.

"Good heavens! what has happened?" said Marthe.

"Fighting with little Maclou, the goose-boy; the geese were making a horrid row, and I halloed to him to keep them quiet; and as he chose not to mind me, I sent one of my sabots at his head."

"For shame, Yves! A little fellow like that!"

"He's an impudent monkey, all the same; and next time I catch him I mean to wring the neck of that biggest goose of his; as soon as the chap began blubbering she flew at me, and I got as many pecks as I had given him thumps."

"O, Yves, my poor child, will you never mend your ways?"

"Why, where's the harm of licking Maclou?"

"Poor little fellow, he was doing you no harm; and he's such a good boy."

"Is he, indeed? Well, I can't abide the little beggar; and, besides, I wanted shoes like Aubin's, so I got rid of my sabots, for they are broken to bits."

"Aubin's was a very different affair."

"Not a bit of it; it all comes to the same thing; he gave his away, and I smashed mine; so, as I haven't another pair, you'll just have to buy the shoes."

"That I shall certainly not do."

"Oh, then," said Yves insolently, "there's one law for Aubin, and another for me, is there?"

"Yes, there is a different law for a cruel, disobedient boy, and for a good and charitable one. I reward the one and I punish the other. But, mind, you are not to suppose that I love you less than him because you force me to treat you differently. Oh, Yves, you are my eldest child, the first who called me mother, and God knows how I thanked Him for you. Let me thank Him still more, Yves, as I shall do when you are a better boy; don't go on grieving your father and me. And why are you jealous of your brother? He would give up everything to you."

"His shoes, for instance?" said Yves with a rude laugh.

"You are a bad boy—cruel and bad."

"So you have said before; once more, will you buy me a pair of shoes?"

"No, I will not. When you deserve favors, you shall have them."

"Very well; I shall wring that bird's neck, and Maclou will get a flogging."

"You will never be so wicked."

"I will, as sure as—"

Marthe threw her arms around him: "Hush, Yves, don't take a sinful oath. If you don't mind your mother's displeasure, fear God's anger."

"Let me go!" shrieked the boy, beside himself with passion. He tore himself from his mother's arms, and rushed out of the house.

Meanwhile, poor little Maclou was sitting under an old willow-tree, very sore and very sad. He had pulled a handful of wild mint, dipped it in water, and bathed his bruised head and face. By his side sat Armelle, the straw-cutter's little daughter; she had torn up her handkerchief to bind his forehead, and was doing her best to comfort him. Maclou had told her his history, and was extolling the prowess of his beloved goose—the pride of the flock. "I should never have got away from him but for her, Armelle. He did hit hard with his sabots! Ah, he is a bad boy; but you are good, and then you are unhappy too—like me."

"What makes you call me unhappy?" said the little girl.

"Why, because your father drinks so."

"I love my father," said Armelle quickly.

"Well, you see, I haven't got a father," replied Maclou, after a moment's reflection; "I'm just a foundling—something like a duck hatched by a hen, I suppose; the chickens won't have anything to do with it, and drive it away."

By and by Maclou forgot his troubles, and the two children were playing together quite merrily when they were interrupted by a tremendous noise. The geese came waddling to them as fast as they could with their web-feet, flapping their short wings, and screaming with terror. The dog barked furiously, the cows ran wildly about the meadows, and the great black bull, the terror of the country, rushed about with his head down, his nostrils foaming, and his eyes bloodshot. At length, by the combined efforts of Maclou and the dog, the stragglers got together and counted; but one was missing—the great white goose, the pride of the flock, the valiant champion of her little master. He burst into tears, crying out:

"He has killed her! I know he has."

"O, no; he never, never could!" said Armelle; "he never could be such a coward."

"Say that again!" cried an angry voice behind the children.

It was Yves, mad with passion, and clenching his fists as he spoke.

"Very well, I will say it again, for you are a coward," said the brave child; "and because you are a coward you might strike me, only you won't, bad as you are, because you know my father would give you a thrashing. And what do you suppose Maclou's master will do to him? If your father had to punish you, he would give you a scolding, I suppose; even if he did more, he would just hit you a very little with a tiny switch. But Maclou is an orphan, with nobody to take his part; and his master will lay a great thick stick across his shoulders, and you know it! If all the boys in the village are afraid of telling the truth to 'wicked Yves,' as they call you, I'm not; so I tell you that you are a bad fellow,—yes I am here waiting, and you can strike if you dare!"

The little thing spoke so fearlessly, and looked so calmly at him with her innocent eyes, that Yves slunk away cowed and crest-fallen, muttering, "I'll pay you off, too, some day, so look out."

The straw-cutter's little daughter did not even hear him; she was kneeling by poor Maclou, who had thrown himself sobbing on the ground, and trying all she could to comfort him; but his grief broke out more loudly than ever when his dog Finaud, after snuffing about in search of his missing charge, brought the dead goose to his master's feet.

"O my God," wailed the poor child, "how shall I ever go back to Marcotte! The goose would have fetched a couple of crowns, and the mayor's wife would have been sure to buy her for Twelfth-day. I am sure Marcotte will kill me. I had rather run away at once than face him."

Armelle was terror stricken. Marcotte was a dreadful man, to be sure, but then there were things as bad or worse; it would soon be dark, and brave as she was when a tangible danger was in question, she was in mortal dread of ghosts and "loups-garous."

"It will be very dark," she said, "there's no moon."

"I know there isn't," said the frightened child.

"And isn't there anybody you will be sorry to leave?"

"O yes, Armelle, you; you are so good and kind; and then there is Aubin, that bad boy's brother, he is good too; and so is his father—he often gives me a loaf of bread and a bowl of milk, and good advice too; and his wife knitted me a pair of stockings at Christmas. There are plenty of good people at St. Aubin du Cormier; and besides, when one has always lived in a place, one is sorry to leave the trees, and the cows, and— and everything."

"Well, then, don't go."

"But—there's Marcotte!"

"Yes, I know, there is Marcotte."

And the children sat down opposite each other silently, with their elbows on their knees, puzzling how to solve the difficulty.

They were roused from their meditations by a sharp shrill cry; and looking up saw Aubin standing before them, holding in his arms a struggling goose nearly as big as himself.

"There," he said, "take her home with you; I believe she beats the one you lost."

"But," said Maclou wonderingly, "what makes you give her to me?"

"To make up for the one my brother killed; don't you see?"

"But this goose is your father's—what will he say?"

"Why, it happens very luckily that I keep our flock of geese; so when one is found missing, they will just think I have lost it."

"But your father will scold you."

"Never mind that."

"Or beat you."

"My father's beating won't be like your master's, Maclou; it's not worth thinking of."

"O, how good you are!" and the little orphan clung round Aubin as if he could never leave him. Presently he said, "But what shall we do with the dead goose?"

"Armelle shall take it home with her, and keep our secret."

And so the three children went their different ways—Aubin to his comfortable bed, Armelle to her father's wretched hut, and poor little Maclou to a kennel where Marcotte's watch-dog used to live.

Aubin went to his home with a light step and heart, and yet he knew that he had incurred a punishment. No matter; better so than that poor little Maclou should suffer unjustly, or that his own kind parents should be grieved by this new instance of his brother's violence. Still, Aubin was but a child, and brave as he was he liked being punished as little as any other child; so he turned a little out of the way to say a prayer at the foot of an old wayside cross, where he often brought his childish troubles and difficulties. At the foot of this rude Calvary, in a niche, stood an image of our Lady. It was made of the coarsest pottery; over it hung a box, into which the village children now and then dropped a sou, and the shepherds often laid bunches of broom and heather on the steps. There she stood, in her little niche, smiling on every one, and holding out her Child to the poor and suffering, to young and old; there was no rich canopy over her head, no jewels decked her crown; only the blue sky above her, and the sweet wild-flowers at her feet. No trained voices sang antiphons in her honor, but many a "Hail Mary" was whispered, many a simple hymn sung before her. And the birds perched on the arms of the cross; and greeted her with their carols. Ah, many were the confidences breathed into her ear; many the good resolutions formed at her feet; many a mother came there to pray for her children, and countless blessings fell from her sweet hands on bent heads and aching hearts. "Our Lady of the Road," they called her, and I am sure she showed the road to heaven to many a suppliant.

Aubin knelt down on the steps, laid a bunch of wild-flowers on them, and prayed for strength to do right, then for all he loved—not forgetting the straw-cutter's little girl—and lastly for Marcotte. As he crossed the threshold of his home, he thought he caught a glimpse of Armelle crossing the yard, and carrying something white, and a large basket. But what could Armelle be doing at the farm? He entered the big room where meals were taken; his brother was there, but neither of his parents. He asked the carter where they were. The man pointed silently to the door of the inner room, and Aubin, startled and a little frightened, sat down by the fire, and Labrie, his dog, crouched at his feet. For this inner room was one which was only used on solemn and important occasions; the children of the house, indeed, were never allowed to enter it till the day of their First Communion. Afterwards they were only admitted for very grave reasons. To be sent for into the inner room was an alarming event.

Limping Louison now came in, full of consternation, exclaiming that one goose was missing; and at the same moment Jean and Marthe came in. Both looked very grave, and there were traces of tears in Marthe's eyes; but the master took his place as usual, said grace, and supper began. There was plenty of talking at the meal, much joking with Louison, and many compliments to the mistress on her cookery. The farm-servants discussed everything which concerned the interest of their employers with a kind of filial eagerness, which is peculiarly Breton, and the farmer, in return, treated them more like children than inferiors. On this particular evening, however, his words were few and short; and the servants were on the point of withdrawing, when he said to the herdsman:

"Are all the cattle right?"

"Yes, master."

"Jacquet, (to the shepherd) "did you count the sheep and goats?"

"Ay, master; they are all right."

"And your geese, Louison?"

"There is one short." And the old servant cast a pitying glance at Aubin.

The farmer turned to his son.

"You have been careless," he said severely. "Careless shepherds must be punished. Your godfather made you a present of six francs on New-year's day; the goose you have lost was worth quite as much as that; you have forfeited the money, others must not suffer for your fault."

"No, father; you are quite right."

"Now, children, it is bed-time; come and say good-night." Yves came slowly forward; and, as he knelt at his father's feet, Jean said, in a low and broken voice, "Take warning, Yves; do not disgrace your father."

Aubin meanwhile had gone to his mother for her blessing; and as she laid her hand on his head, she said, with great tenderness, "May God bless thee, as I do."

Aubin was not long before he fell asleep, and dreamed that he saw Armelle busily employed in removing the wings of the dead goose. As she did so, they grew larger and larger. She fastened them to Aubin's shoulders, and, to his surprise and delight he began flying about like a bird or an angel. A rough shake aroused him from his dream. Yves was standing by his bed with an excited expression.

"If you dare to say a word," he muttered.

"What about?"

"You know well enough; it's lucky for you that only I heard you just now talking about the goose, and Armelle, and angels, and the crown-piece."

"You know quite well, Yves, that I never meant to say a word."

This little incident will show the character of the brothers. As Yves grew older, his mother's anxieties increased. She was very gentle with the stubborn, ill-conditioned boy, always reproving him with kindness, often with tears. She never praised his brother to him, for fear of exciting his temper; and with a mother's patient hopefulness she was always trying to find some tender spot in his heart; but all in vain. The good Abbé Kerdrec was untiring in his efforts for the amendment of this black sheep of his fold; but it really seemed as though the boy had neither heart nor conscience. The jealousy with which he had always regarded Aubin had become something terribly like hatred, ever since the story of the goose; he never would believe but that Aubin had told his mother everything. He was right in thinking that Marthe knew the truth, though not from his brother. The straw-cutter's little daughter could not feel easy in her honest child's conscience at receiving Aubin's present. A fat goose would be very nice for supper, certainly; but was it quite right? And so, while Aubin was praying at the Calvary, she had taken the goose to the farmer's wife, and told her the whole story in confidence; for she did not forget Aubin's wish to screen his brother. Marthe was very much touched; she stooped down and kissed Armelle, telling her to keep the goose as a present from her, and giving her besides a loaf and a bottle of wine. So now there was a secret between Marthe and little Armelle.

There came a time when there seemed to be a hope of Yves changing for the better. The boys were preparing for their First Communion; and certainly both the curé and Jean and Marthe thought he was impressed by the instructions he had received. He was less gloomy and jealous, and once or twice he threw his arms round his brother and earnestly asked his forgiveness. The eve of the great day came; and when the boys knelt to ask pardon of their parents for all they had ever done to offend them, Yves covered their hands with kisses and tears. Poor Marthe! it seemed to her like her first-born's second and better birthday. When the family returned from the mass, at which the children had received their Lord for the first time, the parents led them into the inner room, and Jean Patriarche opened a large book which lay upon the table, and told the boys that it had been in the family for two hundred years. It was the book of the Holy Gospels, and on the fly-leaves were written important family events—births, marriages, etc.

"After this great day," said the farmer, "should you commit any serious fault—God forbid it should be a crime—I should be obliged to write it down in this book. May the necessity never occur. Here, my children, write down your names; and may God give you grace and strength to live and die his faithful servants."

There was character shown in the very way in which the lads signed their names. Yves scrawled his in a hasty slap-dash fashion; Aubin wrote slowly, feeling as he did so the solemnity of the occasion, and of his father's words. Jean added the date of the month and year; and the children left the room in silence. From this time the servants called them "our young masters," which much gratified the self-importance of Yves. Still, that was a small matter; and the boy seemed so altered for the better, that for six months Marthe was happy. At the end of that time, however, the old anxieties returned. He went seldomer to church, and grew cold and reserved with his mother; complaints of him were constantly being brought to his father. One day he had turned some cows into a clover field; on another he had overturned a neighbor's bee-hive, or robbed his orchard. Jean's remonstrances were met by indifference or insolence; and by degrees Yves took to frequenting the tavern on Sundays, and keeping company with lads as idle and mischievous as himself; and now there was always one empty seat in the family bench at church, one absent at the evening meal on Sunday. The unhappy boy had become one of the habitués of the Foaming Pitcher, a low tavern, kept by a good-for-nothing old fellow named Mache coul, who kept a running account with Yves, not forgetting to charge interest. "Drink what you like, my boy," he would say, "you are a fine fellow, and like to treat your friends. Never mind the score now; we'll settle accounts when you come of age." Things went on in this way from bad to worse. If Aubin had shown the slightest inclination to follow in his brother's steps, the parents would have been compelled to send the latter away; but it was not so, and therefore they waited, wept and prayed. The farmer scarcely ever spoke to his eldest son now, except to give necessary orders, which were received in surly silence. Yves did his work, and did it well; but his father would rather have seen him fail with humility than succeed with insolent pride. It may seem strange that this very fault did not keep him from associating with the low set who frequented Mache coul's tavern; but the truth was that he was a sort of king among them, and the deference they showed him flattered his vanity. Now and then he had moments of tenderness towards his mother, and a look from her would make his heart swell; but his bitter envy of Aubin always stifled the good impulse, and he would turn away muttering, "She does not love me; he is all she cares for." Ah, no, poor misguided boy; it is the lost sheep we go after, the lost goat that we seek for. And so, like all mothers to whom our Lady has bequeathed her heritage of sorrow, Marthe hid the sword in her heart, and suffered silently.

This, then, was the state of things at Cadiorne when we introduced this family to our readers; plenty and prosperity, with a secret sorrow blighting all.

The shadows were lengthening; only a few sheafs had to be bound; the farmer, standing in the great wagon, caught them one by one as Yves threw them up with a strong, steady hand. "Cheerily, my lads," cried Jean Patriarche; "the mistress has supper ready, and it is growing late."

There is only one sheaf left now, but what a grand one it is—the harvest-home sheaf! It is always made with extra care, and presented with some ceremony to the master, whose business it is to pour on it a bottle of good old wine as he receives it. There is, I confess, a touch of paganism about this custom, but it is a pretty and graceful one nevertheless.

The farm servants and day-laborers go singing merrily to fetch the harvest-home sheaf, with its gay ribbons and bouquets, from the end of the field. Jean Baptiste and Peirrot are preparing to lift it, but stop with a startled exclamation at the sight of a ragged child sleeping quietly in the shadow of the sheaf. Poor little thing! her thin hand was holding some grains which she had rubbed from the husk before falling to sleep. "Holy Mary!" cried one of the men, "it is the straw-cutter's daughter!"

CHAPTER II.

THE HARVEST HOME.

And why was the straw-cutter's daughter so much to be pitied? Alas for poor little Armelle! she was worse than an orphan. Her mother had died worn out and heart-broken; a long course of ill-usage had hastened her end. Her husband was a hopeless drunkard; he would come reeling home from the Foaming Pitcher and load her with reproaches and abuse; sometimes the neighbors heard Annette's voice broken by sobs and then a scream; and more than once she had been seen running out of the house with her child in her arms, to pass the night in an outhouse or a yard. If it was very wet or cold she would knock timidly at the door of a farmhouse; and it would have been a hard heart indeed that could have refused shelter to the pale trembling woman, with her child's rosy face pressed to the bosom so ill-protected from the winter wind.

pared the poor breakfast, and all with the most uncomplaining patience. But there came a day when Mache coul refused to let the straw-cutter add to his score unless he paid a part of his reckoning. This he could not do; high words followed, and Mache coul said: "Your wife has to beg her bread through your misconduct. Annette is my god-daughter, and if she comes to me, I sha'n't refuse her." The straw-cutter went home mad with fury, which only seemed increased by the silence with which his wife met his abuse. He dragged her out of the house, and as she fell, he pushed her with his foot against the doorstep. In the morning he remembered nothing of what had happened, but noticed with surprise that there were no preparations for his breakfast. He opened the house door; there Annette lay, her hair loose on her shoulders, her white face upturned; on the left temple was a deep red mark: he gave only one look, and fled from the place. Soon afterwards, a laborer, who wanted some straw to finish off his bee-hives, came to the door; he lifted up the poor young woman, bathed her face, and gradually she recovered consciousness. Recognizing the man, she said: "I had a fall, Catherinet, but it is nothing. Many thanks; I am sorry to have troubled you; my husband will be wanting his breakfast." She just managed to drag herself to the bed, and to say: "Catherinet, go and send the priest to me: God will repay you for your trouble." The man went, with tears in his eyes, to do her bidding. Poor Annette! her long martyrdom was all but ended. She confessed and received absolution, and received the "Bread of life" to support her on her last journey. She died very quietly, forgiving her husband, but troubled about her little one. "Who will take care of her?" she said to the priest. "Providence, my child," he answered, "is a good mother to the orphan."

Two neighbors stayed beside Annette's corpse: and when her husband came in, one of them said: "Take off your hat, Daniel; you must pay her some respect in death, though you made her life wretched."

He obeyed mechanically.

"Say a prayer, Daniel; she is gone to God, and she forgave you."

The straw cutter knelt, but he did not know how to pray. He could feel remorse though, and the thought of his heart was: "She never gave me an angry word, and I have killed her!"

The next day he followed her to the grave, and afterwards took his little girl in his arms, and leading by a string the goat whose milk had fed her, went to one of the women who had watched by his wife, and agreed to pay so much a month for taking care of the child.

Little Armelle grew and thrived. Chantefleur doted on her; the only trouble was that every now and then her father talked of having her home; but the good woman put him off, and said he had better wait till she was old enough to cook his dinner and mind the house. He saw that the child was terribly afraid of him, and this made him furious.

When Armelle was seven years old he took her home. It was a sad change for the poor child; but the thing that she most missed was hearing Chantefleur talk of her mother. One day she had put a rosary round the child's neck, telling her that her mother said it every day; and never since then had Armelle failed to say it too. She pulled up daisy-tufts, and planted them on her grave, and gathered the first violets, and pretty little milk-worts to lay there. One day a little boy gave her a bird's nest, in which were some downy nestlings; she put it in a wild rose-bush which grew by the grave, and told the little birds to sing to her mother when they were old enough. Chantefleur had always kept her neat and tidy, but now the frocks were in rags, and the little feet bare. She was very ignorant. Daniel refused to send her to school, and very often she had to beg.

One evening, when she was about ten years old, her father came in with a coarse untidy-looking woman, whom he ordered Armelle to call "mother."

"My mother is dead," said the child gravely.

"This is your second mother."

"Chantefleur is my second mother."

"Indeed! and what is my wife?"

The child seemed stupefied; then, after a while, she said gently: "Father, now that you have some one else to look after you, you do not want me."

"I don't turn you out, mind."

"But I am going," she answered.

"A good riddance;" cried La Gervaise, for that was the woman's name.

Armelle went up to her father and asked him to give her her mother's wedding-ring. The man turned pale; he had placed it on the finger of La Gervaise. The child had noticed what seemed to her a sacrilege.

"Give it her," muttered Daniel. "I can get you another."

The woman drew it off, and threw it rudely on the ground. Armelle picked it up, kissed it, fastened it to her mother's rosary, and then said slowly and sorrowfully: "Good-bye, father."

The man's heart smote him.

"Stop here," he said, "and I promise never to beat you again."

But La Gervaise rose, and facing him, said resolutely: "She or I—choose between us."

Then Armelle repeated, "Good-bye, father;" opened the door, knelt down, kissed the doorstep, and went away.

It was a lovely night; the stars looked down from a cloudless sky. Armelle did not feel lonely; it seemed as if some one was beside her taking care of her; her mother or her angel-guardian—perhaps both. She walked straight to the church-yard. What a pretty carpet the turf made, starred over with daisies; and how sweetly the nightingale was singing! She lay down on the grave and slept quietly till morning; then she awoke with the sun, the swallows in the tower, and the church-bell. She slipped into a confessional, for she was ashamed of her rags; and when mass was over, she slipped out again.

What was she to do? Chantefleur had left the neighborhood for a few days. But, to be sure, it was harvest time; she would soon glean a little bundle; the miller was a kind man, and would give her in exchange for it a loaf of bread. Providence guided her to the field of Jean Patriarche; she gleaned all day, ate the corn, which she rubbed out in her hands, drank from the stream which ran at the bottom of the field, made a dessert of blackberries, and then quite tired out, she laid her bunch of ears beside her, and fell asleep in the shadow of the harvest-home sheaf, with the names of God and her mother on her lips.

She awoke with a start as Pierrot's cry brought the reapers to the spot. She looked round her with a scared expression, pushed her tangle of hair back from her little pale face, and said: "I may keep my bundle, mayn't I?"

"Poor little mite," said Pierrot, "how hard she must have worked to get all that! I'll tell you what, you fellows, I've got an idea; suppose the straw-cutter's daughter gives the sheaf to the master?"

"Well said! a capital notion!"

A wreath of wheat-ears and corn-flowers had been made, ready for the ceremony, and this was placed on Armelle's head. The men undid the wisp of straw which bound the sheaf, and placed the child in the middle of it; only her head was visible,

"Poor little maid!" said Pierrot; "I wish she had poppies on her cheeks, as well as corn-flowers in her eyes."

"Up with the sheaf, the bonny harvest-home sheaf!"

Père Patriarche was sitting quietly on the wagon-pole, waiting for the sheaf; his sons were beside him; Yves was looking unusually pleasant, and the father felt almost happy.

"The sheaf seems tolerably heavy," he said, smiling.

The men laid it with a laugh at their master's feet.

"It is good grain," said old Pierrot, "which the good God has ripened. See what He has hidden in the sheaf—a bird without a nest, a daisy plucked up by the roots. See, master, we have made her a bed of fresh straw, just as our Lady did for her little Jesus."

Patriarche could not understand a word of all this, till a pretty little face met his wondering eyes, as Pierrot's sickle cut the straw band, and the golden ears fell in a shower at Armelle's feet. The good farmer's eyes were wet. "Poor little lark," he said, "did you make a nest in the corn?"

"I was gleaning," answered the little one, "and I fell asleep, and it was Pierrot—"

"Pierrot is a very clever fellow," returned Jean, with a kind smile. "You shall have the harvest-home sheaf, my child. When God gives abundantly, our hands must be opened like His. But your father?"

"He is married again—to La Gervaise."

"Good heavens! And you are turned out of doors?"

"I am sure father would have kept me; but—"

"But he is afraid of La Gervaise. I see—a woman like that! What a shame! What a sin—"

Patriarche broke off abruptly; then, at a sign from him, Armelle was lifted into the high wagon, the two lads led the horses, and he himself followed slowly and thoughtfully.

It was a pretty, yet a sad sight; the little thing with her bare feet crossed, sitting smiling on her golden throne, crowned with flowers and innocence.

As soon as they reached the farm, Jean Patriarche took his wife's hand, and saying, "I want to speak to you," led her into the family sanctuary, the inner room.

"Wife," he said, "I do not want to give you a command; I do not even ask you to do what I wish for my sake; I only want to say this—we have a wound deep down in our hearts; let us move the good God to cure it by a good action. The straw-cutter is going from bad to worse. The house where La Gervaise is mistress is not a fit house for Armelle. Last night she slept on her mother's grave, and the angels watched over her. Where can she sleep to-night? Where can she go to-morrow? Our men, who found her sleeping by the sheaf, brought her to me like a dove in its nest; and I have been thinking—"

Marthe opened the Book of the Gospels, and taking a pen she wrote, in a bold, firm hand:

"The day of our harvest home, 18—, Jean and Marthe Patriarche have adopted Armelle, the straw-cutter's daughter, and taken her for their own child."

The farmer kissed her gravely and silently, and Marthe said, in a low voice "May our Lord have mercy on Yves!" Then she opened the great oaken cupboard, saying, "I have all Jeanne's things here, and now that God has given me another daughter, they will do for her."

So Armelle was washed, combed and dressed. Marthe put a gold cross round her neck, replaced the garland on her head, and then sat down in the great arm-chair by her husband's desk, while he threw the door wide open, and made sign for his sons and servants to enter. Then he rose, took off his hat, and said "Before God and before our own conscience, we promise to bring up Armelle as a good Christian girl. Love her, all of you, as you love us, for His sake who has loved us."

Poor little Armelle! she could hardly believe that it was all true. The only cloud was, that Yves did not look at her as kindly as Aubin did; she was afraid she should have only one brother. But troubles are soon over at her age; and besides why should Yves not like her? The story of the goose was four years old.

At the end of the evening, Jean spoke with honest indignation of Daniel's conduct.

"Patience," said Marthe; "the child will save him yet."

"His wife tried, and it cost her her life."

Martha answered, "What is that as the price of a soul?"

CHAPTER III.

THE STRAW-CUTTER'S BARGAIN.

ARMELLE'S business was to keep the sheep; Aubin had charge of the horses and cows. The two went out together, the boy carrying the basket containing their dinners, the girl with a book in her pocket, and her distaff stuck in her girdle. In winter, the first thing was to make a fire. Aubin managed capitably with heather and dead branches, and the children sat before it on two large stones, chatting merrily. They baked their potatoes and chestnuts in the ashes, sang songs, and talked about Marthe's kindness and Jean Patriarche's generosity. Sometimes Maclou joined them. When Finaud was playing with Labrie, Maclou was never far from Aubin and Armelle. His love for them was a passion, a worship, as it is apt to be with the forlorn and desolate; he would have died for either of them. After their dinner, they fed the birds, which were so tame that they came to pick up the crumbs under their very sabots. Sometimes Aubin read stories to Armelle. She conceived a great idea of the dignity of her occupation when she heard that Paris had been saved from a terrible king by a shepherdess, and a king of France restored to his throne by another. What a pity her name was not Genevieve or Jeanne, instead of Armelle.

When the day of her First Communion came, she wished to see her father, and her adopted parents took her to his cottage; it was empty. Marcotte, who was passing, said, "Go to Machecou's tavern."

The child turned away with a shudder, saying to Marthe, "Mother, let us go home."

Her father met them, singing, shouting, and cursing. Armelle trembled from head to foot; but without hesitating a moment, she went up to him and said, "Father, I have been to your house to ask your blessing. God is giving me a great grace, and I want you to share in it."

"Is that why you are all in white? You are a fine looking lady now, fed and clothed with the best."

She took his hand fearlessly.

"What do you want?" Daniel asked.

"I want to say just one word to you."

"Well what is it?"

"Father, what you say is true; I am well clothed and loved at Jean Patriarche's; and yet, for all that, my heart often aches. I should like to share your poverty and your trouble. I want to be back in the house where mother died. Send away La Gervaise, father—they say she is not really your wife—and let me come back and take care of you and love you. Oh father you don't know how sweet it is to be loved. May I come to you?"

The man burst into a loud laugh.

"You want to preach, I suppose."

"No," answered Armelle.

"Well, then, to cry as your mother did."

"I will not cry," said the child.

"Children are only a trouble. La Gervaise suits me best."

He went away, and Armelle clung to Marthe, weeping bitterly. By and by she said, "Mother, it would have broken my heart to leave you, but—"

"I understand, child; and don't you suppose I should have been sorry to lose my daughter? But there are only two roads, you see—a wrong and a right one—and when you took the right one, I wasn't going to stop you. Why, Armelle, I couldn't love you so much unless you did your duty."

So there was a heavy cloud overshadowing that blessed day—the brightest and fairest in a child's life. She was never again the same merry laughing creature as before; she grew very thoughtful—almost gloomy at times; she knew too much now. It was well for her that she could rest on the tender and faithful heart of Marthe. She felt so safe under her motherly wing, so sheltered by her love. The conduct of Yves was another grief to the poor girl. This indifference had turned to positive hatred. He tried to wound and humiliate her in every possible way. He told her that he had met her father at the tavern, or that he had seen him fighting. He grudged her the clothes she wore, and the bread she ate; he would sit smoking by the well while he made her draw heavy pails to fill the trough. She never refused to do anything; she never complained. This cruel Yves was the son of one who was both her master and her father, and she obeyed him in silence.

Armelle was turned fifteen. Pretty, pious, and the adopted daughter of the rich farmer, she had plenty of suitors; but she refused them all, saying simply that she was too young, and wished to stay with Marthe.

One winter's evening it was snowing fast, as Armelle was bringing her sheep home; the wind was very high, and she could hardly keep the hood of her cloak over her head, as she struggled on, blinded by the thick flakes. Presently Labrie barked furiously, and the sheep pressed close together, shivering more from fear than cold. Something red, glaring, was a few steps before her. The terrified girl fell on her knees, unable either to cry out or run away. The two flaming eyes, for such they were, came nearer. She felt as if they drew her irresistibly towards them. Then she saw dark shadowy things like great, hideous, rough dogs. Labrie leaped gallantly on one of the creatures, the other sprung upon Armelle. She felt suffocated—a hot fiery breath was on her cheek. She had a dim consciousness of a struggle around her, and then all was darkness. When she came to herself, the farm servants, holding torches, were kneeling beside her. On the snow was a pool of blood; beside it a dead wolf. "Hush!" said Marthe, as she tried to speak, "you shall hear everything presently:" she was taken into the great hall at the farm. There sat Aubin, pale as death, leaning his head on the table; beside him stood Yves, his hand bleeding, and his forehead bound with a handkerchief.

"Oh!" cried Armelle, "what has happened?"

"It was a wolf; two wolves, rather," answered Yves shortly.

"You were all but devoured by one," added his mother.

"And Yves saved my life?"

"I only killed the wolf."

"The wolf was going to kill me?"

"Well, and if I did save your life, what would that prove?"

She went up to him, and said, in a voice trembling with emotion: "It would prove that you have a tiny bit of love for your little sister. No one can give more than his life for any one."

"I don't know," answered Yves brusquely. "I think plenty of people give their lives, or their deaths, if you like, easily enough, from love, or hatred, or whim, or because they are fools; but to sacrifice one's life, one's whole life, day by day, hour by hour, that's different."

"It is much sweeter," said Armelle.

"Now, look here; if you knew that you could save Daniel from sin or damnation by throwing yourself into the flames or under a mill-wheel, would you not do it?"

"Oh, yes."

"But would you consent to live with him—close to him—always; to see him jealous of your services, of your love? Would you agree to let him tyrannize over you, when all the while there was a peaceful life ready for you elsewhere?"

"Yes, Yves; I would."

"Why, it would be a hell!"

"No; a martyrdom."

"But without any one to force you to it?"

"There is duty, Yves."

"And would you sacrifice everything to duty?"

"Everything. But," she said, after a pause, "your hand is not properly bound up; the blood is coming through the linen. Yves, let me see to it." And she gently undid the handkerchief, bathed and dressed the gaping wound, with a light tender hand. "You will not hate me any more?" she asked winningly.

"Do you love me, then?"

"Certainly I do."

"I know what that means—just nothing," Then, all at once, he broke out passionately: "And have I not reason to hate you! You have taken from me my place in the house; you are slowly stealing away what little love my mother has left for me; you are robbing me of my birthright!"

"Be silent," said Aubin. "I will neither have you ask her whether she loves you nor say that you hate her."

Angry words were rapidly exchanged, and Armelle with difficulty quieted the brothers. Soon after, Aubin went out; and when the farmer and his wife returned, Yves and their adopted daughter were talking together happily enough.

From the day the straw-cutter's daughter had stood up so bravely in Maclou's defence, Yves had disliked her from his heart. When his parents adopted her the dislike became positive hatred. But gradually another feeling came; I can scarcely say to replace the other, for even the love he was beginning to cherish for Armelle was so strange, so vehement, so absolutely without any softening influence, that it seemed still to retain some of the old hatred. As to the simple happy child herself, she guessed nothing of all this, but went on quietly feeding her sheep, singing her songs, and reading the stories of St. Geneviève and Jeanne d'Arc. When the Abbé Kerdrec spoke of her to Jean and Marthe, he called her his "saintly little shepherdess."

The long evenings had begun; the women knitted or shelled peas. Loïc the bell-ringer, the musician of the village, brought his "binion," and played sad or merry tunes, or told stories of ghosts and "loups-garoux" that made one's hair stand on an end. He delighted in giving his audience a fright, and seeing how close the girls kept together when the time came to separate. Brittany is such a place for "eerie" sights and sounds. Think of all the "fairy rocks," the mysterious "lavandieres" of the streams, the "white ladies" in the ruins; then the "death chariot," which passes noiselessly along, and the "hollah" of the "night huntsmen!" It is all delightfully terrifying, and Père Loïc was a great favorite with the young people. He was the first to see how it was with Yves and to give him a hint. "Take my word for it," he said, "and give up that idea; the hawk does not mate with the dove, nor the lamb with the wolf." These words set him thinking. "She shall love me," he said, and he set about trying to win her with all his might. Marthe was full of joy at the change in his manners and conduct, and Armelle treated him with affectionate kindness. All was sunshine at the farm.

Lent was over. The Paschal candle was lighted in the church, and Abbé Kerdrec had preached on the threefold resurrection; that of our Lord, that of our hearts, and that of the teeming earth.

Marthe and her husband, Armelle and Aubin, came out of church full of peace and joy. Aubin gathered some "Alleluia flowers," and offered them to Armelle saying: "They are not to be gathered in Lent; it would make our Lady weep; but she smiles on those who pluck them at Easter."

"Thanks, Aubin; I will put them on my mother's grave."

"And may I pray there with you," he asked timidly, "as if I were her son?"

"And my brother."

They knelt, one on each side of Annette's grave, and prayed silently for a few minutes. Then Aubin bent down till his face touched the ground, and said: "Annette, Annette, let me tell you that I love Armelle."

The girl rose from her knees; before her, just behind Aubin, stood the Abbé Kerdrec. Then, without a blush, with the grave religious simplicity of the Breton character, she drew from her finger her mother's ring, and gave it to the priest.

"In the name of your mother, Armelle, your humble holy mother, I approve of Aubin as your husband; and as I know the mind of Jean and Marthe Patriarche, I betroth you here to each other, in the sight of God and of the holy dead."

The Abbé Kerdrec walked home with the affianced pair, telling them the story of Tobias and Sara; he bade them remember that life is a pilgrimage, and that their happiness depended on their love for each other and for God. Then he said that they were very young, and had better not marry till after harvest.

"O, father," said Aubin, "I could wait Jacob's seven years now. I could do anything so that I may have Armelle for my wife at last."

"Very well, my children; I will settle it all with your father. You will do well, I am sure, and it will be a pleasure to me to give you to each other."

There was quite a grand dinner at the farm. Marthe surpassed herself. The mayor was present, with a friend of his, a magistrate from Rennes, a little, sharp, thin man, with a voice like a peacock. He wanted a vote from Patriarche, and therefore did him the honor of drinking his wine and eating his chickens. Patriarche had no fancy for men of the law. As a rule, country people consider them a bloodthirsty race, from the gendarme to the avocat. The procureur impérial is the worst of the lot. The only legal functionary they consider useful is the garde champêtre, who looks after their orchards. The farmer, therefore, was perfectly civil, but very careful to support the dignity of the spade and the plough. Yves was in a state of suppressed fury with the dry little man, who kept looking at Armelle through his eyeglass. She, on her part, saw nothing of what was going on; she kept touching her left hand with her right; it seemed so strange to feel no ring there. Then she thought that Aubin would soon give her another, with their names engraved inside, and a date, which the Abbé Kerdrec would bless. She remembered the Alleluia flowers which she had laid on Annette's grave, and that the curé was going to tell the great event of the day to Jean and Marthe. The tears sprang to her eyes at the thought of kneeling for Marthe's blessing.

After dinner, Patriarche went into the garden with his guests. The Abbé Kerdrec said a few words in a low voice to Marthe, who led the way to the family sanctuary, and the lovers went for a stroll in a little green paddock surrounded by a thick hawthorn hedge. They talked of their childish days, of how they had loved each other all their lives, of the happiness which awaited them. Then Marthe and the Abbé joined them, and soon after, Patriarche.

"God bless you, my children; we have settled everything—M. l'Abbé and I. We shall have to see to our daughter's trousseau, that's all; there will be no house to find for you: the old folks would be lost if you left them."

Meanwhile, Yves met Daniel in the road, and invited him to accompany him to Machecoul's. He had overheard the conversation of Aubin and Armelle in the meadow, and his resolution was taken.

"I can't come," answered the straw-cutter; "he refuses me credit now."

"Come on, I'll pay;" said Yves.

The fact was, Daniel's peccadilloes had multiplied of late; he had taken to poaching, if to no worse. When a hen came in his way, it was seen no more; he borrowed, and forgot to pay; everything short of actual stealing he was capable of; but he had not gone so far as taking money, and he made the strangest compromises with his conscience. The miserable man was very much altered in appearance lately; there was a wild wandering look in his eyes; sometimes he laughed idiotically; at others he would remain for hours without speaking, and then suddenly tell such strange weird stories, that Loïc himself might have been jealous. His hands trembled a good deal; still, he was as good as ever with the scythe and the sickle, but more gloomy, silent and fierce-looking every day. When he went by, scythe in hand, the children ran away in a fright, and said he looked like the picture of death.

When he had drunk some wine he brightened up a little.

"Capital wine this," he said.

"A barrel of it in one's cellar wouldn't be a bad thing in the winter," suggested Yves.

"I believe you"

"Well, Père Daniel, I will send you a couple."

"And what will there be to pay?"

"Not a farthing."

"Nothing at all?"

"One word, just one, that's all."

"Let us hear it by all means."

"You have a daughter—"

"And a pretty one, too."

"Well, will you have me for a son-in-law?"

"Patriarche would not allow it."

"Yes, he would. Come, Daniel, two hogsheds of wine, and three hundred francs on the wedding-day. I will thatch and whitewash your cottage, and give you a cow into the bargain."

"That's all right; but I don't half like giving up Armelle."

"Why you turned her out of doors."

"Never mind that; I can take her back whenever I like now, but if she's married I can't."

"I'll pay you so much a year regularly."

"How much?"

"A hundred and fifty francs."

"It must be all properly done, mind; drawn up by a notary; and on the whole I prefer three hundred francs down. Give me a bill for that sum, payable at three months date, and you shall be married at the end of that time."

"Done!" cried the young man.

When Macheoul came in, he gave Yves a knowing wink, and said:

"Are things going on all right?"

"Capitally; I am going to marry his daughter."

"My daughter and my debts."

Yves took the straw-cutter home, and returned to the farm with his head in wild confusion. Was it not all a dream, what he had heard behind the hedge, and his wicked bargain with Daniel?

CHAPTER VI.

ANNETTE'S GRAVE.

EARLY the next morning, the Abbé Kerdrec went to the straw-cutter's house. It was a wretched place. The walls were damp, black, and cracked; the thatch hung green and decaying on the rotten beams; the door was almost off its hinges. The inside was no better. Ragged clothes lay about the place; in one corner fowls were pecking on a heap of straw; broken plates, cabbage leaves, potato-parings, strewed the floor; and it all looked doubly disgusting on that fresh, sweet morning, when everything was so bright and beautiful—when Nature had donned her green robe, gemmed with dewdrops, and wreathed her brow with flowers. But darker yet is the contrast between the song of the birds, the rustle of the breeze, the perfume of the flowers and the blasphemy of the man who ignores or insults the God of whose Uncreated Beauty all this fair world of nature is a faint image.

The good priest walked along slowly and thoughtfully, blessing all the creatures of God. A book was passed through his girdle, but it was the open book of Nature that he was studying, and his eyes were full of love and gratitude. He drew near to the straw-cutter's house—it was like a blot on the fair landscape. Daniel was walking before the door, reflecting on last night's transaction, and never noticed the Abbé Kerdrec till he spoke.

"Good morning, my friend. I come from Jean Patriarche, who has commissioned me to ask your consent to Armelle's marriage with his son."

"My consent! Certainly, M. l'Abbé—with all my heart."

"I am glad you see no objection; the marriage will be after harvest."

"O, indeed; is it put off till then?"

"It will be a time of leisure then; I want you to give a written consent."

"Are you afraid that I shall go back from my word?"

"No; but I am afraid that you will pay too many visits to Père Macheoul."

"I see; all right. La Gervaise, bring us paper and ink."

"I have brought everything with me," said the priest; "let me read you the form, and then you will only have to sign." and he read: "I, Daniel, commonly called 'the straw-cutter,' hereby give my consent to the marriage of my daughter Armelle with Aubin Patriarche, younger son of Jean Patriarche, of the farm of Cadiorne."

"You have made a mistake, M. l'Abbé; you have written 'Aubin' instead of 'Yves.'"

"Yves? It is for Aubin that Jean and Marthe ask your daughter."

"Well, then, it's a mess," said the straw-cutter, "for only last evening I promised her to Yves."

"It was a rash promise, Daniel. Aubin is a young man of unblemished character, and sincerely attached to Armelle, who returns his affection."

"All that means nothing to me. Yves suits me best; and a girl must obey her father."

"And do you dare to call yourself by that title?" asked the priest indignantly. "Did you not drive the child from her home? Are you not insulting your dead wife by the presence of the woman you have put in her place? What have you done for the poor girl who has been brought up by the Patriarches? You only remember that you are father in order to tyrannize over her; the duties of a father you shamelessly forget! Daniel, beware of braving God's anger!"

"You may spare your sermon, M. l'Curé. The long and short of the matter is this: Armelle is not of age, and I am her father. She either marries Yves Patriarche or comes back to me."

"You have no right to dictate terms," said the Abbé Kerdrec; "you lost that right the day you brought that woman to your house."

"I may engage a servant, I suppose; and it is my own affair."

"You will find that it is that of others, too."

"Very well; but in any case I refuse to sign that paper."

"Daniel, be merciful. Yves is a bad fellow, and Aubin and Armelle love one another. Have you never loved any one yourself—not your mother, nor Annette—"

"No," thundered the miserable man; "my mother cursed me, and Annette—"

"Forgave you."

"All I know is this, I want wine and I want money. Yves will pay Macheoul and secure my credit. There!" and he turned his back upon the priest and went into the house.

Very slowly and sadly the Abbé Kerdrec returned to the presbytery. As he passed the mayor's house, he saw him at the window, and the thought struck him that he would ask his advice. He told the whole story to the worthy man, who reflected for a minute, and then said:

"Don't despair yet, M. l'Abbé. Daniel's bad life is notorious. If Annette's death had been inquired into too closely, things would have looked ugly for him; but nothing was said for the child's sake. Now, however, we can put a spoke into his wheel. We can't force him to give his daughter to Aubin; but neither can he force her to marry Yves. There remains the question of his threat to take Armelle back. That's not to be thought of—here we step in. The innocent child shall not live with La Gervaise; the law will not help Daniel there. We deprive him of his paternal rights, hold a meeting, and make Patriarche Armelle's guardian. She lives at the farm until she is twenty-one, and then marries Aubin."

"I see that," said the Curé; "but it is a terrible misfortune that both brothers have asked her in marriage on the same day. Well, we must trust in God!"

"And rely on me," said the mayor.

On his way home the Abbé Kerdrec met poor Aubin, told him the sad story, and consoled him as best he could. He shrank from letting him know that his brother was his rival; and he advised him to go to the farm and say nothing of all this trouble.

Patriarche was full of glee; he whistled as he walked, raised Pierrot's wages, gave Baptiste a pair of shoes, and Joseph a neckerchief; Louison was presented with two jackets of russet cloth, and every beggar who came to the door received a hunch of bread and a mug of cider.

Meanwhile, Daniel was on his way to the farm. Jean Patriarche was in the garden; the straw-cutter went up to him, and said that it was his intention to take his daughter back.

"Your reasons?" asked the farmer.

"I have no reasons to give; she is my daughter, and I have the law on my side."

"And I have all honest men on mine; so until you are armed with a legal authority, I forbid you to enter my house."

Daniel went straight to M. Gorju, the mayor, who told him that the life he was leading deprived him of his natural rights, and that his daughter was perfectly justified in refusing to live with him. The man was furious; he entered Machecoul's tavern, where he found Yves whom he told of Aubin's proposal to Armelle, and of his own interview with M. Gorju. Yves remained lost in thought for some time; then he said:

"You must marry La Gervaise."

"Anything but that."

"Send her away then."

"I dare not; she would kill me."

"Look here; I will give you four thousand francs instead of three the day you marry her; and you can take away Armelle the same day."

We will not linger over the hateful compact; it was so unutterably base, that bad as both the men were, they felt ashamed of it, and separated as soon as possible.

A few days later Daniel's banns were published during mass. The Abbé Kerdreo did not fathom the plot, but he had a presentiment of misfortune.

The straw-cutter married La Gervaise, the village children hooting after them all the way home. Daniel went straight to the mayor, and said:

"Monsieur, there is nothing to prevent Armelle's return home. I mean to claim her."

"God will judge you?" answered Gorju.

On his way to the farm he passed the Curé, and told him his errand.

"God forgive you!" said the priest.

Marthe had told the young girl of her father's marriage. Never dreaming of all it involved, she was almost glad, and said:

"It is better so."

They were all assembled for the midday meal, when the straw-cutter entered. Armelle trembled, Yves turned livid, Patriarche remained calm and dignified.

"What do you want here?" he asked.

"I want to speak to you elsewhere," said Daniel. "Let us go into that room—is it not there that family affairs are arranged?"

The farmer and his wife entered the inner room. Jean signed to Armelle to follow.

"The matter is this," said the straw-cutter, "both your sons have asked my daughter's hand. I refuse it to Aubin; I give it to Yves."

"I shall not permit Yves to marry Armelle," answered the farmer; "he is not worthy of her."

"And I refuse my consent to her marriage with Aubin. The child is under age, and I am come to take her with me."

The poor girl fell on her knees, weeping convulsively.

"You are doing a wicked thing," said Patriarche. "You have never thought about your daughter till now, that you mean to break her heart. But I know her well; she would die rather than murmur, die—like her mother—with a prayer on her lips, and forgiveness in her eyes. I will take her myself to your house; but you must give her time for her tears and farewells; and now go, Daniel."

The straw-cutter obeyed in silence. Then poor Armelle abandoned herself to an agony of grief. In heartrending accents she implored Marthe not to send her away to La Gervaise—to the house where her mother had died of misery. Patriarche raised her tenderly. "My daughter," he said, "my heart's own child, do not give way so terribly. When the rain lays the corn, the sun raises it again. God and his angels will be with you. There is an end to everything on earth. You will be eighteen in August, then there will be three years to wait. Take courage; they will soon pass. And there will be the Sundays—you shall always have your old place on the old bench."

"O how good you are! It is a heavy cross, but I am a Christian, and my father—"

Patriarche took her in his arms: "My daughter, we shall suffer with you; remember that; now dry your eyes. We will go together to the field where Pierrot hid you in the sheaf, and then to your mother's tomb to ask her to bless and watch over you."

As they passed into the hall, he called to Aubin to come with them. Yves rose to follow but he dared not disobey the glance and gesture with which his father stopped him. The parents signed to Aubin and Armelle to walk on together. When Aubin sobbed uncontrollably as they knelt by Annette's grave, the girl said: "Listen to me, Aubin, and do not make the trouble harder to me; it is like death to me to leave the farm; but I have tried to look up to the Cross, and our Lord's Sacred Wounds. We will be true to each other, and wait. And O, Aubin, you will have Marthe; but I shall have no one. Don't make me weaker than I am; remember the first thing is to do our duty, everywhere, always, and before all things." Then she bent across the grave towards him, and said in a low voice: "There is another sorrow in store for you. Remember one thing: whatever happens, however hard, however terrible, you must forgive—God commands you to do so, and I entreat you."

"Armelle, what do you mean?"

"I can say no more; remember my words when you are tempted to revenge."

Then she laid her hand on his forehead, as though she blessed him; and without another word left the churchyard, holding Jean's arm. When they reached Daniel's gate Armelle gave one long embrace to him and his wife, and went in; while they returned to the farm, silent and heartbroken. Armelle laid her little bundle on a stool, and said good evening to her father. Presently she asked where she was to sleep. "In Blanchette's stable." Blanchette was the goat which had been her nurse. She undid her bundle, took out some sheets, went to the stable, made an impromptu broom of some bunches of heath that lay about, swept the place, arranged a straw bed, covered it with her sheet, and went back to the house without a trace of ill-temper.

She had everything to do; her stepmother spent her time gossiping in the village, whilst Armelle washed, cooked, and cleaned the house, with the utmost diligence and care. Only, when Sunday came, no matter what orders were given to her, she went to Mass. Her place was always kept by Marthe. After Mass she went to Annette's grave. A black cross marked it now; and at the foot, every Sunday, she found fresh flowers which Aubin had laid there during the night. And so the days went by, and every Sunday told that another week had gone.

After a time, Armelle was forbidden by her father to join the Patriarche family at Mass; she saw them at the church, and that was all. Her chief comfort was her old friend Chantefleur; she persisted in coming to see Armelle in spite of the rudeness and insolence of La Gervaise; she brought her loving messages from Marthe, and tried to cheer her as much as possible.

Yves became more gloomy and irritable as the time of Armelle's majority approached—sometimes he was half mad, and felt ready to crush her under his feet. Her father too was furious with her; he had conquered Annette, but it seemed as if he could not conquer her daughter. He had insulted, beaten her—all in vain.

Never once had Yves dared to speak to his brother of the rivalry between them; he felt that everything was in Aubin's favor—his high character, his parent's affection, Armelle's love; while he himself had nothing but her unnatural father's favor. And his heart told him that Armelle would never yield.

CHAPTER V.

TEN LIVES FOR ONE.

One evening the two brothers walked together to a neighboring village; their father wanted a tool repaired at the ploughwright's and a new knife bought.

It was a sweet still evening; only now and then heavy masses of clouds hid the moon. Aubin's step was light, his heart glad; for in a few months Armelle would be free, and his wife.

"There is no need to hurry so," said Yves; "it is a fine night."

Aubin slackened his pace. Then they began talking of the old tailor who was making a wedding suit for a neighbor of theirs, of another neighbor who had taken a farm, of the fair which was just over, of the crops, and of the village girls.

"The rose of St. Aubin du Cormier is in no hurry to marry, it seems."

"Time enough," said Aubin.

"You think so, do you?"

"Certainly I do."

"She has a reason for waiting, perhaps?"

Aubin made no answer.

The spade was set to rights, the knife bought, and the brothers left the shop.

"It seems strange for us to be walking together; it does not happen often," said Yves.

"Whose fault is that? I heartily wish that we were more together. I have always loved you, Yves, in spite of everything."

"As much as Labrie and Louison?"

"Yes, you are not just; you know very well you have estranged yourself from us without reason."

"Without reason?" And Yves turned passionately upon him. "I tell you there was a time in my life when a girl's hand could have led me anywhere. One look of hers was enough. If only—But no; she was afraid of me; and besides there was one who had been beforehand with me, one who knew how to please and flatter and speak fair; a fellow without spirit or courage, always tied to his mother's apron string. And I was told that Armelle loved Aubin—for I mean you—the very day on which I asked her hand."

"We could not guess that, either of us."

"But you might have given her up! Are you to have everything—our mother's caresses and the love of the straw-cutter's daughter too? Suppose I were to say that you must give her up, that I will marry her?"

"Yves do not let us speak of it; it does no good to either of us; and Armelle is my betrothed."

"I will not hear of it; you shall never marry her! Once more, will you give her up?"

"No."

Yves seized Aubin's arm, and shook him furiously. The young man tried in vain to get free. In the struggle Yves felt in his pocket the knife they had bought. A cloud hid the moon—there was a terrible cry—a heavy fall—the cloud passed over the moon, and the pale light showed a man rushing madly from the spot.

Later in the evening Yves went home. There were many lights about; people coming and going; there was a light too in the inner room. Labrie lay, whining, in one corner; Louison was moving about with a scared face; in the next room people were talking in awe-struck whispers. Marthe entered; "Who is that?" she said; then recognizing Yves, "where did you leave your brother?"

"In the shop."

"And where have you been since?"

"At Machecoul's."

Bewildered with terror, she caught his hand and dragged him into the inner room.

"Swear," she said; "swear on this book."

He remained motionless. She bade him take off his hat, and he obeyed her mechanically. Then she fixed her eyes upon his face with an expression of horror, and leaving the room for a minute, she returned with a bowl of water in one hand and a looking-glass in the other. A drop of blood was on his forehead. "Stay here," she said in an agonized whisper; "stay here before the Crucifix."

She went out quickly; the doctor had come to attend to Aubin.

Returning from a wedding, Loic had seen something dark lying in the road; it was Aubin. The old man managed to carry him to the farm, and Pierrot ran for the doctor. The news spread like wild fire, and in a short time the gendarmes, the garde champêtre and the Curé were in the room. The commissary of police and the magistrate had been sent for from Rennes. At length Aubin showed signs of life. Patriarche was sitting watching him at the head of the bed; Marthe at the foot, with her eyes riveted on her son's deathlike face. No one spoke. Suddenly a sound of wheels was heard.

"It is the magistrate," said the Abbe Kerdrec as he entered.

"What do you want?" asked Marthe in a terrified whisper.

"There has been an attempt at murder," was the answer, "and there must be an investigation."

Old Loic told his story, and produced the knife which he had drawn from the wound. The magistrate ascertained from Patriarche at what hour, and in whose company, and with what intention Aubin went out, and Yves was summoned. In telling what had happened, he stated that he had left his brother at the hardware shop after the knife was bought, and that he himself had gone to the tavern. The shop-keeper, however, swore that they had gone away together.

"You see," said the magistrate, "the two accounts do not agree."

Yves muttered something about his having been drinking at Machecoul's, and not remembering things clearly. Just then the doctor came in to say that Aubin had revived sufficiently to be able to speak. He was as white as the sheets in which he lay, but quite calm and collected. When all were assembled round his bed, and the magistrate had taken a chair directly opposite to him, he said:

"Sir, and you, reverend father, and you, my dearest parents, I wish to confess my crime to you. I have made an attempt on my life."

The magistrate started.

"Let me tell you how it was," continued Aubin. "The straw-cutter's daughter and I have long been betrothed, but her father will not consent to our marriage." He broke off suddenly; then, after a pause, he added faintly, "I ask pardon of you all."

The Abbé Kerdrec laid his hand on Aubin's forehead. Marthe hid her face in the bed-clothes. The magistrate rose, saying:

"After this I can say no more, except indeed, this: there are crimes which escape the justice of men, but God will judge them."

He fixed a penetrating glance, cold, clear and keen as steel, on the face of Yves, and left the house. The doctor administered a sleeping draught to his patient, and the Abbé went to say mass. Then the miserable parents commanded Yves to follow them to the inner room. There was an awful silence for some minutes; then Jean Patriarche addressed his guilty son:

"Yves, your brother has saved you, but we condemn you. Deny nothing—do not speak! You think, perhaps, that I shall shoot you, as I would a mad dog. No, for I am a Christian; but still the shedder of blood deserves death. I allow you to lose yours in an honorable calling; you must enlist to-morrow."

Yves remained silent; the old man's head was bowed lower than that of his wretched son. He pointed to the door—"Go!" he said. Yves obeyed; and then that room, the family sanctuary, which had been the scene of the home festivals and home solemnities of four generations of good and upright men, witnessed the tears and anguish of the dishonored parents. Jean spoke first.

"God's hand is heavy upon us," he said; "but it is the hand of a Father. One word from Aubin, and we must have left the country. Now, our shame and sorrow are a secret, except to ourselves. All this we owe to Aubin. Ah, Marthe, Aubin will make up for everything to us."

"And if he dies——"

"Then we must not grudge him to God."

In the course of the day the Abbé Kerdrec came to console them. His heart was filled with unutterable tenderness for Aubin, who did not appear to see anything heroic in his own conduct. The doctor gave good hopes of his recovery; he had doubted certainly, in examining the wound, whether the young man could have inflicted it on himself, but he did not mention his suspicions.

When Yves left the house, he did so like one in a dream. His hatred was gone; but a dull, heavy weight was at his heart; thought and feeling seemed alike dead in him; he was hardly conscious of anything. The meadows were covered with a white veil of mist; the sun rose higher in the heavens; the birds began to chirp and sing; all was fair and fresh and pure; and he was a blot, a stain on the loveliness of the morning. In the distance a withered tree stretched one bare arm, like a gallows, towards Saint Aubin du Cormier. He hurried on. Before him, in the dust of the road, were large brown stains.

"It is blood!" he muttered; and staggered on with a shudder.

He was wearied with his sin, without having the strength to repent. What he felt was a desire to be hidden, to be annihilated, to disappear, even if it were into the lowest hell. A low bleating struck his ear; a white goat had broken the cord which had fastened her to a tree, and was sporting near him with her kids. Yves coaxed the creature to him, fed her with some bits of bread which was in his pocket, and untied the string from her foot. There are terrible moments in which, after sinking deeper and deeper into an abyss of misery and despair, only one thing seems possible—suicide.

Yves did not reason or reflect; half unconsciously he made a running knot in the cord; he was stunned with suffering; his brother's blood was upon him. He had escaped the sentence of the law; conscience judged him, and his own hand must be his executioner. He managed to climb the tree high enough to secure the cord to the great projecting branch. Then he slowly unfastened his necktie, and hid his face one moment. A hand was laid on his shoulder.

"A man must not die before he has made his peace with God." It was the voice of the Abbé Kerdrec.

Yves fell on his knees.

"It was here, was it not? And you feel the need of expiation? I understand; and you are right—only it is not for you to choose the manner of expiation. Strike your breast, my son, and say, 'God be merciful to me, the most miserable of sinners.'"

A sob burst from the wretched Yves.

"Father, forgive me," he said "I have sinned—I must die! Aubin knows that I left him thinking him dead. My parents know the truth, and you, father, you know it too. There are voices in the air calling me Cain! This tree seemed to have tongue; and it said it was a gibbet waiting for me. The blood which stains the road cries aloud like that of Abel. God's brand is on me, it will never be effaced—a stain is on my soul which nothing can cleanse. I hated Aubin because he was good and beloved. And Armelle, how I have wronged her! I made a wicked bargain with Daniel; I bribed him to give her to me. I deserve death—a thousand deaths!"

"I condemn you to something more terrible," said the priest; "you must live!"

Yves bowed his head to the dust. It was a strange and solemn sight; the two men stood at the foot of the blasted tree, on the very spot where the crime of the day before had been committed; where a fresh one had been on the point of accomplishment. There was something awful in the silence which ensued. It seemed as if it would never end. The Abbé Kerdrec was praying with clasped hands and uplifted eyes, in a very agony of supplication for light and grace and pardon. At length he spoke again:

"Yves, are you sorry for your sins, your hatred, your crimes?"

"I am, I am! Ask God to strike me dead here at your feet."

"Yes, you shall live; but you are not your own, your life is not your own. It belongs henceforth to every one in trouble, to every creature in danger of death. For the life which you wickedly tried to take you owe God ten lives. Wherever there is peril, by fire, by blood, or any other way, there is your place. Do you understand me? For your penance you shall save ten lives—the lives of ten—men, women or children—and by the merits of the Precious Blood of Jesus, your guilt shall be washed away, and remembered no more; neither by your earthly nor your heavenly Father."

A loud cry broke from Yves.

"Is it true," he said; "ten lives to be saved, and then for giveness from all!"

"All." The priest laid his hand on the forehead of Yves. . . . "Now rise, and go; you are reconciled with God. Complete the work of penance; obey your father, do as he bade you."

"I will; but you know father, in time of war a ball may strike me, and if I had not the number?"

"Come to me before you start and I will answer that question."

"And Armelle?"

"You must get her father to consent to her marriage with your brother."

"But the money?"

"Ask your father for it. Now go to the town, and return with your papers signed. I will go to the farm."

The young man did not speak or move for a few minutes; then he burst suddenly into an agony of weeping, and sobbed out:

"Aubin!"

"You shall see him before you go. I promise that you shall."

Yves caught the hand of the priest, kissed it passionately, and was gone in a moment.

It had been a wonderful inspiration of God that the Abbé Kerdrec had laid on Yves Patriarehe the work of expiation. He felt that the same energy and force of character and passions which had driven him into such terrible guilt and misery, might, properly directed, make him by God's grace a Christian hero. It was a stroke of genius; nay, shall we rather say a supernatural illumination? It was one of those sublime ideas which so often originate with the humblest priests. The world passes such a one by, with a careless and supercilious glance at the worn face, the feeble hands, the frayed cassock; but God and all great souls know what is in him.

The Abbé Kerdrec did justice to the grand old Breton farmer in feeling sure that the money question would be no difficulty. He said simply:

"We must not expect any softening on the part of the straw-cutter. We must wait God's time. There was a marriage in contemplation to which his consent had been gained by a promise of four thousand francs. Will you buy Aubin's happiness at that price?"

And Patriarehe said to Marthe:

"You have the key, wife; give the money to M. le Curé."

So the matter was settled.

Next morning the straw-cutter and his daughter were on their way to the farm. He had dressed himself with unusual care, and tried to assume the air of a careless bonhomme, which but ill disguised the shame which he really felt. He talked and jested with Armelle in a forced unnatural manner; but she, dear child, answered with the utmost sweetness. There was almost as much sadness as joy in her heart, but no bitterness; when God was smoothing the way before her, was it for her to remember the stones and brambles which once were there?

At the farm everything was strangely quiet. The servants went about their work silently; Louison had taken off her shoes for fear of disturbing her young master. Marthe never left his side; when the fever was highest, her touch soothed him; her whispered blessing, her loving kisses, always brought a smile to his pale lips. The sound of the door opening gently made her look round. Armelle entered between the priest and her father.

"Peace be to this house!" said the Curé.

Marthe folded Armelle in a silent embrace; Aubin opened his eyes, and said to Daniel.

"You won't take her away again?"

"No."

"And you will give her to me?"

"Yes."

"God is very good! Thank you, Daniel. My God, I thank thee!"

"And now," said the straw-cutter, "nobody wants me here, so I am off. You will let me know when the time comes for signing," and he left the room abruptly.

At nightfall Yves returned. Jean Patriarche had begged the Abbé Kerdec to stay the evening. There was something so awful, so mournful, in this departure of his eldest son. It was such a terrible necessity. It almost seemed like a secret execution. Yves came in, laid some papers on the table, and stood before his father in silence. The father looked them over, went out, and returned with the Book of the Gospels, which he opened, and wrote, under the date of Yves' First Communion, "Enlisted on such a day." The conscript read the words, and then added, with a trembling hand, "Died the——." There would be only that last date to be written when the time came. He was no longer one of the family.

There was a fearful struggle in Jean's soul. He saw that there was a great change in Yves; but he did not say a word. He felt that the judge was not to be merged in the father.

Aubin had guessed what was going on by that wonderful instinct of the sick, which is like second sight. He asked Armelle to open the door, and called his brother by name. Yves started violently. The priest took his hand.

"God has forgiven you," he said; "go and be forgiven by your brother."

When he came into the sick chamber; Aubin held out his hand.

"You are going away?"

"I am a soldier"

"God bring you back safe! We will pray for you!"

Yves felt crushed; he was sinking on his knees at the foot of the bed; but Aubin held out his arms, and clasped him in a long embrace. Then, turning to Armelle, he said, "Good-bye, sister." His preparations were soon made; he tied a few things in a handkerchief; refused, with a gesture, a small bag of money which his father offered him; and with one last look at his mother, he left his home. The last scene of the family tragedy was now over.

Very slowly but steadily Aubin recovered his strength. The straw-cutter hung about the farm from time to time, to learn how he was going on. It was a regular day of rejoicing in the village when Aubin appeared for the first time in church. Père Loic had undertaken to keep Annette's grave in order; the curé had given him some flower-seeds, and it looked like a little garden. The Calvary had not been forgotten; the Patriarche family had laid fresh bouquets on the steps.

At last the wedding-day came. Never was there a happier bridegroom nor a sweeter bride. Daniel refused to be present at the ceremony; but he lingered in the churchyard, and when his daughter came out on her husband's arm, he started as if he had seen Annette; and then, turning away with a gesture of despair, he went to drown memory and remorse in wine.

CHAPTER IV.

LA TRAPPE.

Yves went straight to Rennes. Six months later, his good conduct obtained for him the permission he applied for to join the army in Italy. He distinguished himself greatly; he was something more than a gallant soldier, he was a hero. He was a model of good conduct too; and in action, wherever there was most danger, there was Yves. But there was this to be noticed in him; his most daring feats had always a touch of generosity about them. He defended rather than attacked. His one object was to save the wounded, to shelter the fallen from insult, to maintain the honor of the French flag. On one occasion, a French officer, whose courage bordered on rashness, was surrounded by Austrian soldiers. Yves dashed in, carried him off through a shower of bullets, and got him safe to the ambulance; there he fell with the wounded officer—a bullet had broken his shoulder-blade. After this he was promoted. The first time he was allowed to use his hand, he wrote the word "one" on a sheet of paper, and sent it to the Abbé Kerdec. Another time he saved two children from drowning, at the risk of his life. He shunned all notice after these actions, as though they were crimes; and his superior officers used to say, "Yves Patriarche is a regular hero, but there never was such a bear of a fellow. After all, there is nothing like a Breton; with a few regiments of such men we should conquer half the world."

At the end of the campaign Yves was sous officier. He refused his discharge; danger was his passion, and he volunteered for the Chinese expedition. There too his bravery was the theme on many tongues, and his name was more than once mentioned in the dispatches. He had particularly requested the Abbé Kerdec not to write to him; he was resolved to bear his punishment to the full; the bitter cup should be sweetened by no hand but God's.

The chaplain of the regiment had formed a strong attachment to the brusque, reserved soldier, whose silent ways he had watched; he was interested in the man who fought like a lion, made no intimacies, and whose only passion appeared to be that of helping and saving others. French, English, Chinese—it was all the same to Yves; one life was as good as another, there were seven owing still.

On the field, in the trenches, anywhere and everywhere, he fought hand to hand with Death to rob him of his victims. He bore a charmed life; often he escaped all hurt by a miracle; at others his injuries healed with an ease and rapidity which astonished the surgeon, who would write him a prescription or dress his wound with a smile and a shrug, intended to convey that the man was sure to get around, and no thanks to him.

Alas, poor Yves! No wonder that his self-devotion was so absolute; it was his only relief from the anguish of memory. When the time of action was over, the ghost of the miserable past filled his tent. The pale face of Aubin on the road in the moonlight rose up before him; the voices of the betrothed lovers again struck his ears as on the day when he heard them behind the hawthorn hedges—the day on the evening of which he destroyed their happiness. Once more the scene changed; this time it was the wretched hovel of the straw-cutter; and he saw Armelle dressed in mean and ragged clothes, with her besotted father and the degraded woman he had put in her mother's place, yet unsullied by the unfit companionship, as a lily blooming on a dunghill loses nothing of its fragrance and its purity. Oaths, bad language, ill-usage—nothing could really harm her. Her duty remained, and she bent meekly beneath that glorious yoke, as only the virtuous and holy do. But the misery she had endured was his doing; he it was who had driven her from the happy home where she was beloved and honored, to be the insulted victim of La Gervaise. It was too much. Had not the Abbé Kerdec deceived him when he assured him of forgiveness in the name of God? Were not his crimes past all pardon? And as the gibbet-like tree rose before his imagination, he seemed to himself like Judas, when rushing in his hopeless remorse from the assembly of the priests he came upon the executioner fashioning the cross.

And all this misery was aggravated by the respect of his superior officers, by the affection of the chaplain.

"What am I," he cried, in the bitterness of his soul, "but an assassin and a thief? If they knew the truth, they would scorn and hate me—they would shun me as one stricken with the plague—they would point at me as a monster of wickedness. The general would tear the cross from my button-hole. Praise, respect, affection—it is all stolen. I will wear this hideous mask of hypocrisy no longer."

One day the chaplain, the Abbé Florent, found him sitting alone in the tent. He had a book in his hand, but he was not reading; his lips moved as though he were repeating something he had learned by heart.

"My friend," said the priest, gently.

"I do not deserve to have a friend," answered Yves.

"Yet you greatly need one."

"I do, and I do not."

"Explain yourself, Yves."

"A friend—a real friend—should be our second self."

"Quite true."

"And we should have no secrets from him."

"Not when it is possible."

"It must be possible," said the soldier, gloomily.

"Not always, Yves. When the wound is scarred—"

"And if it is a shameful one?"

"No matter, if God has healed it."

"A friend!" Yves burst out passionately. "I have none; I never shall have one—it is impossible. My comrades like me, they are good fellows; but do I make friends with them? Is there any confidence between us? At the canteen, by the bivouac fire, I keep aloof. Alone—always alone. You will say that is my fault, my choice. Yes, father, because it must be so. I have one thing to do—a task which is laid upon me—and I devote myself to it. But that is not enough for me. There are many sorts of expiation; I must go through them all."

"My poor fellow!" said the priest, gently.

"Do you know what I was reading when you came in. It was the Bible. Shall I go on reading aloud?"

"Go on," said the Chaplain.

Yves began, and as he read drops of agony beaded his forehead.

"Cain said to his brother, Let us go forth abroad. And when they were in the field Cain rose up against his brother Abel, and slew him.

"And the Lord said unto Cain, Where is thy brother Abel? And he answered, I know not; am I my brother's keeper?"

"And he said to him, What hast thou done? The voice of thy brother's blood crieth to Me from the earth.

"Now, therefore, cursed shalt thou be upon the earth, which hath opened her mouth and received the blood of thy brother at thy hand.

"When thou shalt till it, it shall not yield to thee its fruit; a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be upon the earth.

"And Cain said to the Lord, My iniquity is greater than that I may deserve pardon.

"Behold, thou dost cast me out this day from the face of the earth, and I shall be hidden from Thy face, and I shall be a vagabond and a fugitive on the earth; everyone, therefore, that findeth me shall kill me.

"And the Lord said to him, No, it shall not be so; but whosoever shall kill Cain shall be punished seven-fold. And the Lord set a mark upon Cain."

Yves read these verses slowly, in a low, stifled voice, and when he had done so he put down the book, told his own history to the priest, and then, looking into his face, exclaimed:

"Now you know why I cannot die. I attempted the life of my brother, and God has set a mark upon me, and Death will not strike me. Now you see why I can never have a friend. You thought well of me, father, but I have been a bad son, an ungrateful brother, and a thief."

On a certain day, father, our curé told me to save ten lives, and he promised me God's forgiveness. And that is my work. But I begin to think my burden is too heavy for me. Death—death—that is all I long for."

The Abbé Florent clasped him in his arms. "My friend, my brother!" he said.

"Your friend—your brother—after what I have told you?"

"Yves," continued the chaplain, "you must let me read your inmost soul now. I can heal all its wounds."

He shook his head.

"You think that is impossible?"

"I am sure 't is."

"Tell me, Yves, what do you want? what is in your mind?"

"It is not the present, but the future, that I am thinking of."

"And what do you wish to do in the future?"

"To lead a life of silence, solitude, and prayer. To live with good and holy men, who would know my history, and yet let me be with them. To be the lowest of all, the servant of all, and to feel that God has forgiven me. To drink the chalice of humiliation to the very dregs, and to satisfy the justice, the implacable justice of God."

"A merciful justice, Yves; do not forget that."

"Yesterday," he went on, "I was so happy as to save three little children, whom the Sisters of Charity have received. That makes eight lives saved in five years; the number will soon be made up, please God, and then—what shall I do?"

"First go back to your home."

"Go back! I!"

"For a time. First of all, go to your good curé, and tell him that your penance is accomplished; then go to your father's farm."

"Go there and see them again!—all of them!" murmured the soldier.

"Yes, all. Your parents, to get their forgiveness; Aubin—that good Aubin—to make him happy."

"And Armelle—"

"To see her your brother's happy wife."

"True; that is part of the penance."

"And then—"

"Yes, then—"

"Then you shall leave Saint Aubin du Cormier, and go to Morbihan. Go to the Abbey of Thymadeuc, and ask to see the Abbot of La Trappe. Tell him everything; speak to him as openly as you have spoken to me, and ask to be received as a brother. You will be able to make a confession of your whole life before them all, and to realize the longing you have just expressed—that of living with holy men acquainted with your sad history."

"You are saving me!" exclaimed Yves.

"I have shown you a safe harbor, but one which is not without its labors and storms. There will be every kind of hard penance—everything to subject the flesh to the spirit: absolute silence, trying fasts, wearisome watchings. There will be everything to tear the heart from earth and fix it on heaven; everything to confound human wisdom, to exalt the soul by humbling it, and to purchase eternal happiness at the price of daily martyrdom. That will be your life, and it is a hard one."

"The innocent and good accept it. Shall I complain?"

From that day Yves was a different man. The future, which had been so terrible because it was vague and undefined, lay before him now in a tangible shape. His thoughts dwelt on that severe life of labor and penance with love and longing. To live by daily dying—that was the life for him.

The army returned to France, and Yves got his discharge. Tears were in his eyes when he took leave of the Abbé Florent, promising to write to him. Then he started for St. Aubin du Cormier. Two comrades were with him, who belonged to neighboring villages: Yves was décoré, and wore a medal for each of his glorious campaigns.

When the three soldiers reached Rennes it was night, but Yves was anxious to go on; and as his friends would not leave

Suddenly, heavy dark masses swept across the sky, then lurid red ones. "It is a fire," said one of the men. They set off running in the direction of the flames, crossing fields, leaping hedges and ditches. As they approached they could distinguish the burning buildings, the crackling of the flames, and the fall of the masses of wood.

The fire had begun in the barn, and the terrified inmates were surprised in their sleep.

"Come on, my lads!" cried Yves; "it is not worse than the fire of a battery. Follow me heroes of Pekin and the Tchernaïa!"

Just as they dashed into the burning house, people were talking of a helpless old man, who slept in a shed adjoining a pigeon house, which gave admission to the fire through numerous openings, and of some one who had climbed on the roof to get to the old man, and been seen no more. No one knew who he was, but all said he was a gallant fellow, and that no doubt he would lose his life in his generous attempt.

It was a strange and horrible confusion; the lamentations of the poor people whose property was being destroyed, the wailing of children, the sound of axes, the creaking of the bucket-chain as water was drawn from the well, mingling with the shouts of the workmen and the vociferations of the crowd.

Yves had climbed up to the pigeon house, and gone in. On the threshold, close to the staircase, which the flames had all but reached, lay two bodies—two corpses, doubtless—suffocated by the smoke.

Yves lifted up one—the eldest—seized the other by the hand, and so, laden with this double burden, carrying one, dragging the other, he struggled, panting up the quivering staircase, blinded by the smoke, enveloped in flames, and feeling as though he were drinking draughts of fire. At the top, he sank down with his burden, faintly murmuring, "Ten!"

The three men—none could tell whether they were living or dead—were carried, senseless, burnt and blackened, to a place of safety; women threw water on their faces, and tried to revive them.

The Abbé Kerdrec approached the group. The old man remained insensible; the man who had been the first to hasten to his rescue was slowly recovering.

"Aubin, my son!" cried the priest.

The young man tried to rise.

"Armelle! Tell Armelle and the children."

"We have sent for her; and the poor old man is beginning to come to at last."

"Oh, thank God! My head swam, and I made sure of death. How was it? Who saved me?"

"Our comrade," said the two soldiers, who had joined the party. "It is the way with this fellow, wherever he goes."

The Abbé Kerdrec bent over the sous-officier. He had not at first recognized the blackened disfigured face, but at the words of the soldiers a thought flashed into his mind.

"Can it be possible?" he said; and he put back the tangled hair from his forehead, and looked long and earnestly at him. Then he turned to Aubin, and said in a faltering voice: "My son, do you know who it is that has saved your life? It is Yves—your brother."

Aubin jumped up and threw his arms round the fainting soldier. "Yves—my brother! Yes, he lives; his heart beats. And look, father, the cross of honor! Yves—dear Yves—my own brother! don't you know us, Aubin and M. le Curé? O, to think of our mother's happiness!"

Yves could not take it all in yet; but he felt himself embraced by strong and loving arms; he heard voices that were music in his ears; and he closed his eyes, wondering if it was all a dream—the danger, the pain, and the gladness.

Presently he regained full consciousness. Day was breaking, and he looked around, first at one, and then at another. When he saw the curé, he caught both his hands, exclaiming, "Ten, father, ten!"

"And do you know who the tenth is, my son?"

"No there was an old man, and a strong young one, half suffocated, I think. No, I don't know their names; I don't even know where I am; but that is no matter. Ten, at last, and God is satisfied!"

"And do you still doubt His forgiveness?"

"I must believe in it."

"Yes, Yves, you must, for here is the proof, and the pledge of pardon. My son, here is the man you have just saved."

Then Yves knew he had saved his brother's life.

It was a moment not to be described. The brothers held each other in a long embrace, weeping, trembling, murmuring broken words of love and tenderness which cannot be written down, but which the heart easily understands. Then Aubin took his brother home; the curé followed with the two soldiers. You may imagine how he drank in their accounts of the heroic actions of their comrade. Never had the good Abbé Kerdrec thanked God as he did that day.

They were in sight of the farm now. The men were about their work. Armelle stood at the door, with a child in her arms, and another at her side. She was looking anxiously down the road: the group had just reached the turning. She ran on. Aubin met her, and took her hand—"Armelle, you are the first to welcome our dear brother Yves, who has just saved my life." Then there were the children to be looked at; and after a few minutes they all went towards the farm. Yves trembled as the meeting with his father drew near. The old man came forward. Without hesitating, Armelle went up to him, saying, as she put her arms round his neck: "It is Yves, father; he has saved Aubin; we owe him everything." Then all turned away with a feeling of awe, as the father embraced his repentant son. We will not attempt to describe that moment, still less the mother's feelings. The excitement at the farm, in the village may be imagined. Every one was pressed to eat, but no one was hungry, except the two soldiers, who had certainly a good appetite. Poor old Louison limped about, waiting on every one. Old Loïc hastened up to see the hero of the village, and one after another followed him, full of pride and delight, till every one had had a good look at him; and I should be afraid to say how many times the soldiers had to tell their comrade's history.

It was all positive torture to Yves; but he bore it for his father's sake; and besides, it would be over soon. God had been very good, and the goal was very nearly reached.

The following Sunday, after Vespers, he asked for a private interview with his father, and the old man went with him into the inner room. He opened the Book of the Gospels, and showed his son where, in a few simple words, the story of the fire was told. Then Yves knelt down; he insisted on speaking to his father in that attitude. They talked long and earnestly. More than once Jean Patriarche hid his tears on his son's shoulders; more than once the young man's voice was broken by emotion. Then the peace of God sank into their hearts, and there was a great calm as Jean solemnly blessed Yves.

The next morning, the farmer dressed for a journey, was waiting, surrounded by his family, while Yves received his mother's parting kisses. Aubin was making a last appeal.

"Why should you leave us?" he said. Could you not make yourself happy here amongst us all? Why must you grieve me and break our mother's heart? Is not this your proper place—your home? Where are you going?"

And his father answered: "I am going to take your brother to Thymadeuc to the abbey of La Trappe!"

Then Aubin made the sign of the cross, and said no more. The last embraces were given in silence; there was a sense of God's presence in the house; and Patriarche and his son went out slowly and silently. Yves turned round just once to kiss his hand to Marthe, and then the only sounds were the heavy steps of Jean Patriarche, the sobs of Marthe, and the tender voice of Armelle trying to comfort her.

The Five Franc Piece.

I.

TOWARDS the end of the month of December, 1849, a young soldier, with that frank and honest mien one so much loves to meet with, presented himself at the military post-office in the street of the Corso at Rome, to exchange a modest five franc piece for an order of the same value.

"To whom do you wish to send this little order?" asked M. Lambelin, an excellent man, who then filled the office of post-master as well as pay-master to the army.

"To my old mother," replied the young man.

"For her new year's gift, I suppose?"

"Yes, sir."

"That is right, comrade, a new year's gift from a good son, brings happiness to him who gives, as well as to her who receives it. What is your name?"

"Bois."

"Of what regiment?"

"The 25th, 5th division."

"From what country, are you?"

"From the department of Cher."

"Where does your mother live?"

"At Communs, near Aubigny."

"Your name is not unknown to me, for, if I mistake not, you have before this, brought me the fruits of your little savings?"

"Little, you may well call them, sir, for it takes some time for a poor trooper to save a five franc piece from a pay of five centimes a day."

"This saving seems to me impossible."

"Nothing more true, sir, nevertheless. I have already had the happiness to send my poor mother a sum of seventy francs."

"Seventy francs? In what time?"

"In two years, during which I have had the honor of serving my country."

"Your calculation seems to me incorrect, for a sou put by each day, would only produce, at the end of two years, thirty-six francs fifty centimes; how then do you come by the difference? And how have you been able to bring me so often these sums, out of your ordinary pay?"

"Nothing is easier, sir; I have done what I do now every time an opportunity offers. In the day, I mount guard or do some service for comrades richer than myself; at night, I mend their trousers, shirts or gaiters."

"In this manner then you unite the duties of a soldier and the profession of a tailor?"

"This employment brings me every day a few centimes, which I carefully hoard up until I can change them into a round piece like this."

"You never go then to the tavern?"

"Never."

"Then you don't like wine?"

"I like my mother better."

"But some recreation is necessary now and then in the laborious life of a soldier."

"And I am far from depriving myself of it."

"Where do you take it?"

"That is as it happens. One day, perhaps, at Saint Louis, the parish of the French in Rome, where the worthy priests tell us all sorts of things about the country we are now living in. On another day, I go to the Trinité-du-Mont, where the good religious make us sing hymns, which reminds me of my own village church. Then sometimes to the Catacombs, or to the Forum, where a bishop, Monseigneur Lucquet, who calls us his children, relates to us curious histories of past times.

It appears, sir, that the ancient Romans were famous troopers in their day, as they say of the French in our times. These amusements are better than those of the tavern."

"That is quite true, comrade, your conduct is worthy of all praise."

"Praise for doing what is right! oh no; but now, sir, will you allow me to take leave of you, for duty calls me to my quarters. Adieu, sir."

"Adieu, my friend."

II.

Whilst this conversation was going on at the military post-office, the frequenters of the table-d'hôte of the hotel Minerva, the best hotel in Rome, kept by M. Save, the best host in the world, remarked the prolonged absence of the pay-master, who was generally noted for his punctuality.

"Lambelin is quite a lambin* this morning," said the colonel, in a forced tone, which contrasted with the burst of laughter occasioned by his bad joke.

"No doubt he has received to-night a wagon load of French coin," answered Robin, since dead at Versailles.

"Lambelin's chest is the very Pactolus of the army," added Lacauchie.

"A famous torrent, indeed, that!" said another colonel, now a general of brigade, "it is a pity it is so often dry, and that we cannot dip our fingers in when we like."

From one end of the table to the other there was kept up a running fire of bon-mots, repartees, and jokes, seasoned by that gaiety which a French party knows so well how to keep up; till at last Lambelin entered the room, his arrival being greeted by a burst of applause.

"What news do you bring?" was shouted out.

"I will tell you at dessert, it will make you relish your coffee better," answered Lambelin. And at dessert the pay-master told the story of the soldier Bois, relating what the reader has just heard.

"The conduct of this soldier is as beautiful as it is rare;" said a superior officer, the president of the party; "I will make enquiry as to Bois' behavior since he has been in the army, and if it answers to the good opinion we already have of him, we will come to his aid and do something for his old mother." This suggestion was received with enthusiasm.

The report of virtuous actions, though not spreading so quickly as that of scandalous ones, nevertheless gets abroad sometimes pretty soon. The history of the soldier Bois had already arrived at the Café Neuf, where after breakfasting at the hotel Minerva, it was the custom to take a cup of mocha. About twenty officers were playing billiards in the gardens of the establishment, for the benefit of the hero of the morning. The Café Nuovo had just changed its name for the Café Militaire. Those of you my readers who are ignorant of the cause of this transformation will no doubt like to know it.

In the early days of the French occupation, two officers presented themselves at the Café Neuf, then one of the greatest resorts of the Italian demagogues. It was there, during three months, that plots were formed against the authority of that holy Pontiff, who had inaugurated his reign, by the merciful act of general amnesty. The democratic Romans, who continued from custom to frequent this establishment, now become a place of re-union for the French officers, received the two visitors in silence, but at the same time with unequivocal signs of antipathy. The landlord of the café, advancing towards our two countrymen, thus addressed them.

"What do you desire?"

* Lambin—a dawdle.

"Two cups of coffee, if you please," was the answer.

"We have none left."

"Well then, give us two cups of chocolate."

"We never make any."

"Give us then a bowl of punch."

"As to punch, we have only the English journal of that name."

"Bring it then," said one of the officers, beginning to comprehend the hostile intentions of the host.

"Some one is reading it," he answered.

"Have you any ices."

"Very fine ones, you can see yourselves in them from head to foot." *

"Have you any beer?"

"We finished it this morning."

"Well! then! bring us a glass of water; you surely have that!"

"Not at all, the French have broken the aqueduct which supplied it."

"Enough!" And the officers, with difficulty restraining their anger, took their departure.

The frequenters of the Café Neuf, laughed heartily, and congratulated the master of the establishment on his courage, when bye-and-bye a confused noise of footsteps, bayonets, etc., was heard on the stairs. At the same moment a company of grenadiers appeared, and ranged themselves in order of battle. One of the officers who commanded the troop, approached the frightened hotel keeper, and said to him in a determined tone—

"There is no coffee to be had in your shop; you have no chocolate, no ices, no beer; you refuse even water to your customers; your house then is not fit for a coffee-house, it will do better service when we have transformed it into a barrack."

The Café Neuf was immediately evacuated and shut up; but at the end of a month the master made an humble apology to the French authorities, who allowed him permission to open his establishment on his agreeing to change the name as above mentioned. Let us now return to Bois.

III.

On the same day, as he had promised, the colonel made inquiries about the soldier Bois. The result was most satisfactory; ever since he had been in the regiment, he had not had a single punishment, and he was remarked during the siege for his courage and coolness in danger. As good a son as he was a brave soldier, he deprived himself even of his pipe, the consolation of a trooper, in order to make up more quickly the modest piece of five francs, which he was accustomed to send to his old mother. This conduct of Bois was not only worthy of praise, but it merited a recompense, which was awarded him some days after as we shall see, in the hotel Minerva.

It was determined to invite this good son and brave soldier to dinner, and it fell to me to perform the commission, which I did, without betraying the quality or the number of persons he was to meet. I have already mentioned that the hotel Minerva received at its table the élite of the French army, so you can imagine my dear reader, what was the surprise and embarrassment of this poor soldier, on finding himself seated at a splendidly served table, by the side of colonels and officers in full uniform. He would have drawn back, but for the kind commands of his superiors.

"I wish much to retire," he said, whispering in my ear, and twisting in his fingers the napkin to which he was unaccustomed.

"Remain, my friend," said I, "you will dine like a prince."

"I should like the mess with my comrades much better."

* Glaces, the French both for ice and glass.

"You will not say so by the time we have come to the desert."

"Dessert! what is that?"

"You will see, comrade; meantime, taste this wine."

Bois ate and drank with extreme discretion, scarcely daring to raise his eyes more than three inches from his plate; however, encouraged by the kind looks, and unanimous welcome of the officers, he at last became more at his ease. He was beginning to confess that the cookery of the hotel Minerva, was better than that of the canteen, when a servant brought me a box, directed "to M. Bois, chasseur au 25<sup>e</sup> léger 5<sup>e</sup>, du second." I handed it to its owner, who begged me to open it. It contained a pair of red woollen epaulettes, a little card box carefully sealed, and a letter addressed to Bois. He gave it to me to read and inform him of its contents. It was as follows, "A good action ought to be recompensed! you have been a good son and good soldier; this is for the soldier." We put on him the epaulettes of a carabiniier. "You have been a good son, this is for your mother." The little card box contained a sum of one hundred francs, quite a fortune for him, who during two years, and by the most generous sacrifices had only been able to realize, sou by sou, the sum of seventy francs.

The joy of the young soldier can be better imagined than expressed. The name of God and his mother trembled on his lips, and his heart overflowed with grateful emotion. "How good art Thou, my God!" said he, "Thou hast had pity on my poor mother! Placed above want, this dear parent, will now have wood in the winter to warm her limbs, frozen by old age, and bread at all times, bread not too hard or too black; thanks, thanks, O my God." And then turning his eyes to us, he said, "Oh! how good you are also, my dear benefactors, for I see that the Lord God has chosen you to enrich my mother! Accept my warmest gratitude!"

At this moment, the brave Colonel Devaux raising his glass full of champagne, cried out, "Messieurs, I propose a toast! let us drink to the health of the woman who gave birth to this true model of filial piety! To the mother of Bois, Messieurs!"

"Bravo! colonel," answered the voices in chorns, and cups were filled and emptied to the health of the mother and her son.

Notwithstanding all these flattering speeches, of which he was the object, and the entreaties of his companions, Bois drank as he had eaten with extreme moderation, scarcely touching with his lips the sparkling draught.

"What! my friend, do you despise that liquid there?" said the surgeon of the army, the excellent and wise Lacauchie, since dead, a victim to his love of science.

"Like you all, monsieur, it possesses my esteem, my respect."

"Well! prove it then."

"I would do so, but I have something here," answered Bois pointing to his heart, "I have something here, which chokes me."

"A good reason why you should drink then. Now, one, two, three, let us drink again to the health of your mother. Drink; bravo! one more cup."

"Enough: this is the best stuff I ever drank in my life, but it intoxicates, and I am too happy to-day, to run the risk of making acquaintance with the police."

"Happiness cheers," answered the colonel, "but will not intoxicate. Therefore, before separating, messieurs, let us drink to the health of our common mother, to France!"

"To France!"

An instant after, Bois experiencing in himself the truth of the axiom enounced by Lacauchie, regained his quarters, to enjoy his bliss alone, and to think of his mother.

The other personages in this scene, adjourned to the Café Français, to end a day, of which they could with truth say with Titus, "We have gained one more."

THE PORTRAIT IN MY UNCLE'S DINING-ROOM.

A TALE OF FRENCH SOCIETY UNDER THE OLD REGIME.

Translated from the French of Madame Charles Reybaud by Lady Georgiana Fullerton.

CHAPTER I.

DOM GERUSAC AND HIS COUNTRY HOUSE.

DURING my college life, or rather more than thirty years ago, I used to spend a part of my holidays with an uncle of my mother's at a pretty country house in Upper Provence, a few leagues from the Piedmontese frontier. This uncle of mine was a Benedictine, wonderfully learned, and devoted to his books. It was generally agreed that he would have been one of the glories of the celebrated Congregation of St. Maur, if the Revolution had not driven him from his monastery just as he had completed his novitiate.

Dom Gêrusac, as he was still called in his family, was only twenty-five years old when the decree was issued which suppressed all the religious communities in France. He did not take advantage of this circumstance to mix with the world again, nor did he, on the other hand, endeavor to return to the religious life by retaining, like most of the members of his Order, the habit of St. Benedict in a Spanish or Italian monastery. When the storm of the Revolution had in some measure subsided, he collected together the remains of his paternal inheritance, and took refuge in a little obscure corner of the earth, to which he gave the high-sounding name of St. Pierre de Corbie, in remembrance of the famous House where the first studious years of his youth had been spent. This little property was concealed, as it were, in a bend of the Alps, on the northern slope of the chain of mountains which gradually descends to the mouth of the Var. It was a wild but yet cheerful site. The house stood on a little eminence, behind which rose a ridge of immense rocks, on the steep sides of which grew some fine tufts of Spanish chestnuts, whilst its deep crevices were filled with a multitude of shrubs. The approach to it was by a winding road, bordered with willows and poplars, forming on both sides a transparent curtain of foliage, through which could be seen fields, olive-groves and long trellised alleys of vines, which looked like green ribbons of curious hues unrolled on the chalky soil.

The diligence used to set me down on the high-road at about a good league's distance from my uncle's home, and I then followed on foot the narrow lane into which no voiturier, or coachman, had ever hazarded his vehicle. I was delighted to make my way along this unfrequented path, carrying my slender stock of clothes tied in a handkerchief, and with a travelling stick in my hand, as if I had been a workman on his tour through France.

I hastened my steps as I drew nearer, until at last, at the entrance of the avenue, coming to a stand-still, I looked around me with a delight I can hardly describe, for each stony bank, each tree, each little rivulet making its way through the thick grass, seemed like an old friend. It was always the same peaceful, charming, well-known picture. The house with its white walls and red-tiled roof, over which a wreath of blue smoke curled gracefully upward, then a little below the house the garden, green and gay as in the spring, and close to it the orchard, with its fruit-trees bending beneath their load of red apples and violet colored plums. And beyond this fair home-scene rose the beautiful mountains, crowned with forests of oak, and their sides dotted with white sheep, the sounds of whose bleating was faintly heard in the distance.

My good old uncle always met me with open arms, his first question invariably was, "My dear boy, do you come loaded with University honors?" And when I informed him of my successes, he never failed to congratulate me in a Latin speech. After which he would notice my heated, tired appearance, and hurrying me into the little sitting-room on the ground floor, he called his old servant, Marian, and desired her to bring me a glass of sugared wine, and to take my bundle up stairs.

The sight of Marian was the only drawback to my enjoyment in arriving in this lovely place. She was certainly the ugliest creature I ever set my eyes on. There was something grim, sulky, and disagreeable about her looks, which I can hardly describe, but that made her singularly repulsive. I could never get over my aversion to this woman. When I was a little fellow of eight or nine years old, I did not venture to look Marian in the face, and later on I could never see her without thinking of the characters in the infernal legends. Her stiff figure, bony hands, blood-shot eyes, and innumerable wrinkles, always reminded me of the stories about vampires and ghouls. But I am bound to add that she was an excellent servant, attentive, obedient, and so little given to talking that she never seemed of her own accord to open her lips.

My uncle had furnished his rooms with the becoming simplicity and substantial comfort of some of the ancient Religious Houses. Marian excepted, everything about him had a cheerful, pleasant aspect. The little saloon where he habitually sat was furnished in particular with an unpretending elegance which did not at first strike the eye, but by degrees its peculiar character attracted notice. Everything in it was adapted for a quiet, peaceful, studious mode of life. Comfortable armchairs, noiselessly rolling on the castors, seemed to gather of their own accord round the chimney, where, as early as September, a bright little fire of vine fagots was lighted in the evening. Vases of Japan china, always filled with fresh flowers, decorated the corners of the room, and each frame of the gray wainscoted walls was enlivened by a landscape painting of some historical scene. A door, which was generally ajar, opened into the library, the shelves of which were enriched with all the bibliographic treasures my uncle had collected. There, in fair array, were to be seen a profane tribe of Latin authors, the learned host of the Benedictines of St. Maur, and a crowd of less illustrious writers, who have devoted their time to the study of our national records. A few wandering poets had strayed into the midst of these huge folios, and their gorgeous bindings glittered here and there on the dusky shelves. The saloon was adorned with several paintings, and a curious old set of engravings, much prized by my uncle. On the walnut-wood sideboard stood some ancient pieces of plate of exquisite workmanship. But I must own that none of these curiosities attracted me half as much as a portrait which Dom Gêrusac had hung up over the pier-glass of the chimney-piece. It was a drawing in colored pencils, faded by time, and set in a frame, once a handsome one, but now damaged in several places. This picture represented a woman in the full bloom of the most radiant youth and beauty, and dressed in the style of one of Watteau's shepherdesses—a trimming of pink ribbons ornamented the long, stiff, painted bodice which supported her round and slender waist. Two broad black velvet bands, worn like bracelets, encircled her beautiful arms, which were bare up to the elbow, and her powdered hair was tied up with bows of a pale blue. There was something wonderfully captivating about that face—a mixture of softness and brilliancy in those tender and slightly prominent blue eyes. A half smile seemed to hover over lips which disclosed teeth of the purest enamel; that little mouth was like a pomegranate flower, into whose chalice jasmine blossoms had fallen.

My place at the table was just opposite the chimney, and I could not raise my eyes without seeing this enchanting creature, who seemed to gaze on me with the most bewitching sweetness; but when I looked down and saw Marian, with her crabbed hideous face, standing bolt-upright behind Dom Gêrusac's arm chair, ready to change our plates and wait upon us, I could not get over this contrast, and it served to increase my antipathy to the old woman. I might have been more easily reconciled to her repulsive ugliness, if I had not had so often before my eyes the ideal beauty of that incomparable face. As to my uncle, he looked upon most things with the indifference of a saint and of a scholar. I am sure it had never occurred to him to take notice of Marian's appearance. I ventured to ask him one day if he ever remembered her less wrinkled and shrivelled than she then was. He thought a little, and then said, "No, upon my word I don't. Do you think she is very old? I suppose she must be about my own age—sixty or thereabouts."

And, when I exclaimed at this, he added, "I should not be surprised if she were younger. There are people who appear old long before their time. It strikes me that for the last ten years that she has been in my service she has always looked much as she does now. At any rate, she is as strong and active as a young girl."

Dom Gêrusac lived quite secluded from the world, and kept up little correspondence, except with the learned societies to which he forwarded the results of his labors, and received at his house only a few members of his family who from time to time came to see him. A good old priest, the Abbé Lambert, was the only habitual visitor at St. Pierre de Corbie. Once a week during the holidays I used to see him arrive, with his worn-out cassock tucked up in his pockets, his Breviary, under his arm, and a thick stick in his hand. He was curé of the parish of Malpeire, on the confines of which my uncle's property was situated, and I would venture to affirm that this worthy man was the poorest priest in France. His parishioners were scattered over a vast tract of thickly-wooded land, intersected by deep valleys and often impassable torrents. The village of Malpeire, situated nearly in the centre of the parish, contained scarcely more than a hundred inhabitants, but from the size of the surrounding walls, and the number of houses crumbling into ruins, it was easy to see that its population must have formerly been far more considerable. The church, which, with its Gothic spire, still towered over all the neighboring country, was a vast building, bearing traces of ancient splendor; magnificent stained-glass windows adorned the chancel, and mutilated pieces of sculpture and pictures denoted the places where works of art had once existed.

The village of Malpeire was about a league distant from St. Pierre, on the other side of a high mountain, which we crossed every Sunday on our way to mass, for although Dom Gêrusac had long since given up the observances of monastic life, he practised all the ordinary duties of a Christian. As often happens in these Alpine countries, we on the southern slope of the mountain enjoyed an equable temperature, whereas frequent storms burst upon the higher lands, and the cold was sensibly felt in that part of the parish. We accordingly took precautionary measures before ascending to those regions. Marian went on before us, carrying our cloaks, and waited for us at the entrance of a gorge which divided the summit of the mountain, and across which a current of icy air was almost always blowing.

The old servant carried also in a basket our breakfast, and in a wallet slung over her shoulder my uncle's offerings for the poor. She insisted on conveying these things in this way, instead of strapping them on the back of the quiet little donkey Dom Gêrusac rode. We generally made a halt on reaching the above mentioned gorge. The spot went by the name of the pass of Malpeire. It had a wild, sombre aspect, which particularly took my fancy. The rock, apparently cleft by antediluvian convulsion, exhibited a rent, both sides of which were almost perpendicular. The black jagged points of its double crest rose overhead in sharp and clear outline against the pale blue sky, and the bottom of the precipice was hidden by a multitude of plants and shrubs, which under their intricate tissue, concealed unfathomed abysses. The pathway ran between the bare rock on one side and these masses of verdure on the other. Beneath the green surface roared the rapid waters of a brawling torrent. This road became impracticable in winter, when the snow concealed the inequalities of the ground, but in summer nothing could be pleasanter than to walk in the shade of those huge rocks, enjoying the delicious coolness rising from that ocean of foliage alongside the narrow pathway. An immense mass of rocks stood at the entrance of this defile, and jutted like a promontory above the wild uneven tract of land on the northern side of the mountain. On the summit of this sort of crest, the steep and barren sides of which overshadowed the village, rose the dilapidated walls and ruined towers of the castle of Malpeire.

When we reached the mouth of the gorge, Marian rose from the seat at the foot of the road where she was in the habit of waiting for us, and came forward to assist Dom Gêrusac to dismount; then producing our cloaks, she threw them over our shoulders, and forthwith proceeded on her way, leading the donkey by the bridle.

"Really," my uncle would say, as he followed her with his eyes, "that good woman has the legs of an ostrich, which runs, they say, at the rate of seven leagues an hour. There, see, she is already out of sight."

"So much the better," I mentally exclaimed, for to my mind Marian disfigured the prospect. I hated the sight of this antiquated shepherdess in her Sunday clothes, with her heavy shoes, her frightful black-straw hat cocked up on her old gray top-knot, and her loose print gown, with the sleeves cut short at the elbow, leaving her bare arms exposed to view.

When she had disappeared, I walked more leisurely along the little winding path, enjoying the wild beauty of that magnificent scenery. Each time I came there I felt more struck with the picture which met my eyes at the furthest extremity of the defile. The ruins of the ancient feudal castle frowned above us, and at the foot of the gigantic rocks on which they rested stood the old church, with the houses of the village irregularly grouped around it. In the midst of a large open space in front of the sacred edifice were two elm trees, linked together by their interweaving branches, so as to form in appearance a single tree with two large trunks. They had not their equal for size and beauty in the whole country. Beyond the hamlet an extensive tract of undulating ground was spread out, over which the eye wandered without taking cognizance of any particular details. It would almost have seemed as if, in some strange convulsion of nature, the land had been thrown about in wild heaving confusion, and then suddenly resolved itself into a sea of mountains, an ocean of motionless waves.

The ruins which overlooked this rugged expanse formed an imposing pile of buildings, displaying the architectural features of several different epochs. Dom Gêrusac had taken care to point out to me the different characteristics of those successive eras. According to him, Roman legions had once encamped on the broad terrace in front of the castle. The encircling walls dated from feudal times, whereas the elaborate ornaments still to be seen on the frontage of two elegant pavilions on each side of the building betokened a comparatively modern erection. In any case, nothing could be more desolate than the aspect of these roofless dilapidated structures. I had sometimes questioned my uncle as to the former lords of the domain of Malpeire, but he had never studied the local traditions of the place, and the sort of answer my inquiries generally met with was that the history of these great families was a perfect chaos. Not, indeed, that documents on the subject were altogether wanting; there were some valuable ones in the cartulary of the church of St. Maur, which he happened himself to possess. He had come across a title in that book which went clearly to prove that Ferrand, seventeenth baron of Malpeire, was one of the sixteen Provençal lords who accompanied Godfrey de Bouillon to the Holy Land. He intended some day to write a memoir on the subject, and he would give it to me to read. But, whilst the chronicle of the crusader was progressing, I made in the meanwhile an effort to induce Marian to relate to me the more recent history of the country. One day as we were going to Malpeire, I overtook her at the entrance of the pass, and, instead of getting out of her way, as I usually contrived to do, I boldly made an attempt at conversation.

"What a beautiful morning it is!" I said as I came up to her; "I feel as active as a chamois, and have walked so fast that I have left my uncle a long way behind. May I sit by you until he comes up?" She made room for me on the ledge of the rock, but turned her head away in her usual ungracious manner, and began to rummage in her basket, evidently in order to avoid speaking to me. But nowise daunted, I began again: "How many years have you trudged along this road, my dear Marian? Don't you find it sometimes very long and tiring for your poor legs?"

"No, sir," she replied in that abrupt and sharp tone which is peculiar to ill-tempered old women.

I still persevered. "Before the Revolution there was a fine castle on that height," I said, pointing to the ruins. "Were you ever there in those times, I mean when it was inhabited by its ancient lords?" As she made no answer, I civilly added, "You must have been very young then."

"So young that I recollect nothing about it," she growled out in a surly manner, and gathering up her bundle and her wallet she went to meet my uncle.

This reply seemed to me a funny bit of pretension on Marian's part, who must have evidently reached years of discretion at the time when the old régime came to an end. Without any better success, I cross-examined the Abbé Lambert; it was only since the Restoration that he had been appointed curé of Malpeire. As to the peasants, they knew nothing of the local history of their districts, and troubled themselves very little about the occurrences of former times. As to the rising generation, I have no doubt they would have been puzzled to say if thirty years or thirty centuries had elapsed since the castle of the Barons of Malpeire had been destroyed.

Once, however, as I was standing in the shade before the church door, a little peasant directed my attention to the elm-trees, and said, with evident complacency:

"Did you ever see two finer trees than those, sir; so straight and tall, and so covered with leaves? I have been told that the like of them is not to be found in all Provence, or even much further."

"They do not seem to be very old," I answered, gazing upwards at the interwoven branches which formed overhead an impervious roof of foliage.

"O, as to that," the lad replied, "who can tell how many years it is since those trees were planted and christened?"

"Christened? what do you mean?" I asked.

"Yes, sir, christened; for that one is called Monsieur le Marquis and this one Monsieur le Baron."

"And why, my boy," I again added.

"O, why," he answered, shrugging his shoulders, as if to say "Who cares?" "I never heard why; it was so long ago I suppose nobody knows."

CHAPTER II.

A VISIT FROM MY UNCLE'S SCHOOLFELLOW.

I HAVE already said that there was a picture in my uncle's drawing-room which had strangely taken my fancy. It hung over an old looking-glass, which had the property of imparting a frightfully green hue to the unhappy faces reflected in it. There likewise stood on the chimney-piece two little cups of Sevres china, embellished with ciphers and miniature wreaths, perfect gems—into which Marian ruthlessly stuck her matches. I don't know why I had taken it into my head that the picture, the looking-glass, and the cups had all come from the same house, and that the person represented in the picture had often looked at herself in the mirror, and touched with her coral lips the edges of the pretty cups. This notion having once taken possession of my mind, I was seized with ardent curiosity on the subject, and framed all sorts of fanciful conjectures, worthy of figuring in the pages of a novel. By degrees a singular feeling grew out of this fancy. By dint of gazing on that portrait, I really fell in love with it, and experienced the agitations and emotious incident to that passion. All the little ornaments which adorned the chimney-piece, became to me objects of interest. I looked upon them with a kind of mysterious reverence. Marian's matches I threw away, and filled their place every day with the most beautiful flowers. Little did Dom Gêrusac imagine when he saw me buried in his folios, as he fondly imagined, with my elbows resting on my desk, that I was all the time lost in dreams about this beauty, who only existed on canvas, and composing verses in her praise. I can only plead in extenuation of this folly that I was seventeen years of age, and had just finished my course of rhetoric.

In the midst of my intense internal agitation I maintained sufficient self-command to conceal the emotions I went through in consequence of this extravagant and romantic fancy. The mere idea that anybody would suspect its existence made me feel dreadfully ashamed. But in the meantime my unsatisfactory curiosity became quite a torment. I conjured up the most extraordinary suppositions as to the name and history of the lovely creature who had sat for her picture probably a hundred years ago, as if on purpose to be the delight and the plague of my life.

It would have been easy enough to clear up the matter by putting a direct question to my uncle; but I could not bear to talk to him about it, I was so afraid of betraying my unaccountable interest in the subject. One day, however, when we were at dinner, my courage suddenly rose, and pretending to laugh as I looked up at the glass,

"O, my dear uncle," I exclaimed, "what a funny sort of looking glass that is! It makes people's faces seem as if they were made of green wax."

"But it is, nevertheless, a very pretty piece of furniture," Dom Gêrusac replied; "the frame, if you notice, is of ebony, inlaid with silver and mother-of-pearl. It is a pity that the top has been unfortunately knocked off. I suppose the arms of the family, with supporters and crest, used to be there. I found that glass in a broker's shop at D—, as well as the picture which hangs over it, and those little Sevres cups, all jumbled up together with bits of old rusty iron."

My heart beat very fast, and I said in a strangled voice, "I suppose those things came out of some great house sacked at the time of the Revolution?"

"Most likely," my uncle replied; "but there is no mark by which we can guess who may have been the owners of this old rubbish, as you young gentlemen are apt to call everything not in the newest fashion." Dom Gêrusac had turned round to look at the things he was speaking of, and, pointing to the portrait, he said, "And that frame, Frederic, is a very pretty one, too. Don't you think so?"

"That portrait," I exclaimed, "O, yes!"

"Dear me, no; not the portrait," he cried. "It is half rubbed out, and in very bad drawing; but the frame is really very handsome. Some day I mean to have it cleaned and repaired, and I shall then give the picture to Marian. She may nail it up in her bedroom by the side of the print of the Wandering Jew."

This speech made me shudder, but I did not venture to ask my uncle to give me the object of my romantic worship. I made up my mind to see it pass into Marian's hands, with the hope that it would be possible later on to buy it of her.

Meanwhile my uncle received a letter which filled him with delight, and turned upside-down his quiet little household. A great personage and distinguished diplomate, the Marquis de Champanbert, French ambassador at a foreign court, had written to Dom Gêrusac to say that, as he was to pass through Toulon on his way to his post, he should turn aside from his road to pay him a visit, and renew their old friendship.

My uncle forthwith summoned his privy council, that is to say, he called Marian and communicated to her the news he had received. "Let every one set to work," he enjoined. "Desire Babelou to get the blue bedroom ready, and do you devote yourself to the kitchen. M. de Champanbert will be here to-morrow. Everything must be ready in good time. You will, I am sure, take particular pains about the dinner. There are some dishes you excel in—a pigeon-pie, for instance. Try and let us have one to-morrow; and give us some œufs à la neige, and some roast chickens. In short, whatever you can think of that will be nicest."

"I will do my best," Marian replied in her short manner, and, without waiting for further instructions, she returned to the kitchen.

"That dear good Maximin," my uncle said, turning to me, "how glad I shall be to see him! He is my old friend. We began our studies together at the Oratorians'; but I was intended for St. Maur, and so two years afterwards I went to La Chaise Dieu. Champanbert asked leave to go there with me. He had no vocation for the religious life, but he was a good scholar and had a decided taste for the classics. His family had wished him to be a priest, but his elder brother happening to die before he had finished his studies, he reëntered the world before he could be said to have left it. I was just going to begin my novitiate when he left La Chaise Dieu. It was on All Saints' Day. I can see him now, in his blue coat and round American hat, taking leave of us at the entrance door, just before mounting his horse. O, he was a famous horseman, and so good-looking."

"Was that a very long time ago?" I foolishly asked.

"Well," said my uncle, "stop a moment. It was in 1787; therefore, thirty-five years must have elapsed since those days. I have never seen Champanbert since, nor heard about him except through the newspapers. He emigrated in the early days of the Revolution, and did not return to France till the peace. Since then, his talents and fidelity have met with their reward. The king has heaped honors and distinctions on him. He is a peer of France, an ambassador, and has I don't know how many titles and dignities. May God prosper him! He's worthy of his good fortune."

The idea of finding myself in the presence of this great man, of being presented to him, kept me awake all the night, and the first thing I did in the morning was to stand on the terrace and watch for his arrival. I was greatly perplexed to think how his Excellency's carriage and horses would manage to get through our cross-road, with its ruts and holes, and I felt no little anxiety about the reception which was in course of preparation for him. It seemed to me quite out of keeping with so distinguished a guest. I concluded, of course, that he travelled with a numerous suite, and I pictured to myself the figure which our old servant would cut in the midst of all those fine people. I felt myself getting hot in the face as I thought of her boldly coming into the drawing-room, with her napkin on her arm, sticking herself behind Dom Gêrusac's chair, or pouring out wine for his guest with that frightful claw-like hand of hers.

In the afternoon, Babelou, the little maid who helped in the kitchen, made her appearance at the end of the terrace, and screamed to me in her most shrill voice, "M. Frederic, come; the gentleman is arriving; he is there in the avenue."

"Where is his carriage? Which way did he come?" I asked, quite puzzled. "It must have been upset in a ditch."

"His carriage!" cried Babelou, laughing. "Why, it is like your uncle's carriage—it can go along any road where a donkey can set its four feet."

And so it was! The ambassador was actually riding up to the door on a small ass, caparisoned in the fashion of the country, with a pad stuffed with straw, and no stirrups; his whole suite consisting of a peasant, who carried his portmanteau and drove the ass before him with a hazel-bough.

M. de Champanbert sprang nimbly to the ground, and threw his arms about my uncle's neck. The good old man fairly wept for joy, and faltered out as he clasped his friend's hand, "Well, I had never hoped for this. It is too great a happiness, monseigneur."

"What do you mean by monseigneur?" the Marquis exclaimed, taking his arm. "Call me Maximin, as you used to do. Do you know, my dear Thomas, that I knew you again at once?"

"So did I you," my uncle replied; "you are not the least altered."

"Come, come," rejoined the Marquis with a smile, "a little snow has fallen here since we last parted." And he ran his fingers through his gray hairs.

"If your letter had only reached me one day sooner," my uncle said, "I should have gone to meet you at C—. You must have been rather puzzled to find your way here."

"O, not the least!" his Excellency replied. "I left my carriage on the high-road, and went in search of a donkey and a boy to bring me here. I found what I wanted at a farmhouse close by."

"But who had described to you the road you were to take?" my uncle asked.

"Nobody," replied his friend. "I know this country. I have been here before." And he looked around him at the valley and the mountains.

"After you had left La Chaise Dieu?"

"About two years afterwards."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Dom Gêrusac. "How did it happen that I never heard of it?"

M. de Champanbert smiled somewhat sadly, and lowering his voice, answered, "You were at St. Pierre de Corbie, just about to make your vows. There were things at that time I did not feel as if I could write to you about."

"Why not, I wonder?" my uncle said in his kind simple manner.

I stood a little apart in silent amazement; I could not persuade myself that I had before my eyes a man who represented the King of France, and was in the habit of speaking to crowned heads. At first sight, our guest might have been taken for a plain country gentleman. His blue coat, closely buttoned over his chest, did not afford a glimpse of the least bit of red ribbon. His dress was as unpretending as possible; his manners easy and natural, and his countenance expressed at once good-nature and shrewdness. Not but there was at the same time something commanding in his appearance, and in his eye sometimes a quick flash which denoted perhaps a little pride. His face was still very handsome, and, which was odd, he looked much younger than my uncle. Dom Gêrusac, whose life had been spent in quiet scientific labors, had already the gait of an old man; whereas his friend, who had been plunged in the warfare of conflicting passions, and gone through the agitations of an eventful life, still walked with head erect, and a firm unhesitating step.

My uncle presented me to our guest, and then the two friends entered the house arm in arm. M. de Champeaubert was turning towards the garden, but Dom Gêrusac drew him another way, saying: "It is too hot out of doors; we had better go into the library."

"By all means," the other gaily replied; "your library, my dear Thomas, is, I know, your world, your kingdom, your family. You will introduce me to all the ancient and modern authors assembled here. But, first of all, will you let me have something to drink? I am dying of thirst."

My uncle went to the door of the kitchen and called Marian. "Now for it," I thought, and awaited with a kind of comical terror the effect her appearance would produce upon his Excellency; but to my great relief she did not appear. It was Babelou who came in, carrying on a large tray a bottle of old wine, some sugar, a magnificent basket of fruit, and a plateful of little yellow peaches.

"That is perfect," M. de Champeaubert exclaimed, as he himself assisted Babelou to set down the tray on the table, which was all covered with manuscripts and books. "This clever little girl has guessed that I am particularly fond of these yellow peaches, with their little acid flavor. I don't know anywhere a more refreshing fruit."

"I daresay not," my uncle said with a smile. "It is only on our barren mountains that this wild production of nature is suffered to grow nowadays."

"Do sit down here, dear old schoolfellow!" the Marquis said, making room for Dom Gêrusac by his side. "We have so many things to talk about."

I asked my uncle in a whisper if he had any directions to give me, and then, out of discretion, withdrew.

A little before dinner-time Babelou came to me in the dining-room, looking aghast.

"Mercy on us, sir!" she exclaimed, "what are we going to do? Marian has been working so hard since yesterday, that now she is taken ill, and has just been obliged to go to bed."

I must confess that I felt an involuntary relief.

"Well, you must wait at dinner," I said to the little maid; "go and put on your best gown and a clean apron. Tell Marian to remain quietly in bed; I will let my uncle know about it."

The two friends had gone from the library into the garden, and my uncle was proudly showing off his flowers and vegetables to M. de Champeaubert, who seemed delighted with all he saw, went into good-natured raptures about the fine carnations and the tall cabbages, and as he walked along the trellise picked and ate the grapes with the relish of a school-boy. I whispered to my uncle the news of Marian's illness. The dear good man went immediately to see his old servant, and I remained alone with M. de Champeaubert, who, after one more turn in the garden said: "Perhaps we had better go and see if dinner is ready."

The dining-room had a window down to the ground. I opened the outer blinds and stood aside to let his Excellency go in first. The curtains were drawn up, and a bright light shining in the room; the gildings of the old frames looked to advantage in the rays of the setting sun. As M. de Champeaubert entered and walked toward the chimney, his eyes caught sight of the picture over the looking-glass. He turned round to me and asked eagerly, "Do you know where that portrait came from?"

I colored up to the eyes, and stammered out, "Yes monseigneur; my uncle bought it at D——, in an old curiosity-shop."

"With that looking-glass and those two little cups?"

"I believe so, monseigneur."

Dom Gêrusac came back at that moment. "You must excuse me, my dear Maximin," he said, "if the attendance is not what I should have wished. But I have lost the best half of my household. My old maid-servant has been taken suddenly ill?"

"Never mind," M. de Champeaubert replied; "we will wait on ourselves, as I have done in the days of the emigration."

Fortunately Marian had been able to attend to the cooking up to the last moment, and to give directions to her aide-de-camp Babelou. The table was in consequence perfectly laid, and the dinner excellent. I had routed out from the corner of the cellar some bottles of wine really fit to beset before a king. M. de Champeaubert ate sparingly and quick, talking all the time, whereas my uncle went through his dinner with his usual calm manner and steady appetite, only heightened by the pleasure of having opposite to him so welcome a guest.

For my part I could not swallow a mouthful. Nothing could exceed my internal agitation. The Marquis's questions evidently showed that he recognized the lovely face which I had been gazing on with such rapture for the last six weeks. He knew who this woman was whose name I had despaired of ever discovering. He could tell me—there was no doubt of it—the very thing I most ardently desired to know. But how should I ever venture to put to him a question on the subject? How manage to approach it? These thoughts were running in my mind, when all at once, in the midst of a conversation in which political discussion was mixed up with school reminiscences, my uncle said to his friend, "Public affairs seem to have engrossed your whole life. You have never, I suppose, thought of marrying?"

"I beg your pardon," was the reply. And the Marquis, looking up at the picture over the chimney, added, "I was to have married the beautiful girl whose portrait that is."

"You don't say so!" my uncle exclaimed; "that anonymous portrait? It is a singular coincidence."

M. de Champeaubert said, "I certainly did not expect to have seen here that likeness of the fair object of my first love."

"You must tell us all about it," Dom Gêrusac said. "As we are about recalling all our old recollections, I am glad you have happened to find here this souvenir of the past."

The Marquis smiled a little bitterly, and answered, "I can now speak of it without emotion; and since you wish it, I will give you the history of that time of my life. Not so much for your edification, my dear old friend, as for the sake of your nephew, who sits there gazing so intently on my betrothed that it would almost seem as if her fatally beautiful eyes had instilled into his soul some of their poison."

These words, whether said in jest or in earnest, put me quite out of countenance. I felt as if the speaker had read my inmost thoughts, and I could only reply to this kind of apostrophe by a nervous attempt at a cough.

My uncle, after emptying his glass at one gulp, laid both his hands on the table-cloth, which was with him a token of the deepest attention, and prepared to listen.

"Let us have coffee brought in here, and send Babelou away," M. de Champeaubert said; "I must tell my story with that picture before my eyes."

CHAPTER III

MONSIEUR LE MARQUIS AND MONSIEUR LE BARON.

The day was waning. I lighted the candles on both sides of the mirror. The light thrown on the picture brought out its faded tints, and lent a vague relief to the enchanting face, which seemed to smile through the glass that covered it, like one of Greuze's lovely heads behind the half-opened curtain of a window. The Marquis fixed his eyes steadily upon it for a moment, and then, as if he guessed my secret but intense curiosity, he addressed himself to me, and said, "That is the portrait of Mademoiselle de Malpeire, the only daughter of the Baron de Malpeire."

"Of the last lord!" I exclaimed; "and she lived at the top of the mountain?"

"Yes, my young friend," M. de Champeaubert replied; "and it was there that the events took place which I am about to relate." After a pause, he turned to Dom Gêrusac and said: "Do you remember, my dear Thomas, my writing to you a letter, in which I mentioned that I was leaving Paris and going to take a journey to the south of France?"

"Yes, to be sure, I recollect it," my uncle answered. "It was the last I ever received from you, and, without meaning any reproach, it was written, if I mistake not, before the Revolution in the month of August, 1789."

"What a wonderful memory you have for dates!" M. de Champaubert exclaimed. "You are quite right, for I arrived in this country some time after the famous night of the 4th of August. But I must begin by explaining to you the origin of the friendship which existed between the Champanberts, an ancient family in Normandy, and the Malpeires of Provence. More than a hundred years ago, at the time of the war with Piedmont, the division of our army commanded by the Maréchal de Tessé occupied the frontier. My great-great grandfather, Guillaume de Champanbert, served in the Régiment d'Auvergne, as did also a young nobleman of this country, the Baron de Malpeire. They soon became sworn friends, as well as comrades in arms. Both were in the prime of life, and married to young wives, who had accompanied them to the seat of war; that is to say, they had taken up their residence at the Castle of Malpeire, which was considered an impregnable fortress. Several engagements had taken place between the French and the Piedmontese, who were ravaging the low country. In one of these engagements the Marquis de Champanbert was wounded. His wife hastened to the field of battle, about two leagues from here, and succeeded in getting him transported to the Castle of Malpeire, where he died on the following day. A short time afterwards, the Baron de Malpeire was killed under the walls of C—. After this double calamity, the two ladies remained at Malpeire, shut up by the snow which lies on these mountains, as you know, for six months out of the year. On the same day they both gave birth to sons, who were christened at the same time in the church of the village. In commemoration of this event, two elm-trees were planted and named after the new-born children. In my time the shade of these trees covered the whole square. Are they still in existence?"

"Yes, they are, monseigneur," I eagerly cried; "and they go by the name of Monsieur le Marquis and Monsieur le Baron but no one here knows why."

"The two widows spent the year of their mourning together. Subsequently they were obliged to part; but the similarity of their fate had given rise to a friendship, which lasted as long as they lived. They took care to instil the same feelings in the hearts of their sons, who in their turn transmitted them to their children. Although living at the opposite extremes of the kingdom, the two families did not fail to communicate to one another any interesting domestic event; and on all respective birthdays letters of congratulation were duly sent. A long-standing desire for a matrimonial alliance between the two families had not ceased to exist, but Providence seemed to have decreed that their wishes should meet with constant disappointment. During three generations not a single girl was born in the house of Champanbert, and the daughters of the Lords of Malpeire all died in infancy. I had often in my childhood heard this spoken of at home, and I also knew that the Baron de Malpeire happened now to have a daughter about my own age. It was not, therefore much of a surprise to me when, two years after I had left La Chaise Dieu, my father told me one day that he had arranged my marriage with Mlle. de Malpeire. 'My dear Maximin,' those were his words. 'I think that this marriage combines all that we can desire. I knew the Baron when he came to Paris, about twenty-five years ago, to be married to Mlle. d'Herbelay, one of the most charming persons in the world. He is a nobleman of the old school, a little narrow-minded and ignorant, but full of generous and noble feelings. The young lady's dowry is amply sufficient, and as to the name of Malpeire, it speaks for itself—it is one of the oldest in Provence. I have not made any particular inquiries with regard to the beauty of your future bride, you will soon be able to judge of it yourself; I only know that she is in her twentieth year.' My father said this with a smile, which made me conclude that an agreeable surprise was in store for me, and that Mlle. de Malpeire was very handsome. You see by that picture that I was not mistaken."

"Yes, she must have been a pretty girl," my uncle said, raising his eyebrows, with the kind of look a peasant might have put on if called upon to admire an ancient coin or a manuscript in a dead language.

"I arrived here, as I said before, towards the end of August," M. de Champaubert continued. "I had been travelling eight days on the dusty road in an uncomfortable post-chaise, and I well remember the delight I felt at the sight of these mountains and green valleys, and the pleasure it was to hear the sound of running water in every direction. The present road did not then exist; there was only a path for horses and mules. I was riding, and a mule-driver followed with my luggage. This man had travelled a little, and though a native of the country, he spoke French, and told me the names of the various hamlets which we saw at a distance, and had a story to relate about each of them. When we came to the entrance of the gorge, which is commonly called the Pass of Malpeire, he pointed out to me a flat stone which juts out of the rock and forms a kind of seat a little below the road. Have you ever noticed it?"

"To be sure I have," my uncle answered. "It is there my old servant Marian rests when we go to mass."

"I was expecting to hear some tale about robbers in that cut-throat-looking place, but my guide only said, 'This is the place, sir, where the daughter of the Baron de Malpeire came to life again.' 'What daughter,' I asked. 'Oh, the one who is now full of health and spirits. When she was just seven years old she sickened and died, as all her brothers and sisters had done, who have now been a long time in heaven. She was so really and truly dead that they put her into a coffin, with a white wreath on her head and a crucifix between her hands, and set out from the castle to lay her in the vault of the old chapel at the bottom of the hill, which is the burial-place of the lords of the manor. When the young girls who were carrying the body arrived at this spot they were tired, and placed the coffin on that stone seat while they rested a little. M. le Curé had left off chanting the Libera nos Domine. Nobody spoke, and not a sound was to be heard except the murmur of the torrent flowing through the ravine. All at once a little voice came out of the coffin. The child sat up, looked about her as if for the water, and said, 'I am so thirsty.' All who were there felt frightened when they saw her lift up her shroud; but M. le Curé took her up in his arms and carried her back to her mother alive and well.' This story, I can hardly tell why, made me shudder. I had been dwelling incessantly during my journey on thoughts of love and marriage. I trembled to think how near I had been losing my bride. The wild scenery and the gloomy grandeur of the surrounding country worked on my imagination; I was enraptured with the aromatic perfume of the Alpine plants, the solitary beauty of the mountains, the confused but harmonious sounds which rose from the deep woods, the delicious air I was breathing. It was in this frame of mind that I arrived in Malpeire. The castle was at that time an old fortress to which some modern additions had been from time to time joined on. It was surrounded by formidable walls, and flanked by crested towers; but a new frontage concealed the lower part of the keep, which stood at the edge of a perpendicular rock above the precipice. The windows were provided with green blinds, and the platform on which they looked had been transformed into a little flower-garden, open to every wind. But these embellishments had altered in nothing the character of the old baronial residence. The principal entrance was to the north, and on that side the castle completely preserved the warlike and severe aspect of the buildings of the middle ages. A wide moat surrounded the ramparts, and the entrance-gate stood between two little towers, still furnished with falconets. The drawbridge existed in the same state as at the time of the wars of Provence, but for many years it had not been raised, and its solid planks formed a kind of passage, without chains or hand-rail. When I arrived the sun was just setting. I dismounted at the drawbridge, and, throwing the bridle of my horse to the guide, I walked on looking about for some one to speak to. After going through a vaulted passage, I came into a large court surrounded by ancient buildings, the mullioned windows of which were all closely shut up. No one appeared, and so profound was the silence that the castle might have been supposed to be uninhabited. After once walking round the court, I ventured to push open a door which stood ajar, and I saw before me the first steps of a winding staircase and a niche in the wall with an image of the Blessed Virgin surrounded with bouquets. I went up, feeling my way as I ascended, and on reaching the first landing-place found myself at the entrance of a spacious and lofty room, the furniture of which seemed to me to date from the time of the League. A solitary lamp was burning at the corner of a table. By its light I could just discern the tapestried walls, the high-backed chairs, the large branched candlesticks of copper, and the chimney, with its heavy mantelpiece projecting over the hearth like a stone canopy. I concluded that this room, or rather hall, must be the ante-chamber of another apartment, where I could hear the sharp, shrill yapping of a little dog who was barking furiously, no doubt at the sound of a strange footstep. I knocked to give notice of my presence, and a stout servant-girl, dressed in green baize, made her appearance; but without allowing me time to give an account of myself, she ran towards the door at the other end, calling out, "Mlle. Boinet, Mlle. Boinet." A middle-aged woman, with the air and manner of a confidential attendant in a great family, then came forward and made me a low curtsy. When I mentioned my name she assumed a smiling, discreet expression of countenance, which seemed intended to convey that she knew what I was come about, and with a true Parisian accent, which showed her to have been born within hearing of the bells of Notre Dame, she said: "I beg, sir, to offer to you my most humble respects. I will hasten to inform Madame la Baronne of your arrival." A moment afterwards the folding-doors opened, and Madame la Baronne herself, coming forward, said to me: "M. de Champeaubert, I beg you a thousand pardons. I am more shocked than I can express that you did not find any one below to show you up. The fact is, we did not expect you till to-morrow." I apologized for having arrived thus unexpectedly, and, Madame de Malpeire having invited me in, I offered my hand to lead her back to her room. When I crossed the threshold of the door I was so taken by surprise that I could not help exclaiming: "This is something marvellous, Madame la Baronne! You have managed to carry off the salon of one of the most charming hotels of the Faubourg St. Germain, or of Versailles, and to place it at the top of this mountain!" "Well," she answered, laughing, "I have contrived to arrange a corner of this old castle so as to make it possible to live in it. When the curtains are drawn and the candles lighted, I can almost fancy myself at Paris. But, alas! when I look out the illusion is at an end. Instead of the gardens of the Luxembourg, I see nothing from my window but the roofs of the village, and on every side rocks, woods and mountains. Indeed, I have often been tempted to say what my late mother-in-law—she was a Forbin Janson—wrote from here to her uncle the Cardinal, just after she was married—'Here I am, lodged in the skies, with the eagle at my beck, and near enough to the moon to touch it with my hand.' She laughed again, and, after inviting me to sit down, took up on her knees the little spaniel, who still kept growling at me sotto voce, and sank back into her chair in a gracefully indolent attitude. The Baronne de Malpeire was a thin small woman, who looked at first sight much younger than she was. Her dress was somewhat old-fashioned, but it was in keeping with the style of her delicate features and her coquettish manners. What with rouge and powder, her complexion exhibited the peculiar brilliancy of a pretty family portrait. She managed to wear with all the ease and grace of a grande dame, that most troublesome invention of the last century, an enormous flounced petticoat, spreading over two stiff projecting pockets, and walked with great dignity in the most prodigiously high-heeled shoes. I was too much absorbed, too much agitated, to attend much to anything but the one predominating thought in my mind. Every sound made me start, and I kept watching the door in hopes every moment of seeing Mlle. de Malpeire appear, though I could not summon courage to inquire after her, or even to pronounce her name. 'The Baron is out shooting, as usual,' Madame de Malpeire said; 'but it will not be long now before he comes home. In the meantime, I will order some refreshments to be brought up for you here. What will you have? a little wine, with a slice of dry toast? or a glass of eau sucrée, perhaps.' I declined, but she insisted. 'Well, but a cup of coffee, then with me? Nobody ever refuses a cup of coffee. Mlle. Boinet, bring the little table here, and ring that we may send for hot water.' The lady in waiting pushed a little round stand in front of her mistress, and placed upon it, between two lighted candles, a small chest of sandalwood. Madame de Malpeire opened this case and took out of its blue-velvet compartments a coffee-pot, a sugar-basin, and those two little cups you see on the chimney-piece."

"O, I felt sure of it!" I cried, clasping my hands on my forehead.

The Marquis looked at me with a faint smile, and continued: "When the coffee was ready, Madame de Malpeire poured it out into two cups, gave me one, and she took the other herself, she said, 'Mlle. Boinet, will you let my daughter know that I wish to see her? Not one word more, if you please.' I felt I changed color, but I said nothing. My agitation seemed to amuse Madame de Malpeire. 'Come, now,' she whispered, with a smile, 'it would be all very well if you were the young lady.' After a pause, she added more seriously, 'That little girl of mine does not, you know, expect to see you here, so you must not be surprised if she does not welcome you at the first moment the way you deserve.' 'I deserve nothing yet,' I cried. 'I can only hope. And so I hope, madame, that I shall not prove unworthy in your daughter's eyes of the happiness that has been promised to me.' Almost at the moment I was saying this, Mlle. de Malpeire came in by the door opposite to the one which opened on the large room. I heard the sound of her light footstep; but when she saw me, she stopped short and seemed inclined to make her escape. Her mother, to relieve her embarrassment, took her by the hand, and leading her forward, said in a playful manner, 'This is my daughter, sir, a very shy young lady, but when she has seen more of the world I have no doubt she will soon learn to make herself agreeable.' I muttered a few words of compliment, to which Mlle. de Malpeire made no reply beyond a silent courtesy, and then, with a cold, distant, almost haughty expression of countenance, she sat down by her mother. The shyness which Madame de Malpeire had spoken of evidently amounted either to an excessive reserve or a total absence of any desire to please. But so great was the charm about this lovely girl, that, in spite of her ungraciousness, it was impossible not to be irresistibly captivated. That portrait gives only a faint idea of her beauty. Who could ever have painted the exquisite delicacy of expression, and her eyes, which seemed at one moment to flash fire, and an instant afterwards to express the most bewitching sweetness? Yes, she was wonderfully beautiful. She possessed that extraordinary power of fascination which robbed Adam of Paradise, and would have beguiled Satan himself had he been made of mortal clay. Dazzled by this fair vision, I lost all self-possession, and really during the whole of that evening I must have appeared a perfect fool. For the first time in my life, I had fallen desperately in love."

CHAPTER IV.

A SUITOR UNDER THE OLD REGIME.

"Madame de Malpeire was quietly sipping her coffee, and fortunately took upon herself the whole burden of conversation.

'My dear love,' she said, glancing over her daughter's dress, 'I don't like you in that cotton gown and those clumsy flat shoes; and why is your hair tied up quite at the back of your head, and without any powder? It is very evident that Mlle. Boinet has had nothing to do with your toilet. You really look a great fright!' 'Do I, mamma?' Mlle. de Malpeire said, as she raised her eyes to the glass in which I had been contemplating for the last quarter of an hour that beautiful fair hair, fastened by a simple tortoise-shell comb, her blooming color, and the fineness of her slender waist, enclosed in a corsage of blue and white print. Her eyes met mine in the glass. She instantly turned her head away, with a look not so much of confusion as of annoyance.

"You must excuse my daughter's déshabillé," Madame de Malpeire added, addressing herself to me. "She did not know we should have company this evening, or she would have dressed for supper. I wish she would take more pains about her dress, but I cannot get her to attend to it. She pretends—foolish child—that she cannot walk in high-heeled shoes." 'Mademoiselle may perhaps be right on that point,' I ventured to say. 'It must be very difficult, Madame la Baronne, to keep one's balance in shoes like yours.' 'Oh! not at all,' she quickly replied. 'I assure you it is all habit. I should not think of taking a step beyond my room with my morocco slippers, and with these little shoes I can walk very well.' She put out at the same time her tiny foot, encased in a shoe of that absurd shape which only allowed the great toe to touch the ground, and then striking together the high wooden heels, covered with white leather, she added with a sigh: 'I have danced in shoes of this kind in a ballet at the Hôtel de Richelieu, in which I appeared as a shepherdess. But that was a long time ago.' Then passing by a sudden transition to graver thoughts, she exclaimed: 'It is a terrible thing to live as we do here, excluded from society, and with hardly any intercourse with the world. I have never been able to reconcile myself to this kind of banishment. When I came to this spot after my marriage, I little thought I should spend my life here. I endured my solitude and ennui with patience, because I was young, and with so many years of life before me; and felt as if there would be time enough later for amusement, and so I allowed my youth to slip by. M. le Baron is kindness and good nature itself; though we have not the same tastes, and though the life he leads here suits him exactly, he would always have been willing to take me to Paris. Every spring and every autumn the journey was talked of; but I have had a great many children, and whenever the time to set out approached, I was not able to travel. If I had not arranged this apartment in the way you see, and hadn't my poor Boinet with me, I don't know what I should have done; I must have died of ennui.' 'But heaven in its mercy, Madame la Baronne, spared you one of your children,' I timidly replied; 'and whilst you devoted yourself to your daughter's education, the isolation you complain of must have been less sensibly felt.' 'Oh! of course,' she answered, and bending down to fasten a bow of ribbon which had been lying on the table in her daughter's hair, she added, 'This little puss has never left me. I taught her myself to read. I also tried to give her music lessons, but the attempt was not very successful. Her education has been left a little to chance. I brought from Paris, with some other furniture, a little book-case filled with works chosen by my late uncle, the Baillé d'Herbelay, who was a philosopher, and a friend of all the learned men of his time. My daughter has taken possession of those books, ancient, and modern, and though they are not particularly amusing, her greatest pleasure is to read them. To-day she has spent the whole morning, poring over a huge volume.'

"I ventured to address myself to Mlle. de Malpeire, and to ask her what was the work which had interested her so much. 'The Philosophical History of the East and of the West Indies, by the Abbé Raynal,' she answered. 'It is a very nice book, only I am sorry to find in it some passages favorable to the Jesuits.' 'What, are you against the Jesuits?' I asked. 'Are you, then, a Jansenist, mademoiselle?' 'No, she quickly replied; 'I am nothing at all.' 'I am delighted that my daughter is fond of reading,' Madame de Malpeire said, playing with her snuff-box as she spoke. 'For my part, I never could apply my mind to it, and as to serious books, I cannot endure them.' Astonished at this undisguised frivolity, I answered, 'If I might venture a suggestion, I would advise you, Madame la Baronne, to go out sometimes, and walk on those beautiful adjacent mountains, clothed with almost more flowers than grass. The finest gardens do not present, I assure you, a more brilliant and smiling picture.' 'Yes, I daresay it is very pretty,' she replied, in an indifferent manner; 'but the roads which lead to these charming spots are not so smooth as the alleys of the Park of Versailles. We should have no end of precipices to cross.' 'In that case,' I said, 'we must look nearer home. If I were you, Madame la Baronne, I would try and interest myself about the people among whom I lived, and the details of rural life. I would often go into the village, and visit the tenants.' 'O, dreadful,' she exclaimed, laughing; 'you do not know what you advise! Every Sunday at church I have a distant view of these good people, and I can assure you that it is quite enough to take away any wish to see them nearer.'

"I saw a look of indignation in Mlle. de Malpeire's eyes, and in an almost imperceptible manner she moved a little farther from her mother's side. What I had said seemed, on the contrary, to meet with her tacit approval. She turned towards me with a less stern expression of countenance. 'There are, then, some very beautiful flowers, sir, on our wild mountains?' she said. 'As beautiful,' I replied, 'as any of our gardens can boast. There are slopes entirely covered with the blue heartsease and the purple-headed aconite and all kinds of other plants, one more lovely than the other. But I suppose you have often walked, mademoiselle, in that part of your father's property?' 'No, sir, never,' she coldly replied. 'My mother does not go beyond the walls of the castle, except to church, and she would not allow me to walk anywhere without her.' 'Here is my husband,' cried Madame de Malpeire, turning towards the half open window; 'he is coming into the court-yard.'

"This announcement was speedily corroborated by a confused noise of footsteps, and the loud barking of several dogs. Almost immediately afterwards the sound of a heavy tread was heard in the adjoining room, and then the Baron made his appearance, with his game-bag slung over his shoulder, and a fowling piece in his hand. Had I met him anywhere else I should have taken him for a poacher. He threw his cap on the sofa, wiped his sunburnt face, and, after cordially embracing me, inquired after my father. Then, turning to the Baronne and Mlle. de Malpeire, he said, 'How are you, wife?—how do you do, my little girl? Guess what game I bring you.' 'Four-legged or two-legged creatures?' asked Mlle. de Malpeire, slipping her hand into the bag. 'Both,' cried the Baron, in a tone of triumph. 'I have three white partridges, two red ones, and a leveret, which has kept me on the run the whole morning. I should have ended by losing it, if it had not been for that tall fellow who won the pewter plate at the wrestling match last year.' 'Pinatel?' Mlle. de Malpeire said. 'Exactly so,' the Baron answered displaying his spoils; 'he just happened to be there with his dog—a dog I would willingly give ten crowns for, though he does look like a badger. I had shot that hare in the back, and it went tumbling down into a precipice under the rock of Pierre Fourcha. My dogs would not fetch it; even Leander refused. Upon this, Pinatel went in quest of it with his cur, and brought me back the creature, and here it is.' As he was emptying his bag, the Baron exclaimed, 'Look here, what on earth is this little queer concern?' 'Let us see,' both the ladies said. It was a wooden figure, in the style of the Nuremburg dolls, roughly carved with a knife.

"What is that bit of wood intended to represent?' Madame de Malpeire asked, without touching it. 'A sportsman with his gun in his hand, I suppose,' the Baron answered. 'No, papa; it is a shepherd keeping his flock, and leaning on his staff,' Mlle. de Malpeire said, as she took hold of the little figure. 'Do put your gloves on before you touch that thing,' the Baronne said; 'how do you know through whose hands that figure has passed? I daresay some peasant-boy made it in some dirty shed, sitting on the straw amongst his sheep.' 'Yes, very likely,' replied her daughter, and she put the little figure in her pocket. 'I think it is the image of some saint,' the Baron opined; 'my gamekeeper slipped it, I have no doubt, into my bag to bring me luck.'

"He then took off his belt, threw his powder-flask on his wife's little table, and sank into the soft depths of an easy-chair, with his elbows resting on the pearl-colored damask cushions. Madame de Malpeire sat opposite to him, playing with her fan, and now and then taking a pinch of Spanish snuff out of a box of burnished gold. You may easily imagine what a strange contrast the husband and wife presented. He with his thick blue-cloth waistcoat, his leather gaiters reaching above his knees, his sunburnt face, large heavy hands, and colossal figure; she with her bows, her lace, her small, light figure, dainty manners and aristocratic refinements. I looked on in astonishment.

"The Baron asked me what was the news at Court, according to the style still in use at that time, and the conversation naturally turned on recent events. The old nobleman could not at all realize the importance and significance of what he called an audacious sedition, and spoke of it in terms of indignant contempt. 'Sir,' he said to me emphatically, 'we have nothing to apprehend. The King is master, and he will show himself to be so as soon as he chooses it. With one look, one word, he will crush the factious multitude.' 'Who knows?' Mlle. de Malpeire ejaculated, with a singular expression of countenance. I said to myself, 'The study of the Philosophical History of the East and West Indies has, I see, borne its fruits.' But I considered this leaning towards the new opinions as the youthful exuberance of a generous spirit, and I was not at all anxious as to the results it might have.

"Supper was announced and we, went into the next room. By Madame de Malpeire's desire I led her daughter in, and sat down by her side. But she did not vouchsafe to look again towards me, and when I spoke to her she answered shortly, and with marked coldness of manner, still I could evidently see that she was by no means out of spirits. On the contrary, there was a half-smiling, half-dreamy expression in her face which enchanted me.

"After supper we retired to the saloon, which was lighted up and arranged as if a numerous society had been expected. The arm-chairs were placed in a semi-circle opposite to the chimney, and a screen embroidered in gold and purple silk, with the arms of the Malpeires in the centre, stood before the hearth. The harpsichord was open, and the card-table set out. Madame de Malpeire sat down at the instrument, and played an easy little sonata with her eyes looking up at the ceiling, and her head moving to and fro in time with her performance. Meanwhile the Baron fell asleep, and Mlle. de Malpeire gradually approached the window, and at last ensconced herself in the recess, half concealed by the curtain. I could see her profile. She was leaning her forehead on her hands, and gazing through the half-closed shutters on the outer darkness, in the midst of which a few lights in the direction of the village showed that some of the cottagers had not yet retired to rest.

"'Will you play cards with me?' Madame de Malpeire said, as she rose from the instrument. 'What do you say to a hundred at picquet? It was the Baillè d'Herbelay's favorite game, and his luck at it was wonderful. I was his scholar but it is so long since I have played, that I am afraid I have forgotten his lessons.' The card-table was near the window, and when I was seated at it I found there was only the curtain between me and Mlle. de Malpeire. She immediately moved away, and sat down by her mother. 'Do you, then never play, Madame la Baronne?' I said, shuffling the cards. 'No, not at picquet,' she answered. 'The Baron can never keep his eyes open after supper, and as to my daughter, I could never teach her the difference between the king of hearts and a knave of diamonds. Having nobody to play with me, I sometimes amuse myself with a solitary game at patience. It is a sort of method of telling fortunes with cards.' 'Will you tell me mine?' I said. 'O, by all means,' she answered, laughing and looking at her daughter. 'We will consult the cards to see how soon a certain handsome dark young man will marry a fair young lady.' Mlle. de Malpeire blushed at this direct allusion, and a slight frown contracted her eyebrows. A moment afterwards she asked her mother's leave to withdraw, and curtseying to me left the room without speaking. 'Ah, Madame,' I exclaimed. 'I am sadly afraid the cards do not return a favorable answer.' 'In that case,' she quickly replied, 'they do not speak the truth.' And holding out the pack to me, she added, 'Cut, if you please, my dear son-in-law.' We played six games at picquet. Madame de Malpeire was in ecstasies; 'it seemed,' she said 'like being in Paris again.'

"When the clock struck twelve, the Baron woke up, and said, looking at the clock, 'You ought, I am sure, to be tired. We have kept you up much too late. It is all Madame de Malpeire's fault. We have got into this bad habit of sitting up.'

"According to the old fashioned ideas of hospitality, he lighted me to my room, and, before taking leave of me for the night, he pressed my hand affectionately, and said with some emotion, 'Your coming here has made me very happy. Good night, my dear Count. To-morrow we shall talk of the future.'

"In spite of the fatigues of the day, I did not rest much that night. Mlle. de Malpeire's image kept pursuing me, and seemed to hover behind the curtain of my canopied bed. If I fell asleep, I saw her, and when I awoke my thoughts carried on the dream. This feverish excitement subsided towards morning. The lovely phantom which had haunted me vanished with the first rays of dawning light, and the delightful hopes and anticipations which had filled my mind during the night, gave way to an unaccountable feeling of depression. I was in this state when, at an early hour, the Baron walked into my room. Though the clock had not yet struck seven, I was already up and dressed. He took a chair, and, sitting down by me, began at once, without any preface: 'My dear Count, the reception we have given you must have plainly shown what our feelings are with regard to your views in coming here. You have quite won my wife's heart; she is delighted with your appearance, your manners, your conversation. For my part, I felt love to you at once because of your great likeness to your father, the worthiest man I know. Now it is for you to say if there is anything about my daughter's looks which does not take your fancy, or if you find her pretty and attractive enough for you?' 'O, Monsieur le Baron!' I exclaimed, 'she is the loveliest, the most charming person I ever beheld! If I can obtain her hand, I shall consider myself the most fortunate man in the world.' 'In that case,' the Baron answered, with a pleased smile, 'we have nothing to do but to draw up the settlements and fix the day for the wedding.' 'You do not anticipate, then, any obstacle?' I asked in an agitated voice. 'No; what obstacle could there be?' he replied. 'You have my consent and Madame de Malpeire's—what would you desire more?' I clasped the hand he held out to me in token of his promise, and then asked him as a favor to delay my happiness for a little while. 'I beseech you, not to tell Mlle. de Malpeire that you have accepted my proposals for her. Allow me a few days, during which I shall endeavor to win her own consent.'

"He laughed and answered, 'Oh! by all means, my dear Count; I can refuse no request of yours. Pay your court to my daughter, fair Amadis. Her heart must be made of steel if it does not soon surrender at discretion. Now,' he added, 'come to breakfast, and then I will take you over the castle. We have plenty of time to spare; my wife only gets up for dinner at twelve o'clock.'

"The Castle de Malpeire is now, I suppose a heap of ruins; but at that time not one stone of its ramparts was missing, and it contained treasures of antiquarian value. The armory and the archives especially were full of rare and highly interesting curiosities. In the tower of the keep were some banners which had been brought back from the Holy Land by one of the lords of Malpeire at the time of the Crusades. They consisted only of strips of faded yellow silk fastened to a plain staff of black wood. As the baron stood gazing on these trophies, he said: 'They may abolish all titles of nobility, they may deprive us of all our rights, but they can never turn those old Saracen banners into mere worthless rags. And it is the same with us. As long as our race exists, it will be noble by right, and noble in fact, in spite of revolutions.' I quote the old nobleman's words, because they give you an idea of his principles, and they account for the stern inflexibility he testified later on.

"A little before dinner time Madame de Malpeire sent Mlle. Boinet to request me to come to her room. To my great disappointment, I found her alone.

"'Good morning, my dear Count,' she said. 'The Baron has given me a hint of what passed between you this morning. I was longing to tell you how charmed I am with the delicacy of your sentiments. They are worthy of a high-minded gentleman. I approve very much of your wish to begin, in the first place, by winning my daughter's affections.' 'I shall try my utmost to do so,' I answered with a sigh. 'You will not be at a loss for opportunities of ingratiating yourself,' replied Madame de Malpeire. 'I would, for instance, advise you to join my daughter in the parterre, where she is gone to take a walk. I have secured for you this little tête-à-tête with her.'

CHAPTER V.

THE COURTSHIP.

"Mademoiselle de Malpeire was walking slowly under the shade of what used to be called a pleached alley, a sort of long bower on one side of the parterre, ending with an arbor, if at least a sort of trellis painted light green, up which a few creepers were twisting their sickly shoots, could be dignified by that name. I hurried into a little walk which ran parallel to the alley, but Mlle. de Malpeire was so engrossed by her own thoughts that she did not notice my approach. I saw her go into the summer-house and seat herself on the bench where she had left her work-basket. For a few minutes she remained in a pensive attitude, her head leaning on her hand, her elbow resting on a little garden table. I did not venture to interrupt her meditation, but when she took up her embroidery and began diligently to ply her needle, I joined her in the arbor. The instant she saw me, Mlle. de Malpeire rose as if she meant to go away. I hastened to say 'Madame la Baronne gave me leave to come and look for you, mademoiselle. Will you allow me to offer you my hand to escort you back to the drawing-room?'

"She bowed in a way that did not imply either consent or refusal, and continued to keep her eyes bent down on her work. I felt too much agitated to begin the conversation, and remained silent, which must have seemed to her extraordinary. In order to relieve my embarrassment, I took up and held in my hand one end of the long strip of blue silk which she was ornamenting with silver and gold lace. The taste and execution of this elaborate piece of embroidery was very questionable, but I kept gazing upon it as if it had been a chef d'œuvre worthy of the most profound admiration. After having carefully studied its details, I replaced it in a very respectful manner on the table before Mlle. de Malpeire, and asked her for whom she intended this work of her hands. 'For him who shall win it,' she replied, spreading out the piece of silk on her knees, in order to judge of the effect of a bit of edging she had been adding to the embroidery. 'Is there, then, going to be a tournament?' I said, with a smile; 'because in that case, mademoiselle, I shall certainly enter the lists, and dispute against all comers the prize you propose to award the conqueror.' 'No, sir,' she answered, with a half-amused look, 'I am sure you won't.'

'Why not, mademoiselle?' I exclaimed, 'I would willingly run the risk of my life to obtain—I do not say this scarf, but something far less precious—a ribbon, or even a flower which you had worn.' She resented this foolish speech by turning her head away with a look of annoyance. 'Do tell me,' I urged, 'what would be the way to win so inestimable a prize.' 'The way would be,' she answered, 'to overcome a crowd of competitors.' This was said with a smile bordering on a sneer. 'I shall carry it off,' I exclaimed. 'You will do no such thing,' she said again, smiling, 'you will not even try to do so.' 'What can prevent me?' I asked. She replied—'Next Sunday is the fête of the village. All the young men will take part in the games. In the afternoon they wrestle on the green, and the strongest and most active of the lot will receive this scarf. So you see that I was right when I said that you would not even wish to compete for it.'

"I was weak enough to feel vexed with this explanation, and I instantly replied. 'And so, then, mademoiselle, the work of your hands is to figure by the side of the pewter dish your father was mentioning yesterday. Allow me to say that this is doing too great an honor in my opinion to that public-house trophy.' She seemed more deeply wounded by these words than I had expected. The color rose in her face, and she exclaimed, in a tone of indignation and even anger, 'You despise, I see, the people and their amusements. Your pride disdains the industrious, simple-hearted men whose labor you live upon. But patience, patience!'

"It was hardly then the time to make my profession of faith on philosophical and political subjects, so I merely said, 'I assure you that I neither despise nor disdain anybody, even the most obscure and humble. I must, however, admit that I have sympathies and repugnances which result from education.' 'From your prejudices,' she subjoined in a low voice. I did not choose to take exception to this phrase, which might have led to an argument, and I contented myself with answering, 'I own that I am exclusively attached to the society in which I have always lived, and I am convinced that you will share that feeling when you have once taken your place in it, amongst the most lovely, the most admired, the respected of its members.' She shook her head, and in an almost audible voice uttered the word 'Never.' 'What!' I exclaimed, 'have you not the least desire to become acquainted with that refined and intellectual world which your education must have given you already some idea of? Would you not like to leave for a while your solitary home, and visit that great city of Paris you have often heard of?' 'No, sir,' she replied; 'it would give me, on the contrary, the greatest pain to leave our poor mountains. I dread everything that could lead to my going away from here.'

"I was not altogether displeased with this reply, for it was evident that if Mlle. de Malpeire persisted in her resolution never to leave the old fortress where she had been born, I had every chance of becoming her husband, if only from the lack of any other possible suitor. I also saw storms in the future likely to obscure the calm and brilliant existence which I should otherwise have planned for her elsewhere; and the idea of living in retirement with so charming a companion in this remote corner of the world was by no means distasteful to me. 'You may be right,' I said, after a short silence. 'It is perhaps true wisdom to prefer the peace and tranquillity you enjoy here to any other mode of existence. Everywhere else your life might be disturbed by events against which no human foresight could secure you. If the Revolution does not stop, who knows what will be the fate of that brilliant, refined, fashionable society I was speaking of just now? It would be far better to live in the most profound seclusion than to witness the decay and destruction of that old French society to which the new régime has already dealt such terrible blows. Its ranks are already thinning; the nobility emigrates or withdraws into the provinces. I should probably find in Paris many salons shut up, many aristocratic houses deserted. Under these circumstances, I could easily make up my mind to give up the world, and lead the life of a simple country gentleman.'

"'You, sir!' she quickly replied, 'you could not do it. You would be like my mother, forever regretting the parties, the balls, the visits, the card-playing and all the amusements you have been accustomed to.' 'It would only depend upon you,' I exclaimed, with a burst of impassioned admiration, 'to prevent my regretting anything.' She drew back to the farthest end of the bench on which we were sitting, and shrugged her shoulders with a scornful and defiant expression, which would have made another woman ugly, but which, by some unaccountable fascination, only served to render her more captivating. Then, without taking any farther notice of me, as if tired of conversation, she leant on her elbows against the trellis, and through that sort of lattice sat gazing on the landscape. Her muslin cap had fallen off her head, and though her face was turned away from me, I could see, through the locks of her fair hair, its lovely outline, her smooth white temple and swan-like neck, at the back of which were hanging the ends of a black ribbon. A rather long silence ensued. I was watching her with anxiety and admiration, not venturing to speak first, but impatiently waiting for the moment she would turn her head towards me. She had not changed her position, and seemed absorbed in a sort of gloomy reverie. But all at once I saw her start and blush to the roots of her hair. I could almost perceive the beating of her heart through the folds of the muslin handkerchief which covered her breast. She leant trembling against the trellis work, as if ready to faint from the excess of her agitation. With an irresistible curiosity I sprang from the seat and stood behind her, looking over her shoulder and trying to make out the cause of that extraordinary emotion. But in vain I cast my eyes in every direction. There was no one passing under the castle walls. Everything was quiet and silent about the place, and farther off I could see nothing but women washing their linen near a fountain, where my mule-driver was watering his beasts, and beyond the village only a few peasants at work here and there, and one or two goat-herds following in the wake of their wandering flocks.

"All this lasted but a short moment. Mlle. de Malpeire drew a deep breath, and hid her face an instant with her pocket-handkerchief. When she removed it the burning blush had passed away from her cheeks. She turned towards me with a calm, proud look, which showed she did not think I had noticed anything. And indeed I remained in complete doubt, not knowing how to account for what I had observed, and almost inclined to believe my fancy had deceived me. Twelve o'clock struck, and the dinner-bell ringing, I offered to lead Mlle de Malpeire back to the house, but she declined on the plea that she wished to gather some flowers on her way through the garden. We met at the hall-door. She then made me a curtsey, just touched the sleeve of my coat with the tip of her fingers, and we entered the house together.

"At dinner the conversation naturally reverted to public affairs, and the events which had taken place during the last few months. 'The effect of these disorders has been felt even in this part of the country,' the Baron said. 'The peasantry, especially the younger men, are infected by a very seditious spirit, and a secret agitation reigns in the whole neighborhood. Each fresh piece of political news serves to keep up the excitement.' 'The political news!' I exclaimed; 'and how does it reach these good people, I wonder?' 'By a number of indefatigable agents,' the Baron replied. 'For instance, through those itinerant artisans who wander about the country carrying on their back the whole of their stock-in-trade, and those lusty vagabonds, too, who make it their business to haunt the village fairs and festivals for the purpose of competing for prizes at the running and wrestling matches. The news these persons circulate is transmitted from one neighborhood to another with considerable rapidity. They are the most active propagators of sedition, and have already done a great deal of harm. Lately they spread the report that the Assembly had decreed the destruction of all the habitations of the nobility, from the fortified castles defended by ramparts down to the small manor-houses with their dovecots and rabbit-warrens. Instantly the peasants in the plains were stirred up like a nest of ants, and marched to the assault of the Chateau de Maussane, a handsome building in the modern style, with a suite of apartments on the ground floor as easy of access as a ball-room. The next day a detachment of the Regiment of Bourgogne quartered at — arrived to quell the disturbance, but all was over by that time. The peasants had dispersed, after burning and laying everything to waste. They are difficult times, but I have no fear as to the issue,' the Baron said, with a confidence that could not be shaken. 'It is not the first time that factions have desolated France, and our fathers were familiar with civil wars. We shall do as they did; we shall fight for our religion, our King, and our rights! These old walls have been more than once besieged by the Huguenots in the days of the League, but never scaled.'

"After dinner the Baron said he was going to take a little turn with his gun in the warren. This meant a walk of more than three leagues, which generally lasted until nightfall. I remained therefore alone with Madame de Malpeire, for her daughter had disappeared as soon as we had left the dining-room. I saw her go into a little boudoir, the door of which remained half open, and when she moved about I could just catch sight of her shadow on the oak floor.

"'Well, my dear sir,' said Madame de Malpeire, seating herself comfortably in her arm-chair, 'have you been paying your court?' 'I have, madame, but I am very much out of heart,' 'O, monsieur,' she cried, 'you have no occasion to be so. I know that my daughter is not at all tender-hearted. She will not appear at first to like you, but it is impossible that she should not appreciate your merits. It may be some time before you succeed in touching the heart of this obdurate fair one, but, in the mean time, I can see no objection to your marrying her.'

"The unaccountable circumstance which had disturbed my mind in the morning recurred to me, and I said, in a hesitating manner, 'But suppose a more fortunate man than myself has already succeeded in winning her affections?' At those words, Madame de Malpeire cast up her eyes and her hands. 'My dear sir,' she exclaimed, 'there is not for ten leagues round a man to whom a girl like my daughter could have given a thought. No one visits here except a few old friends of the Baron's, who sometimes do us the honor of dining with us after a day's shooting with him. M. de la Tusette, for instance, who shares with him the lordship of the manor of Piedfourcha; M. de Verdache, one of our glass manufacturing nobles; M. de Cadarasse, too, who was formerly one of the rangers of the royal forests—all very excellent people, and of unexceptionable birth, I admit, but by no means agreeable members of society.'

"Whilst Madame de Malpeire was thus allaying my apprehensions, I happened to cast my eyes on a most exquisite oval frame, in which was stuck a most wretched English print of Clarissa Harlowe escaping from her father's house, which neither as to size or beauty fitted the magnificent specimen of carving which encircled it. Madame de Malpeire's glance had followed mine, and with her usual versatility she instantly changed the subject of discourse. 'Yes, I see,' she said, 'that you think it is doing too much honor to that stupid engraving to put it in that frame. I am quite of your opinion, but it is, however, my own doing, and you will understand my reasons when I tell you what led to it. You must know that I was so dreadfully bored here the first year of my marriage that I became positively ill. The Baron was looking out for something to amuse me. He happened to hear of an Italian painter, who was making the round of the neighboring chateaux seeking for employment. He took it into his head to send for him to make my picture, and at the same time he sent to Paris for a handsome frame and a box of colored crayons, for portraits in pastel are the only ones I like, and I would not on any account have had mine done in any other manner. The Italian did not arrive, however, for three or four months, and when at last he did come I was grown dreadfully thin, and so weak that I could hardly walk a step. However, to please the Baron I consented to have my likeness taken, but after the first sitting I was obliged to give it up. My health completely gave way, and I did not leave my bed for six weeks. The first time I came out of my room he brought me here, and making me sit down in front of that frame, he said, 'Our Italian painter did not require to see you more than once in order to set to work. Look up, dear heart, and tell me if you do not recognize your own features in that face?' I positively shrieked, for the abominable wretch had actually painted me in oils, and besides that he had the beautiful idea of dressing me up like a Roman or a Turk, or I don't know what, with a yellow drapery around my waist, and on my head a sort of turban, and no powder. I told the Baron I could not bear to see myself in that dress, even in a picture, and that, with his permission, I would send that horrid daub into the lumber room. It was accordingly carried up-stairs, but the frame remained where it was, and Boinet bethought herself of sticking that print into it. I locked up the box of crayons, in the hope that some other painter might perhaps come this way, but we never see those foreign artists now, and so that affected Clarissa Harlowe still occupies my place.'

"Perhaps you would allow me," I said, "to try and take your likeness; I can draw a little." "No, no. I thank you very much, but it is too late now," she answered with a sort of melancholy vivacity. "It is at twenty, my daughter's age, that a woman should have her portrait taken; it is her picture I should like to see in that frame." "If she will sit to me," I exclaimed, enchanted with the hint, "I can begin it to-morrow." "Why not to-day?" cried Madame de Malpeire; "we have only to let my daughter know;" and she invited me by a sign to follow her into the boudoir. Mlle. de Malpeire was standing reading near a little bookcase, the old Baillet d'Herbelay's, of course. When we came in she quickly threw down the volume, but without any attempt at concealing it. When her mother told her that I was going to take her portrait, she evinced neither satisfaction nor dissatisfaction, but carelessly twisting up her fair long curls, she answered, laconically, "I am ready." "Not so fast, mademoiselle; not so fast," cried Madame de Malpeire; "I must have you dressed as a nymph, and your hair slightly powdered, and in it sky-blue bows." "Very well, mamma," she answered, with a look of resignation. "Go into your room with Boinet," Madame de Malpeire continued, "and while she dresses your hair I will get everything ready here." I remained alone in the boudoir, and could not resist the temptation of ascertaining what book it was Mlle. de Malpeire had been reading. I found it was Rousseau's Nouvelle Héloïse. A sentence in the preface of that work flashed across my mind: "The woman who will venture to read this book is as good as lost." "Thank Heaven," I thought to myself, "we have no St. Preux here." I was too young, too thoughtless, too much in love, to make any more serious reflections on this discovery. I put back the volume in its place, only regretting that chance had happened to throw it in Mlle. de Malpeire's way.

"Madame de Malpeire, like all persons who are habitually idle, was wonderfully active when once she hit upon something to do. Under her superintendence the little room was transformed into a kind of studio, and she sent for the box of crayons, the sheets of vellum, and all the things which were to have been originally used by the Italian artist. Mlle. de Malpeire, in the dress and coiffure her mother had desired, looked on with indifference at all these preparations. When they were completed she said it was too late to begin that day—that I should not have time to sketch her portrait. "You are right, my dear," her mother replied; "and, moreover, it is time for our gouter. Ring the bell, that Boinet may send us up cakes and fruit." The fruit Madame la Baronne spoke of was a plateful of those little yellow peaches which I ate this morning with so much relish. Mlle. Boinet took them up one after another on the point of a fork, and after peeling and cutting them in quarters with a silver knife, she poured upon them sugar and wine. Madame de Malpeire helped me to some of this compote, and said with a sigh: "This is the only fruit which ripens here." "It is quite excellent," I answered, with perfect sincerity. "It is very kind of you to say so," she replied; "they would not be eatable but for the art Boinet possesses of improving their flavor with sugar and wine. She prepares cherries for me in the same way when it is the season for it. That woman is a perfect treasure. She has neat, handy ways of doing things which make her services invaluable. I wanted her to have married some peasant in the village, whom I could have made an upper servant after she had polished him up a little; but she could never make up her mind to marry one of those clownish fellows.'

"Really, mamma," exclaimed Mlle. de Malpeire, with a sudden vivacity, "it would have only been too great an honor for her. Those clownish fellows, as you call them, are free independent men, whereas her position is that of a menial." "O, good Heavens!" Madame de Malpeire exclaimed, "what is the meaning of these fine phrases? Where have you learnt this nonsensical trash, my dear? Let me tell you that Mlle. Boinet's excellent conduct and the refinement of her manners have raised her long ago above what you call a menial condition. I beg to assure you that she would have lowered herself greatly in the social scale by marrying a man inferior to her in mind and education—one of those boorish, stupid peasants whom you call free independent men."

Mlle. de Malpeire colored violently at this kind of reproof, and hung down her head with a look of embarrassment and ill-concealed anger. I was surprised at her seeming so annoyed at her mother's words, but my thoughts did not go any farther. I ought to have understood by that time that the education she had secretly given herself had created an impassable gulf between us. I ought to have been more alarmed at the ideas and feelings she sometimes expressed, and foreseen their ultimate results. Yes, it would have been well for her and for me if I had that day left the Castle of Malpeire, and given up all thoughts of this perverse but too captivating girl; it might have saved her from a terrible fate. But I remained, and her doom was sealed."

CHAPTER VI.

THE FEAST OF ST. LAZARE.

M. de Champanbert paused after he had uttered these last words, and looked up at the picture. After gazing for a little while sadly and intently at the lovely face, which seemed to listen to him with a smile, he went on:

"I took possession of my newly arranged studio, and in three or four days finished that portrait."

"And you signed it with your initials," added Dom Gérusac; "I have often noticed that there was an M. and a C. at the corner near the heading."

"How carefully you must have examined that anonymous picture!" M. de Champanbert replied; "yet it is by no means a chef d'œuvre."

"No, certainly not," my uncle answered with his usual simplicity.

"But it was an excellent likeness," the Marquis subjoined, "and was, therefore, of course reckoned perfect. I will not treat you, my dear Thomas, to a description of all the feelings of my infatuated heart during three or four days which were spent in contemplating that lovely face, and in striving to reproduce on paper the nearest possible resemblance of those beautiful features. The sitting generally lasted several hours, for the Baronne was in a state of restless impatience to see my work finished. As soon as she was up, she came to the boudoir, where I was already established, and immediately sent for her daughter. Mlle. de Malpeire then made her appearance, dressed as you see her there, with her hair arranged in that way. She walked leisurely into the room, and sitting down at a little distance from the table, drew herself up in her stiff corsage, fixing her eyes upon me with a defiant expression, crossed her beautiful arms on her chest, and remained immovable in the position I had prescribed.

"Madame de Malpeire, when I began to draw, used to cry out with an amusing impatience, 'smile, my dear, smile then!' But in spite of the maternal injunctions, she sat on proud and silent, till by degrees the expression of her countenance underwent a change. A sort of dreamy reverie seemed to steal over her, which I would not for the world have interrupted, for then her features resumed a more natural expression, a soft light shone in the blue orbs of her matchless eyes, and sometimes she looked at me, but I felt it was unconsciously, with the enchanting smile I have reproduced in the portrait. Two or three times during these long sittings, I remained for a little while alone with her. Then her expression instantly altered; she turned her eyes away from me with a look of haughty reserve, which seemed meant to convey that any attempt at conversation would be disagreeable to her. But I was so desperately in love, and in consequence so obstinately sanguine, that these signs of indifference, and even aversion, did not destroy the hope that my love and my devoted attentions would end by softening that proud heart, and I began to think it would be as well, as her mother had said, to marry her in the meantime.

"The Baron did not know I was making his daughter's portrait. Madame de Malpeire intended it to be a surprise for him, and was keeping the secret with all the discretion she was capable of. It was not difficult, for he was out shooting all day, and in the evening he did not think of inquiring what we had been doing during his absence. When my chef d'œuvre was finished, I placed it in the frame and hung it up myself in the drawing-room, opposite to the arm-chair in which the Baron took his nap after supper. As soon as the sun had set that evening, Madame de Malpeire desired the shutters to be closed, and the lustre which hung from the ceiling to be lighted up, as well as the branch candlesticks over the chimney-piece. Mlle. Boinet had stripped the garden, in order to make up an enormous cipher of flowers and foliage, which she fastened above the frame. It was formed of two M's surrounded by a coronet. The clever creature had bethought herself that my Christian name was Maximin. 'What a charming idea!' Madame de Malpeire emphatically remarked. 'Do look, my dear, at that cipher.' 'Yes, it is my cipher,' Mlle. de Malpeire quickly said as if to protest against her mother's interpretation of the symbolic monogram. 'Those two M's mean Marie de Malpeire.'

"The Baron was coming home just at that minute. His wife went to meet him, and brought him in triumph to the door of the drawing-room. 'Oh, what a beautiful picture!' he exclaimed, when he saw his daughter's portrait. 'How like it is! how perfect!' Madame de Malpeire enjoyed his surprise for a little while, and then said, with a smile, 'You do not ask the name of the painter?' 'Ah, indeed, I ought to do so, my love; I am sure I owe him a great many thanks,' he good-naturedly replied. 'Here he is,' his wife said, taking me by the hand; 'it is modesty which prevents him coming forward.' The good old man embraced me most affectionately, and said, in a gay, light manner, but with a little emotion, 'Well, we make an exchange. I give you the original, and you leave me the copy.' At the same time, he turned towards his daughter, and held out his hand, as if to ask for her's, in order to place it in mine, but she drew back, and with her eyes bent on the ground, hid herself behind her mother. 'Well, you have my promise, and that is enough,' he added more seriously.

That night at supper he said to his wife, 'Have you forgotten, my dear, that to-morrow is the feast of St. Lazarus, the patron saint of the village?' 'Well, I certainly never thought of it,' she answered, in a careless tone. 'A great many people are already arrived,' the Baron subjoined. 'As I came home from shooting, I saw them all flocking this way, gipsies, horse-dealers, pedlars, and all the variety of tramps that pitch their tents on the ground of the fair the day before it opens. The folk from the low country are coming up in crowds, and when the inhabitants of the neighboring villages swarm here to-morrow, there will be an immense number of people gathered together. It used to be the custom,' he added, turning to me, 'for the wife or the daughter of the lord of the manor to open the ball with one of the village lads. My wife did away with this practice, but my daughter chose to revive it last year, and danced with the peasants like her grandmother and her great-grandmother had done before her, but this year things must be managed differently. We shall go to the village only for Mass at the parish church.' 'You don't mean, sir, that we shall not be present at the games?' exclaimed Mlle. de Malpeire. 'No, my dear,' her father answered in a decided manner. 'Times are not what they used to be, and you cannot appear in a place where you might not perhaps meet with proper respect.'

'You are not really going to regret that rustic ball, I hope,' Madame de Malpeire said, in a tone of indulgent reproach. 'Charming partners, upon my words, those hot-faced perspiring fellows, dressed as in the heart of winter, in coats of green frieze, and short breeches of the same material; and, moreover, with worsted stockings, in their heavy clumsy shoes?' 'O, mamma, what do their clothes signify?' exclaimed Mlle. de Malpeire, in a tone of intense though suppressed irritation. 'There is nothing coarse about these men but their dress. The simplicity of their manners is perhaps preferable to the refinements of our politeness, and, in spite of the peculiarities which shock you so much, their society is endurable, I assure you.' 'Well, possibly so, in the open air,' the Baronne replied, with a little affected laugh.

"I remembered then the blue embroidered scarf, and turning to the Baron, I asked, 'Will the conqueror, then, not receive the prize from the hands of Mlle. de Malpeire?' 'He will come here for it after the sports are over,' he replied. 'Madame la Baronne will receive him and his companions in the hall down-stairs. This does not commit us to anything.' He led his wife back to the drawing-room. I remained a minute behind with Mlle. de Malpeire, and trembling with emotion, I whispered to her, 'To-morrow your mother will tell you what has been settled. My happiness depends upon your answer. I cannot be happy if I do not obtain your free consent.' She drew back, and looking me straight in the face, she said in a low voice, 'What! so soon!' 'Forgive me, forgive me,' I cried, terribly agitated. 'The excess of my love justifies—' 'Do you mean,' she coldly said, 'that you would marry me against my will?' My only answer was a gesture of despair and passion. 'You would really go so far as that!' she exclaimed indignantly. 'Very well. Time will show!' and she turned her back upon me.

"Early the next morning, Mlle. Boinet came to let me know it was time to go to church. I found Madame de Malpeire dressed as if to hear Mass at the King's chapel, in a gown of Indian satin, and three great feathers in her head-dress. Mlle. de Malpeire was also in greater toilette than usual. She had on a déshabillé of striped silk, and a little straw hat on her head adorned with ribbons, the long ends of which streamed down her back. When I went up to her to pay her my respects, she bowed in an indifferent absent manner, which took me by surprise. I expected to see her less composed. Her mother made me a confidential sign, and then whispered in my ear, 'I have not said anything to her yet. There is no hurry about it.'

"The road which descended to the village was a sort of staircase cut in the rock. Madame de Malpeire was carried down in a Sedan chair. The Baron took care of his daughter, and I walked with them. All the household followed; that is, about a dozen men and maid servants, with Choiset, the game-keeper, and Mlle. Boinet at their head.

"There was a crowd in front of the church. The peasants in their Sunday clothes stood in groups, conversing in a noisy manner under the shade of the twin elm-trees. Farther on in the open space, where the fair was held, on a kind of a natural bowling green, the mass of people was still more considerable. I observed that most of the young men wore in their button-holes, or in their hats, a bit of ribbon of the national colors, as they were then called. When the Baron and his family appeared, all eyes were directed towards them, and there was a moment of silence. The crowd made way for us to pass, and some of the older then touched their hats, but there were few of them who showed that mark of respect. Notwithstanding the recent attacks on the privileges of the nobility, the seat of the lord of the manor still existed in the old parish church. It was a beautiful piece of osken wood-work, with a very high back, surmounted by a canopy. The panels were elaborately carved, and each compartment bore the shield of the Malpeires, and their haughty motto, the Provençal words, Fuero un degun, 'No one except one.' As I went up the nave I observed against one of the pillars a picture worked in tapestry. It was an ex voto. Imperfect as was the execution, it was easy enough to recognize the scene it was intended to represent. A funeral procession was halting at the Pass of Malpeire; a coffin stood on the ledge of a rock, and a priest, with his hands upraised, was gazing on the young girl who had just lifted up her shroud. Madame de Malpeire saw that I was looking at that simple memorial, and with a sudden burst of feeling she said, glancing at her daughter, 'They were actually going to bury her alive!' 'And God restored her to you in a miraculous manner,' I replied, touched by her involuntary emotion. 'I suppose you had that picture made as a thanks-offering?' 'I worked it myself,' she answered. 'It took me a year to finish it.'

"The Baron seated himself in his usual place, his wife on one side of him and his daughter on the other. Pointing to a vacant seat by the side of the latter, he invited me to take it. The household knelt a little lower down on a carpet which was spread over the stone floor. We thus formed a separate group between the sanctuary and the nave, which was filled with the villagers and strangers. Our arrival had occasioned a little agitation amongst the crowd. When the Baronne had walked up the aisle, smiling in a condescending manner, her feathers waving to and fro, and her high-heeled shoes resounding on the pavement, every face had been turned towards her with a malevolent expression. As soon as we had taken our places in the manorial seat, these feelings of hostility assumed a more open character. Notwithstanding the sanctity of the place, murmurs rose amongst the congregation. At this unexpected demonstration, Madame de Malpeire, who was quietly reading in her prayer-book, looked up surprised, and said to her daughter, 'What do they want, I wonder?' 'That everybody should pray to God without distinction of rank,' Mlle. de Malpeire answered in an excited tone. The Baron was looking very pale, and scanned the crowd with a haughty and frowning countenance. Fortunately, the priest with his acolytes appeared at that moment, and when he went up to the altar the people at the lower end of the church knelt down in silence. About a dozen young men, however, advanced towards the chancel, genuflected as they passed before the altar, and then stood together side by side opposite the Baron's seat. He whispered to me, 'They have a right to stand there. From time immemorial the Abbat, that is, the prince of the young men, and his companions occupy the place on St. Lazarus' day.'

"These youths had all green sprigs in their hats, and a sort of scarf tied across the thick waistcoat which so much offended the Baronne's taste. Most of them were robust peasants, with sunburnt faces and athletic frames. The Abbat especially furnished a magnificent type of physical strength. His stature was colossal, and his regular features reminded me of the head of an ancient gladiator. This man's dress was somewhat different from that of the other peasants. Instead of worsted stockings he wore yellow leather gaiters, and in lieu of the obnoxious frieze waistcoat, a jacket of striped linen. I noticed all this in a vague, cursory manner. My anxiety was increasing as the moment approached for the publication of the banns of marriage, and I could hardly conceal the agitation with which I awaited the accomplishment of that formality. Madame de Malpeire seemed to have no misgivings, though she had not chosen to inform her daughter of what was about to take place. She looked at me from time to time with a smile, as if to congratulate me on my happiness. At last the priest, with a paper in his hand, read in a loud voice from the altar, in the midst of a profound silence: 'There is a promise of marriage between the very excellent and illustrious lord

Maximin de Monville, Count of Champaubert, and the very excellent and illustrious lady, Madeleine Marie de Malpeire.' Fresh murmurs rose in the body of the church, provoked this time by the sound of those titles and high-sounding appellations. I looked anxiously at Mlle. de Malpeire. Her countenance betrayed no agitation. She only looked very pale, and her hands trembled a little, though she tried to repress it. 'Do not agitate yourself, my love,' her mother affectionately whispered; 'there is no occasion to be surprised, and still less distressed.' 'I am perfectly calm,' she answered, with a faltering voice, and turning away her head.

"I saw nothing, I remarked nothing more, and yet I am sure that something must have passed there which ought to have opened my eyes and showed me I had a rival. As soon as Mass was over the Baron made way for me and said, 'Now that the announcement of your marriage has been publicly made, Monsieur le Comte, lead the way and give your hand to your betrothed.'

"I did so with a beating heart. Mlle. de Malpeire suffered me to lead her down the church. The crowd had already streamed out, and was waiting for us outside. The little band of peasants, at the head of which was the Abbat, came forward. He took off his hat and addressed the Baron in Provençal. 'What does he say?' whispered Madame de Malpeire in her daughter's ears. 'He invites us to be present at the games,' she coldly replied. 'At a distance, well and good,' the Baronne rejoined. 'I have ordered seats to be placed along the parapet; we can see from there everything that goes on as well as below. But we must invite that big fellow and his friends to come up to the castle to drink a glass of wine, and receive the scarf you have taken the trouble to embroider. It is of no use for me to speak to them in French. You had better explain the matter to them, my darling.' 'It is already done,' she answered. 'My father has just told him that you expect them this evening.' 'Then let us quickly get out of this mob,' exclaimed the Baronne, stepping into her chair; 'we shall be suffocated if we stay here.' We were, in fact, inconveniently thronged, the mob pressing upon us somewhat insolently. Still there was no absolute rudeness, no threatening expressions. 'I will go on first,' the Baron said; 'I leave you to take care of my daughter.' I took Mlle. de Malpeire's arm under mine to lead her through the crowd, but she abruptly disengaged it, and turning towards the Abbat, as if to place herself under his protection, she said to him, 'Go before us, Pinatel.' The colossus obeyed. He forced his way through the mob, jostling and thrusting everybody aside, and thus clearing a passage for us. As soon as we were out of the place, he turned round, and without saying a word went back to his companions.

"We walked on in silence towards the castle, Mlle. de Malpeire some way in advance of us, the Baron at my side with a gloomy, disturbed countenance. At last he said, 'You have seen the disposition of these people; they have all but insulted us. Who knows how far this will go? If the King does not provide a remedy, his nobles will be exposed to a conflict with the peasantry. In the meantime, I must take measures for our own security. We shall not go any more into the village.' 'I am quite of your opinion,' cried the Baronne, putting her head out of the sedan-chair. 'We shall remain at home, and our daughter shall be married in the chapel of the castle. Do you know Boinet heard them saying behind her that in all the other parishes the seats of the lords of the manor had been pulled down. You will be obliged, perhaps, to remove yours.' 'Never!' exclaimed the Baron. 'I gave up without hesitation all pecuniary privileges; toll rents, field rents, fees, weighings, fines on sales, and the like, all have been abolished, but never as long as I live will I renounce my honorary rights. Of these nothing but violence shall deprive me.'

"As we entered the castle I tried to speak to Mlle. de Malpeire, but with determined ingenuity she contrived to avoid it. In the afternoon, however, I succeeded in detaining her on the steps as we were going down into the garden, and said to her with great emotion, 'O, mademoiselle, cannot you forgive me my happiness? What can I do to soften your feelings towards me? How can I make myself worthy of your regard? If you did but know how I love you, perhaps your heart would not be so slow to return my affection.' and as she hurried on without answering, I added, 'Do let me speak to you of my feelings. You cannot object to it now that you look upon me as your future husband.' 'You had better say the highest bidder for my hand,' she replied with a bitter sneer. I do not know why, but at that moment a sudden suspicion flashed across my mind. With a vague but violent feeling of jealousy I exclaimed, 'You care for somebody else. Who is it you prefer to me?' 'You will soon know,' she boldly replied, and without another word rushed into the garden."

CHAPTER VII.

MADemoiselle de Malpeire's Marriage.

"I GRIEVE to say that even after my short conversation with Mlle. de Malpeire on the steps of the parterre, I did not make up my mind to give her up. On the contrary, my love became selfish and tyrannical, and I felt resolved to assert my claim to her hand, in spite of the existence of a favored rival. So greatly did passion blind and mislead me, that the idea of a forced marriage no longer appeared to me as repugnant and odious as it used to do. The time for delay and hesitation was gone by, and I determined to speak to the Baron that very evening. We had only to draw up the contract on the following morning, and in three days I could be married to Mlle. de Malpeire. It was whilst I was sitting by the Baronne near the parapet, watching the games on the village green, that I turned over in my head these plans and resolutions.

"The scene below was somewhat confused. Almost everybody had left the place where the fair was held, and the crowd pressed tumultuously round an enclosure formed with ropes and stakes run into the ground. At one end of these lists, so to call them, stood a pole, at the top of which glistened in the rays of the setting sun a gigantic pewter dish. At the opposite extremity a drum and fife formed the most discordant orchestra ever inflicted on mortal ears. Mlle. de Malpeire was on the other side of her mother, and never took her eyes off that scene. I kept watching her, with feelings of jealousy, anger and tenderness. She tried to look composed, but the expression of her countenance and the feverish flush on her cheeks betrayed a secret agitation.

"'Look, my dear Count,' the Baronne said to me, 'the games are going to begin.'

"Two half-naked men entered the lists, and seized one another by the body. One of them was soon thrown down, and silently withdrew from the ring. The other man stood bolt upright, and awaited the next combatant, who, in his turn remained master of the field, and then was vanquished by another adversary. For more than an hour new wrestlers successively occupied the centre of the ring, and were one after another rolled in the dust, amidst the shouts of the mob, who greeted them with applause, or hissed and hooted at them, according to the more or less strength and activity they evinced.

"After two or three encounters had taken place, the Baronne turned to me, and said, with a slight yawn, 'It must be owned, this is a little monotonous, especially as it is perfectly well known beforehand who will be the conqueror. The Abbat is sure to end by throwing them all down, as he did last year,' 'The strength of that fellow Pinatel is extraordinary,' the Baron observed; 'and he is also a wonderful pbacher. If he had belonged to the place, I should have made him the offer of Choiset's situation sometime hence, and in the meantime occupied him as a woodman.'

"A moment afterwards Madame de Malpeire yawned again, and exclaimed, 'This is decidedly very tedious. These fights with the fists are too tiresome. Let us take a turn in the parterre.' I think I have already mentioned that this parterre was a raised platform, supported by the rampart, and surrounded with trellised walks, amongst which meandered a number of narrow paths, edged with box. This little miniature hanging garden of Babylon filled up all the space in front of the modern part of the castle, and some of the old structures had been smartened up and newly painted in accordance with these recent alterations. At one of the angles of this portion of the building, which was entirely devoted to Madame de Malpeire's apartments, was a little turret, jutting out beyond the wall and overhanging a precipice, the bottom of which was on a level with the plain. In old times this turret was called the watch-tower, and when there were wars or disturbances in the country, a sentinel was placed in a little lodge at the top of it, to give notice of the approach of hostile bands. A slated roof had been substituted for the watchman's sentry-box, and at the height of the first story a large window had been made, the balcony of which hung over a chasm full of briars and dark-colored mosses. Mlle. de Malpeire's room was in this tower. As we passed near it the Baronne stopped, and, pointing to the balcony with her gold-headed cane, she said to me: 'I cannot look out of that window without feeling giddy. My daughter's nerves are stronger than mine. I have often found her musing on a moonlight evening with her elbows resting on the edge of that swallow's nest.' I leant over the parapet to measure with my eyes the tremendous height of the wall, and satisfied myself that even if there had been a Romeo in the neighborhood, that Juliet's balcony was inaccessible.

"Shortly before sunset loud acclamations arose from the plain, and the pewter dish disappeared from the top of the pole. 'It is over,' the Baronne said, peeping through the sticks of her fan. 'The victor is proclaimed, and he is crossing the square with his train. They will be coming up here. Let us go in.' It soon became dark, but the peasants lighted pine branches, which they carried in their hands. The flickering light of their torches formed a curious moving illumination as they ascended the hill. From the windows of the drawing-room we saw parties of men parading about the village, with a drummer at their head, singing various patriotic songs, and a less numerous band of boys and girls dancing on the green. In a few minutes, Choiset, the game-keeper came in. 'The Abbat is arrived,' he hastily announced; 'there is a great crowd following him. I am come to take M. le Baron's orders.'

"'You will admit no one but the Abbat himself and his twelve companions,' answered the old nobleman; 'and if any of the others try to force their way in, you will do as I told you.' 'Come,' said the Baronne, smiling, 'let us go and give audience to these gallant shepherds. Your hand, M. le Baron. Come with us, my love,' she added, turning to her daughter. Mlle. de Malpeire followed them, holding in her hand the blue scarf unfolded. She looked very pale, and I saw her hands tremble.

"They all went down stairs. I did not follow them; the whole affair was disagreeable to me, and I had not meant to be present at the presentation of the scarf. I remained, therefore, alone in the drawing-room, standing near a window, and unconsciously gazing on the dark plain. There was no moon, and not a star was to be seen in the sky. The garden and everything beyond it was veiled in profound obscurity. The night wind moaned sadly through the trellised alleys. I leant my head on my hands, and fell into a melancholy fit of musing, which gradually softened my resentful feeling. The kind of avowal which Mlle. de Malpeire had volunteered, as it were, to make to me, had created at first in my heart a paroxysm of jealousy and anger, which was almost like hatred. But by dint of turning over in my mind the cruel words she had uttered, I began to think that there was no occasion to attach any importance to them; that it was all an excuse and a subterfuge, a mere threat—that I had not, that I could not, have a rival. If I could be once persuaded of this, I felt I could easily forgive her coldness, endure her scorn. I was ready to fall at the feet of the haughty girl, and to tell her that I should always love, always be devoted to her, without insisting on a return, if such was her will—her whim. As I was indulging in these alternate moods of tenderness and anger, I thought I perceived a figure passing slowly under the window, keeping close to the wall, like some one feeling his way in the dark. Though there was nothing extraordinary in this, my attention was roused, and I followed with my eyes the indistinct form for some time, but the obscurity was so great that it disappeared without my having been able to discern which way it had gone. A moment afterwards Madame de Malpeire's little dog got up and growled. I turned round; the door of the boudoir which had served me as a studio was ajar. I fancied I heard the sound of a light stealthy footstep on the creaking boards. The impression was so strong, that I called out, 'Who is there?' There was no answer. I took a candle and went into the boudoir; the little spaniel followed me, barking between my legs. The door to the parterre was open. This was often the case these summer evenings. No one was to be seen, but I fancied I heard the sound of receding footsteps. I concluded that some of the servants had passed that way into the garden, and returned to the drawing room. About half an hour afterwards Madame Malpeire came in and threw herself on the sofa, exclaiming, 'I am quite exhausted. I have been obliged to rest some time on my way up in Boinet's room. I do not know that I ever laughed so much in my life. I think it is that which has tired me so much.'

'Was the reception so very amusing then?' I asked. 'O, you shall hear all about it,' exclaimed the good lady, seized with a fresh fit of laughter. 'Just picture to yourself. The Abbat and his cortège were waiting in the green hall, with their hats off and very respectful, all as it should be. When my daughter came forward, the big fellow went down on his knees in a most gallant fashion to receive the scarf. She stooped over him, and passed it over his chest, whilst the others applauded, making a tremendous noise. At last, when silence was restored, the Abbat stood up and addressed to me a little speech, which gave me time to look at him. Upon my word that man is a giant. I do not think my feathers reached as high as his elbow. When he had finished his harangue, I turned to the Baron and said, 'Monseieur, may I beg you to make my acknowledgments to that young man. Not knowing the language of the country, I have not been able to understand his speech, but I am not the less delighted with his sentiments.' 'Why, good gracious, madame,' the Baron exclaimed, 'he spoke to you in French!'

'This tickled my fancy so much that I was seized with a fit of laughter which obliged me to hide my face with my fan, and I was at least a quarter of an hour recovering myself. But it all passed off very well, I think. Wine and liquors were plentifully served out to these good people. They drank our healths, I don't know how many times, and are gone away quite satisfied, I presume. But the whole affair has been dreadfully fatiguing. As to my daughter, she is quite knocked up by the exertions of the day, and has asked my leave not to appear at supper. She has probably retired to rest by this time. For my part, I feel sufficiently refreshed not only to keep you and the Baron company at supper, but to play, if you are so disposed, our usual game at piquet afterwards.'

'The Baron then joined us, and said, 'There is an immense number of people on the road. They seem to be coming here, but they certainly will not come in. We can sleep in perfect quiet; I have ordered the draw-bridge to be taken up.' 'O,' exclaimed his wife, in a jesting manner, 'then we are all your prisoners. Nobody can go in and out without your leave.'

'We went to supper. I thought, in spite of all his efforts to appear unconcerned, that the Baron was somewhat anxious about the state of things. He fell, however, asleep as usual in his arm-chair, and Madame de Malpeire and I began one of those interminable games at cards which she often liked to prolong beyond midnight.

'At about eleven o'clock Mlle. Boinet ran in, looking terrified. 'I don't know what is going on,' she said; 'there is a great tumult outside. From this room nothing is heard, but if M. le Baron will go down into the court, perhaps he can find out what all this noise is about.' 'I daresay they have come to give us a serenade,' Madame de Malpeire said, quietly shuf-fling the cards. 'I shall go down and see,' the Baron cried, starting up out of his sleep, 'Don't move, Champanbert; it is not worth while to interrupt your game.' He had hardly left us when the bells of the parish church began to ring. 'It is the tocsin,' I exclaimed. 'Then I suppose a fire has broken out somewhere,' Madame de Malpeire answered. 'It is a frequent occurrence here, where the houses are all built of wood and thatched with straw. On these fête days there is always the beginning of a conflagration somewhere or other, because in each cottage they light great fires for the frying with oil which goes on at a great rate on these occasions.' 'In that case,' I replied, 'we ought to see the flames from this window,' and I went to look out. It was as dark as possible, and the air felt heavy and sultry. It seemed as if a storm was gathering on the mountain. It was impossible to discern the position of the village, except by the mournful sound of the alarm bell, which fell on the ear with an ominous significancy. I could see nothing in the thick darkness, except a multitude of lights moving in the same direction. These were the pine-wood torches carried by the peasantry. They were evidently advancing towards the castle in great numbers, and I was watching this procession with some anxiety when the Baron rushed into the room with a gun in his hand, one of those heavy muskets formerly used in sieges. 'It is a regular sedition, an attack with armed force,' he said, with a mixture of self-possession and anger. 'There are four or five hundred of them yelling and hooting on the other side of the moat in front of the gate.' But what do they want, I wonder?' the Baronue said, without much distressing herself. 'Who knows,' he replied. 'Choiset went to the wicket to speak to them, but they only shouted more furiously, and instead of stating their grievances, if they have any, they kept screaming, 'The Abbat, the Abbat!' just as if we had kept him a prisoner. Some of them have guns, but the greater number are armed only with pickaxes and ploughshares. There is no danger of them taking us by storm. I am only afraid of one thing, which is that it should occur to them to surprise us on this side by the postern gate.' 'Would that be possible?' asked the Baronue, beginning to take the alarm. He nodded affirmatively, and exclaimed with an oath: 'But I undertake to defend that entrance. The first man that appears I shoot down as a dog, and in like manner as many as shall follow, one by one.' 'O my God, my God!' cried his wife, lifting up her hands, 'and my daughter?' 'You must bring her here,' the Baron replied. 'It is from the balcony of her room that I must watch the postern gate.' 'Have you any directions to give me?' I asked. 'Come with me,' he briefly replied.

'Madame de Malpeire took a candle, and we followed her along the passage which led to her daughter's room. 'She must be fast asleep,' she said, 'and her door is always locked inside, but I have my master-key in my pocket. I often go in for a moment to look at her sleeping.' She opened the door, and at a glance I took in the principal features of the room. The bed, which had no canopy, was covered with a white counterpane. A large woollen curtain was drawn before the window. Over the mantelpiece, which faced the door, there was an old looking-glass, and at its foot the little figure the Baron had found in his game-bag. At the same time I perceived that Mlle. de Malpeire was not in her apartment. 'She is not here!' exclaimed the Baronue. 'What on earth has become of her?'

'My blood ran cold at these words. I remembered the figure I had seen gliding under the window, the light step I had heard in the boudoir, the strange emotion I had felt, the threat implied in the words, which had been ringing in my ears for the last few hours, 'You shall soon know.' Then, like a flash of lightning, passed through my mind the thought of what the Baron had said of the cries of the mob clamoring for the Abbat. A cold sweat started on my brow. I felt paralyzed from head to foot, and whilst a hasty search was made all over the castle for Mlle. de Malpeire, I stood rooted to the spot, feeling a horrible certainty that I should never see her again. The Baron came back, looking as pale as death. 'Sh:

'has been carried off,' he said in a hoarse voice. 'We must rescue her, or die.' 'I follow you,' I cried, but with despair in my heart. The words had scarcely passed my lips when my eyes fell on a letter, which was lying on a table in a corner of the room. I pointed it out to Madame de Malpeire, who seized it and exclaimed, 'Read, Monsieur, read. It is my daughter's handwriting; it is directed to you.'

'The Baron opened the letter, and an appalling change came over his face. He read it to the end, gave it into my hand, staggered, and fell heavily on the floor. His wife knelt by him and called wildly for help. The servants came rushing in. By the time he recovered his senses I had read these words:

'Sir:—The moment has come when everything must be known, when the secrets of my heart must be revealed. I have given my love, I have pledged my hand to a man who, according to the ideas of the world, is not my equal. I love him because he possesses all the virtues of his humble condition, truthfulness, honesty, morality, and simplicity. I am not afraid of poverty with him; his hardy frame is inured to labor. He will share with me the bread earned by the sweat of his brow. If I fly with him to the honorable shelter of his virtuous parents' roof, it is because an odious tyrannical despotism has driven me to this extremity. It is to escape the horrible misery of being forced into a marriage I abhor. On that account I claimed his protection and placed myself under his care. Do not think that you can drag me from the refuge I have chosen. Thousands of strong arms and brave hearts will encircle the peasant's bride, and save the noble's daughter from the tyranny which would constrain her to wed a man she does not love. If you would save my honor, if you would secure for the child you once called your own, though now you may curse and disown her, an unblemished name, send me your written consent to my marriage with Francis Pinatel, that I may become in the eyes of the world the lawful wife of the man with whom I have not feared to fly in the dead of night, to whom I shall have pledged my faith in the presence of a multitude, and whom I will never forsake in life or in death. I cannot expect that you, sir, and my poor mother will forgive me now, but the day will come when you will do so.'

'The Baron turned towards me with a calmness more fearful than the most violent burst of passion, and said, 'She must marry that man. I shall send my written consent, and when that paper is signed and gone, then I shall be childless, and forget that I ever had a daughter.' After a pause he added, in a tone which even at this distance of time I cannot call to mind without shuddering, 'Cursed be the day when she was born. Cursed be the day when God in His anger raised her from amongst the dead! Accursed be her life in this world and in the—' 'O, do not say in the next,' cried the wretched mother, putting her hand over his mouth. She too had read the letter, and wringing her hands, she kept repeating, 'My girl is mad; my poor girl is gone out of her mind.'

'What a terrible night we went through! Everything in me seemed crushed and annihilated. Transports of rage shook me to pieces at one moment, and vague feelings of remorse and pity tortured me the next. The Baron, unable to endure the cries of his wife, who was falling every moment into hysterics, followed me to my room. His grief was gloomy and silent. He walked up and down the room in a restless manner, and sometimes went to the window, as if to breathe. Every noise outside the castle had subsided; evidently the popular excitement was allayed by some unexpected circumstance.

The peasants were no longer clamoring before the entrance gate.

'Between twelve and one o'clock Choiset came into the room, and said, with tears in his eyes, 'Forgive me, Monsieur le Baron, if I venture to disturb you, but Madame la Baronne has had a long fainting fit. We were almost afraid she would die, but now she is a little better and has gone into her room. She asks to see you and Monsieur le Comte.'

'We went down stairs together. As soon as she saw us, Madame de Malpeire threw herself on her knees before her husband, and in a voice broken by sobs cried out, 'Monsieur, I cannot, I will not abandon her. You must take pity on that poor, deluded child. You must let me go to her; it is my duty, it is my right. I must save her from that horrible wretch. She will soon repent of her fault; then I shall hide her in some convent, and shut myself up with her. Religion bids us be merciful. It teaches us that the greatest offences can be expiated by repentance.'

'Repentance can win forgiveness at God's hands,' the Baron replied, 'but it cannot wipe away shame. Our name and our house cannot brook disgrace.'

'Long and vainly the poor woman pleaded in accents of vehement grief, which thrilled through my own bruised and miserable heart. The Baron continued unmoved. 'Nothing,' he said, 'can efface this shame or redeem the past. There is no option, no possible course but one. The unfortunate girl has chosen her lot and she must abide by it. She must marry the man she has eloped with, and be to us as if she had never existed.'

'Thus we passed the night, and the dawning light found us sitting together in the same place, pale, heart-broken, utterly wretched. Early in the morning the Baron wrote and sent his consent to his daughter's marriage. As she was not yet of age it could not otherwise have taken place.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE EMIGRES.

THE violent agitation I had gone through, and the struggles I had made not to give way to the excess of my grief before Mlle. de Malpeire's parents, brought on a state of physical suffering and mental prostration which occasioned great anxiety to those about me, and gave them reason to apprehend that I was seriously ill. Alarming symptoms soon showed themselves, and on the following day the doctor pronounced me to be at death's door. I have preserved only a confused recollection of what took place whilst I was lying in bed with a burning fever and often light-headed. The only thing I distinctly recollect is being haunted by the same continued hallucination. I kept fancying myself a child who had just died, and that I was placed in a coffin and carried along accompanied by funeral chants. The procession stopped at the Pass of Malpeire, and then I opened my eyes, lifted up my shroud, and gazed on the blue sky. This feeling of being dead and coming to life again was constantly re-occurring in my excited imagination, and I passed alternately from a state of physical prostration to one of violent excitement. At last, however, nature triumphed. I sat up one day, looked about me, and saw a woman sitting by my bed-side. It was Madame de Malpeire, but I did not know her again at first, for she wore neither patches or rouge. She had never left me day or night, and certainly I owed my life, under God, to the devoted care of her husband and herself. My illness had lasted six weeks, and the doctor, who came from D—, had often declared that he did not expect me to live through the night. The doctor was a sharp, clever little old man. He had not been deceived as to the cause of my illness, and as soon as he perceived that I was beginning to recover consciousness and memory, he said to me before Madame de Malpeire, 'The air of these mountains is too keen for my patient. Moreover, we must bear in mind that the winter here lasts for eight months consecutively, and that it is likely the snow will soon begin to fall and to make the roads impassable. My opinion is, that M. de Champeaubert ought at once to set off. Though he is very weak, I am not afraid of the journey for him. If he cannot ride, nothing will be easier than to carry him in a litter.' I moved in a restless manner, and moaned. The effort I had made to sit up had been too much for my feeble strength, and my thoughts began to wander again. 'Yes, doctor,' I murmured, 'you will come with me. We shall rest on the snow at the Pass of Malpeire, and you will leave me there.' 'No, no; we shall go on further,' he hastened to reply. 'You will go to your father, who is expecting you.' 'My father!' I said, suddenly struck with a new thought. 'Does he know that I am ill? Has he written?' Madame de Malpeire looked anxiously at the doctor, as if uncertain what answer to give. 'Tell him everything, madame,' he replied. 'Speak to him of the letter M. le Baron has received.' 'A few lines only,' she said, bending over me. 'A few lines written by your father himself. He is quite well and in a place of safety; but terrible things have happened.' The Baron came in at that moment and it was he who gave me an account of the horrible days, the 5th and 6th of October. My father had taken part in all that then took place. After accompanying the royal family of Paris, subsequently to their unhappy attempt at flight, he had gone home only a few hours, and on the following day went into voluntary exile. He had emigrated, and it was at Turin he was expecting me to join him.

"The doctor hoped that these terrible tidings would serve to divert the current of my thoughts from the one besetting idea which was destroying me. And it did so happen that the shock which this intelligence gave me turned away my attention from my own sufferings, and gave me a sudden energy. I raised myself a little in the bed, and, leaning my elbow on the pillow, listened to the accounts in the public papers, which the Baron had received at the same time as my father's letter, and which he read aloud to me. The description of the horrible scenes of which they gave the details absorbed all my attention, and for a quarter of an hour I forgot where I was, and the havoc which my unfortunate passion had made in my whole being. I forgot Mlle. de Malpeire. But before the Baron had finished reading, my eyes unfortunately fell on a little green branch, the leaves of which showed themselves against one of the window-panes. It was a sprig of periwinkle that Mlle. de Malpeire had stuck into her sash one afternoon, and which I had taken possession of when she threw it away, faded and broken, into a corner of the dining-room. The poor slip had taken root, and its light green leaves were beginning to rise above the edge of the flower-pot in which I had placed it, like some rare plant. Instantly, my throbbing head fell back on the pillow, and I sank into a bitter train of thought. The Baron read on, but it was no longer what I heard which made my blood boil with indignation or filled my eyes with tears. The old doctor perceived this sudden change, and said in a decided manner, 'Well, sir, we must be off to-morrow.'

"That same evening, Madame de Malpeire was sitting alone by my bedside. I hardly know with what kind of expression I looked at her, as I thought of one whose name I could not utter, but the poor woman burst into tears, and said, in a low voice, 'I mourn over her as if she were dead.' No other explanation took place between us. The wound in my heart was so sore and so deep that I was afraid of increasing my sufferings by touching upon it. I felt that there were things I could not hear mentioned and live.

"At about twelve o'clock that night, the Baron and his wife withdrew, after having affectionately squeezed my hand. Mlle. Boinet lingered for a moment in my room, and wished me good-night with a sorrowful expression, not at all usual to her. 'Good-night,' I said, 'du revoir tomorrow.' She put her handkerchief to her eyes, and went out without speaking. I remained alone with the maid-servant, who was to sit up with me that night. Hitherto the Baron had slept in my room, not choosing to rely on any one but himself for the minute watching my dangerous illness required. The stout, good-natured girl established herself close to my bedside, with her hands folded under her handkerchief. As I did not fall to sleep immediately, she began in her patois a sort of unintelligible soliloquy. I gathered from it, however, that she was lamenting over my departure and that of her master and mistress. The monotonous sound of her voice ended by lulling me to rest. My weary, burning eyes at last closed themselves, and for the first time I slept soundly for several consecutive hours.

"When I awoke the following morning it was broad daylight and the exhilarating rays of the rising sun made their way into every part of my room, the doors and windows of which were wide open. The doctor was already, standing by the side of my bed. 'Come, come,' he said, in a cheerful manner, 'you are much better. We must take advantage of this beautiful day, and start in an hour.' I suffered myself to be dressed as a child, and leaning on the arm of this kind man I tried to walk a few steps, but I was so weak I could not get as far as the door. 'Never mind,' he said, encouragingly, as he led me back to my arm-chair. 'I have ordered a good litter to be got ready, with thick curtains, and you will be very comfortable. It is at the bottom of the stairs. If you cannot walk, we shall carry you down.' 'I must first take leave of the Baron and Madame de Malpeire,' I said, with a choking sensation in my throat. He answered, 'They have spared you the pain of that parting. It would have been an additional trial, which you are not in a state to bear. For several days everything has been prepared for their departure. They only waited till you could be pronounced out of danger, and this very night they have left the castle.' 'For any long time?' I asked, quite startled at this information. 'Most likely for ever,' he sadly replied. 'They emigrate.'

"I was carried down to the litter almost fainting, and allowed myself to be conveyed away without asking where I was going, without casting one look behind me. The doctor accompanied me on horseback. When we arrived at the Pass of Malpeire he dismounted and opened the curtains of my litter. The open air had revived me. I raised my head and gazed on the melancholy view. The lengthening shadows of the rock had already reached the confines of the gorge. The torrent was brawling in its deep bed, and the yellow autumnal leaves strewing the path. A little bird hopped on the stone where Mlle. de Malpeire's coffin had rested, and its joyful twitter mingled with the roaring noise of the imprisoned waters. I hid my face in my hands with a low moan. The doctor bent over me and anxiously inquired how I felt. I pressed his hand, which had taken hold of mine, and made a sign to him to close the curtains. The sight of that place made me feel faint and giddy. My head reeled, and I was seized with a wild desire to throw myself into the abyss and end my life beneath the cold waves of that foaming stream. This sort of delirium ceased as we began to descend the mountain on the other side, when I felt the softer air blowing in my face, and the southern sun warming my benumbed limbs. It was thus I departed from a spot where, in a short space of time, I had enjoyed the most transporting dream of happiness and suffered the most severe pangs that the human heart can undergo.

"Eight days afterwards I arrived at Turin, where I found my father. The doctor, who had accompanied me so far, was then obliged at once to return to the little town where he lived. The separation affected me, for I had become attached to him as to a friend whose skill and penetration had been the means of saving my life. Another absurd, strange feeling, which I would hardly acknowledge to myself, made me also regret his departure. He knew Mlle. de Malpeire; he could have talked to me of her. Just before he went away I had a weak return of passionate tenderness, and taking him apart, I said, in a faltering voice: 'Who knows what is the fate of that unhappy girl? I implore you to make some inquiries about her. Perhaps she may have changed her mind at the last moment, and left that man. What, in that case, would become of her? Her parents have disowned and cast her off. There would be no one to lend her a helping hand, should she wish to retrace her steps. This thought makes me miserable. I would give my life to save her—to take her away from that man.' The doctor looked at me with a compassionate expression of countenance, and said briefly: 'Believe me—forget her. It is unhappy; she has the fate she chose for herself.'

"My father did not put any questions to me, and I said nothing to him. By a kind of tacit agreement we avoided every allusion to the fatal project of marriage which took me to the Castle de Malpeire and to the time I spent there. Once, however, my father broke through that silence. It was at the end of the year 1792. We had just arrived at Ostend, where a great number of émigrés were preparing, like me, to cross over to England, but I did not seek them out, and whilst my father went to visit some old friends I remained alone at the hotel. I remember that the day was closing in, and the intensely melancholy feeling with which I watched the snowflakes slowly falling and whitening the roofs of the neighboring houses, the high-pointed gables of which stood out in dark relief against the pale gray sky. My father came in with a sorrowful countenance, and seated himself by the fire without speaking. This made me feel anxious, for at that time life was made up of incessant fears, and the event generally more than justified the worst apprehensions. 'Any news from France?' I asked, trembling at what the answer might be. My father shook his head, and with a manner of great depression said: 'I have just heard of the death of an old friend. You know him, Maximin, and although it was under very painful circumstances that your intimacy ended, I am sure you will feel his death very much.' 'You mean that the Baron de Malpeire is dead,' I exclaimed. 'Yes, he was carried off suddenly within the last few days,' my father answered. 'He had been living here some time in a state bordering on destitution.' 'And Madame de Malpeire?' I asked. 'Was she with him? Have you seen her?' He shook his head sadly. 'What, is she, too, dead?' I cried. 'She died a good while ago of a broken heart, I think,' my father said in a low voice. 'The Baron had no one with him in his last moments except a poor servant of his wife's, who had latterly supported him by her work. When I heard all this I tried to find her out. I should have liked to have done something for that faithful creature, but she is gone; she went back to France.'

'We sat on some time in silence. At last I said to my father—'And Mlle. de Malpeire—do you know what has become of her?' He hesitated for a moment, and then replied in a way that seemed intended to stop any farther questions, 'the family of Malpeire is now quite extinct.'

'From that day to this I never uttered again Mlle. de Malpeire's name and my father may have thought that I had forgotten her, but it was not so. The remembrance of that first and only affection dwelt in my heart through all the years of my youth, and, I am almost ashamed to add, even in a more advanced period of life, stood in the way of my marrying. And now I cannot look at that picture without emotion. The sight of it makes my poor old heart thrill as it used to do years ago. The brightest and the most terrible days I have known rise again before me.'

CHAPTER IX.

THE HOME OF THE PINATELS.

M. de Champaubert leant his elbow on the table, sighed deeply, and pouring out a glass of sherry, drank it off. My uncle, who had with difficulty followed all these romantic metaphysics, ejaculated, "You were really very unfortunate in your first love." As to me, my heart was bursting with indignation. I could not take my eyes off Mlle. de Malpeire's picture, and when the Marquis had finished his story I murmured, with a kind of scornful rage, "That Abbat she was so fond of must be by this time a horrid wrinkled old peasant, bent half-double, I daresay, and dressed in tattered clothes. I should like to see him now."

Whilst M. de Champaubert had been speaking Babelou had looked in at the door more than once. When his narrative came to an end she glided into the room, and going up to the back of my uncle's arm-chair, she whispered in his ear that M. le Curé was come, and asked for a bed, as he was in the habit of doing now and then.

"By all means," cried Dom Gêrusac; "he is most welcome. Where is he?"

"In the kitchen drying his cassock." Babelou replied,

"There was a heavy shower just now, and it soaked through and through."

The rain was indeed streaming down the window panes, and the temperature in the house had become sensibly colder.

"Throw some fagots on the fire," Dom Gêrusac said; "we are freezing here. And get us some coffee; you know M. le Curé likes it very hot."

"My dear Marquis," he added, "you will let me introduce to you the Abbé Lambert, a worthy priest, who has been for fifteen years Curé of Malpeire."

"I shall be very glad to make his acquaintance," the Marquis eagerly answered. And whilst my uncle went to look after his new guest, he said to me, "M. le Curé must, I think, know something as to the fate of the family of Malpeire. He must have heard people talk about them and their misfortunes. Have you ever asked any questions on the subject?"

"Yes, I have, monseigneur," I answered, getting very red, "but he seemed to know nothing about it. Perhaps it was out of a feeling of charity, and because he wished people to forget Mlle. de Malpeire's disgraceful history."

The Abbé Lambert came in with my uncle. His old cassock was still very damp, and the marks which his heavy shoes left on the floor showed that he had been trudging on foot in roads full of clayey mud. But he was in nowise ashamed of his poor appearance, and it was in a manner equally free from embarrassment or familiarity that he returned the greeting of our distinguished guest, who received the old village priest with as much respect as if he had been a dignitary of the Church, made way for him by his side close to the fire, and stirred up the blaze of the fagots, in order that the poor worn-out cassock might be effectually dried.

"My dear Curé, I am delighted that your flock is scattered over these mountains and valleys," said Dom Gêrusac with a smile. We should not have had the pleasure of seeing you to-night if you had not some parishioners to visit in this neighborhood."

"Yes, indeed," he replied, with somewhat of sadness in his tone. "It is a case requiring my ministry that brought me here to-night—a pressing sick call,—and I was afraid of being too late. It is a long walk from Malpeire to here, and in this stormy weather the torrents may swell at any moment so as to impede the way."

"After the Abbé Lambert had dried his clothes and drank a cup of coffee, M. le Champaubert began discreetly to sound him as to the time of his arrival in those parts, and the reports he might have happened to hear concerning the former lords of the soil. The Abbé Lambert seemed aware of the interest which prompted M. le Champaubert to make these inquiries, and he spared him the necessity of more direct questioning by saying, in a grave, sad voice:

"When I came here, about sixteen years ago, the family of Malpeire was almost forgotten. Even the melancholy event which preceded their departure was hardly alluded to."

"But you know of it!" exclaimed the Marquis. "You had heard of the only daughter of the late Baron, Mlle. de Malpeire?"

The old priest raised his eyes and hands to heaven, and said, in an earnest and impressive manner, "May God have mercy on the soul of that poor woman! And you must also forgive her; she has atoned for her guilt by severe sufferings—"

"You have been yourself acquainted with Mlle. de Malpeire," interrupted M. de Champaubert, greatly agitated; "you can tell me what has been the end of her unhappy life."

"It is a shocking history," murmured the Abbé Lambert, shaking his head, as if beginning to hesitate about recalling that painful remembrance. But the Marquis would take no denial, and he then said, "I little thought where and in what company I should relate the history of that poor sinner. God, in his mysterious providence, has, I suppose, thus ordained it." He paused for a moment or two, and then went on:

"At the time of Mlle. de Malpeire's elopement, I was Curé of St. C——, a little village of Provence, in the diocese of Aix. François Pinatel's family lived in that place. He went by the name of the Abbat, because in all the village fêtes he was leader or prince of the young men. The Pinatels belonged to that old race of peasantry which for three or four hundred years have been in possession from father to son of a piece of ground of their own, and cultivated it themselves. The mother, an honest, hard-working woman, with a sharp eye after profits and gain, managed the household. She married her eldest son to a girl who had for her portion a plot of ground worth about a thousand crowns, and she lived in very comfortable terms with her daughter-in-law. She came one day to tell me the news of her second son's marriage with Mlle. de Malpeire. The widow Pinatel was by no means dazzled by the noble alliance. 'Everything is not gold that glitters,' she said. 'Not a word had been breathed about a marriage portion; and as the parents will not see or speak to the girl, it is most likely they will disinherit her. It is not in any way a marriage that snits us. What shall we do at home with this fine young lady? Does she think we are going to be her humble servants? I can tell her it will be no such thing. And what a figure she will look amongst us in her smart gowns? They will laugh at us in the village, and I shall be almost ashamed of being seen with her. For my part, I have no opinion of those handsome women. They are always thinking of their faces and their dress. There is not a bit of use in them. I am certain my eldest son, when he comes home, will be out of sorts about this marriage. But it is of no good talking. François brought her to the farm, and there was nothing for it but to get them married. But I wish with all my heart—that I do—that this mademoiselle had never darkened our doors.' I did all I could to make her look on her son's marriage in a different light, and to persuade her to welcome with a more Christian spirit the young stranger who had become a member of her family. But though a good woman as the world goes, Madame Pinatel had none of the religious principles which would have made her susceptible of the sort of feelings I tried to instil into her, and all my efforts were useless.

"Just at that time I was summoned to Aix by the Bishop for a work which had been begun the year before, and which he wished me to finish under his eyes. I was absent from my parish about two months, and it was near Christmas when I came home. I arrived late one evening, having walked part of the way, and as a cold, drizzling rain was beginning to fall, I hastened towards the dwelling-place of the Pinatels, which stood on the roadside, about a mile from the village. Their house was a large, ill-constructed building, the walls of which had never been plastered. Properly speaking, it had neither sides or front. The windows seemed to have been made here and there without any definite plan, and were without panes or blinds. The entrance door opened upon a sort of yard, encumbered with rubbish, piles of brushwood, and heaps of manure. There was not a tree about the house, or the least appearance of a garden. In summer a burning sun turned the outside of this habitation into a furnace, and in the winter the icy mistral blew in unopposed through the rotten boards of the old outside shutters. It was very dark, and as I was crossing the yard, feeling my way with a stick, I heard somebody before me exclaiming: 'François, is that you at last?' I advanced and named myself, upon which the person who had spoken turned abruptly round towards the house and disappeared. I pushed open the door, which stood ajar, and, passing through the stable, entered the room where the family usually sat. It was a tolerably long apartment, but so dark and smoky that at first it was difficult to discern anything in it. The widow Pinatel's bed was in one corner, screened from sight by curtains of yellow serge. Her great wooden cupboard—always carefully locked up—stood opposite to three or four shelves, upon which the crockery and the saucepans were placed in grand array. The wall was adorned with the pewter dishes won by the Abbat, and some of the household provisions were always hanging against it.

"When I walked in, the family was sitting round a table upon which was lying a large heap of wheat. The grains were being sifted one by one for the purpose of removing the mildew, which is apt to spoil the flour. This occupation was carried on by the dim light of a snuffly lamp, and they all applied themselves, to the ant-like labor with extraordinary activity. When I appeared, Madame Pinatel got up and said, 'O dear, you have had to cross the stable without a light, M. le Curé. We never heard you coming. You found the door opened, then?' 'There was somebody in the yard,' I replied; 'I think it was your new daughter-in-law looking out for her husband.' 'The widow shrugged her shoulders, and the eldest son muttered between his teeth, 'In that case she is likely to spend the night out of doors.' 'Is François gone up to the mountain?' I asked, thinking it possible that he might have been to Malpeire, where great damage had been done after the Baron's departure. 'What business would he have there replied the widow; 'he is gone in another direction. You see, M. le Curé, he is a lad that can never stay long together at home. He is gone to amuse himself at the fair at Apt.' I sat down in the post of honor, under the projecting chimney-piece. Two small logs were slowly burning on the hearth, and though the hour of supper was past, an enormous iron pot was still simmering amidst the ashes. The The Provençal peasants' idea of politeness is to take upon themselves the whole burden of conversation, so that the visitors should not be at the trouble of answering. The eldest Pinatel accordingly began to descant upon the drought, which had been unfavorable for the sowing, and on the extraordinary size of two fat pigs which he had sold at the last fair at St. C——. Whilst he was giving me every kind of detail on the subject, his young sister-in-law silently slipped into the room and seated herself in the corner of the chimney opposite to me; her clothes were wet, and she was shivering with cold. 'Do not leave, another time, the door open when you go out in the evening, daughter-in-law,' the widow Pinatel said to her in a sharp tone of voice. 'How can I come in again if I shut it behind me?' she replied with a scowl on her face. No one took any further notice of her. The eldest son went on with his account of the sale of pigs. The other brothers had also their say in the matter, and an animated discussion arose as to the size and weight of the animals. In the meantime I was looking at the young wife with a mixture of curiosity and compassion. She was dressed like Madame Pinatel, in a brown drugged petticoat, and her cap of printed calico tied under her chin entirely concealed her hair. The white smoothness of her face was so remarkable that it almost seemed made of marble. She made up the fire a little, shivering all the time in her wet clothes, and holding her head down, as if afraid that I should speak to her. Seeing this was the case, I did not say a word, and even took care not to look at her any more. But I threw into the hearth some logs that were lying near me, and moved aside the iron pot that she might put her feet on the ashes. When she had warmed herself, she leant back against the wall with her arms crossed over her chest, and closed her eyes like a person who dozes overpowered by fatigue. The rain continued to fall, and I staid on till late in the evening. During all that time the young woman never moved, or opened her eyes. At last, just as I was going away, thinking that the bad weather would last all the night, somebody whistled in the yard, and the house-dog ran to the door wagging his tail. 'It is François!' exclaimed the young woman starting up and rushing to meet her husband.

"The others did not move. The widow Pinatel, casting a glance at the place her daughter-in-law had just left, muttered, 'I only hope she has kept the soup warm.'

"A moment afterwards the Abbat came in, and throwing his stick and heavy woollen cloak into a corner, said in a cheery manner, 'Good evening to you all. M. le Curé, how do you do?—and you, mother, is all right with you?' 'Well, I suppose one must always say yes to that,' she answered; 'and you, son, how do you feel yourself?' 'Why, not amiss as times go,' he cried, and then, patting his stomach, added with a loud laugh, 'but I daresay better soon.' 'You have had no supper?'

asked his mother; 'then come and sit down here.' She made room for him by her side at the table, and turning to his wife, said, 'Come, daughter-in-law, get your husband's supper.' The young woman did as she was bid, and fetched a large loaf of brown bread, and a basinful of soup with vegetables. Unfortunately, the soup was cold, which made the Abbat cross and the widow angry. 'My gracious!' she exclaimed, 'what have you been about? It really is enough to make one laugh to see a person of your age who cannot learn to keep a pot boiling on the fire. It is lucky that everybody is not so helpless as you,' she added, glancing approvingly at her favorite daughter-in-law. 'When my eldest son comes home, he always finds his wife hard at work, and something hot and snug by the fire for his supper. If you want to be a good housewife you had better learn a lesson from your sister-in-law.'

'As long as François does not complain, you have no business to find fault with me,' she answered in an arrogant tone. I hastened to say that it was my fault if the Abbat's supper was cold; that I had meddled with the saucepan. 'François will excuse it,' I added; 'I shall not be so stupid another time.' 'There is nothing to be angry about,' he said to the two women; 'the soup is very well as it is. So all is for the best; let us hear no more about it. Do you know that the fair turned out a poor concern after all? There were neither buyer or sellers, and not a creature with so much as a piece of five francs in his pocket. And then the weather turned cold yesterday. Snow fell on the Luberon, and I had to come back through roads where a dog would not like to travel. I was ankle deep in mud all the time, and my feet are like icicles.' 'Make haste then and put some hot ashes in your shoes,' the widow Pinatel cried; 'there is nothing like it to prevent a chill.'

'Here, wife,' the Abbat said, taking off his thick hob-nailed shoes, the leather of which was covered with a thick coating of frozen mud; 'take my shoes and manage it for me.' She scraped off the mud without saying a word, put in each shoe a shovelful of ashes, and brought them back to her husband.

'Seeing her so humbled and so cruelly punished for her fault, I could not but hope that she would have recourse to those religious consolations which alone could support and strengthen her amidst the many trials which must necessarily await her, and I went away praying and trusting that her soul would turn to God, and seek peace in His love and service.'

CHAPTER X.

THE FARM AND THE FAIR.

'On the Sunday which followed my visit to the Pinatels, François' wife did not make her appearance at church, nor did she go to her duties at Christmas. The Pinatels were certainly by no means fervent Christians, but still the family were tolerably regular in their attendance at church. I asked the widow why her daughter-in-law did not come with her, and what she was doing at home. 'Nothing, as usual,' the woman answered. 'There she sits at the corner of the chimney, with her arms crossed and her feet in the ashes. If her petticoats happened to catch fire, I don't believe, heaven forgive me, that she would stretch out her hand to put it out.'

'I was in the habit of visiting the different families in my parish once or twice a month, according to what I supposed to be their need of spiritual advice or consolation, and only under exceptional circumstances broke through this rule. A fortnight therefore elapsed before I went again to the Pinatels. This time I found the young woman alone. She was sitting in the sun near the door of the house, her peasant's hat overshadowing her eyes, so that she only saw me when I was within a few steps of her. She seemed disagreeably surprised, and starting up suddenly, said in Provencal. 'There is nobody at home. They have all been out in the fields since morning.' I answered in French, 'I am not in your way, I will sit down and rest a little while.' She had probably fancied that I knew nothing of her former position, for she blushed and seemed surprised that I did not speak to her in the dialect of the country, as I did to the other members of the family. But she soon recovered her self-possession, and with the air and manner she would have had in her mother's drawing-room, she said, 'Will you do me the honor to walk into the house?' I thanked her, but declined; and we remained seated on the bench outside.

'The weather happened to be wonderfully mild for the time of year. The birds hopped joyously amongst the bushes, and the little snowdrops were beginning to peep out in the sheltered spots under the hedges. 'What a beautiful day it is!' I said to the pale, stern young creature by my side. 'I always think this bright sunshine is like a look of love—the love of a merciful God—on the works of His hand. The most deeply afflicted soul ought to be cheered by those benignant rays, which seem to give new life to all creation. We feel that God is our Father, and that he watches over us.' She did not answer, but looked at me in that sneering, offensive way which persons who have no religion always put on with priests when they endeavor to suggest to them thoughts of faith, gratitude, and love of God. I had often met with this sort of contemptuous treatment at the hands of men imbued with the prejudices of philosophical intolerance, and I had sometimes been insulted by impious boasters who gloried in abusing the habit I wear, but the hostile, unfriendly manner of this young woman took me painfully by surprise. I went on to speak of the great consolations which the practice of Christian duties afford, but my words had an effect quite contrary to what I intended. They provoked an outburst I little expected, and which revealed opinions I could never have imagined to exist in a person of her age and sex. She began at once to argue, or rather to hold forth, explaining her views, and calling into question the teachings, not only of the Church, but of the Holy Scriptures. I was amazed at discovering in so young a woman such false and presumptuous ideas, such obstinacy in error, and a sort of impassioned scepticism. She had a mind at once arrogant and disputatious, which was easily worked up to excitement, and a heart which nothing seemed to soften and touch. There was not an atom in her of what the world calls tenderness and sensibility, but she possessed an impetuous imagination, full of false enthusiasm. As I sat listening to her, I could perfectly understand how her unbridled passions had misled her from one folly and one fault to another, into her present miserable position. I was young myself at that time, and had not yet learnt to fathom the fearful depths of the human conscience. I was so shocked at the state of that unhappy soul that I began silently to pray for her with all my heart, and to beseech our blessed Lord to dispel by a miracle of grace her miserable pride. Whilst I was thus pouring forth secret supplications to the divine mercy for her, the young woman, who fancied she had humbled and silenced me, said in a light tone, 'There is an end of the argument. Let us talk of something else.' I knew that I could give her some useful advice with regard to her position and the line of conduct she would do well to follow with regard to her husband's relations, but she did not let me finish what I had to say. 'I know very well what I have to expect,' she interrupted. 'These people detest me, and nothing will ever alter their feelings towards me: I must own, that if they hate me, I hate them just as much. We must, however, put up with one another on both sides till the widow Pinatel can pay her son the sum that is due to him from his father's inheritance. It is only thirty louis; but with that we shall be able to hire and stock a small farm, which we shall manage ourselves. My husband has been already looking out for something of the kind, and has heard of a place that would just suit us. It is property belonging to an émigré, so it will be long before the owner comes back. The worst of it is that we must wait till next Michaelmas, almost a whole year. But never mind; I must have patience.' This plan appeared to me very questionable, and I ventured to observe that it would be difficult to make it answer. 'You are not used to work,' I said; 'and in spite of all your energy and good will, it will be hardly possible for you to accustom yourself to a life of so much labor and fatigue. Moreover, your husband will not be perhaps as much of a help to you as you fancy. He has never followed the plough or handled the spade like his brothers.' 'You may as well speak plainly,' she replied, very composedly. 'He is an idle fellow; and not only idle, but also addicted to drinking and gambling. I know his character very well. It was all his mother's fault. She has suffered him from his boyhood to haunt the fairs and markets, where he associates with horse-dealers and gipsies, and all sorts of vicious and profligate people. Even since we have been married she tolerates, and even seems to approve of, his frequent absences from home. She even goes so far as to help him to find excuses for getting away from me. When we have a farm of our own he will not be able to wander about the country. I shall manage to keep him at home then. He will leave off loitering in the public-houses; he will lead a quiet, industrious life, the appointed lot of man on earth, and fulfil all the duties of a good citizen and the head of a family.'

"Christian charity compelled me to hold my tongue; but any one the least acquainted with François Pinatel must have been aware that he would never be able to earn his livelihood by agricultural labor, and that he was only capable of exertion when he had occasion to display his extraordinary strength. He had none of the qualities requisite for a farmer—patience, perseverance, shrewdness, circumspection, activity, and, above all, strict economy. He was a thick-skulled, good-hearted, merry wight, easily led astray, and subject to sudden outbursts of passion. In spite of all his defects, he had always been his mother's favorite child, and she perfectly knew his character. With great prudence she had taken care not to make over to him his share of the paternal inheritance; but, on the other hand, when this her prodigal son came home, his piece of bread and basin of soup were always forthcoming.

"It would have been vain to try and explain to the young wife the sort of tutelage her husband required, and which she would never herself be able to exercise. I therefore only begged her not to undertake anything without her mother-in-law's advice, and withdrew with the sad consciousness that I had not succeeded either in enlightening her as to the perils of her immortal soul, or even as to the questions relating to her temporal interests.

"A few days afterwards I left St. C——, Monseigneur d'Aix having appointed me to other functions. My flock thus passed under the spiritual care of another curé. The most disastrous days of the revolution were then at hand; the Church was threatened with an impending schism, and the priests who refused to adhere to the civil constitution of the clergy with persecution. During several months I went from place to place in the diocese, enlightening the undecided, and strengthening the courage of the weak. Towards the end of my circuit I came to S——, a small town about five miles from St. C——. It was then about the beginning of October, and nearly a year since I had left my parish. I arrived on the eve of the fair, which is one of the principal ones in that part of the country, and the occasion of a great concourse of people. It is a market as well as a fair, and on the last three days a festival. Opportunities of temptation and ruin are never wanting at gatherings like these. Gambling goes on at a frightful rate, high stakes are played for, and important affairs transacted. The kind of people who live by cheating their neighbors flock there in numbers.

"The next morning as I was coming out of the vicarage where I lodged, I met the Abbat. He was dressed in a new suit of clothes, and was going towards the site of the fair, with a bustling consequential air and manner. I went up to him to inquire after his relations. He answered, 'They were all well when I came away. My mother is just the same as ever; straight as an arrow, and as active as a girl of fifteen. My wife also is pretty well, though she looks thinish.' 'Are you here alone?' I asked. 'My eldest brother was coming with me, but he could not manage to get away,' he replied. 'You must know, M. le Curé, that my hands are pretty full of business just now. I have taken a farm of three hundred perches of land in one lot. It is no small affair, I can tell you, to cultivate such a property as that. I have already engaged a man to drive the oxen, a shepherd and a ploughman; and now I am going to buy a pair of oxen, a horse, and a hundred of sheep. And then we must have corn to last us till the next harvest.' 'All that will cost you a good round sum,' I said. He tapped his leathern belt, making the money within it jingle, and, lowering his voice, said, 'I have seven hundred francs here, which my mother brought me in her apron just as I was coming away.' Thereupon we parted, and went our different ways. About an hour after, as I was crossing the market-place, I saw him going into a sort of café where well-to-do farmers, rich horse-dealers, and most of those who come to the fair, with well-filled purses, were wont to congregate. I knew that gambling went on there, and that the stakes were very high; but it never entered my mind that François Pinatel would adventure himself in such society, or be tempted to play at vendôme, a ruinous game of hazard. He was in the habit of keeping with the younger men, and I thought as soon as he had transacted his business he would be sure to go and wrestle with them or shoot at the target.

"In the afternoon I went into the olive groves to say my Office, and it was late before I returned from my walk. As I was coming back into the town I met the Abbat without his hat, which in the case of a peasant is a sign of the greatest agitation of mind. He was walking to and fro, heedless of the passengers, whom he elbowed without mercy. As soon as I appeared, he rushed up to me and said, 'M. le Curé, can you lend me a piece of six francs?' 'I have only one of these francs,' I replied. 'It is very much at your service: but in the first place you must tell me what has happened;' and taking him by the arm I forcibly drew him away from the crowd to a quiet spot where nobody could overhear us. He uttered himself to me like a child, and would not answer at first any of the questions I put to him; but suddenly rousing himself, he told me with a volley of oaths, intermingled with bursts of grief, that he had lost at play every penny he possessed. It was not the time for reproaches, or for trying to move him to repentance; all I could do was to try and soften his despair. But he had one of those excitable, unreasoning natures which must give full vent to their violence before it can subside. He kept repeating over and over again, 'My mother! O, what will my mother say? I had rather die than go home. I am not afraid of death. It is so easy to throw one's self into a well.' I shuddered at the thought that if left to himself he might commit such a crime and that neither the sense of God's justice nor the fear of eternal punishment would be sufficient to restrain him from self-destruction. In the midst of his bursts of passion he had moments of weakness, when he would sit down, and hiding his face in his hands, moan and weep like a woman. I took advantage of one of those intervals to say to him in an authoritative manner, 'Now, my dear Pinatel, there is only one thing to do. You must go back at once to St. C——, an , relying on your mother's kindness, own to her what has happened.' 'No, no,' he exclaimed; 'I tell you I never will show my face at home. I will go away, and nobody shall ever hear of me again.' 'Get up,' I said; 'get up at once and come. I shall go with you.' By degrees his resals became less positive, and at last he yielded and we started.

"I tried as we went along to make him feel how wanting he had hitherto been in his duties to God and to his family, and spoke of the way in which he might in future make amends for his faults. He listened with deference to my observations, but I cannot say that I had the consolation of hearing at that time from his lips one word of real repentance. He soon calmed down, however, and his natural recklessness and levity got in some measure the better of his grief. Before we were half way to St. C——, he had recovered sufficient composure to enable him to give a detailed account of the misfortune that had befallen him. 'I will tell you the real truth,' he said with a sigh. 'I wanted to buy a gold chain for my wife. That was the cause of it all. A gold chain costs, you see, about sixty francs. When my eldest brother married he gave his wife a chain. I was vexed that I had not been able to make the same present to my wife. The fact is, that my mother would not listen to reason about it; not that she is partial to my elder brother—God forbid that I should say such an untruth—but she takes things into her head, you see. And three women in a house are just like three nuts in a bag. Now my sister-in-law is jealous of my wife because they call her in the village the fair peasant; and on the other hand, my wife is vexed because my brother's wife shows off her gold chain on Sundays, as if on purpose to taunt her with it.' 'I do not think your wife can care for that sort of thing,' I said, in hopes of cutting short what threatened to prove a long digression. 'O, but I can tell you she does,' he replied and went on: 'Well, to come back to what I was saying I wanted to buy a gold chain, and I had only just money enough to pay for the stock and a few sacks of corn. It suddenly came into my head to try my luck at vendôme. I went into the café with a piece of six francs in my hand, but quite resolved not to risk a penny more. It was Nicholas Fidelier that held the stakes. He had a heap of gold louis in front of him. I threw in my six francs, and unfortunately won; upon which I instantly staked three louis, and lost them. This made a hole in the price of the pair of oxen. I risked three more louis, and lost again. The blood began to rush to my head. I said to myself that the next time luck was certain to turn, and I staked and lost six louis more. The whole price of the pair of oxen was gone. I threw down a louis on the board to try once again. The banker's card was drawn, and that I won. Somebody behind me said that now I should be sure to win, because the banker had crossed his little finger with his thumb, which is a certain sign of bad luck. This put me into spirits, and I played on without reckoning, and lost again. Seventeen louis went in that way. I could still have bought the sheep and a little corn, but I had engaged the man to take care of the oxen, and the ploughman, and so that would not do. I played on, and lost everything up to my last piece of twelve sous—up to my last farthing; and then, as ill-luck would have it, I borrowed from Jean Paul, a neighbor of ours, four pieces of six francs, which I now owe him. You were quite right not to let me have your piece of three francs. It would have gone the way of the others. I might have known this morning that some misfortune would befall me, for as I was going out of the house I met a black dog running after a hen.'

'I exclaimed against this gross superstition, and tried to make him feel ashamed of it. But he would not give in about it, and added, 'It was just the same two years ago, when I went to Malpeire for the first time. I should have done well then to turn back again. Only think: just as I was setting out, I saw a crow flying lower than the top of our hen-coop. If my dear mother had known it, she would never have let me leave home that day. It is not that I repent of my marriage; but you see, M. le Curé—I speak to you as a friend, and I don't mind saying it to you—the peasant who marries a lady brings into his house the seven capital sins in person.' 'How can you say anything so shocking?' I said indignantly. 'Well, if not the whole seven, four or five of them at least,' he subjoined. 'Hold your tongue, unhappy man,' I said. 'It is shameful of you to talk in this manner, after misleading that young girl into marrying you.' 'I did not mislead her a bit,' he replied. 'As sure as that I must die one day, I never made up to her. The first time that I went to Malpeire for the St. Lazarus, about two years ago, she was present at the games. After the wrestling-match was over there was a ball, and I was her partner. It was no doubt a great honor, but I declare I should have liked better to have been with my friends, who had agreed to sup together on a rabbit-pie. She spoke to me in a pretty smiling sort of a way, and, as in duty bound, I answered in the best way I could. Before we parted she said some civil things. I did not at all expect. I stayed at Malpeire because she asked me, and she used to give me rendezvous, harmless ones, in all conscience. She stood up there on the terrace of the castle, and I down there under a tree at the entrance of the village. We looked at each other, and spoke by signs. Sometimes I went under her window, and she threw down bits of ribbon. You see it was all nothing but folly and nonsense, and it never entered my head that the end would be a marriage in the church. But that was what she wanted, that headstrong girl, and she contrived to have her way about it. Well, well, perhaps her father and mother will think better of it, and may forgive her one of these days.'

CHAPTER XI.

THE NIGHT AFTER THE FAIR.

"When we came near St. C——, and in sight of the house, the Abbat began to tremble, and to regret that he had come. 'I cannot go in,' he exclaimed 'I shall never have courage to go up to my mother and tell her what I have done—I had rather die.' 'Well, I will go in first,' I said, 'and break to your mother this sad news.' 'O; yes, M. le Curé,' he cried, greatly relieved, 'you will tell it to her before everybody. You see, I am only afraid of the first moment; as soon as they all know of it, I shall come in. Beg my mother to forgive me; tell her she must. 'And your wife—your unhappy wife?' I said reproachfully. 'O, as to her,' he answered, 'I am not afraid; she will forgive me fast enough.'

"We went up to the door. The Abbat stayed outside. I charged him not to go away, and went in myself. All the family were seated round the table at supper. I suppose my countenance betrayed uneasiness, for as soon as the widow Pinatel saw me she exclaimed, 'O my good Lord! Has some misfortune happened. What are you come to tell me, M. le Curé?' I entreated her to be calm, and to make up her mind to submit to the will of God, for that I had indeed a painful bit of news to give her. 'It must be about François,' she cried, beginning to tremble; 'all the others are here. My boy, my poor boy! What has happened to him?' The Abbat's wife came up to me, looking pale and anxious, but she did not say anything. 'What has happened to my son?' the widow exclaimed in a voice of despair. 'You will see him in a moment,' I answered; 'he is alive and well, but something very sad has happened to him.' I then gave a brief account of what had occurred. I added that François was deeply penitent, and that it was grief and shame that prevented him from coming in. She listened to me in silence, and then, raising her eyes to heaven, murmured: 'God be praised; I thought a worse misfortune had befallen us. I was afraid my poor boy was dead. Let him come in, M. le Curé; I won't reproach him. It was his own money, and it is very sad that he should have made such bad use of it, but nobody has any right to quarrel with him about it.' The Abbat had crept into the room, and when he heard what his mother said, he came in and threw his arms about her neck in a transport of gratitude. 'Don't be afraid, my poor boy,' she cried, with a somewhat ostentatious display of maternal affection and generosity; 'there will always be bread enough for you in your mother's house.' His brothers shook hands with the Abbat, and made room for him at the table, but his wife remained aloof and did not utter a word. She was sitting in a corner of the room, with her hands on her knees and her head hanging down. He went up to her and spoke in a whisper, as if trying to appease her, but she listened in a gloomy silence, without raising her head or making any answer. He renewed his entreaties, and tried gently to make her turn her face towards him. Then her fury broke out. 'Leave me alone!' she exclaimed in a loud voice, and standing up with a look of terrible anger. 'You are a wretch, unworthy of my notice. Do you suppose I am going to share the bread which, as a beggar, you will receive from your family? No. As you have not chosen to go out of this house with me, I shall go away alone, and leave you on the dunghill where you were born, mean vagabond that you are.' The Abbat turned pale with rage, and raised his hand; she drew back with a cry.

Everybody rose and rushed towards them. The widow Pinatel seized her son by the arm and held him back. I went up to the young woman, who was standing upright against the wall, looking straight before her with a fixed gaze. One of her cheeks was of a deadly white, the other crimson. 'He has struck me,' she said, with a fearful expression of countenance; and then, without listening to me, without saying a word or looking at any one, she walked out of the room, and we heard her going up stairs and uttering terrible curses.

"'Hold your tongue,' cried the Abbat, 'or else I—' 'Leave her alone,' cried the widow, compelling him to sit down; 'do not put yourself in the wrong. She began by insulting you, and you punished her. Now you must make friends and try and live peaceably together.' 'Well, we shall see about that,' he muttered; 'but do you know, that if you, my own mother, had said such things to me, I really think I should have frown at you.'

"It was getting late, and I had to go back to S———that same evening. The eldest Pinatel offered to accompany me, as he had business to transact the following day at the fair. Just as we were starting, the widow seemed to have a presentiment. She turned to the Abbat, and said, in an anxious manner, 'You ought to go and sleep at S———. Your wife is very angry, and if you speak to her to-night, something worse may happen than what took place just now.' 'Do you think that I am afraid of her?' he answered, half affronted. 'I'll tell you what, mother, she sha'n't insult me another time as she did just now.'

"We went our way. The weather was fine, the full moon shining on our road. Before losing sight of the house I turned my eyes once more towards it; and uttered an earnest prayer for the proud and rebellious soul I had left behind me. Alas, I ought to have been pleading for another soul then about to appear before the judgment-seat of God."

The Abbé Lambert sighed deeply, and again seemed reluctant to proceed with his narrative, but M. de Champaubert, in an agitated voice, implored him to finish it. Upon which, after what appeared a painful effort, he went on.

"Well," he said, "this was what happened. On the following day, as I was going to church, I saw some one on the high-road in the direction of St. C——, walking very fast, and coming my way. This man, as he passed me, called out, 'The fair peasant has killed her husband; I am going to Aix for the police.'"

"Well, she was certainly a very wicked woman," my uncle ejaculated.

"I at once determined," the Abbé said, "instead of going on to the church, to hasten to St. C——. Before I arrived there I met another man, who confirmed the terrible account I had heard from the first messenger. 'It is the fair peasant who had committed the crime,' he said, 'there is not the least doubt about it. Last evening she quarrelled with her husband. They went to bed, however, as usual, and nothing was heard in the night. But in the morning, the wife of the eldest son, who got up at daybreak to bake, as she passed their room felt her foot slipping in something, which turned out to be blood, which she then perceived to be oozing out from under the door. She screamed for help, and the two young Pinatels, who were just going off to the vineyard, heard her. They ran up stairs, and found their brother lying murdered in his bed. It would seem as if she had stabbed him in his first sleep, for he had evidently not moved. Just now, when I came away, he was still alive, but was expected every minute to breathe his last.' 'And that woman?' I asked, with a shudder. 'They don't know where she is,' he answered, 'but they are gone in search of her. She must have escaped across the fields, for the door of the house was found open. But it is impossible she can escape; the whole village is after her, bent on avenging the Abbat.' I hurried on, begging God with all my heart to give me time to prepare that unhappy man to appear before Him. As I approached the house I heard cries and sobs, which made me afraid all was over. The room down-stairs was full of people, for the Pinatels held a certain position in the village. I was told that the Abbat was still alive, but not conscious. I made my way up the sort of ladder which served as stairs, and into a dimly lighted room, where all the family were gathered round the Abbat, who was lying in the position of a man asleep. A white sheet covered the bed, and only his face was to be seen resting against the pillow. His mother was bending over him with inexpressible grief, and kept now and again speaking to him, as if she hoped he could hear her. When I came in she exclaimed, 'Yesterday you brought him back full of life and health, and now he is about to die! That she-wolf murdered him in his sleep like a poor helpless lamb.'

"'I must try to help him,' I said, and with a strong feeling of faith in my heart I knelt down on the opposite side of the bed. I fancied the Abbat moved, then, and opened his eyes. The doctor arrived at that moment. He raised the sheet, and after having ascertained that the pulse was still beating, he leaned over the dying man to listen to his almost imperceptible breathing. Then he came round to my side of the bed, and looking at me shook his head. 'Is there no hope?' I asked in a low voice. 'Not the slightest,' he answered. 'The poor fellow has only a few minutes to live. It would have been over long ago but for the extraordinary strength of his constitution. Life does not easily withdraw from that young and vigorous frame.'

"I went close to the Abbat and felt for his hand. 'My son, my dear son,' I said to him, 'if you wish God to forgive you raise up your heart to Him now. Pray with me; pray for your wife and forgive her; you have only a moment more to live, but that moment may purchase the pardon of all your sins. Do you hear me, my dear son? Are you sorry for all your sins, and do you forgive your wife in the hope that God will forgive you?'

"He made an effort to speak, but failed. I had, however, the unspeakable consolation of feeling his hand feebly grasping mine in token of assent, upon which I gave him absolution. He turned his languid eyes towards me, and then towards his mother. A few moments after, François Pinatel gave up his penitent and ransomed soul into the hands of his Maker."

CHAPTER XII.

WHAT BECAME OF THE PICTURE.

"When I returned to S——, I heard that the wretched criminal had been arrested and put into prison at Aix. It was not possible for me to visit her here, for at that time none but the priests who had taken the oath could enter the State prisons. The only thing I could do was to write her a letter, in which I said everything which Christian charity could say to save her from despair. I had the satisfaction of ascertaining that my letter had reached her.

"In times of popular commotion and political disturbances the law deals silently, as it were, with great criminals, and on that account the unhappy woman escaped a horrid celebrity. After lingering in prison for about a year, she appeared before the tribunals which had been substituted for the old parliamentary courts, and was tried and condemned according to the newly enacted laws. She was sentenced to be branded by the executioner, and to imprisonment for life. I was not in France at that moment, the violence of the persecution had compelled me to take refuge in the States of the Church, and by the time I heard of her sentence she had already undergone a part of it. When I returned from exile, the whole affair was nearly forgotten. I only learned that the fair peasant, as she was still called, was in the penitentiary of Embrun, and that the widow Pinatel had died of grief, as it was supposed, because the judges had not sentenced her daughter-in-law to death."

"And since then you have heard nothing of that unhappy woman?" exclaimed M. de Champaubert.

The Abbé Lambert hesitated a little, as if he felt some scruple about giving a direct answer to that question. At last he said, "I subsequently learnt that by her sincere penitence and exemplary conduct she had earned her pardon and come out of prison. Her situation then was very sad. She had nothing to look to but destitution and universal reprobation. Somebody, however, who knew by what a deep and sincere repentance she had atoned for her crime, helped her to conceal her name and obtain the means of earning an humble livelihood."

"M. le Curé," said M. de Champaubert, in an agitated manner, "I entreat you to make further inquiries about her, and let me know the result. It is my anxious desire to secure her sufficient means to live upon, so that she may end her days in quiet."

The Abbé Lambert bowed low, and said, "I will try, M. le Marquis."

Dom Gêrusac looked at the picture, and said, "How extraordinary it is that I should have had so long under my eyes, without the least idea of it, the heroine of such a dreadful story. My dear Abbé, you ought to have told me of it."

The Abbé Lambert looked puzzled.

"That is Mlle. de Malpeire's picture," I said; "did you not recognize it, M. l'Abbé?"

He shook his head, and answered sadly, "No, indeed I did not. Even when I first saw her she had not that blooming, smiling face; she was not like that picture."

A long silence ensued; the candles were nearly burnt out, but a fresh supply of fagots threw out a blaze which lighted up the room. It had left off raining, but the wind still whistled amongst the trees and shook the outer blinds. When the clock struck twelve, M. de Champaubert got up and wished us good-night. He was to set out early the following morning, and it was settled that we should walk with him as far as the high-road. Before leaving the room, he went up to the Abbé Lambert, shook him by the hand, and emptying his purse on the corner of the chimney, he said in a low voice, "This is for your people, M. le Curé; I intend every year to renew the same offering."

I did not close my eyes for some hours that night, and I do not think M. de Champaubert slept at all. Long after midnight I heard him pacing up and down his room. We were both thinking of that beautiful but guilty woman who had been his first love, and whose portrait had bewitched me thirty-five years afterwards. I could not divest myself even then of a strange interest about her. My mind kept dwelling on her tragical fate. I shuddered at her crime, but thought, nevertheless, that the Abbé had deserved a thousand deaths for having dared to strike Mlle. de Malpeire. I ascribed the terrible vengeance she had taken to the proud spirit of her ancestral race, which could not leave an insult unrevenged. The thought of her low-born spouse excited in me both jealousy and anger. In spite of this miserable end, I thought he had been only too happy to be her husband, and envied his destiny. I spent the night in a feverish, restless state. The same image kept passing and repassing before my eyes, whether I opened or closed them, sometimes smiling, sometimes looking sternful and mournful. I was fast asleep, however, when Dom Gêrusac called me the next morning. M. de Champaubert was soon ready, and we started. The mild rays of an autumn sun were gilding the valley; no early frosts had yet blighted the fresh green of the foliage. The cheery robin-redbreast was chirping in the hawthorn bushes, and beautiful butterflies hovered over the rosemary bushes. But above the level where the soft breezes of the south were blowing from the coasts of the Mediterranean, rose the crests of the mountains, already covered with their snowy mantles.

Before we reached the high-road, M. de Champaubert turned round and gave a last look at the surrounding landscape. He gazed on the two lofty peaks separated by a deep chasm which crowned the southern side of the nearest mountain, and murmured with a deep sigh, "There is the Pass of Malpeire." A few minutes afterwards we arrived at the spot where his carriages were waiting. He shook hands with me in a very cordial manner, and then turning to my uncle, said with much feeling, "Now that we have met again, my dear old friend, I find it hard to part with you."

"And yet we have had a melancholy time of it," murmured my poor dear uncle, "and all along of that horrid portrait."

The two friends embraced. The Marquis sprang into his carriage, and stretching his head out of the window made us a last sign of farewell. We soon lost sight of the carriage in the midst of a cloud of dust, but stood a while on the roadside watching the white speck vanishing in the distance.

The first thing Dom Gêrusac did when he came home was to send for Babelou, and to desire her to carry up to the lumber-room the object of my romantic worship. When she had left the room with it, he turned to me and said: "The sight of that dreadful woman would have disturbed my digestion; I should always have been thinking at dinner of her horrid adventures. And, after all, that portrait is a wretched daub. I am sorry to say so, for Champaubert's sake, but really the arm is quite out of proportion, and the little finger of the right hand very badly drawn. In short, it is a wretched performance, and I was very foolish ever to hang it up over my chimney-piece."

I did not remonstrate against this verdict, nor would I ask my uncle to make me a present of the picture he had so cheap, and which I so highly prized. I should have been afraid of exposing myself if I had ventured to express a wish to possess it, but I resolved to steal the despised treasure, and to carry it off with me. There was no time to lose, for my holidays were almost over. I was to go back to college the next day but one. I did not apprehend any great difficulty in the matter. I had only to make my way into the lumber-room, which was in a corner of the attic, to bring away the picture, and to intrust it to some boy, who, for an adequate consideration, would undertake to carry it to the place where I always met the diligence.

Before going in search of the accomplice, without whom I could not carry out my scheme, I insidiously questioned Babelou. "How did you manage, my dear," I said, "to get that heavy picture up-stairs? It must have been difficult to find room for it in the attic?"

"O, I just poked it behind the door," she answered; "I had something better to do, I promise you, than to hunt out a place for it amidst all the old rubbish up stairs."

"Does my uncle keep his odds and ends under lock and key?" I asked, trying to put on an appearance of indifference.

"He thinks he does," she replied with a shrug; "but as we are always going in and out for one thing or another, the key generally remains hanging by the side door."

I went away satisfied with this information, and spent almost all the day wandering about my gun in my hand, by way of shooting, but really to try and find in the neighborhood a youth capable of executing my orders. At last I met a young scamp who, for a five franc piece I gave him, engaged to do my bidding and hold his tongue. I desired him to come that evening, and station himself at the bottom of the alley between eleven and twelve o'clock at night. He was to bring with him two wicker trussels between which I intended the lovely picture to travel. I fully meant always to keep it with me. When all this was arranged, I came in and prepared to perform my part in the plot.

It was getting late. The light was waning, and a melancholy silence reigned in the house. There was nobody in the drawing-room, only the dogs sleeping in the arm-chairs. I thought my uncle was in the library, hard at work over his books, and Babelou in the kitchen. The moment seemed particularly favorable. I went up-stairs with flushed cheeks and a beating heart, like a man engaged in a desperate adventure. The lumber-room was, as I said before, on the third story. Just as I arrived at the top of the stairs I met Dom Gêrusac, with his reading-lamp in his hand, and his spectacles pushed back on his forehead. He looked quite grieved and dismayed.

"Poor Marian," he said, "is as ill as possible; the Abbé Lambert has just given her the last Sacraments. She may die at any moment."

"My heart sank within me, more, I am ashamed to say, at the failure of my own plans than at the news about Marian. Her room was next to the one where the picture was, and the present state of things made it impossible to remove it without attracting notice from those who were assembled round her bed. My uncle, who was truly grieved about his old servant, took my arm to go down-stairs. We found Babelou crying in the entrance-hall.

"Poor Marian," she said, wiping her eyes with her apron, "was very ill yesterday, but she would rather have died in the kitchen than go to bed before the dinner was cooked. And yet she knew very well she was dangerously ill. Whilst I was waiting at table, she told Gothou to send immediately for the Curé. It was for her that he came last night in all that pouring rain. To cheer her up this morning, I showed her the two good pieces which M. le Marquis had left for us. She then said she felt much better, but it did not last long, and now she is dying!"

We went into the drawing-room, and half an hour afterwards the Abbé Lambert came in and told us all was over. Marian's all but sudden death was one of those events which throw a bachelor's household into confusion. My poor uncle was quite distressed, and kept repeating, "She was a very faithful creature. During the twelve years she lived with me I never had occasion to find the slightest fault with her. It will be no easy matter to replace so good a servant."

I was occupied meanwhile in considering whether it would be possible to carry off Mlle. de Malpeire before next morning. Suddenly my uncle said, "I wonder who are the heirs of that poor woman? A year's wages were owing to her, and she had put by a little money, I think. If she has any relatives it must go to them. I must make inquiries."

The Abbé shook his head; he was writing a memorandum for the Registrar. When he had finished it he handed over the paper to my uncle. I saw Dom Gêrusac start, and throw up his hands and eyes with a gesture of profound astonishment. Almost unconsciously I approached, and looking over his shoulder, glanced at the paper and read: "To-day, October 12, 18—, died at Pierre de Corbie, Madeleine Marie de Malpeire, widow of François Pinatel."

"Marian—Marian was Mlle. de Melpeire!" I almost shrieked out the words. The Abbé Lambert and my uncle were both leaning against the table with their hands clasped together; I think they were praying. Babelou was sobbing bitterly.

I went out and sat down at the corner of the chimney with my head resting on my hands. I did not move or speak the whole evening, and about twelve o'clock went to my room. Soon afterwards I heard some one under my windows, calling to me in a suppressed voice. It was my accomplice, who tired of waiting for me in the alley, was come to remind me of my appointment.

"I say, Monsieur Frederick," he said, standing on tip-toe, "I am come to fetch the picture. Could you not hand it down to me through the window?"

"I have not got it, and I don't want it," I angrily cried, "go along with you."

Fifteen years afterwards, after the death of Dom Gêrusac, who made me his executor and residuary legatee, I found Mlle. de Melpeire in the same place where Babelou had put her. The mice had done some mischief to the painting, and the little finger which my uncle had found so much fault with had disappeared. I had it cleaned and repaired, and it now figures in a very respectable manner in my portrait gallery.

Captain Ricard.

I.

IN the very interesting "Souvenirs of an Army Chaplain," published in 1852, by a priest, who under his cassock bore the noble heart of a soldier, the Abbé Sève has written some remarkable papers. His mind inspired by holy and bold convictions, has furnished him on this subject with eloquent pages, which have enabled us to give an account of the fact that forms the subject of this story. It is well known that in 1830, three thousand officers, true to the cause they had sworn to uphold, broke their sword, and mourning in silence the fall of an illustrious monarchy, threw themselves into exile. Among these brave men was Fr. derie Ricard. His heart free, and his purse light, but satisfied with having done his duty, he took the road to Vigan. Before seeking in a strange land for some provision against the future, he was desirous of seeing once more his native country.

Our hero was of middling stature, but well made; his broad shoulders indicated strength, and the deep lines in his bold forehead revealed a mind far above the common. Of an impetuous character, but still, when necessity required, sufficient master of himself to control those warm passions inherent in the inhabitants of the south, Captain Ricard had the instinct of appreciating just and holy things; he was as strong as a lion, but gentle as a lamb. Surprised by the revolution of July, when at Provins, where his regiment was in garrison, he traversed a part of France, avoiding the high roads, so as not to hear or see anything that would recall the evil days of revolution. He was obliged, however, to pass through Avignon. This town, though protected by the good sense of the populace, was in a state of great excitement. It was not without difficulty that Captain Ricard, making his way through the groups assembled before the gate of Loule, could reach the hotel Saint-Yves.

Seven or eight young men, whom the experienced eyes of the captain recognized as commercial travellers, were seated at a table covered with glasses and bottles of different colors. At the sight of the new comer, closely enveloped in his long blue riding coat, buttoned up to the neck, the jovial party exchanged looks with each other, as much as to say, there is an ultra. At this period ultra and Jesuit were the two great stalking horses used by the liberals to attack the clergy and those of the laity who did not know by heart the verses of Béranger and other worse than flippant productions of that day.

The captain placed himself at a vacant table, and called for a glass of absinthe, to prepare, according to custom, his digestive organs for dinner. "Absinthe!" said one of the clerks in a low tone. "A green liquor! we are not mistaken; he is a Carlist, who knows? an ex-minister disguised. Polignac perhaps? Suppose we arrest him?"

During this conversation, the captain, the object of these various suppositions, continued quietly sipping his draught. On their part, the bon-vivants concerted together to submit him to a system of ordeal, which they began, by singing in chorus a verse of a military ballad. At each couplet, the singers, looking askance at the captain, added these words, "Liberty for ever! Down with the Jesuits! down with the Carlists!" The captain was immovable. Encouraged by his silence, perhaps attributing his reserve to a feeling of fear, the travellers redoubled their audacity; their allusions became so pointed at last, that the captain resolved to put a stop to them. The wool of the lamb changed under the insult to the lion's mane. Frederic Ricard, his countenance pale with anger, but calm and resolved as a man who knows his own strength and right, rose from the table and slowly approached the one who seemed to be the chief of the party.

"Monsieur," he said, laying his right hand on his shoulder, "I cannot suppose you have any intention of insulting me, for you are eight against one; I believe you to be to good Frenchmen to do so cowardly a thing. Be that as it may, you will permit me to remark that gentlemen of good breeding ought to respect those whom chance unites under the same roof. Now, as your songs annoy me, and here, we are neither in the theatre, nor in the street, you will greatly oblige me by discontinuing them."

"Monsieur," answered the chief of the band sharply, in a shrill cracked voice, "we are extremely sorry to inform you it is not in our power to satisfy you on this point. It is true we are neither in the theatre, nor in the street; but we are in a public place, where each can do as he pleases. We shall continue to sing, and you can dance, if that is agreeable."

"That is quite right," replied Ricard; "then each for himself, and God for all," and returning to his seat, he finished his glass of absinthe, rang for the waiter, and ordered him to bring dinner. It was Friday, a day of abstinence.

"I am certain," said one of the young men, loud enough to be heard, "that this Jesuit in the blue coat is going to make a maigre dinner."

"That will be a droll thing to see," added his neighbor.

"We shall have a good laugh," said the chief; and giving a new signal he commenced a song from Béranger. Just then an organ began playing in the Square de Loule the overture of Gulistan. Ricard whispered to the waiter who brought his plate; "go and bring that organ boy in here; fetch him quickly. Here are five francs, which you can divide with him."

"I understand, Monsieur," said the boy, "he shall come directly."

"We shall have a good laugh," returned the facetious traveller, thinking of the maigre dinner he was about to ridicule.

At the same moment the organ boy, his face sparkling with joy, entered the hall, and turning the handle of his instrument, began playing the first notes of a chorus in La Dame Blanche.

"Will you please take yourself off as quickly as you can, Mr. Grinder!" cried the singers, thus interrupted in the best part of their song.

"Stop!" said the captain, in a voice accustomed to command, and then added: "Messieurs, I detest vocal music without accompaniment; at the same time I admire harmony. Let me have my organ, you can have your songs."

"But, Monsieur, we are not in the street."

"I am aware of that; but we are in a public place, where each can do as he pleases."

This reply was unanswerable; the noisy party had to suffer the consequences of the law they had themselves laid down. They began again, in a higher key, but the clamorous notes of the instrument playing the deep chorus of the Marche des Tartares, so overpowered and confounded the voices, that after a long discord the organ remained master of the field. Not satisfied with his first victory, the captain, turning towards the band, whose extinguished fire threatened to rekindle in an anti-religious refrain of Béranger's; "Messieurs," he asked, "do you like duets? You do not answer this,—this gives consent; so we will treat you with a piece which will set your hair on end." At these words, seeing in a corner of the room the box of the public crier, he fetched it, gave a signal to the organ player, and both of them executed, on the air of La belle Arsène, an infernal discord—a veritable charivari. In less than five minutes, Ricard had obtained such a victory as a generous adversary never abuses; he therefore dismissed the organ boy and his instrument.

The travellers, beaten on their own ground, waited for an opportunity of revenge. It presented itself at the moment they feared it was escaping them; in fact, they had prepared their batteries against their adversary's scanty dinner; what was their surprise, then, when they saw the cover removed!

"Have we been deceived?" said they, looking quite mystified.

"We are robbed," said the chief of the party, seeing the captain vigorously attack a magnificent roast fowl.

"I would willingly give three francs ten sous," added one of his companions, whose red nose testified to his propensities; "I will give a hundred sous to the waiter; to see that fowl change into a carp."

Wounded to the quick by the hidden provocation which this speech implied, Ricard put back the juicy wing which perfumed his plate, and calling the boy, said, "Take away this fowl."

"Is it not roasted enough, sir?"

"Nothing could be better."

"Then why does monsieur refuse it?"

"Because it does not suit me to eat it."

The travellers, their eyes fixed on the two speakers, waited with anxiety the issue of the scene. The officer continued, "What day is it?"

"Friday, monsieur."

"Are you quite sure?"

"Perfectly sure."

"In that case, replace this fowl by a carp."

"Monsieur will then be served en maigre?"

"Yes, my friend."

"Good. Now we shall have our laugh," said the travellers, rubbing their hands.

As he desired, the officer was served entirely en maigre. The carp, as you may imagine, received, on its entry, the honors of an ovation. We will pass over the sarcasms and jokes with which the singers seasoned the captain's fare; he, calm and immovable as an old trooper, did not even let his fork tremble. It was delightful to witness him, opposing a dignified silence to foolish pleasantries, invented out of hatred to the clergy and religion; the more direct the insults, the less they seemed to affect him.

"Decidedly the holy man has made a vow of patience," said one.

"I think," said another, "that he carries a hair-shirt under his great coat."

"He gives himself the airs of a soldier, and yet has only served at Mass."

"Parbleu! I recognize him!" laughingly said another of the guests, who until this moment had kept a prudent silence; "he was at the side of M. Dupin at the procession of St. Acheul, and, like him, carried a holy taper."

"Gargon," said the captain, "bring me some coffee."

"Gargon," cried the one who was the leader of the party, "do not forget the little glass of holy water."

"Bravissimo! well hit!" shouted the insulters, enthusiastic at what they considered the finishing stroke.

The captain slowly took his cup of mocha, then, when he had drunk the last drop of cognac that the boy gave him, he rose from the table as calm as if nothing had happened to disturb his equanimity.

"Now," said the chief of the party, "we have the second handle."

"Let us see who has the best," answered the officer, and measuring from head to foot the tall figure of his facetious adversary, he asked, "What is your name, monsieur?"

"Chameron, François-Joseph."

"Monsieur Joseph-François Chameron, of what country are you?"

"Of a country where the seed of the Jesuits has not taken root."

"In what religion have you been brought up?"

"In the Catholic religion. But you, monsieur, let me ask you in your turn, what are you called?"

"Frederic Ricard, at your service."

"What is your country?"

"A country where all convictions are respected when they are conscientious."

"Of what religion are you?"

"I am a Huguenot."

"Huguenot! Why, then, do you abstain on a Friday?"

"To give, in religious matters, lessons of tolerance to pretended patriots,—to give, on suitable occasions, lessons of politeness to impertinents. Monsieur Joseph-François Chaméron, you are a worthless fellow."

"Monsieur!"

"Monsieur Joseph-François Chaméron, and you, messieurs, who, for the past hour, have insulted a man who has done nothing to provoke you, you are a set of cowards!"

The young men, thunderstruck at this epithet, and the fierce looks of the officer, kept silence. The officer continued.

"Amongst you all, insulting bullies, there will not be found one whose heart is manly enough to offer me the reparation which is due to me."

"Enough, monsieur!" cried one of the insulters, unable to stand this taunt. "What are your arms?"

"Mine will be yours."

"Your hour?"

"That which is next to strike will be the best."

"Well, then, let us go!"

"I am at your service; but, before leaving, you have a small account to settle," said the captain, addressing him whose face was ornamented with the red nose.

"For what?"

"That which you owe this boy."

"François?"

"Who for a hundred sous favored your wishes in transforming to a carp the bird he had served me with."

"Ah! I had forgotten," said the traveller; and with ill-disguised vexation he gave a five-franc piece to François.

"Now let us depart," said the captain; and a few minutes after the two adversaries found themselves, sword in hand, in the isle of La Bartolasse.

"Monsieur," said the officer, disarming the travelling clerk at the first pass, "I am not in the habit of fighting duels; but I like to show those who know not how to use a sword, that they will do well to learn how to hold their tongue. March off!"

II.

Five years had flown by since the incident I have just related, years full of events more or less strange, more or less dramatic. Frederic Ricard, the principal personage in this history, passed through them with the stoicism that characterizes a strong-hearted man. Leaving Du Vigan where he had gone immediately after the above occurrence to sell a small patrimony and realize a few livres, he determined to seek a fortune on some of the great roads which were open to his ambition. Once he thought of finding it in Portugal, under the banner of Don Miguel. Vain hope! The courage of heroism does not always suffice to fix the capricious goddess, not even on a field of battle. Grievously wounded at Santarem, by the side of the Marquis De Larochejacquelin, who himself received a mortal wound, he escaped as by a miracle. As soon as he was cured, he renounced the profession of arms, and returned to France to seek a new position. Then, one after the other, he became a lawyer without clients, a physician without patients; he tried every means, and succeeded in none; indeed he would have died of misery and hunger if one of his old comrades, a discharged officer like himself, now living on the products of his vineyards at Grenoble, had not offered him a place in his flourishing domain.

Strange inconsistency of earthly things! our brilliant cavalry officer, Frederic Ricard, has become a traveller in the sale of Bordeaux wines. He consoled himself with this metamorphosis in thinking, like a good royalist, that Bordeaux was the king of wines! Now, as he was active, zealous and intelligent, he rapidly rose in his new employment, and soon distinguished himself above his companions in all those qualities which are requisite to a good commercial traveller. The nature of his business often called him to that part of the country where the first scene of our story occurred, and he spent many weeks of every year at Avignon.

One day, when he was proceeding to this town, he met as a traveling companion in the Marseilles diligence a priest, whose pleasant countenance and interesting conversation attracted his notice. Ere the first stage they had formed an intimacy, which is not so soon made now, since horses have been obliged to give way to the power of steam. Locomotion has gained in rapidity what it has lost in agreeableness. Thus, we do not travel in these days; we are removed from one place to another; we can go quicker now from Lyons to Paris than we could formerly from Paris to St. Germain. Our two travellers were making their reflections on the subject of the railroads established at this time in the department of the Loire, when the diligence stopped before the gate of Loule—they had arrived at Avignon.

"At what hotel do you stop?" asked the ecclesiastic of the traveller.

"At the hotel Saint-Yves."

"If you will allow me, I will join you at the same hotel."

"We can do still better; we can dine together."

"I was just going to propose so. At least, if," answered the traveller, with marked emphasis, "at least, if you have no repugnance to sit at table with a man who differs from you in religious belief. I am a Protestant."

"I am a Catholic priest, monsieur," replied the ecclesiastic, "that is to say, your brother, for all men, even those born in error, are the sons of the same God. By this title, I love and esteem you. I love you more, perhaps, since I see you living so far from the truth. We will dine together, monsieur; at least if you,"—and the priest hesitated a little in his turn,—"if you do not object to a Friday's abstinence."

"A maigre dinner has never frightened me," replied the Protestant; "and I have even made an excellent one at the hotel we are about to enter. It is many years ago now, but I will tell you the story, between the fruit and the cheese; perhaps it will please you, as much as your company in the diligence has me."

The priest answered these words with a smile, the singular expression of which escaped the notice of his companion.

As he promised, the traveller related the story of his encounter, with which the abbé seemed much interested.

"You conducted yourself nobly, monsieur," said the priest; "and you may be sure that the lesson you gave, though a Protestant, to a bad Catholic, will not have been lost. Be that as it may, the man you so wisely corrected ought to bless your name, for you might have ended his days with your sword. May the life you have preserved be nobly and usefully spent! Have you seen him since?"

"I have never met him again. I should like to see him, however, as we are now in a similar position in life; for I, like himself, traffic in wines."

"Then most certainly you will one day find him."

"To be frank with you, I should greatly like it."

"To offer him his revenge?"

"To offer him my hand."

"Well said, monsieur; you have a noble heart. You will see him one day, be assured; but, till that time arrives, you will always have a share of my prayers, that——" "That," interrupted the traveller, laughing, "that, as at this same table a fowl was transformed into a carp so a Huguenot may be changed into a Catholic. Is that what you would say, my dear Abbé? It will be more difficult, I forewarn you."

"Nothing is impossible with God," added the priest solemnly.

The two new friends separated, after exchanging cards, and promising to meet in Paris, where both were going; the priest to preach during Lent, the traveller to visit his customers.

One day, soon after arriving at Lyons, Frederic Ricard ascended the top of Notre-Dame-de-Fourvières, in order to admire the magnificent panorama which lay stretched at the foot of the sacred hill. From this eminence could be seen the town of Lyons, with its beautiful quays, its old churches, its numberless bridges, its two rivers, and the vast square of Bellecour, ornamented with the equestrian statue of Louis XIV.; then the rich plain of Grenoble, sown with elegant villas, and divided by the high-road to Dauphine; in the distance the Alps, whose summits, covered with eternal snows, serve as a barometer to the inhabitants of the city.

When our ex-cavalry officer had sufficiently satisfied his curiosity, he mechanically entered the holy chapel. It was a day consecrated to the Holy Virgin, and there was a great crowd at the foot of the privileged altar, from whence the celestial Mother of the divine Redeemer watches incessantly over the children of her beloved city. The altar was decked with flowers; the image of the Immaculate Virgin, clothed in gold vestments, was illuminated by the light of a thousand tapers; and an old priest, whose forehead was encircled by a crown of silver hair, recounted from the pulpit the praises of Mary. At this name, Ricard felt his soul moved for the first time; for the first time, perhaps, he comprehended all there was of consolation and hope in the cultus of the Mother of God; and for the first time, he secretly dared, in the bottom of his heart, to establish a comparison between the two religions, which certainly was not in favor of his own. There was so much serenity shed on the calm foreheads of the worshippers of Mary! so much ineffable sweetness on their prayerful lips, that he could not prevent himself from pronouncing a name that his mother had never taught him—a name, sweeter than the sweetest honey. On the morrow Ricard again went to Notre-Dame-de-Fourvières, and like the day before experienced emotions of which he could not account; was it grace beginning to work in his soul? We know not; we only know that when he left Lyons, he several times put his head out of the diligence window, to see the little white steeple planted on the hill of Notre-Dame-de-Fourvières, like a light-house of mercy between earth and heaven.

III.

When he arrived in Paris, the ex-officer went to the priest of Saint-Roch, from whom he was to obtain the address of his travelling companion. It was given to him as had been promised. The good father was living at the Hotel du Bon Lafontaine, Rue de Grenelle Saint-Germain. Ricard took a hackney-coach, and ordered the coachman to drive thither. The ecclesiastic was just gone out. Ricard inquired when he would return. "Very late," he was informed, "for he was to preach at six o'clock." The captain looked at his watch; it was half-past five.

"Could you tell me where I can find him at this moment?"

"At the sacristy of Saint Sulpice, without doubt; but it will be difficult to see him before he has finished his sermon."

"How long does his discourse last?"

"That depends; an hour, perhaps—an hour and a half—two hours, even."

"Two hours! that is a long time," said Ricard. "Never mind, I will go to St. Sulpice, and wait for him."

The sacred orator had just mounted the pulpit. From the animation of his voice and actions, one might see he was completely engrossed with his subject. He had chosen for his text this proposition: "The divinity of the Catholic religion proved by its works."

Ricard leant against the angle of a pillar, and listened to a language hitherto unknown to him. After having graphically sketched the first ages of Christianity, so wonderfully established by twelve poor fishermen on the ruins of the old world, the orator spoke of the cross shining on the darkness of the middle ages, and shedding its glorious light over the new world. He passed in review the phalanx of doctors, philosophers and saints laboring with generous hands to develop the civilization hidden in the writings of barbarism, and to awaken man, stupefied by ignorance and slavery; then following from century to century those sublime benefactors of humanity, always unchangeable in their faith, persevering in their unity (that divine characteristic of Catholicism), he proved, in the second place, that the Catholic religion alone had been the initiator of all great ideas; that from her alone came the amelioration of humanity, and the merit of the numerous works set on foot for the benefit of the human race. Frederic Ricard, half hidden behind the pillar, listened to the preacher with the most lively attention. Reviewing, on his side, the dissensions of the numerous Protestant sects, worshipping in as many different forms, he comprehended that truth could only be one, invariable, immutable, as the God from whom it proceeds; and he saw that the Catholic religion alone possessed this character, which was therefore an irrefragable proof of the divinity of its origin. The orator finished his discourse by a short peroration, showing the necessity of following the Catholic faith, not only in order to attain the facilities of another world, but to enjoy in this that peace of soul which is the most certain indication of true happiness.

The preacher descended from the pulpit, and returned to the sacristy. Ricard followed, and embracing him, said, "Your voice has touched my soul, my dear Abbé."

The Abbé replied, "I shall thank God for it, if it has opened the way to that light which penetrates and converts."

"We shall see. Do you preach often?"

"Three times a week. Why do you ask?"

"To arrange that I may come and hear you each time."

In fact, our brave ex-officer did not miss one sermon of his new friend, whose enlightened and devoted zeal for the salvation of his brethren, changed the regard he had felt on their first meeting into the warmest affection. In fact, to be nearer him, Ricard had quitted the Rue Saint Honoré, and taken furnished apartments in the Faubourg Saint Germain. The worthy priest avoided all that could resemble a wish to convert; he wished to leave the result to time, and the more efficacious influence of divine grace. On his part, Ricard equally avoided speaking of the progress which grace was really effecting in his heart. The festival of Easter was approaching, and Ricard had not said a single word of the mental struggle he was undergoing. The Abbé began to fear that indifference was the cause of his unaccountably prolonged silence, when he one morning received the following letter:

"MY DEAR ABBÉ:

"During fifteen days, two irreconcilable adversaries have chosen my heart for their battle-field. They have struggled with a perseverance which has had in it something superhuman, but which has not yet ended in a decisive result. 'Truth is in Catholicism,' said one; 'be a Catholic.' 'To change one's religion,' replies the other, 'is to be a coward.' 'To persevere in an acknowledged error is folly,' said one. 'At all times apostasy has been considered a shameful and mean thing,' said the other. 'In all ages conversion has been acknowledged as praiseworthy in the eyes of faithful men, and meritorious in the eyes of God,' said one. 'All religions are good—why wish to change?' said the other. 'Enter the bosom of this Church, which offers all the chances of salvation, and as the sole depository of unity contests the truth with all others; be a Catholic,' said one. 'Remain a Protestant; for if you deny the faith of your fathers, what will your brothers and friends say?' replied the other. 'It is not to deny the faith of your fathers, but only to return to that of your grandfathers.' The unhappy one who is carried away by the torrent of error, acts justly and reasonably in seizing the branch of safety which truth offers him from the friendly shore."

"As the sole witness of this struggle between two such contrary influences, my heart hovers, hesitates, and trembles; come to my help, dear Abbé—come this evening at nine o'clock; I shall be at home."

You may be sure, dear reader, the good Abbé went as requested. His presence on the field completely changed the state of the combat, the evil genius, turned out of his entrenchments by the messenger of God, gave up his arms and acknowledged himself vanquished.

"You said well," cried the ex-officer, throwing himself on the bosom of the venerable priest; "nothing is impossible to him who changed a fowl into a carp, at the Hotel of the Palais Royal at Avignon."

"And who," answered the Abbé, "will to-morrow change a Huguenot into a Catholic."

Grace, operating on a soil prudently prepared, had worked the most consoling results; in fact, since his arrival in Paris, occupied only with this great affair, Ricard had opened his eyes to the truth, and closed them to the darkness of error; he was ready to enter the bosom of the Church.

"My friend," said the priest, on receiving his abjuration, "to the red ribbon which ornaments your neck, you require a cross of honor."

"Whose, father?"

"The cross of Christ; receive it from my hands, and wear it always in memory of me."

IV.

In the course of the many friendly conversations between Ricard and the priest, before the desired conversion, the former had often expressed a wish to see the travelling commissioner. "Your desire will be satisfied," the Abbé had said each time. "Your old adversary is in Paris. I know him, and I promise you, you shall meet him again before you leave, and shall finish, over a glass of wine, the combat begun at the fle de la Bartelasse." However, days flew by, and the expected meeting had not yet taken place. Ricard had fixed the time of his departure for the Thursday in Easter week, when one evening he received the following note:

"MY DEAR FRIEND:

"If you still persevere in your wish to see, before quitting Paris, the traveller whose life you so generously spared at La Bartelasse, come and dine with me to-morrow, at six o'clock.

"Yours ever,"

It was just striking six from the church of Saint Sulpice, when Ricard arrived at the Abbé's hotel. The dinner was ready, but only one guest had arrived.

"Shall we allow him a quarter of an hour's grace?" asked the Abbé.

"We will give him two," answered Ricard; "the distances are long in Paris, and business causes delays."

Half-past six arrived, and the expected guest had not come.

"Let us place ourselves at table," said the Abbé, smiling; "and do not look so disappointed, my dear captain. I promise you he will come."

Dinner was soon served. A magnificent carp, laid on a china dish ornamented with flowers figured at the first course. The guest thanked his entertainer for this pleasant remembrance of the past.

"Since I have known the history of your combat," said the Abbé, "carp is the fish I now like the best. I cannot help considering it the mysterious apostle that Providence made use of to prepare the way for the saving of two souls."

"Of whose?"

"First of yours, for believe it, captain, one can never idly trifle with grace. The day when, as Protestant, you acted the part of a good Catholic, in giving an example of submission to the commands of the Church; on that day our good God blessed you, and opened your heart to the treasures of His grace, which you enjoy to-day."

"You spoke of another soul, whose is it?"

"Without doubt that of the travelling commissioner; of him, who despising and mocking all things, thought himself permitted to insult others, because he knew by heart the songs of Béranger; on that day, captain, the carp you had asked for in place of the fowl, only to satisfy the laws of a Church then not your own, that carp has, I repeat, acted a part in the story of your conversion greater than you suppose. Under the hand of God the greatest effects often arise from the smallest causes."

"You see that my old adversary will not come," cried Ricard; "for, if I mistake not, we are now at the dessert."

"Captain Ricard, look well at me, do you recognize me?"

"Yes, for an excellent and worthy priest, whom I esteem and love with all my heart."

"And on whom you wish to be revenged, captain. This is why; the adversary whom I promised you should meet to-day, is at this moment before you, glass in hand, to ask your pardon—"

"How! you are—"

"The irreligious and insolent traveller, to whom Captain Ricard, a Protestant, gave a lesson of tolerance and politeness."

Saying thus, the good Abbé threw himself into the captain's arms, who imagined he was the victim of some strange hallucination."

"Yes! it is I, look at me well," said the Abbé, and he related, as briefly as possible, the scene we have read in the first part of this story. At the request of the astonished captain, he completed his recital by explaining his conversion, which, from public conveyances and the high roads, had brought him to a seminary, and from a seminary to the sacred pulpit. "Since that day," said he, "I do not dine at three francs at the table d'hôte, but I teach men of faith and good-will the consoling truths of our holy religion. In a word, I find myself a hundred times happier, since the hymns of the Church have made me forget the songs of Béranger."

The two converts, forgetful of time, chatted in the most friendly manner until near midnight; the captain was the first to rise and take leave of the priest, whom he never saw again in this world. That zealous preacher departed six months after for the missions of the Levant. Captain Ricard is still living; he has retired from business, and resides in the country, in the possession of a moderate fortune, and in the bosom of an affectionate family. He never fails on days of abstinence to have a carp at his table.

An Incident of Sailor Life.

A FORMIDABLE French fleet left Toulon on the 16th of June, 1609, commanded by a prince of the blood, the Duke de Beaufort, to deliver Candia, which was besieged by the Turks. He had with him a C puchin, Father Zephyrin. The fleet, favored by beautiful weather, for some time slowly advanced. The admiral-ship, Le Monarque, preceded by a small brigantine, which served as a guide, was at the head, bearing with pride the banner of the Sovereign Pontiff. With the exception of a north-west squall, which snapped the top-masts of the Syrian when they were off the islands of Hyères, the passage bid fair to be most favorable.

The fleet had just left Cerigo, anciently called Cythera, to its left, and had doubled Cape Carobuca, which is the most easterly point of the island of Candia, when one morning the watch said that a signal from the Thérèse had been given announcing that a priest was wanted for a sailor who was seriously ill. Père Zephyrin knowing this, went immediately to the captain of the admiral's vessel, and asked him to give orders so as to enable him to fulfil the duties of his ministry.

"What you ask, father," said the captain, "is quite impossible!"

"As things are, those words are neither French nor Christian. Over there is one of our comrades dying; it is my duty to go to him."

"The man can die very well without you."

"That is exactly what he ought not to do."

"But I cannot take upon myself the responsibility of doing as you wish."

"Very well, I will go and ask the admiral."

"You must wait till he is up."

"Death does not wait, captain." So saying, Père Zephyrin went down into the Duke de Beaufort's room. The prince was shaving.

"Excuse me, my lord, if I come at so early an hour," said the chaplain.

"At whatever hour he may come, Père Zephyrin is always welcome," said the duke.

"Thanks my lord."

"What do you wish, reverend father? Something very important, since you come so early about it."

"It is something very important, indeed, my lord; a favor I wish to ask you."

"Which I am ready to grant. Speak, I am listening."

"One of our sailors on board the Thérèse is very ill, and desires the succors of religion, and I am come to ask leave of you to go to him."

"But to be able to do that, I must stop the whole fleet, which would keep us back two hours!"

"Two hours are less in eternity than two drops of water in the ocean, my lord. The salvation of a soul created to the image of God depends, perhaps, upon your decision."

The prince had just finished dressing. "What time is it, father?"

"Five o'clock."

"How long would it take you to go in a good boat to the Thérèse?"

"About three quarters of an hour."

"What kind of weather is it this morning?"

"Beautiful weather, although the sea is rather rough."

"We shall see," replied the duke, and, throwing a cloak over his shoulders, he went on deck.

"The sea is terribly rough, father," said the duke. "I would not allow you to expose your life thus in a mere boat."

"There is no fear, my lord; the sea knows me well, and the guardian angel of the sick man will protect me!"

"You persist then."

"I beseech you, my lord, allow me."

"Very well. Go, and may God protect you!"

At the same moment the fleet was stopped, and Père Zephyrin jumped into a boat, in which twelve volunteers were already seated, who began to row vigorously towards the Thérèse.

The boat scarcely swerved; it seemed to glide over the waves, leaving behind a white foam. The Duke de Beaufort followed with a glass the progress of these brave men, who, to save a soul, did not mind risking their lives. Courage and self-devotion! The whole of a sailor is comprised in these two words.

At last Père Zephyrin got alongside of the Thérèse. As he went on board all the sailors took off their caps—the sentinels presented arms—the captain came himself to conduct him to the sick man, who was in the infirmary.

"God be praised!" cried he, as he saw the captain enter, bringing with him the priest, "God be praised! And may God bless you, father!"

He was a brave sailor, who had often met Père Zephyrin; the father recognized him, and expressed to him those hopes of recovery which our lips often pronounce in presence of the dying, even when our heart does not respond to them.

"You come just at the right time, father; I feel I am going to die," said the sick sailor.

"I have seen people worse than you recover after all. One must never despair."

"I don't despair; but I feel that I must get ready to go to a country where every body goes, but from which nobody ever comes back. That is to say, I don't think they——"

"Well my friend, since you asked for me I am ready to hear you." Then the sick man began his confession, which did not last five minutes. He seemed so piously resigned, and so generously sacrificed his life to God, that his confessor said, while administering to him—"Now, my friend, you can go whenever God calls you; you are quite prepared."

Upon a bed near to that of the dying man who had called for the assistance of God's minister, was another sailor, who, not being so ill, and having less faith, had laughed at his comrade for being so impatient to see a priest.

"Absolution won't prevent you dying," said he.

"Perhaps not," replied the other; "at all events it will prevent me from dying badly; and, if I had any advice to give you, it would be to do as I am going to do."

"To confess!—I, Pécard—surely you are joking!"

"There have been cleverer fellows than we who have confessed themselves before now, and have not been any the worse for it."

At that moment Père Zephyrin entered; he had now been three quarters of an hour on board the Thérèse. "I am going back again to the admiral's vessel," said he to the impenitent sailor; "won't you, too, take advantage of the opportunity?"

"I am not ill enough for that."

"All the better; you are in a more fit state to make a confession."

"I shall see later."

"Later! perhaps than it may be too late; better now than never."

"What should I have to say? I have neither killed nor stolen. I have always behaved like a brave and an honest sailor,"

"So much the better, your confession will be the sooner over."

"If it would not inconvenience you too much, father, to come to-morrow at the same time."

"Supposing there were no to-morrow for you?"

"Well, in that case, I should not want a confessor; all would be over."

"In this world, but not in the next; believe me, my friend, to-day is yours—take advantage of it."

"And, besides," said the other sailor, joining his exhortations to those of the priest, "if you knew how much good a worthy confession and absolution does one, you would not hesitate a moment. Besides, the father is right; one ought never to put off till to-morrow what can be easily done to-day, for our hours are numbered. Now then, Pécard, you have lived like a good sailor, you ought not to die like a miscreant. That is all I can say."

"Very well, as both of you wish it, I must wish it too," said Pécard, who, after some preparation, commenced his confession. After it was over, "indeed our comrade was right," said he to the Capuchin when he prepared to go. "Confession is a pill which, once swallowed, does one uncommon good."

The sea was still rough; but, instead of having one angel guardian, he had two on his way back. The boat reached safely the admiral's vessel.

That evening the Duke de Beaufort received to dinner all the officers of his vessel. Père Zephyrin, with a joyful heart at having done his duty, was at his right hand; the captain was on his left. The meal was as usual seasoned by wit and champagne; for the Duke de Beaufort, the brother and friend of his officers, preferred joyous friendly meetings to the stiffness of cold etiquette; he possessed the rare faculty of making every body around him at home.

"By the way, father," said he to the Capuchin, while dessert was coming in, "you have told us nothing of your morning's expedition. I am sure the account of it would interest these gentlemen." At the Prince's invitation, the Capuchin briefly recounted, but much better than we have done, dear reader, his arrival on board the Thérèse, the scene with the two sailors, and his return to the admiral's vessel.

"Full success!" said the Duke. "I am not surprised at this ; you are accustomed to overcome hearts, and to sway the consciences of men."

The Capuchin bowed an acknowledgement of these praises, justified by the affection of all ranks of sailors which he had won, and said, "I forgot, my lord, to give you the messages these poor sailors intrusted me with."

"I am ready to receive them, reverend father."

"The two sailors to whom I administered the last sacraments told me to express, in the most lively terms, their gratitude to your royal highness."

"I only did my duty."

"They owe you, my lord, a sacred debt. They will pray God to pay it for them."

"Brave men ! Do you hear that ?" cried the Duke, glancing at the captain on his left. "You would have deprived me of a great satisfaction if I had not been there to give the order which you refused to give."

"Faith, my lord," said the captain, "I will frankly tell you that I did not dare to take upon myself the responsibility of stopping a fleet in full sail for one sailor."

"If the signal had denoted that the spiritual assistance of our reverend father was required for an officer, what would you have done ?"

"I should have considered the matter more attentively."

"Very well ; if the same signal had said it was for an admiral, for a duke, for the Duke de Beaufort, for instance ?"

"Ah, then, my lord," said the captain, "I should not have hesitated a quarter of a second."

"You would immediately have given the order which the Father desired ?"

"No doubt, my lord."

"And you would have done right, just the same as you have done wrong, in refusing to a simple sailor what you would have granted to me ; for remember, sir, before God, who is master of us all, the soul of a poor sailor is as precious as that of an admiral, were he a prince of the blood." After saying these words with a firm voice, the Duke rose, took his neighbor's arm, and followed by his officers, went on deck.

Shortly after this incident the Duke perished bravely under the walls of Candia.

TYBORNE:

AND

WHO WENT THERE IN THE DAYS OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.

"The white-robed army of Martyrs praise Thee."

CHAPTER I.

"Rot je ne suis,
Prince, ni comte aussi,
• Je suis le Sire de Coucy."

MOTTO OF THE COUCY FAMILY.

IT was a sunny morning in May, a pleasant breeze danced among the leaves of the trees in the long avenue, and gambolled among the flowers, while the sunshine tried its best to enliven the gloomy gray aspect of De Lisle Castle. It did not succeed there though. Not only was the place stern and forbidding in its warlike aspect of high walls, and wide moat, and "grim portcullis," but the ivy that clung to parts of the walls, and the long grass that grew in the court-yard, bore evidence of neglect and decay. As one approached nearer one might see the moat was dry, and entering within the walls there were still further proofs that the glory of the house of De Lisle was dim, if not departed. The stables were almost empty; not an armed warder was visible; the attendants were few, and generally old, evidently faithful servants, who had clung to the fortunes of a fallen house.

The ascent to Castle de Lisle was long and toilsome, for it had been built on one of the highest points, so that from its towers the surrounding country lay stretched out as in a map, and it was a fair scene; woods of rich foliage, a noble river, which wound its way calmly along till it reached the sea, that sparkled like silver in the distance, hill and dale, lay before the spectator's eye, and far farther than he could reach they were all the rich possessions of the Barons de Lisle. They had held the castle since the time of the first William, and their estates had often been added to by grateful sovereigns, for each De Lisle in his generation had been a faithful and loyal subject. They were a noble line, not only in long descent, but in knightly deeds. No stain of cowardice or of treachery, of avarice or baseness, had soiled their escutcheon. Sans peur et sans reproche, might have been also their motto.

In the great hall you might see the helmet and sword of the baron who fought by the side of Godfrey of Bouillon, and of him who followed Richard of the Lion-heart, and in the family chronicles you might hear of him who sat at Runnymede, and lent his voice to force a craven monarch to grant the rights of his people. And wherefore, then, this sad change? Has the line of De Lisle, like so many noble families of late times, failed in their heirs male, that their princely possessions are left desolate? Not so; no riches with curses clinging to them had soiled the hands of De Lisle. No ruined abbey had been added to their possessions. No cries of consecrated spouses of Christ driven from their cloister shall meet them at the judgment-seat. But Edward Baron de Lisle had died a glorious death. He had steadfastly resisted the laws by which he would have been compelled to forswear his religion. He was, with many other Catholic gentlemen, thrown into prison, for his high rank and station made the magistrates determined to set an example. While in prison, Lord de Lisle was attacked by one of the fevers which perpetually haunted the place; he died after a few days' illness, away from his wife and children, and without priestly consolations. Prison attendants closed his eyes, and arranged the shroud around the gallant form. It was a hard fate for him, in the prime of manhood, but he murmured not. "Mourn not for me, sweet wife," he wrote; "I die in a braver quarrel than did my fathers; I die for the faith of Christ. Sweet Jesu keep you, my fair wife; in Him I trust, to Him I confide my soul."

Alice Baroness de Lisle gazed on her two children in dismay. Her Walter, now Baron de Lisle, twelve years old, her Isabel, two years younger. How should she bring them up in the faith of their fathers? For Walter she saw but one course; he must go abroad to the college at Rheims, and there receive his education. Alice hastened to put her plan into execution, and scarcely had she done so when she learnt that instead of an act of attainder being passed upon the title and estates of De Lisle, the former was untouched; the latter, with the persons of the Baroness and her children, left in the guardianship of the Earl of Beauville, a distant kinsman. Then Alice heartily rejoiced at what she had done, for she knew well the earl would not have left a stone unturned to pervert Walter's faith.

This lessening of punishment upon the family of De Lisle was not to be attributed to clemency on the part of the Queen. The Earl of Beauville and the Baron de Lisle had been close friends in early youth, and though in manhood Beauville's profession of the Protestant religion had tended to estrange them, yet the bond of affection between them was very strong, and on hearing of his friend's death, Beauville was struck to the heart. He was high in the queen's councils, a man of talents and astuteness, whose value Elizabeth well knew, and by his intercession the bill of attainder was averted, and a chance given to the son to redeem the favor his father had lost. Another grace Beauville procured was to remove the body of the late baron to his own castle, where it was interred in the crypt beneath the chapel. His displeasure at discovering Walter's flight was very great, and he made frequent endeavors to induce Alice to recall him, but in vain. Shortly before our story opens his persuasions had assumed a more urgent form, from the fact that a new order concerning children educated in foreign colleges had been issued by the Privy Council. But no threat of penalty could move Alice from her purpose, and to his indignant letters she returned the same answer. Lord Beauville knew the jealous character of the queen too well to lavish favors on the baroness, and therefore all he had dared to do for her since her widowhood, had been to allow her a moderate maintenance, and to permit her with her daughter to remain in the castle, with a few attendants. All appearance of state was to be carefully avoided, and thus the building gradually assumed the appearance of decay we have described. Still as the servants who had remained were old and faithful, the family had enjoyed religious freedom compared with that of other Catholics in those sad times.

* A king I am not, neither a prince was I, I was the Sire de Coucy.

On the May morning we have described, on the broad terrace which ran on the south side of the castle, walked two maidens, both apparently about the age of seventeen. One was tall and slender, and her Norman cast of countenance, with her brilliant dark eyes and raven hair, spoke her at once a daughter of De Lisle. The other, who was shorter, had evidently more Saxon blood. Her tresses were of chestnut color, and her merry eyes of blue, and though inferior to her cousin Isabel in beauty, Mary Thoresby was a most winning creature.

The two maidens continued to pace together in silence, while Mary, occasionally stooping to pick some of the flowers that grew along the side of the wall, quickly wove them into a bouquet, and then, passing one arm round Isabel's waist, she held up the flowers to her face with a smile full of tender sympathy. Isabel smiled too, but said :

"Thanks, dear Mary ; oh, how I forget myself. How dull this visit must be to you. All the long journey you have taken to come and see us, and then to give you such cold cheer, is too bad."

"Darling Isabel, do not talk in this way. If I could only be some comfort to you."

"How do you think my mother looks?" said Isabel, in an anxious tone ; "tell me the truth, Mary."

"She looks very ill, Isabel," answered Mary, earnestly ; "she is so thin and worn ; but there is no actual disease, Rachel says ; and so may we not hope for better things?"

"No disease, save a broken heart," answered Isabel. "It is not often people recover from that, I fear." And the tears filled her eyes.

They had reached the end of the terrace, and as they turned again to pursue their walk they perceived an old serving-man coming towards them. He carried in his hand a letter, and, bowing respectfully before his young mistress, gave it to her.

"A messenger from the Earl of Beauville, Mistress Isabel," said the man ; "he is the first courier, he saith, others will shortly follow, and the earl and his train will be here by sundown."

Isabel took the letter. "Then, Roger, you must make what preparation is possible."

But when the man disappeared, Mary was alarmed at the look of anguish which appeared on Isabel's face.

"He comes to torment her again," she cried ; "to wear out her precious life in this vain strife ; he will kill her, I know he will."

"It is most cruel and inhuman," returned Mary weeping.

"I must go and prepare her for it," said Isabel hastily ; "and you, dear Mary, will you tell the servants Lord Beauville is coming ? Imagine what we are to do for provisions !"

"I will go and consult with good old Bridget," said Mary cheerfully.

"Don't trouble your head about that, dearest ; we will provide better food and lodgings than our guests deserve."

They had been walking towards the castle while they spoke, and had now reached it. Mary, turning to the left, tripped away towards the kitchen and buttery ; while Isabel, with a slower step, began to ascend the broad staircase.

A wide gallery ran round the great hall, from whence doors opened. These doors did not all admit into apartments ; some led to narrow passages, which wound their way to different parts of the house. But the door which Isabel opened was that of an anteroom to one of the principal chambers. At the end of the anteroom a thick curtain of arras formed the entrance to the apartment beyond ; the floor was strewn with rushes, and Isabel gathered up her long garments, that there should be no rustle, and advanced softly towards the inner room. She pushed aside the curtain and looked in. The room was spacious, and not ill-furnished, though an air of poverty hung about it. A cumbersome bedstead, with heavy curtains of faded crimson, stood in one corner. There were three windows, but all were shaded by curtains of the same hue. A couch was near one of these windows, and on it lay a lady asleep ; while near her, on a low stool, sat an attendant, of middle age, who looked round as Isabel entered, and laid her finger on her lips. Isabel stood still, and gazed on her mother with a beating heart.

Still on that countenance might be traced the loveliness of Alice Thoresby, fairest of the noble damsels that had graced Queen Mary's court ; though time and sorrow and sickness had done their work, and sharpened the chiselled features, and saddened the soft bright eyes, and silver'd the fair locks, and robbed the bloom from the cheek and lip, yet still upon that face there dwelt a look of unutterable sweetness,—a light not of earth shed there its gleams. Presently, gently sighing, she awoke, and turned at once a loving glance on Isabel.

"Have you been on the terrace, my own child ?" said Lady de Lisle. "I have slept so well and long, thank God."

"Yes, dear mother," answered Isabel, kneeling down beside her ; "I have been walking with Mary, and was interrupted by the arrival of a messenger with a letter from Lord Beauville."

Lady de Lisle's face assumed an expression of pain as she took the letter from Isabel. Its contents were brief ; merely that Lord Beauville, anxious to confer with Lady de Lisle on business, ventured to bespeak lodgings for a few days for himself and train, and also for a young and gallant kinsman who accompanied him.

"I fear me much," said Lady de Lisle, "he comes to endeavor once more to break my fixed resolution not to recall my son. Alas ! why such scenes rending a mother's heart ? Do I not yearn, with my whole soul, once more to hold him in these arms ? Could anything but the knowledge that it is not God's holy will induce me to forbear ?"

"And Father Gerard, dear mother ?" said Isabel inquiringly. The baroness clasped her hands.

"Selfish that I am, I had forgotten. What can be done ? The time is so short ; whither can he fly ?" And her weak frame shook with agitation and affright.

"Mother," said Isabel, "I think he is safe ; surely the earl is too honorable to betray us."

"Yes," returned Alice ; "but who is to answer for his train ? The reward offered for the capture of a priest is high and tempting ; his life is not safe here."

"A thought has struck me," said Isabel ; "let him go to Master Ford's house. Rose is here ; she passed me just now in the corridor. The distance is short, and he can go as serving-man, taking care of Rose ; and there he will be safe."

"Yes," answered her mother, "I think that will do ; we will suggest it, at least. Go you, Isabel, and seek our good father, and beg him to come to me forthwith."

Note.—A proclamation was set forth, commanding all who had children abroad to call them home by an appointed day. This was to compel parents to Protestantize their children.—Madden's Penal Laws.

"If any person shall pass or go, or shall convey or send, or cause to be sent or conveyed, any child or other person into any parts beyond the seas, to the intent and purpose to enter into, or be resident or trained up in, any priory, abbey, nunnery, popish university, college, or school, or house of Jesuits, priests, or in any private popish family ; and shall be there by any Jesuit, seminary, priest, friar, monk, or other popish person, instructed, persuaded, or strengthened in the popish religion, in any sort to profess the same ; or shall convey or send, or shall cause to be conveyed or sent, any sum of money or other thing for the maintenance of any child or other person gone or sent, or trained and instructed as aforesaid ; or under color of any charity, benevolence or alms, towards the relief of any priory, abbey, or nunnery, college, school, or any religious house ; every person so sending, conveying, or causing to be sent and conveyed, as well any such child or other person, as any sum of money or other thing ; and every person being sent beyond the seas, shall be disabled to sue or use any action, plaint or information in course of law, or to prosecute any suit in any court of equity, or to be committed of any ward, or executor or administrator to any person, or capable of any legacy or deed of gift, or to bear any office ; and shall forfeit his goods, and shall forfeit his lands during life."—Lynn's Ecclesiastical Law.

CHAPTER II.

"The rod they take so calm Shall prove in heaven a martyr's palm."

KEBLE.

ISABEL re-entered the gallery, and opening another door, she traversed a long winding passage which led to a different part of the castle; before a small door, which a stranger would hardly perceive, she stopped and knocked gently. A voice within bade her enter, and she did so, closing the door carefully behind her. The room was small, and almost bare of furniture, and bore an appearance of being a receptacle for lumber. There was, indeed, a wooden table and a few stools; but packing-cases—some open, some closed—were about in all directions. Near the table sat an old gray-haired man, with an open and benign countenance. He wore the common travelling-dress of the day, and opposite to him was seated a woman: she was wrapped in a riding-cloak, and the hood falling back displayed the head and face of a young girl; on the entrance of Isabel she rose, and, making a low reverence, prepared to leave the room.

"Do not go, Rose," said Isabel, "it is indeed well you are here; I was about to send for you;" and then going forward she knelt down at the old man's feet, and laying her clasped hands upon his knees, said, in a tone of distress, "Father, you must fly."

Father Gerard smiled as he laid his hand on Isabel's head: "Well, my child, it is no new thing, and I am ready; but I grieve to leave your mother. Tell me what fresh danger hath befallen us."

Isabel now related the expected arrival of Lord Beauville, and she ended her tale saying, "And father, there is no time for you to fly to any distance. We thought of Master Ford's; the tenants on our land are respected, you know, by Lord Beauville, and none of his train are likely to wander into such a retired spot; and Rose, I warrant me," she continued, turning her head towards the maiden, "will keep good watch, and then, dear father, when this visit is over, you will return to us, will you not?"

"Willingly, my child," said the priest, "you have arranged all well and kindly for me. Master Ford will, I know, gladly give me refuge, and God, and He alone, my children, will reward your charity towards me, His unworthy servant."

Neither Rose nor Isabel could answer, save by the tears that showed how dearly each prized the opportunity of ministering to his safety.

"Now," said Father Gerard, "I will to your mother's chamber; and how soon do you suppose, Rose, we ought to be going?"

"In about two hours, father, if it please you, not sooner, for it would excite suspicion along the road to see me return so speedily from the castle."

"True, Rose," said Isabel, "you have sharper wit than I, for I should have despatched you with all haste."

"In two hours, then, I will be ready," said Father Gerard; and the little party then separated.

On leaving the room, Father Gerard carefully locked the door after him, and took away the key; for in that little desolate room, full of dust and lumber, abode the Lord of Glory, the Redeemer of men.

Father Gerard went to the apartment of the baroness; Isabel and Rose did not follow him, but proceeded to the right wing of the castle, where they found Mary Thoresby busily engaged in aiding and directing the servants in their preparations for the coming influx of guests. Isabel and Rose gave their assistance, but after some little time, Rachel, Lady de Lisle's maid, came to summon her young mistress to her mother's room, and, "you, also, Mistress Thoresby," said Rachel, "my lady desires to see."

In the ante-room of the baroness's apartment, Father Gerard was standing.

"Isabel," said he, as the cousins approached him, "your mother is about to receive the last sacraments."

Isabel turned pale, she could not speak, but Father Gerard read what she meant, and answered—

"There is no immediate danger that I can perceive, my child, but your mother is, as you well know, very ill, and she cannot see me depart with the uncertainty as to when she can see a priest again, without receiving all the strength given by our holy faith."

"Oh, courage, Isabel," said Mary, "who knows but that the holy anointing may raise her up again, as it did our aunt, Lady Clare; you remember her wonderful recovery, do you not, father?"

"Indeed I do," answered the priest, "and many similar cases. Confide in God, my dear child," said he to Isabel, "and now go into your mother's room, and prepare it, while I go to bring the Blessed Sacrament and the holy oils."

Isabel silently obeyed.

"How great a blessing it is, father," said Mary, "that we have the Blessed Sacrament reserved."

"Yes, indeed," he answered, "and that we have been able to say Mass daily for weeks past, for all the household are Catholics, and trustworthy."

"Ah father," said Mary, sighing, "a few years back, and if you had needed to carry the Host from the chapel to the sick chamber of a Baroness de Lisle, we would have strewn flowers under your feet, and bells would have rung, and incense arise, as you passed along."

"Truly," he answered, "and in these evil days it is not permitted us to honor our Master by outward reverence; we must all the more be bowed in contrite inward devotion before His adorable presence, His wondrous atonement."

"What do you think of my aunt's state?" inquired Mary?

"That she is fearfully weak, and most unequal to the agitation of a harassing interview with Lord Beauville, but time is passing, I will now go to the chapel, and will soon return."

They shaded out the noonday glare with their curtain; they lit the two wax tapers, and spread the linen cloth on the simple altar; a few flowers, which Mary had hastily plucked, white roses and sweet jasmine, shed their fragrance round the spot where Jesus Christ tarried for awhile. Silent knelt the watchers round, while the holy rite went on; upon the wasted hands and feet, upon the eyes that had wept so many tears, the seal was set, given the strength of the last anointing, that raises many to life again, that carries others safe through the dark valley, and then at length, when His graces had come before, He came himself in lowliest guise: Alice de Lisle received her God. Then there was a great hush in that chamber, and they knelt and prayed on, as only the agonizing, and the persecuted, and the dying can pray. At length Father Gerard rose; he laid his hand on Lady de Lisle's head, she opened her eyes, and they beamed with light.

"Yes, father, I can part with you now."

He bent over her with an earnest look: "Do not forget me," he said; and then blessing her, he quitted the room. Soon afterwards, Rose Ford, seated on horseback behind a serving-man, was making all speed to her father's house, some six miles distant.

Mary and Isabel resumed their occupations in the household arrangements. Rachel sat watching her mistress, who lay perfectly still upon her couch. All fears and forebodings seemed to have passed away; upon her face was written a perfect peace. Rachel had occasion to come to Isabel for an instant, and she took advantage of it to whisper to her young mistress, "Surely it will raise her up again. We shall see her walk among us once more;" and though Isabel shook her head mournfully, still her heart echoed the same language: "To have her well again, surely then, I could bear all," said Isabel to herself.

It was a glorious sunset that evening, the sky was lit up with a deep-red glow, and bright colors played on the floor of the old hall, when Isabel and Mary descended thither to receive Lord Beauville, who was at that moment dismounting in the courtyard. The two cousins formed a fair picture, Isabel's luxuriant black hair was gathered from her brow, and her hidden by her coil of muslin and lace, but the small ruffle did not hide altogether her white throat. Mary's face beamed with light and cheerfulness, while on Isabel's was written care and sadness, which did not, however, diminish her beauty.

The Earl entered the hall. He was a finely-formed and handsome man, generally considered stern-looking; but when, as at this moment, he smiled, every feature so entirely relaxed that one could but suppose the former expression more well-assumed and familiar than natural. Lord Beauville was leaning on the arm of his young kinsman, who was apparently about twenty years of age; he wore, as did also the earl, a riding cloak, and a low Spanish hat shaded his face. He did not follow Lord Beauville's example of uncovering as they drew near the ladies. Isabel's quick eye denoted this, and she was as quickly offended at the slight, but Lord Beauville was now saluting her, and she had also to present to him Mistress Thoresby, whom the earl was delighted to see, he said,—he remembered her as a child; and while these compliments were passing, the eyes of the young stranger were fixed on Isabel, with so intense a gaze as to embarrass her, and increase the offence she had taken. With the lofty air she could so well assume, she said:

"My lord, you will doubtless be glad to rest after your day's riding. Supper is preparing, and my cousin and myself will do ourselves the honor of supping with your lordship."

"Thanks, fair lady," said Beauville, raising her hand to his lips; "but, first, I have a boon to crave, that we retire into a more private room for a short space, for I have matters to confer upon with you at once."

Isabel, of course, could not refuse, and led the way into the first room leading from the hall. Great was her astonishment, when she saw the earl still followed by the stranger. She grew crimson with indignation.

"Let me present my young kinsman to you, fair Isabel," said Lord Beauville.

Isabel bent haughtily; the young man lifted his hat from his brow at last—why did he gaze at her in that strange, agitated manner? why that look of intelligence on the earl's face,—the light broke in upon her.

"Is it possible? Oh, do not deceive me!" she cried; but in that instant Walter de Lisle clasped her in his arms, and Isabel wept upon her brother's breast.

CHAPTER III.

"And when the morn came chill and sad,
And dim with early showers,
Her quiet eyelids closed; she had Another morn than ours."—HOOD.

"Bring him to me, Isabel; my boy, my own," murmured Alice de Lisle, roused from her calm rest to hear the news her daughter brought.

Isabel called Walter from the ante-room; and in an instant he was kneeling by his mother's couch, and laying his head on her bosom. While she twined her arms around him, Isabel and Rachel left the room; mother and son were alone. For some minutes neither could speak.

"My Walter, my own boy! do I really hold you once more in my arms? It is eight long years since I parted from you, and I have scarce heard from you since. You have not forgotten me, Walter——"

"Forgotten you, mother!" he answered; "you have been in my heart by day and by night. Oh, how I have longed to see your face again! and truly, though I chafed at the manner of my coming hither, when I learnt 'twas to see you again, my anger vanished."

"How was it accomplished, Walter?" said his mother.

"It was my fault first, mother," said Walter, coloring; "for I was out of the college grounds, and in returning I lost my way. When a stranger accented me and spoke in English, expressed great sympathy with the college, and asked many questions about it."

"And you answered them?"

"Oh no, mother; we are strictly forbidden to do so, and I was not going to be disobedient twice in one day; but the stranger, stopping at a house in the outskirts of the town, asked me to wait a moment for him, and then he would accompany me back to the college. While I stood waiting, two men came behind me and threw a cloak over my head and face, and bound my hands and feet, and bore me into the house. At night I was bound and gagged, put on horseback, and not till we were far out of Rheims would they release me, and then only after I had given my parole not to attempt to escape. From that moment I was treated with the utmost kindness and respect; we made all speed on the coast, and had a favorable voyage. On reaching London, I was taken to Lord Beauville's house; he frankly acknowledged the plot was his, but formed in kindness both to you and myself; and next day we commenced our journey hither. As I journeyed through France, mother, I had plenty of time to reflect on my conduct, and to see there was good reason for the strict rules against going into the town that Father Mordant has laid on the students, and bitterly to regret the consequences of my conduct; but then, when I thought of seeing you, I fear I was not as sorry as I ought to have been."

"It was very wrong of Lord Beauville," said Alice; and yet I feel powerless to blame him, when he has brought me this exquisite delight of clasping you once more in my arms. Let me look at thee Walter; art thou like thy father?"

Walter raised his head, and Alice gazed on a face of which any mother might justly have been proud. She brushed back the clustering hair from the broad fair brow; she looked into the depths of the dark eyes, sparkling with fire and vigor; she marked the finely-formed features, the radiant smile that lit up his face, as, bending down again after the survey, Walter kissed again and again his mother's pale cheek.

"I am selfish in keeping you here, my son," said Lady de Lisle; "you are tired and hungry; the household are at supper in the hall, you should join them."

"Oh no, mother, send me not away; to stay here is food and rest to me," said he, as he drew her closer to him.

So they passed their time, while their conversation went on in low and earnest whispers.

"And you were happy at the college?" said the baroness.

"Oh yes, dearest mother; very happy. The Fathers are, as you will believe, all goodness, and my companions all very dear to me. There are in the college sons of almost every noble Catholic house in England; and it is strange, dear mother, that the sense of exile, and the persecutions endured by our kindred in England, fail to sadden us. A gayer set you would see nowhere."

"I can well believe it," answered Alice; "for even here, in the midst of persecutions, fines, and imprisonments, that surround us on all sides, our spirits rise wondrously. It is because the sorrows make us despise time, and see the emptiness of worldly glory and renown, that can change so speedily with a monarch's breath. Are there any of the Travers' family at Rheims, Walter? Amy Travers is a dear friend of mine."

"Yes, there were two Travers there, but William has returned home, and only Basil remains now. He is preparing for the priesthood."

"The priesthood for Basil! Well, indeed, I should not have dreamed that; William was grave and scholarly, Basil was ever a roysterer, and the life of the old hall."

"He is a fine fellow; and fiery now in the great cause. Why, mother," said Walter, lowering his voice into a whisper, "he would be a martyr, if he could; the queen hath already put some priests to death for saying Mass, and Basil longs thus to die. Now, mother, a De Lisle was never a coward; I could die in battle, in fair and open fight, and even if unjustly condemned, as too many have been, I could meet the death of my peers on the scaffold; but like a dog, as they slay men at Tyborne—ah, mother, the very thought makes me turn cold!"

Alice's pale cheeks grew paler still. "God save thee from such a fate, my boy!" murmured she; "but yet honor beyond all praise those who are called to it: for surely to Him who died between two thieves, the very disgrace and obloquy you shudder at makes them dear in His eyes. But," continued she, rousing herself, "I will not have such sad talk the first evening to greet you with, my boy. Methinks I hear Isabel's steps in the ante-room. Will you go and see if she is there?" But as she spoke, Isabel and Mary entered together.

"Supper is over, then?" inquired the baroness.

"Oh yes, dear aunt, I am thankful to say it is," answered Mary; "it is a blessing to get rid of that terrible earl for a while."

"Has he frightened you, Mary?" said the baroness, smiling.

"Aunt, he is just like a hawk; sometimes he looks through you as if he longed to put you on the rack, and then"—Mary began to mimic his gestures—"he is so soft, pays such gentle compliments, oh, I did so long to say, 'Out with thee, hypocrite!'"

Isabel and Walter were both convulsed with laughing at Mary's ready mimicry.

"Poor Beauville!" said Alice, sighing; "he was a different being a few years since, open as the day, generous and noble; grievous has been the change. He follows now a shadow which will lead him to destruction. I must now, I suppose, prepare to see him."

"Not to night, dearest mother," said Isabel, in an alarmed tone; "when I was about to call even Walter away, for you looked so flushed and weary, and have endured so much to-day."

"But has he not asked to see me?" said the baroness.

"Yes, truly, mother, he did; but I told him you were too ill; and he would have lorded it over me, and said that he must see you—but," and Isabel's color rose, "he is not the master over all the castle."

Alice looked sadly at Isabel.

"Alas, my child," she said, "I ever sorrow when I hear you speak thus, and this matter brooks no delay. Go you, Walter, and beg Lord Beauville to visit me here; when he comes, I would be alone with him; but do you, dear children, remain within call."

"You are ill, indeed, Alice," said the earl, as he took the thin hand and gazed on the wasted form and features of the baroness, with evident emotion.

"Yes, Philip," said she, sweetly; "it is an illness that has no cure; and were it not for my children, I could rejoice it were so. But sit beside me now, for I have to thank you for a great delight, and yet to chide you sorely for giving it to me."

"I have been more merciful to you, Alice, than you would have been to yourself and your children. Had I not brought Walter home, the estates would have been confiscated, and a bill of attainder passed against your house; indeed, you are mistaken if you deem the queen means not to put her decrees into execution."

"I have no such hope," answered Lady de Lisle; "but you know well, my lord, that I count the lands and honors of my son as light in the balance with his honor towards his God. It is a cruel trial of faith and patience at his years that you have now exposed him to,—a trial I would fain have spared him,—and bade my pining heart, that craved so for his presence, be still and endure the pain."

"At his years?" repeated the earl. "Walter is twenty."

"And at twenty," replied Alice, "he is to be kept back from the companionship of the youths of his own age, excluded from the court and university, deprived of all the aims to which it is but natural youthful ambition should aspire."

"Tush!" answered the Earl, "why exclude him from the court, at least. He hath studied enough by this time; now let him win his way; and, with his grace and bearing I warrant you, Walter, Baron de Lisle, will, Papist though he be, ruffle it with the best among us. Elizabeth Tudor has her woman's weakness about her, and the face of yonder boy will please her fancy marvellously well."

"Rather would I see him laid in his grave, in all his beauty and innocence," said Alice, "than send him to meet the corruption of Elizabeth's court. No, Philip; thither, with my consent, he shall never go."

"Now this is too much," said Beauville, starting to his feet.

"Wilt keep the lad here till he moulder into dust, or make him a shaven priest, perchance? God forefend; but by virtue of my office as guardian, I have power, and I say he shall go thither."

There was no answer; but as Beauville perceived the deadly paleness that overspread the face of the baroness, his anger fled.

"Nay, Alice," said he, sitting down again; "why dost thou anger me thus? Thou knowest I would not harm the boy."

"It is useless to argue," said she, faintly; "I know you have power; and if my words, my supplications,—if the memory of our early years, of my husband, your true and faithful friend,—can move you not, I have no other weapons to turn against you but my prayers."

"Well, well," said the Earl, soothingly, "let the matter rest awhile; we will talk more calmly anon. I was to blame for speaking thus roughly; but this religion of yours, Alice, does send you distraught, I verily think. I will leave you now, and to-morrow we will confer further. Fare thee well, sweet Alice," and he raised her hand to his lips; "do not judge me harshly."

Alice raised herself into a sitting posture; she fixed her eyes upon him as she said, "Philip, life for me has nearly run out its span! I stand on the borders of eternity, and see what you cannot now behold; but that hour shall come also to you, and as you hope for mercy on that day, deal fairly with my children; be true to them, God will be true to you; lay snares for them, and that hour shall come on you as a snare!"

She sank back fainting upon her pillows. Beauville called for assistance, and departed ere she woke to consciousness. When she recovered, she expressed a wish to see Walter again; but this was opposed by Isabel, who pleaded the lateness of the hour, and begged that her mother would suffer herself to be undressed and go to bed. Lady de Lisle was too feeble to contend; she yielded, saying, half to herself, "Tell him to be strong—tell him to be strong!" When laid in her bed, she seemed much relieved, and sank instantly to sleep. This comforted Isabel, but not Rachel, who feared it was but a token of the utter exhaustion to which her lady was reduced.

"Go you to bed, Rachel," whispered Isabel; "I will watch beside my mother to-night."

Rachel was unwilling to go; but a look from her young mistress speedily reminded her that there was no gainsaying the will of Isabel de Lisle; and Rachel went to lie down, but not to rest, for she dreaded the effects, on the feeble frame of her lady, of all she had that day gone through.

The castle grew gradually quiet; steps and voices died away, and all was hushed. Midnight rang out its chimes; and the day, so full of events and of strong emotions, was past.

Isabel was used to watching; she regularly shared with Rachel the task of waiting on the baroness at night, when her illness was unusually severe. As the night wore on, she felt surprised at her mother's long continued sleep—so different from her usual restless starts and sudden wakings. Generally she required frequent nourishment during the night; now the wine stood untouched.

As the morning began to dawn, Isabel felt drowsy; and to shake it off, she stole to the window and looked out. The mist that precedes the sunrise veiled the landscape, but as she watched, it began to disperse; streaks of pink scattered over the sky and gathered in more brilliant hues towards the east; the first notes of the birds were heard; and soon gloriously arose the sun over the broad lands and fair woods of the De Lisles; far as her eye could reach over that wide landscape of wood and water, hill and dale, luxuriant and beautiful, spread the heritage of her fathers.

"And is it thus," she mused, "that the heir of these lands, the lord of these possessions, has returned to his home—to ride at the rein of a Beauville, to be marshalled by him into his own castle, to be ordered hither and thither as he lists? What indignity! Oh, if I were but a man, the blood of De Lisle in my veins, would I not set myself free from this thralldom, and reign baron in my own castle?"

A slight sound in the room startled her; in an instant she was at her mother's side. Lady de Lisle still slept, but she turned on her side, and murmured something to herself. Isabel bent her ear close to her mother's mouth; she heard, breathed in half-conscious whisper—

"Æterna fac eum sanctia tuis in gloria numerari."

There was a strange sort of shadow on her mother's face; Isabel sprang to the door of the adjoining room; Rachel was awake, and in a moment was at her lady's bedside. They knelt in silence.

"She will wake," whispered Isabel; but there was no more waking to earth for Alice de Lisle; there was no agony, no death-struggle,—without a sigh she slept into death. The gray shade gathered now over that fair face, and the soul stood before its Judge.

Bright streamed the sun over wood and field; the sounds of wakening life, of earthly toil, and struggle and pleasure, were to be heard; but to Isabel's ears all sounds were dulled, save one everlasting chime that rang—

"Æterna fac eum sanctis tuis in gloria numerari."

CHAPTER IV.

"Mourn, therefore, no true lover's death;
Life only him annoys;
And when he taketh leave of life,
Then love begins his joys."

POEMS BY FATHER SOUTHWELL.

DEEP was the gloom that now fell over Castle de Lisle, and few have there been who were so deeply mourned as the gentle baroness. Many of the servants and tenantry remembered her arrival as a bride, or in the first glow of her short married happiness. They remembered, too, how, a few years after their marriage, when Isabel was still a child, the sun of her life had suddenly gone down, and left her alone and widowed; they remembered how sorrows had followed quickly on that greatest one, and how meekly all had been borne, how she had lived a life of retirement, of constant prayer, of frequent almsgiving; they had watched her steadfastness in resisting the temptations of worldly success, that would have drawn her from her faith; they knew that her death had been caused more by the pressure of mental anguish on a delicate frame, than by actual disease; and deep, though not loud, were the murmurs uttered by the servants and peasantry against Lord Beauville.

Isabel shed no tears for her loss. In silence and composure she performed the last sacred offices, arrayed the wasted body in its last earthly clothing, crossed the thin hands upon the breast, and sealed down the eyes, whose glance had been sunlight to her. She passed hours kneeling by the corpse, and gazing on the marble face, so lovely in its repose. She did not want sympathy, and she seemed to shrink from the sight of her brother, while all felt that the presence of Lord Beauville was more than she could brook; but to this trial she was not exposed. The Earl was deeply moved by the death of Alice de Lisle. His first sensation was one of horror at the part himself had had in the sudden snapping of the life of the gentle baroness; but this faded away. His heart was incrustated too thickly with worldliness for such emotions to do more than float on the surface. He turned from sad thoughts to occupation. He began to look narrowly into the state of the De Lisle estates; so that he could put them under charge of a trusty steward of his own, as he now designed to close the castle, retaining only a few servants to keep it in safety, and to convey his wards to his own house.

It will readily be supposed that the shock to Walter had been most severe: the cup of happiness had been placed to his lips, that he might taste all its sweetness, and then dashed away. The fond visions of his boyhood were now never to be realized. In his dreams for many years past he had pictured to himself the fair face of his mother smiling upon him. Many a secret grief and joy had been treasured up to pour forth to her. The thought of seeing again his mother and sister had been far dearer to him than that of returning to his possessions, for the strongest passion in Walter's nature was human love.

The first night spent in his castle he had gone to rest with no proud or ambitious thoughts, but with the memory of his mother's kiss and blessing lingering with him like a spell. He awoke full of bright anticipations of the hours he would spend with her, of the comfort he would be to her,—he awoke and found her dead.

The second day after the death of Lady de Lisle, Mary Thoresby went into the castle gardens. There, flung on the ground, beneath a wide-spreading elm tree, she found Walter; his head was resting on his arm, and his whole aspect was one of the deepest despondency. Mary knelt down beside him, saying—

"O Walter! how I grieve to see you thus! Would that I could comfort you!"

"Oh! there is no comfort, Mary," said he wearily, "no comfort left on earth."

"If we could only have Father Gerard here!" sighed Mary. "I suppose it would not be safe to go to him?"

"Go to him!—where is he then?" inquired Walter.

Mary told him, and proceeded to relate all the incidents of the day of his arrival. Walter was aroused and interested; and when he heard that his dear mother had partaken of all the consolations of the Church for the dying, he shed tears.

"Oh! thanks be to God, a thousand times, for that, Mary; that she died not as many do, without priest or sacrament."

"Yes, indeed," answered she; "an! surely in such evil days we may rejoice that one so good, and so patient, should be taken from them. Surely her bitter trials purified her even on earth, and now she has entered into the fulness of rest and joy. O Walter! we would not wish her back again on this weary earth, when now she can see His face."

"Yes, Mary," he said, in a choking voice, "I know it is selfish to have wished her to linger one more day on earth; but, oh; you can never know how I have longed for her, these many years past; how it seems as if, could I only have told her all that is in my heart, I could have borne it; and then, the bitterest of all is to know that I have had a hand in her death."

"Walter!"

"Well, Mary, Isabel deems it so."

"O Walter! you should not say such words."

"How can I otherwise interpret her manner? She shrinks from the very sight of me. Besides, it is true, Mary; the agitation of seeing me, the shock of my arrival; and the harassing interview with Lord Beauville, hastened, if not caused her death. I made Rachel acknowledge it, and I would rather know the truth. Oh! how bitterly do I now repent my rash disobedience to Father Mordaunt."

"Isabel," answered Mary, "is beside herself with grief, and does not know what she does. She shrinks from every one; it is her nature not to require sympathy; and surely we are always taught not to mourn over sorrows which we have not wilfully caused, but to submit to God's holy will, even when He makes us the instruments of working it out in a way we would not have chosen; and the words ever on your sweet mother's lips were 'Fiat voluntas Tua.'" *

Walter hid his face in his hands, and made no reply.

"Walter, you must come and see us in Essex; if the earl would only let you, have your home with us for a while, how delightful that would be! Oh, you would like Thoresby Hall!—it is such a dear place, and has seen merry days, though now they are clouded over for a while."

Walter roused himself to answer, "Is it as old as Castle de Lisle?"

"Oh, no; that is, not the present hall; it was rebuilt by my grandfather, Sir Hugh Thoresby. Do you remember him, Walter, for he saw you as a child? He died not more than six years since."

"No," said Walter, "I do not recollect him; and how many of you are there now, Mary? You see, I have forgotten my relations while at Rheims."

"Not much chance of remembering them there," said Mary, cheerfully. "Well, at Thoresby you would find my father and mother, my brother Henry, and Blanche, my only sister; and she," said Mary, lowering her voice, as if she feared the rustling leaves overhead would hear the secret, "Blanche, is going to be a nun."

"Indeed!" answered her cousin, "and when?"

"In another year, at furthest, I think. We must be very cautious about it, as my father does not care to bring any fresh trouble upon us owing to this step; so we must wait till Blanche can find a safe escort, who will conduct her to Paris, where she will go for a visit to my aunt, the Marquise d'Orville, and from thence she can seek a convent."

"Has she fixed on any one?"

"Yes, the one just founded. You have heard of it, Walter, doubtless, it is so glorious—the perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. We are all glad Blanche feels called to this institute, for surely for an Englishwoman there can be no more suitable work than to make reparation for the insults our unhappy country is daily offering."

"Yes, indeed," said Walter; "introducing the queen's prayer-book instead of the holy sacrifice, and hunting the faithful priests who offer it into prison and death."

"Hush!" said Mary, suddenly; "there is some one coming."

In a few moments they were joined by Lord Beauville.

"Might I crave a few minutes' conversation with Mistress Thoresby?" said he, in his softest tone.

Walter departed, and Mary, with no little trepidation, found herself alone with the formidable Earl; but the interview did not prove an alarming one. Without committing himself in so many words, Lord Beauville gave Mary to understand that if she chose to arrange the baroness's funeral by night, and hide a priest in the house to perform the ceremony, he would engage that himself and his train should affect ignorance of the whole transaction, while their presence insured the latter against any molestation from the civil authorities. When the earl left her, Mary sought Isabel, but could not rouse her to the slightest effort, or to express any wish on the subject. Walter and herself made all the arrangements; and two days afterwards, Rose Ford, under charge of one of her father's yeomen, came to the castle; and in the same disguise in which he had quitted it, Father Gerard re-entered the home of the De Lises.

At midnight, a little group gathered in the crypt beneath the beautiful chapel of the castle, now disused and desolate. It was deemed safer that the mourners should only be Rose and Rachel, in addition to the family. Slowly they recited the solemn office of the dead, so full of mingled awe and consolation; then the holy sacrifice was offered up; and at length they laid the corpse of Alice de Lisle by the side of the husband she had mourned so well for many long years. Walter's grief was passionate; and though for long he struggled for control, the barrier broke down at last, and he wept unrestrainedly. Mary, Rose, and Rachel mingled their tears with his, and even Father Gerard was overcome at times. Isabel alone remained unmoved; she shed no tear, uttered no sigh, not even when forever on earth was hidden from her eyes the form she loved so fondly. When the rites were concluded, all the little party of mourners, except Rose, were anxious to seek consolation from Father Gerard, as it was necessary that he should depart at an early hour in the morning. Isabel was the last to come to him, and she did it almost unwillingly, and with such a look of stony endurance written on her face that he would gladly have seen it exchanged for passionate grief.

"Do not, my dear child," said the priest, "exercise so violent a control over your feelings; give way to natural grief. God does not forbid us to mourn—rather, He saith, Blessed are the mourners—if with our sorrow we but adore His holy will; and He whose submission never man equalled, had with it strong crying and tears. I would fain see you weep, Isabel."

"I cannot, father," was the answer; the words seemed to choke her, and she buried her face in her hands.

Father Gerard spoke of the baroness, of her patient life and holy death, of the perfect submission of her saintly soul to the loving and eternal will of God. "I firmly believe," said he, "she is with the saints in glory."

Still Isabel was not moved; Father Gerard's face grew very sorrowful.

"Isabel," said he, almost immediately, "we must part; and it is unlikely we shall ever meet again on earth. I am an old man, and it cannot be much longer that I can serve my Master in this world. Men seek my life: God grant, in His great mercy, that I may be suffered to lay it down for His sake. My child, over whom I have watched for so many years, listen to me for the last time. I have warned you before, Isabel, of that deadly enemy who tracks your path and lays snares for you. Beside your saintly mother's bed of sickness there was not much room for his temptations; but the case is different now, Isabel: you are going into scenes of fearful temptation. Firm must be your hold on the anchor of the cross if you would not fall. Isabel, beware of pride."

Isabel raised her head. "My pride would keep me from the fall you hint at, father. Isabel de Lisle is too proud to be a renegade from the faith of her fathers and the traditions of her house."

"Pride keep you close to the faith of the lowly son of Mary!" answered he. "Oh, never! O my child, lay aside that self-reliance, that haughty nature,—too proud to mourn, too proud to seek for aid. I would send a little child into the strife of life with more confidence than I would you."

"I thank you, father, for your trust in me. If I have hitherto been so unfaithful to the religion which none can profess without suffering, as to warrant you to speak thus with justice, I was ignorant of it. You blame me for controlling myself: methinks I need it. And such words from you on my mother's burial night!"

Isabel was burning with indignation.

"It is the night of our parting, and that forever," rejoined the priest; and he looked up where, through the narrow window, he saw the sun rising. "Something tells me that my time draws near. We must meet once more, Isabel; but then it will be too late for priest to warn. Will you not suffer me to speak, even in chiding truth, for the last time? I cannot speak falsely even to comfort you, Isabel, though my heart bleeds for you."

"Forgive me, father," said Isabel, bursting into tears; "forgive me for those sinful words. I know I am unworthy you should speak to me. Alas! without you how shall I live; how shall I ever struggle against temptation?" And then Isabel wept long and deeply.

The sun had now risen, and Father Gerard was warned he must not linger longer. The parting was brief, as partings with those who look not to meet again ever must be. Isabel, completely subdued, sought her chamber as soon as Father Gerard, bestowing a fervent blessing on his children, resumed his disguise, and quitted the castle with Rose.

CHAPTER V.

"She was a vision of delight,
When first she burst upon my sight."

WORDSWORTH.

Lord Beauville began to grow impatient of his long stay at Castle de Lisle, and neither Walter nor Isabel was surprised when he informed them it was his intention they should both accompany him to his house of Apswell Court, situated some thirty miles from London.

"You must remember that you are my wards, by the queen's command," said the earl—informaton which both heard in silence.

Preparations for departure began to be made. Walter was really glad, he was weary of the gloom and painful associations of his home; and as he was not to be master, he felt it preferable to submit to the earl elsewhere than in his ancestral castle. Father Gerard's last advice had been to submit in patience, at least for a while, and Walter strove to curb the impulse of his fiery nature. The squire of Lord Beauville, who was to hold Castle de Lisle in safety, was also charged to receive the rents. This was a fearful blow to the faithful tenantry, Catholic to a man, and many resolved to give up their farms. Among these was Master Ford; for he clearly foresaw that the number of fines which he would be liable to for non-attendance at the Protestant worship at the parish church, and from which, under the new government of the estates, he could find no protection, would soon ruin him; and he deemed it wisest to employ the little money he possessed in starting some new occupation, whose obscurity should form his protection, and where he could sometimes enjoy the consolations of his faith; and with his wife and family, which consisted of two sons besides his daughter Rose, he resolved to go to London. Rose knew that her father's circumstances would be greatly impoverished by the change, and she bethought herself of offering to go as serving-maiden to some lady of rank; and having obtained her father's consent, she sought Isabel, to ask her advice how best to set about finding a situation. She found Mistress de Lisle sitting listlessly, as was her wont, over her embroidery, and taking not the slightest interest in the efforts of Rachel and Mary to carry away from the castle all the little articles of her own or her mother's which they imagined would be a comfort to her. When Rose told her errand Isabel was roused; she grew indignant at the thought of the sufferings of the tenantry, and at length she bade Rose wait for her, and quitted the apartment; and great was the astonishment of the earl, when he heard that Mistress de Lisle craved an interview with him.

She came, she said in her stateliest manner, to make a request: could she be allowed to take with her two serving-women?

"Well, Mistress Isabel," answered the earl, "it is an attendance beyond your rank; and I fear me our gracious queen, who hears things wondrous quickly, would mislike it."

Isabel colored with offended pride. "It is not for assumption of higher rank that I ask it, my lord, but I can never suffer Rachel, my mother's attendant to leave me, and I would fain take under my protection the daughter of our trusty tenant, Master Ford; it is necessary she should seek service, and for early friendship's sake (she was my playmate), I would have taken her with me also."

"Then let her go with you, by all means," said the earl. "My sister, Lady Anne, will, I warrant me, speedily find her a service with some lady of her acquaintance, and she can be under your protection meanwhile. I would I could pleasure you further, fair Isabel."

But Isabel was in no mood for soft speeches; and without deigning to thank Lord Beauville for the part of her request granted, she withdrew.

Unlike Castle de Lisle, Apswell Court bore every mark of a wealthy owner; and around it were spread none of the hills and wooded valleys among which the former proudly stood, but the flat pasture-land bore signs of luxuriance, herds of red deer gambolled in the park, an array of noble chargers filled the stable, numerous retainers were seen in every direction. There was no doubt the sun of fortune was shining here. A large party of riders have arrived at the stately portico, and at the foot of the long flight of marble steps which lead into the grand entrance-hall.

"Welcome to Apswell Court fair Isabel," said the earl; "I will suffer no other hand than mine own to place you within its walls. Be assured," he continued, in a lower tone, "all that can be done to supply what you have lost will be offered you."

Isabel bent her head, her only acknowledgement of a speech she deemed an insult; and with a cold and mighty air she ascended the steps and advanced into the entrance-hall. There stood two ladies ready to receive her; Lady Anne Beauville, an elderly and formal-looking dame, advanced slowly towards her, and ere she had reached her (for Isabel stood on the threshold), her path was intercepted, and Isabel felt herself embraced and her face warmly kissed by two rosy lips; and then releasing her not from her grasp, but looking full into her countenance, Isabel beheld a face whose witchery few could withstand. The hazel eyes laughed with glee, and in a voice of silver sweetness the owner of them said—

"Welcome, dear Isabel; I am so glad you are come—so very glad."

"Lady Constance," said Lady Anne, severely, "you strangely forget yourself in your father's hall. What must Mistress Lisle think of you?"

Constance would have taken little heed of this remonstrance, had not the surprise and gravity written on Isabel's face assured her her conduct was not pleasing to her guest; she quickly disengaged herself, and stood by in silence, while Lady Anne with solemnity welcomed Mistress de Lisle to her brother's house. Isabel received the attention with equal distance, and then presented her cousin.

During this colloquy the earl and his train withdrew; but lingering in the doorway unobserved, was Walter, who was thus spectator of the whole, and marked the loving greeting and the cold repulse. Lady Anne now proposed that the guests should retire to their apartments; this was gladly acceded to, and Lady Anne, with Isabel, quitted the hall, followed by Mary and Lady Constance; the latter lingered behind for a moment, as if uncertain whether she should come, but Mary's sweet smile drew her to her side. Walter watched the whole, and inwardly thanked his cousin for endeavoring to repair his sister's want of courtesy.

A suite of apartments was assigned to Isabel, furnished luxuriously, as was deemed in those days. The windows looked out into the park, and the green fields in the distance beyond it; one also had a view of the courtyard, where the scene was busting and various.

The cousins were alone, and Mary, tired with her journey, threw herself upon a couch. Isabel seemed insensible of fatigue; she paced up and down the room with impatient steps; her coil was thrown aside, and her luxuriant black hair streamed in masses upon her shoulders.

"Oh, dear Isabel do take a little rest; I know you are very tired, you look pale and you will fall sick, indeed you will."

"There is no rest for me," said Isabel; "I am not made for prison life, Mary; oh, how I pine already for my own mountain air! how this flat place wearies me!"

"Well," said her cousin, "in that I cannot agree with you, dear cousin; it is not so flat as Essex, where I have dwelt all my life."

Isabel made no answer; but she stopped in her walk, and laying her head against the window, looked out with the wistful gaze of a caged bird.

"Isabel," began Mary, "did you ever see any one so beautiful as Constance Beauville?"

"Oh, yes; many more so," said Isabel, in a quiet tone.

"Now, Isabel, surely that is impossible, for I do believe hers is the fairest form and face in all England; she is a perfect little fairy. I have heard it said that there is a look of the Queen of Scotland in her face sometimes, and that she is certainly like her."

"The Queen of Scotland is less fair than I have ever deemed her, then," said Isabel, scornfully.

Mary raised herself from the couch. "Dear cousin," she said, "I crave a favor from you; you know how truly I love you; suffer me to speak to you frankly and seriously."

"Willingly," answered Isabel, in the same scornful tone. "What have the times come to when Mary Thoresby turns preacher!"

"Well, said Mary, with unwearied sweetness, "since I am so seldom a preacher, it is but fair you should listen to me when I do hold forth. I would say, then, Isabel, you who are so noble and generous in mind, I pray you not to let prejudice destroy your peace here. Why should you scorn Constance Beauville? her greeting this day was full of affection. How can you gain influence and win your way here save by conciliation?"

Isabel drew herself to her full height. "Mary Thoresby, do I hear you aright?—I win my way here! I—a prisoner?—what owe I to those who keep me against my will? Nothing. To dwell here patiently is all you can ask of me, deprived of friends and of the exercise of my religion. I will live in these rooms with Rachel, in as retired a way as possible. I do not want the hypocritical affection of the Beauville family, nor will I stoop to dissemble with them."

"I do not ask you to dissemble," returned Mary; "I know well how hard is your lot, how much you have to endure; but surely it is not right, nor wise, to reject the kindness that is offered, however much injustice may be mingled with it. And think of Walter also; he will not stand aloof as you do; and think how necessary it is that you and he should act in the same manner."

"Walter," burst forth Isabel, indignantly, "may choose his own path, and I pray he may not repent it; but ask me not to share it. It has well-nigh maddened me to see at De Lisle Castle how he would stoop to Lord Beauville's will. Oh, would I were a man, and the earl should see what a De Lisle should, and should not brook!"

"You wrong Walter," answered Mary; "he has as noble a spirit as ever breathed in his race; and I am certain it is by the advice of Father Gerard he has acted."

The name quieted Isabel. She was silent for a moment, then said, "There is enough of this, Mary; do not let us dispute just when we are about to part; you have done right to speak your mind, and now no more. I will act as appears best to me." And Isabel left the room to give directions to Rachel, and was, at all events, roused by her cousin's remonstrance from her despairing mood for the time being.

Mary felt it was indeed useless to say more, and even regretted she had gone so far. Her admiration for her cousin was so great that, though it did not prevent her from seeing her faults, it gave her great faith that her noble spirit and sense of right would in time triumph over prejudice.

CHAPTER VI.

"But for my sister Isabel,
The mood of woman who can tell."

LORD OF THE ISLES.

"ARE you really going, Mary?" said Walter to his cousin, when he met her in the early morning of the following day in the gardens of Apswell Court.

"Yes, indeed I must, Walter; if the escort comes, as I think it will, this evening, I must bid you all farewell to-morrow."

"I think," said Walter, "that I will go forth and mislead the escort, tell them this is not Apswell Court."

"Ah!" laughed Mary, "trust the Thoresby wit for that, my Lord de Lisle."

Walter's smile passed away. "I shall miss you so, dear cousin," he said, tenderly.

"Well," said Mary, cheerfully, "I cannot wish that you should not miss me, for a while at least; but I trust shortly matters will look brighter, and your sojourn here become less tedious"

"Why must you go so soon, Mary?"

"My father does not wish me to stay long as Earl Beauville's guest; and besides, he is able just at this moment to send an escort for me, which is not always in his power, for you know we are not the rich Thoresbys now. Walter, I have set my heart on your coming to Thoresby Hall. I feel certain you are to come some day."

"Yes," said Walter, "I will come, Mary; I promise you I will; it cannot be so difficult an undertaking but that a firm will can compass it."

"I suppose you can hardly tell me yet how you like this place."

"Yes, I can, Mary," returned he; "I am very wretched; I do not see how it can be otherwise. Lord Beauville's train is thronged by young gentlemen of good birth, who hope to win their spurs, or gain advancement, from being his attendants; but to mix among them, and not to forswear the worship of God, is impossible."

Mary shuddered. "I have heard my father say that the licence allowed in noble households, of those attached to the court, is fearful."

"Fearful," answered her cousin, "and loathsome! Brought up as I have been, Mary, at college, among learned and holy men, it revolts me to hear the coarse and ribald talk that met my ear last night."

"And can you not avoid it in any way?"

"Yes, in one; plunging myself on my birth, I can show that I condescend not to mingle with those a step below me; but then, Mary, it will be solitude, entire and unbroken."

"Come, come, Walter," said Mary, "be like a brave knight and good Christian, and fight manfully. You want not me to preach to you, after all the lore you heard at Rheims; but I heard it once said, that when God sends trials thick on us, He treats us as a general does his most trusty soldiers,—he puts them in the dangerous parts."

"You say truly, Mary," exclaimed Walter, with brightening tone and manner, "and I will fight my best, and not be a coward in the battle. This is the last complaint I will make, and as you are going away, Mary, I shall have no opportunity."

"So you only desired my stay that you might grumble to me, most noble baron;" and both the cousins laughed merrily.

In the very midst of their mirth, turning round a corner in the walk, came upon them the Lady Constance, fresh and beautiful as the roses she carried in her hand. She blushed, and curtsying with grace, almost stateliness, said "she was sorry to interrupt them," and would have passed on, but Mary prevented her.

"I depart to-morrow, Lady Constance," said she, pleasantly, "and I shall feel as if I knew nothing of one who is to be my cousin's friend."

Constance being nothing loath, the three continued their walk together, and blithely ran their tongues, as they discussed the various amusements of the day, keeping carefully away from the dangerous topics of religions or court news.

"I fear you will find Apswell Court a very dull residence," said Lady Constance to Walter; "for since my brother went abroad, and my father is so much at court, it has grown quite different from what it used to be. We had merry days when Regnier was at home."

"Viscount Regnier is your only brother, I think," said Mary.

"My half-brother," replied Constance. "We are both our mother's only children." And then, quickly, as if anxious to change the subject, she exclaimed, "Mistress Thoresby, I do so envy you one thing."

"What is that?" inquired Mary, with a smile.

"That sweet-looking serving-maiden of yours; I have never been able to get one I liked."

"I should be truly glad if you would have this one, then," returned Mary; and she hastened to explain that Rose did not belong to her. "I travelled without an attendant," he said, "to De Lisle Castle; and as for Rose, I believe this very day Lady Anne will be besought to find a service for her, since Rachel, the elderly one, is to attend upon my cousin."

"Then it is settled at once," said Constance, eagerly. "I am so glad: will you send her to me presently, Mistress Thoresby, and I will arrange the wage with her, and other matters, and (as soon as suits Mistress de Lisle's convenience) she can enter on her attendance? But I hear sounds that announce the dinner hour; is it indeed ten of the clock? I thought it not so late."

Lady Constance departed. Mary gazed after her for a moment, and exclaimed, "How very lovely she is!" She turned to her cousin again, but Walter's eyes were fixed on the path Constance had taken, with so riveted a gaze as startled Mary.

"Lovely!" he said; "methinks I never saw aught so fair on earth."

Mary sighed to herself as she left him, and went towards the house, "Is this to be his trial, poor boy? It is most cruel if Lord Beauville keeps him here in inaction, with nothing to think of but that witching face."

Mary informed Isabel of the good prospect which had offered itself for Rose. To her astonishment her cousin was mightily displeased.

"I would have spoken about her myself to Lady Anne, had I been allowed the time."

"But, Isabel," said Mary, "what could Lady Anne procure for her better than to wait on Lady Constance, and to stay in the same castle with you and Rachel, too?"

"Well, well," said Isabel, "it is arranged now of course; I would not so have chosen, as I said, and there has been too much hurry."

When Rose heard what her future destination was to be, she was delighted. "Not to have to leave the house you are in, Mistress Isabel," said she, "and to wait on that lovely Lady Constance, who looks so meek and gentle, I am happy, indeed."

Isabel's face clouded over, and she expressed no opinion either of satisfaction or dissatisfaction.

When Mary took leave, Isabel melted for the moment, and held her fast in her embrace.

"Forgive me Mary," she whispered; "I have tried your patience sorely, I know."

Mary kissed her fondly, as she assured her of her love and sympathy; and with fervent hopes that they should meet again ere long, they parted.

Walter put her on her horse.

"Farewell, dear cousin," said he; "Heaven bless you for all your goodness and comfort."

"You must come to Thoresby, Walter. Now promise me you will."

"Yes, I promise," said Walter. His last words were, "I will come to Thoresby."

Mary rode out of Apswell Court; Walter stood on the steps watching her, and Isabel, from her window, followed her with wistful eyes. So they parted.

The time passed heavily at Apswell Court after the departure of the cheerful and peace-making Mary. Isabel, true to her resolution, confined herself entirely to her own apartments, only appearing at dinner and supper, and then studiously avoided joining in the merriment that generally went on. Very often she took her meals in her own rooms. Lady Anne considered her conduct insulting, and showed it by taking no further notice of her than a slight and stiff bend of her head, morning and evening, which was as stiffly responded to on Isabel's part. Constance, kept at a respectful distance by Isabel, naturally grew cold in her manner, though her kind heart felt for, and made excuses for Isabel, pitying her loneliness, and the heavy afflictions she had gone through. Constance had never known her own mother, who had died in giving her birth. One of the strongest feelings of her nature was her love for the mother she had never seen, and many were the tears she shed over the beautiful but sad-looking portrait of the Lady Constance Courtenay, Countess of Beauville, which hung in the long gallery. She could the better pity Isabel, who had known the sweetness of a mother's love, and lost it for ever. Lord Beauville treated Isabel with studied indifference, and this galled her. She would rather have met with resistance, and would willingly have measured her strength of will with that of her guardian. She was never required, as she had expected, to attend the prayers and sermons in the chapel; neither did Master Gregory Oldcastle ever approach to entertain her with godly discourse on the errors of papacy; in truth, the haughty bearing of Mistress de Lisle kept the chaplain in too great awe of her to make such an attempt.

It may seem strange that so proud and stubborn a character as Isabel could have grown up under the teaching of the meek and saintly Alice de Lisle; but Isabel's strongest element was her affection—an affection apt to expend itself on one object, and with the true selfishness of all fiery passions, on an object which must be dependent upon her. Lady de Lisle was all in all to Isabel; her pleasure was hers; she lived but in her presence, and she proudly felt that she was to her mother solace and counsellor, nurse and protector; and yet Isabel's love though it bore the aspect of the most unselfish devotion, was selfish. She could bear no other object to attract her mother's notice, or that she should lean on other aid than hers. In De Lisle Castle, Isabel had ruled with undivided sway; no one dared gainsay her will; and Isabel, who was most noble and just in her dealings with inferiors, never gave real cause of complaint. Thus her faults grew up unchecked and unnoticed, save, indeed, by Father Gerard, but he, in his few and hurried visits to the castle, had little opportunity to do more than warn her solemnly, and the warnings were ever received in the same way, with self-defence, broken down at last into violent grief, which passed away and left no trace behind; rather Isabel secretly consoled herself with thinking that Father Gerard was so severe to himself he had no mercy for others, and misjudged her harshly.

And so Isabel went on in self-deceit, deeming that her present conduct showed fitting respect to her condition, and was a protest against injustice.

After Mary's departure, Walter sought his sister, and with a patience very hard for one of his impulsive nature to attain, he strove to break down the sort of barrier that had arisen between them. He thought he had succeeded. Isabel's sternness relaxed; and the love that was really in her heart for her brother began to show itself; but there was one condition, Walter must join with her in the line she took towards the Beauville family; and Walter would not. With an impulsiveness and a guilelessness which made him a boy for his years, Walter had a keen perception of right and wrong; his training, so different from that of his sister, had taught him to submit to lawful authority, and he knew Lord Beauville had not at present exercised his authority beyond its lawful limits. He told Isabel so, and she drew back into her stately distance, and treated him at once as joining in the league against her.

Poor Walter wandered disconsolately about, and heartily wished himself back at Rheims, with the hardest day's work before him he had ever performed, rather than have to drag through these tedious hours at Apswell Court.

CHAPTER VII.

"Her love to him,
Before a spark of his grew dim."

WILLIS.

MASTER GREGORY OLDCASTLE, although he did not dare to broach the subject to Isabel, had not any fear of Walter, and was very desirous of proving to him the utter corruption and horrors of the Church of Rome. Walter did not shrink from the encounters, and indeed rather enjoyed them; and when they had taken place two or three times, there was no doubt he had reason to do so, for Lord Beauville desired Constance should be present, and hear how well Master Oldcastle could defend his cause; and so oftentimes Constance, attended by Rose Ford, sat in the garden at her work while Master Gregory and Walter recommenced the strife. Walter's whole spirit was thrown into his argument; he was well instructed in controversy, and possessed great natural clearness and eloquence. Many a peal of laughter sounded the discomfiture of Master Oldcastle elicited from Constance. At other times she would lean forward, her whole attention absorbed in the contest, her embroidery falling from her hands, her eyes fixed on Walter, who stood, a picture of energy and vigor, tossing back the dark locks from his brow, his eyes radiant with light and eagerness, and his face in one glow; and she felt that from his heart flowed every word of his gallant defence of his holy faith. It was no task learnt by heart, as Master Gregory's (albeit he grew heated enough on the subject) appeared to be.

Often after these contests, Lady Constance would call on Walter to explain some point she had not understood, or to translate some Latin quotation; for the little lady was not to be numbered among the learned ladies of her day, and her awe of Isabel was sensibly increased by finding she understood both Latin and Greek. It may naturally be supposed that these conversations generally wandered from theology to lighter subjects. Constance loved to hear of Walter's college life of his studies, his emulation there for fame, and the pleasures and frolics which he had shared with his companions; and in return, Constance related anecdotes of her childhood, great part of which had been spent within the atmosphere of the court. She knew all the men whose names were then great in the world; and she could describe many a brilliant pageant and royal progress; in such converse hours slipped away. Neither the earl nor Lady Anne interfered in this intercourse; the latter left her niece to do as she listed in this as in all her other pursuits; while the former did all he could to encourage it. Whenever Lady Constance rode forth, Walter was sent to the side of her palfrey; he sat by her side at supper; he became her regular escort wherever she went: and so the days went by of the bright summer at Apswell Court. But the time did not hang heavily on Walter's hands; all day long he was occupied either in contriving something for her pleasure or in her society. At night his dreams were of her. Walter loved with all the vehemence of his youth and all the strength of his nature; his life became wrapped up in her. He made an idol, and fell down and adored it. For some time he never wondered whether his love was returned. In itself it was happiness enough; and when the longing to be loved again did come, Walter feared to speak lest he should break the spell. Was Constance unconscious of the love she had inspired? She was court-bred; young as she was, she had imbibed some of the poison of that hollow worldliness which pervaded those of the Tudor sovereigns above all other courts. She had learnt how cheaply love, and truth, and honor were held; and for some time Constance trifled on, forgetting in the amusement of the hour the misery she might be bringing on Walter; but there was too much that was generous and good in Constance's soul for this frivolity to last; the nobleness of the heart that was cast at her feet grew daily upon her, and Constance loved, not with the idolatry she received, but warmly, deeply, and sincerely Constance loved.

Lord Beauville had gone to court, and their love was yet unspoken, though each knew well the other's secret, and rejoiced in the knowledge.

Isabel now withdrew entirely from the society of the Lady Beauvilles; she could not endure to see her brother tamely and blindly yielding himself a dupe to Lord Beauville's schemes, for she doubted not that the earl allowed his daughter to give encouragement to her brother only to let him have the mortification of being refused; for to allow his only and beautiful daughter, who might ally herself to the highest houses in the kingdom, to marry the penniless and proscribed Baron de Lisle, was impossible. She dared not remonstrate with Walter, for the distance between them was too great now. She sighed over the estrangement, without being conscious she had caused it.

"It is as I foresaw," mused she; "he would not take my counsel, would not lean on me, and this is the result."

The earl came home somewhat unexpectedly; and as he sat at supper that night, he seemed disinclined for conversation; but his glance passed often from Constance to Walter and from Walter to Constance, till the former felt embarrassed. When alone that night, Walter determined the following day he would tell his story of his love for Constance to Lord Beauville. He was not utterly blind to the possibility of a refusal; but when he reflected on the evident encouragement the earl had given to hopes he must have known but too likely to spring up, his courage rose. Walter was sanguine, and lovers look not beyond the present; he went to sleep, to dream of Constance.

At an early hour the following day, while Walter was deliberating what would be the best time for him to seek Lord Beauville, he was summoned to the earl. He found him in his private cabinet, employed in writing, and surrounded with papers and letters, for he had a heavy charge of state affairs, a great share of the queen's confidence.

"Ah, Walter," said he, turning round so as to face him "I desire some converse with you. Dost know thou hast been here full six months?"

Walter started. "Is it indeed, so long?" said he as he remembered that spring had indeed passed into summer, and summer begun to yield to autumn, and it had seemed one short day to him, who had so sighed over the loneliness and tedium of the first few weeks.

"It is too long since your mother's death," answered the earl, "for you to be able longer to plead that excuse for retirement from court; you must now present yourself before the queen, and endeavor to win her favor."

"But can I appear before her in my own title, my lord?"

"Most certainly you can; you have now only to come forward, and by swearing fealty to Elizabeth, you can hold both your title and estates."

"Swear fealty!" answered Walter; "if that is all that is required, I am willing and ready to make all the reasonable submission that a sovereign can require of a subject; but I had deemed far more was asked than this."

"When I say swear fealty," said the earl, "I do not mean saying the oath with your lips, but ranging you self among those faithful followers who a jure all that can hinder their devotion to their queen. Those who hold an Italian prince as greater than an English-born sovereign, are no true and loyal subjects."

"I understand you not, my lord. In all temporal matters I will serve Elizabeth Tudor; but I will never for wear my religion, and confess that the keys given to an Apostle long ages ago are now fallen into a woman's hands."

Walter drew himself up when he spoke; he was arming himself as if for a contest with Master Gregory. The earl fixed his keen eyes upon him.

"I had deemed differently, Walter de Lisle; observing, as I have done, certain passages between you and Lady Constance. Dost mean me to understand," continued he, his voice growing hoarse with anger, "that to trifle away thy time, thou hast dared to act the suitor to a daughter of mine?"

"Lord Beauville," he answered, "this very day I would have sought you to tell my tale. I love the Lady Constance with my whole heart and soul; the earth she treads upon is dear to me."

A momentary expression of anguish passed over the earl's face; but he answered, "I do not perceive your meaning; what proposals had you to make, if you intended to seek the hand of Lady Constance Beauville?"

Walter raised his head proudly. "My lord, a De Lisle might wed with the noblest house in Europe, and bring no stain on their escutcheon. You know well the injustice of the law which deprives me of my inheritance; give me Constance for my wife, and let me seek a foreign court, where my rank will be recognized."

"I would sooner see her dead at my feet than send her an exile to a foreign court. No, Walter; there is but one path—take your place, as it is offered you, among the peers of England; an alliance with this house would not prejudice you in the eyes of Elizabeth, and, believe me, to no man on earth would I sooner commit my child. To-night you shall see Constance, for it is but fair that you should learn what she you have won her favor. I am no tyrant Constance shall marry the man she loves, for I know my child will love no one who is no noble, true, and fitting for her alliance. I return to court in three days: ere then I must receive your answer, for, save as the accepted savior of my daughter, with your present feelings, Apswell Court is no fitting place for you."

Soon after Walter had quitted the apartment, the Lady Constance was summoned thither, and remained for a considerable time alone with her father. Meanwhile Walter spent the day wandering restlessly about and counting the hours ere he could see Constance. He was not cast down; lover-like, he put all his trust in Constance. "She shall marry the man she loves," rang in his ears. "If she loves me, he cannot refuse, he cannot part us;" and Walter had not much uncertainty. He believed Constance, as the type of all womanly perfection, incapable of trifling; and Walter's nature, like all true ones, was full of trust in others.

The short autumn evening was closing in, the gorgeous hues of the sunset floated in the sky, and on the distant horizon the moon was rising, when Walter and Constance met beneath the shade of the trees of Apswell Court. What needs it to linger on that meeting? Then was whispered the story that, so very old, is still ever new, as the world goes on. They loved each other, and in the first bliss of the acknowledgment the future was forgotten.

"Constance, my own," said Walter at last, "have you seen the earl, and do you know what passed between him and me this morning?"

"Yes," she whispered, drawing closer to her lover; "he told me all, and bade me come hither this evening."

"He cannot mean the cruelty he threatened," said Walter; "he will not part us now, my Constance?"

"Dear Walter, my father is very firm; I fear me, if you will not comply with his conditions"—she hesitated.

"But, sweet Constance, he has not, the earl, told you all; you would not honor me with your love if I were a recreant to honor and faith?"

"But, Walter, listen," said Constance, sweetly. "I know the court, and you do not; there are hundreds there Catholics in heart, though Protestants in outward seeming. Nay, am I not nearly that myself, for your eloquence has well nigh converted me."

"Has it, dearest?" answered he; "then surely there is no reason why we should not cast our lot together, and seek a land where we may worship God in peace, and wait for brighter days to dawn over this unhappy land."

"Alas!" said she sadly, "I know my father too well; his word once passed, will not be broken. And consider, Walter, the disgrace and ruin it would bring on him. The queen would banish him at once, perhaps do even worse. Oh, no, Walter, it is we who must submit."

"But Constance cannot ask me to stoop to dishonor?"

"Dearest, it is not dishonor. Surely the prisoner who feigned in order to outwit his jailer, and escaped, would be fully justified; and England now is one great prison, where we dare not say or do as we list, but as pleasures the queen. Walter, you have such wild notions," continued she looking playfully up at him, "fit only for the times of the crusades; this is what half the world does now, why should you scruple?"

"If it were lawful, my Constance, we should not see half the nobility of England exiled from the court, fined, imprisoned, and in constant suffering. Men are not so in love with all this as not gladly to escape from it, if conscience permitted. No, Constance, my beloved, do not urge me to do that which you yourself would hereafter despise me for."

Constance endeavored to disengage herself from the close embrace in which she was held.

"It is time we part, then," said she, as haughtily as she could.

"Constance, you will not leave me in anger?"

"I have tarried too long," said she. "It is not a maiden's part to be rejected."

"Constance, have you no mercy?" said he, in a tone of anguish; "it is my honor and my faith that stand between us."

"No, no," said she, "it is not so; let me go, Walter; choose quickly between my love and happiness, and the vision of honor you conjure up. I will never disobey my father. Seek me as he bade you, or seek me not at all. We part for ever."

She was gone.

He watched the flutter of her white dress along the terrace. He saw her lean on Rose, who had been waiting at a distance. He saw her gather the flowers as she went along, and thence she mistaked she came down at her feet. She stood for an instant on the steps, and the moonlight cast an unearthly radiance on her snowy robe and golden hair. She looked like some vision from fairyland, as she disappeared within the house. He followed the path her tiny feet had trodden; he picked up those scattered leaves of autumn roses, and laid them next his heart, and then he went to his own chamber, went to the struggle with himself for life or death. The breeze whistled blithely by that cool bright evening; the round of life went on, but though mortal eyes saw them not, and mortal ears heard them not, intent upon the scene, bent the gaze of heavenly intelligences, and keenly they listened to every sigh and groan that burst from the aching heart in Walter de Lisle's lonely chamber.

Differently in truth, was that night spent by the betrothed. Constance never entertained the thought of leaving her lover. She was flushed with triumph, she had performed her father's behest—reiterated Walter's arguments, and she did not doubt the next day would bring him a captive to her feet, and she pictured to herself bright visions—how the Baroness de Lisle would comfort herself in the proud court of Elizabeth, how rapidly Walter would advance in favor and trust, and how, through it all, she would be the star that led him on, the best cherished of that noble heart.

The light in her eye, and the smile that sat on her lips reassured her father that victory was secure, so that though Walter was missed from the supper-table, he did not feel anxious.

No, Walter did not sup that night, neither when the weary inhabitants of the house sought their beds did he follow the example. Constance slept soundly, smiling in her sleep.

On the ground, fighting with his anguish, lay Walter de Lisle; close beside was the invisible tempter, busy at his work.

"But for a little time," he whispered, "Elizabeth must ere long recognize the rights of her Catholic subjects, and queens do not live forever. Can you not even secretly serve your party by your influence? Deceit, oh! call it not by that name, it is not that; it is understood by everybody in these days, when religion has changed with each Tudor that has sat on the throne; it is only a scruple of yours thus to relinquish all the sweetness of life. What will life be without her?" And then, in glowing colors, he painted the future with Constance, and in hues that made the heart shrink back—the future without her! Walter half yielded; he began to form plans, how much he would give up; he would see Lord Beauvile again, would argue it with him once more. He would show Constance his meaning more clearly. It was a fearful crisis in Walter's life; but in the darkest hour we are not left alone, and if the tempter were on the one side, an angel, in glorious array, was on the other, strengthening, pleading, bringing back by-gone memories of innocent and happy days. The eyes of angels and saints were bent upon that lonely boy, and in the courts of heaven there went up many a prayer for him from the white-robed throng. On earth, too, in the vigil he was wont to keep, Father Mordaunt prayed in the chapel of the college at Rheims, and impelled by a sudden memory of the boy he had loved so much, he prayed especially for Walter. Walter at last fell asleep, still lying on the ground, and he dreamt strangely and confusedly. He was back at Rheims in the old chapel: there was a figure all in white; he could not see who it was; yes, it showed his mother's face, and vanished slowly away; then again, he too was clothed in white, he was to serve Father Mordaunt's mass, but the chapel seemed to move about in a marvellous manner. The falling of some heavy weight woke him up; he awoke saying aloud, Ne nos inducas in tentationem, sed libera nos a malo."

Note.—“But if such person or child so passing, or sent, shall after become conformable and obedient to the laws of the Church, and shall repair to church and continue in such conformity, he shall, during such term as he shall so continue, be discharged of every such disability and incapacity.”—Burn's Ecclesiastical Law.

CHAPTER VIII.

“But there are some Lutheran baits, by which the devil propagates his kingdom and inveigles many in your spears. What are they? Gold, glory, and lights, pleasures: contemn them. For what else are they than the scum of the earth, a horse air, a feast of the worms, spicing dung-hills? Despise them. Christ is full. He will feed us; He is King who will honor us; He is rich who will endow us with all felicity.”—EDMUND CAMPIAN.

Very early the following morning, Walter went out. He aroused the slumbering porter and passed through the gates, and in a few minutes reached the high-road. The sun was hardly risen, and the air was keen, and refreshed him as it blew on his aching brow and fevered cheeks. His mind was in a very tumult. Every sudden passion contended fiercely within, and the long warfare of the night seemed only to rage more wildly. Spirits, good and evil, still battled round him. He took no heed of surrounding objects, and was unconscious that a rough looking peasant who had advanced towards him from the opposite quarter, had been scanning his features with the utmost interest. He started when the man spoke.

“God save your honor; may this be the way to Apswell Court?”

“It is hard by,” said Walter; “but you keep early hours, my friend, and I doubt me whether you will find the porter willing to attend to you.”

“Perhaps,” answered the man, “your honor would condescend to tell me if there is a young nobleman called de Lisle tarrying at the court?”

“You speak with him,” said Walter, hastily, forgetting in his surprise the caution of the times.

The peasant bowed, and taking a letter from his vest, presented it to Walter.

The handwriting, which was a female one, was unknown to him; he eagerly opened it and turned to the signature; it was from Amy Travers—his mother's dear and early friend. “I cannot bring myself to believe,” she wrote, “that so many letters of mine addressed to you could remain unanswered if they have reached you, and I therefore despatch this by a trusty messenger, who will deliver it into the hands of none save yourself.

“We are at Morris House, not seven miles distant, and greatly do I desire to see you, for the child of my well beloved Alice, and the companion of my boys, is ever dear to my heart. We tarry here not much longer; come without delay, I beseech you.”

Walter's present mood was a ripe one for indignation; to have his letters intercepted, as he now well understood they were, was an insult he could not brook. He turned to retrace his steps to Apswell Court, and perceived the messenger awaiting an answer.

“Did you divine 'twas I when you met me?” demanded he.

“Yes, my lord; an' it please you, these are times when a man's eyes had need to be sharp. I am an old servant in the Travers family, and well knew I the late Baron and Baroness de Lisle—God rest their souls!—and I traced the likeness in your face, my lord, as I came near you, and I thought some good angel had sent you thus early in my way, for it would have been a hard business at the court, I reckon.”

“I might as well be a prisoner, at once,” said Walter, angrily, to himself; “I will let Lord Beauville see how far I can be schooled.”

“Return to Lady Travers,” said he aloud “and say I will be with her anon. I thank thee, friend, for the service thou hast done me;” and Walter offered all the money he had about him for the messenger's acceptance, but it was sturdily refused, and the man set out with all speed on his journey home, while Walter returned to Apswell Court.

It created no surprise among the rooms when Walter ordered his horse and rode out, for he was frequently accustomed to do so at that hour. Walter rode quickly, and he was glad, in the rapid motion, to lose some sense of the aching thoughts that filled his mind. He was very pleased at the prospect of his visit; the name of Amy Travers had been mentioned in that one memorable conversation with his mother, and the thought of seeing old friends who knew nothing of his present struggle, and would take him away from it, as it were, comforted him; and the delay of the hour of decision delighted him, as it ever does, when we want to make our will and God's will agree together.

Warm was the greeting from Sir John Travers, while his lady clasped Walter in her arms as though he had been her own child.

“I will leave you alone,” said Sir John, smiling, “for I know you have much to say;” and he quitted the room.

There was no trace of early beauty left on the pale face of Lady Travers, only the sweetness or placid calm of a spirit resigned amidst privations, content amidst trials.

Neither of Walter's college companions was there. Basil was at Rome, about to receive priest's orders, and William was at the usual residence of the family.

“But we,” said Lady Travers, “are frequently obliged to change our residence to escape from the spying which is carried on. Truly, our homes are no longer our own. We are impoverished, too, with the heavy fines that are laid on us. We have had to dismiss many of our servants, and William,” continued she, “hath to labor hard in looking over the estates.”

“What are these fines?” inquired Walter; “I feel as if I were ignorant of a deal that goes on now.”

“Every Sunday we do not go to church, we are fined twelve marks each person; then, by another Act, every month twenty marks, and if it can be proved that we are absent twelve months, then it is two hundred pounds; and you can therefore well imagine it becomes necessary for us to move from place to place, that it may be impossible to prove this. Nay, you would hardly credit it, Walter, but some months since I fell grievously sick, and was likely to die; my husband was summoned to pay the fine, and he pleaded my sickness, but they answered I was a recusant; and according to law, all sickness among them is reckoned as rebellion against the queen's majesty.”

Lady Travers pronounced her last sentence with so comical a tone, that Walter could not forbear smiling, although there was no mirth in his heart.

“Well,” continued she, “we bear it with tolerable cheerfulness for the present, and I, for one, would not change with the queen on her throne; but enough of myself. My dear Walter, let me hear somewhat how you have fared since you left Castle de Lisle. Ah! you will believe me how I sorrowed for you when I heard that she was gone, the meek and holy Alice; but it was at the time of my sickness, and I could not write; indeed, I thought that I should follow her speedily, but so God willed it not. And what of Isabel, and how are you with the Beauvilles, and how do you plan for the future?”

Poor Walter! Dissimulation was very foreign to his nature. The interest and affection that Lady Travers lavished on him, touched him deeply; he longed to tell her all, and yet he could not. Had he resolved to sacrifice Constance, he could have thrown himself, as it were, on a mother's sympathy, and told her all his grief; but the fiery struggle, the half-formed in was no fit hearing for her, who met sacrifices with smiles, who counted losses but gains. She saw he received quickly, for, indeed, Walter was confused, almost incoherent; and after a few attempts to break it down, she changed the subject, and began to talk of Basil, of Rheim, and of Father Mordaunt. No, this did not succeed. Walter inwardly writhed under it, and could scarcely retain his composure. Lady Travers felt perplexed and alarmed, and breathed a secret, wordless prayer, that the child of her loved friend might not depart from them unconsolated.

The door opened at this moment, and her husband entered, accompanied by another gentleman, whose dress was dirty and travel-stained. His riding-hat he removed as he entered, and thus displayed a head and face that, once seen, could never be forgotten; the face was oval, but the forehead broad and open, and the auburn hair cut short showed the temples; the chin was pointed, and the short moustache and beard were of the same color as the hair; the nose aquiline; and the general expression of the face one of extreme calmness; and while the eagle-glance of the deep-set eyes told of the fire of genius and the ardent soul within, the lines traced on the face spoke of many an inward conflict, of hard study, of wearing thought, and of mastery over self. As Lady Travers's eyes fell on him, she uttered almost a cry of delight, and going forward, knelt for a moment to receive a blessing. Walter, who drew back into the shade, yet could not take his eyes from the stranger's face; and now that he smiled as he warmly greeted Lady Travers, there was something inexpressibly winning in the countenance which the smile lighted up so radiantly. At the same moment, while conversing with Sir John and his lady, and answering some eager inquiries of the latter, his eye perceived and scanned Walter with a searching glance. At last Lady Travers turned round and exclaimed—

"Come forward, Walter; here is a pleasure for you we did not indeed foresee. Father, this is Walter, Baron de Lisle; and, Walter, you see before you Father Campian."

Walter felt overpowered at the knowledge that he was in the presence of that renowned man, whose name was known throughout Europe, and who had been looked upon by the students of Rheims as a hero. Yes, he really saw before him the "Flower of Oxford" and the "Gem of Christendom" (titles which were both given to Father Campian); he saw before him the man who, having gained all the honors of the university, and taken deacon's orders in the Established Church, had cast away all worldly advantages, crowds of friends, prospects of advancement, that he might enter within the proscribed and persecuted Church of Christ; the man of brilliant genius and profound learning, who had quitted the college of Douay to learn humility and abnegation in the novitiate of the Jesuits. Made a priest, he was sent to the mission in Bohemia, and from thence, but a few months back, to England, to a prospect of speedy martyrdom in his native land,—for his power of winning the souls of others was unbounded. Already England was ringing with the sound of his "Challenge to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge;" and the "Pope's Champion," as he was named by both friend and foe, was not likely long to escape the vengeance of Elizabeth.

But while we have been describing him, Campian had passed his arm affectionately within that of Walter.

"I am so truly glad to see you," he said. "On my way back to England I tarried a while at Rheims, and Father Mordaunt spoke of you, and commended you to my good offices, should I meet with you. Indeed," said Campian, turning to Sir John, "I think, if it had not been for my visit to Rheims, I should not have come hither."

"Why, father," answered Sir John Travers, with a smile, "I should not have thought you needed much persuasion."

"Yes," replied the priest; "I was loth to leave Bohemia, where so many are lost in the snares of heresy, but good Father Mordaunt had an answer to every argument I could bring forward."

"What said he?"

"Father," he said, "whatever you did there may be done by others, one or more, of your order. Secondly, you owe more duty to England than to Bohemia, and to London than to Prague; though I am glad you have made some recompense to that country for the old wound it received from us in Wickliff's time, from whom the Hussites of Bohemia learnt their heresies. Thirdly, the recovery of one soul from heresy is worth all your pains, as I hope you will gain many; because the harvest is both more plentiful and ripe with us than in those parts. Finally, the reward may be greater; for you may be martyred for it at home, which you cannot easily obtain there!"* At these last words, Walter almost shuddered.

"So you may suppose I was satisfied," continued Father Campian, without appearing to notice the emotion.

"Father," exclaimed Lady Travers, "you must want some refreshment and rest; and you too Walter. You can stay with us this night, can you not?" said she, addressing the latter.

"Oh no," replied Walter, starting; "I must, indeed, be home ere nightfall."

"Well," rejoined Campian, "that is some way off yet, and so if you, my Lady Travers, like a good housewife, will prepare our repast, De Lisle and I will confer together for a short space."

"I have also matters to attend to," said Sir John; and followed by his wife, he quitted the apartment. Walter and the priest were alone.

"I am truly glad," said Campian, "this chance, if chance we may call it, hath brought us together, my son. I have heard of you, and you have not been absent from my thoughts nor my poor prayers; but I knew not how to gain access to you. Your position must be a most difficult one. What proposes Lord Beauville for your future?"

Walter stammered something about nothing being yet decided; Lord Beauville was very kind and good. The enemy was hard at work. Never did Walter feel so desirous to be within Apswell Court as at that moment, never did Lord Beauville's proposals look so tempting. There was a short silence. Campian looked keenly at him.

"These are no times for trifling," said he, at length; "our lives are in our hands, and none of us know, from moment to moment, when the Master will call us. My son, all is not right with you; there is a burden on your soul, and you need counsel and help. Wilt thou not seek it, now that God offers it to you through His unworthy servant?"

There was no answer.

"Think you," continued Campian, "that we know not the greatness of the trials that encompass you? Think you that you hear the words of one who has not suffered, who has not known what it is to follow the cross, through forsaking of friends and crucifying of his own desires? I glory not in it; but, my son, in these days, we were unfit to speak to any of you, if we had not ourselves the marks of the cross upon us."

He laid his arm on Walter's shoulder as he spoke, and drew him towards him with a gesture of such deep tenderness that the heart striving to keep aloof was conquered.

A groan burst from Walter's lips; he threw himself at the feet of Father Campian, and poured forth the whole tale of his temptation and his suffering. With deepest interest and tender sympathy the priest listened.

"What must I do, father?" said Walter; the struggle is too great; I am tried beyond my strength."

"Not beyond, my son, but to the utmost. God has in store some great thing for you, whom He has thus early called to a mental martyrdom. There is but one remedy for you now, and it is flight. Apswell Court is even, as Lord Beauville said, no fit place for you; and the earl, by the hypocrisy he hath practised, has lost all right to exercise any power over your movements. I would counsel you to return to Rheims, and consult with Father Mordaunt as to your future course; I would this very night proceed onward to the coast. One of the small merchant vessels which are plying about, will, for a small sum, take you over to France."

"I will," said Walter; "it is a wise and safe counsel that you give me, father, and I will follow it. I will write from France to Lord Beauville and to Isabel."

But a sudden memory came over him, and for the moment overpowered him. He saw float before him a radiant face, with golden tresses falling on the fair neck ; he heard the low tone of sweetness in which she confessed her love ; he felt once more the touch of the arm that had twined round his but yesternight ; his Constance, his beautiful one, and his own !

* Challenger.

Walter was all unmanned.

Campian looked at him with tenderness ; he put his hand into his vest ; and drew forth a small and finely-carved ivory crucifix ; he held it before Walter's eyes.

"Behold the Captain in whose army thou hast enlisted, my son,—the Chief whom we must follow. He bids us not to attempt an enterprise which He has not undertaken first ; yea, and conquered. Oh, be strong, and be of good courage ! The Crucified is the King of Glory : nail thyself bravely to thy cross ; so shalt thou be crowned hereafter."

Walter was weeping now ; those tears that are shed but seldom, and leave their furrows on the cheek for aye.

Campian pressed a secret spring at the back of the crucifix ; it flew open, and displayed a small image of the dead body of the Saviour, wrapped as if for the tomb.

"'Twas a fancy of mine own," he said, as he showed it to Walter ; "I would not be without a crucifix to console my brethren with, but for mine own the sight of this ever moves me to the strongest emotions. Yes," he continued, gazing at it, as if forgetting any one but himself heard him—"there is something heroic in suffering even on the cross ; but death, who shall tell its unutterable humiliation to Him, whose Divine breath is the life of man ; to leave His sacred limbs to the rude hands of the soldiery ; His heart to be rent asunder by them ? This is what upholds me when I am like to faint under the burden of temptation, when alluring hopes and fair ambitions would draw me away from His service. I go to kneel, not by His cross, but by His grave, and bury myself and my proud heart beneath the folds of those linen garments."

Walter's eyes were fixed on Campian with wonder and reverence. He saw the pale, wan face glowing, the deep-set eyes radiant with light and love, as he gazed on the image of his Master's sufferings.

"Father," said Walter, suddenly, "I, too, will love Him best ; I, too, will lay at His feet every hope and vision. I will die with Him ; will lie down in the tomb with Him, and forsake all. Hear me, father ; in your presence I vow it ;" and Walter pressed with his lips the image of Christ which Campian held.

Silently the priest blessed him, and received the vow.

"I would hesitate at other times, and in other cases," added he, "to witness such solemn words spoken in haste, but with you there is but one choice, and that to be made instantly—it is for life or death."

"I have chosen now," said Walter, resolutely ; "God helping me, I will not falter. I will go and arrange with Sir John how I shall gain the coast, and with what speed I best may."

And the moon rose in her glory that night, and silvered with her beams the ocean that calmly rippled by, as Walter de Lisle stood on the cliff of the coast of Kent, bidding a long farewell to his country.

But yestereven that same moon looked down on Apswell Terrace, as the lovers plighted their passionate vows, and life in all its sunshine lay before the young baron : now all was passed, and already the boat touched the beach that was to convey him for ever from its brightness ; and at that last moment the brave heart flinched not. In one day Walter had lived years. Last night he was the boy, full of light-heartedness and sanguine hopes ; this night he was a man, entering his manhood by the gate of suffering and of endurance. He has made the sacrifice, has dashed aside the temptation. Shall he endure unto the end ?

Note.—"Every person above the age of sixteen years, who shall not repair to some church, chapel, or usual place of common prayer, but forbear the same, shall forfeit to the queen's majesty, for every month which he shall so forbear, £20; and over and besides the said forfeitures, every person so forbearing, by the space of twelve months, shall, after certificate thereof in writing made into the king's bench by the bishop of the diocese, or a justice of assize, or a justice of the peace of the county where the offender shall dwell, be bound with two sureties, in £200 at least, to the good behavior, and so to continue bound until he conform himself and come to church ; which said forfeitures shall be one-third to the queen, for the relief of the poor in the parish where the offence shall be committed, to be delivered by warrant to the principal officers in the receipt of the exchequer, without farther warrant, and one-third to him who shall sue. And if such person shall not be able, or shall fail to pay the same within three months after judgment given, he shall be committed to prison till he have paid the same, or conform himself to go to church.

"A person who was sick for part of the time contained in an information upon this statute shall not be at all excused by reason of such sickness, if it be proved that he was a recusant both before and after ; for it shall be intended that he obstinately forbore during that time."—Burn's Ecclesiastical Law.

CHAPTER IX.

"The bridegroom's doors are open'd wide,
And I am next of kin ;
The guests are met, the feast is set,— Mayst hear the merry din."

COLERIDGE.

Apswell Court is thronged with guests, and re-echoes again to the sounds of revelry. No expense or pomp is spared. Palfreys in gay trappings fill the courtyard, numberless servants are in all directions, while the tables groan beneath the weight of good cheer. Whence all this rejoicing and merriment in a house erewhile painted as so dull ? It is in honor of the marriage of the only daughter of the house of Beauville with the Duke of Bertram ; you can see the duke even now as he stands on the terrace in conversation with some of the guests. He is a man of middle age, and of goodly bearing and appearance. Kindliness is written on his open Saxon face, which, though somewhat heavy, is now lighted up with smiles in answer to the congratulations which meet him on all sides. He may well be congratulated, for fortune has suddenly showered down on him all her gifts. As simple William Bertram, captain in Her Majesty's Life Guards, he looked to no other way to distinction than through his sword. The sudden death of his cousin, the young Duke of Bertram, when on the very eve of marriage, placed him at once among the peers of Britain, with a far richer estate than many of them. Since then the sun of prosperity did not cease to shine. He grew in the queen's favor, and many a noble house would have gladly sought his alliance ; but the duke wished to marry to please himself, and let the years slip away before he had made his choice. But Christmas 15— he had accepted the invitation of the Earl of Beauville to join the gambols at Apswell Court, and for the first time beheld Lady Constance. He asked for her hand, and was accepted. The duke was by no means an ardent lover, and did not look for deep affection from his wife,—indeed, he liked full well the retiringness of the Lady Constance, and the quiet manner in which she received his protestations of admiration ; while in company her gay laugh and light-hearted manner prevented any fears that might have arisen as to her willingness to be his bride.

And Lady Constance—is it possible the dream of last autumn can have so passed away, that we find her in early spring a happy and loving bride. Let us look in upon her in her retiring bower, while they bedeck her for her bridal.

Very beautiful does she look in her mantle of cloth of silver and her stomacher of pearls, her garniture, likewise of pearls and diamonds ; a collar of brilliants clasps her slender throat, and jewels gleam on her arms, while diamonds confine the rich veil of lace that half conceals her sunny hair. How beautiful she is ! and how many envy her as they gaze ! Her eyes are bright and her cheeks glow, and a ready smile is on her lips ; and, truly, Constance was not an unwilling bride. She had loved Walter de Lisle with all the intensity of her nature, and the parting from him had been agony ; but with it there was none of the hope deferred, none of the shivering of trust that so often breaks a woman's heart. Walter had sacrificed her only to his God ; even in her anguish she could honor him, could feel he was but the more worthy of her love. Then she knew he was gone without recall ; she believed in the steadfastness of Walter's righteous resolves ; she believed she should never see his face again. The world grew heavy to her, and her heart turned sick, her cheek grew pale, and her pillow was wet with bitter tears; but woman's pride came to her assistance, and resolutely she struggled with her grief. The world should not say, Constance Beauville was dying of unrequited love; so amidst the Christmas gambols, Constance bore her part, and the Duke of Bertram could not guess that her cheek was paler than its wont, or that there was a hollow tone in her laughter.

The earl was very anxious that Constance should wed the duke, and he found no opposition from his daughter, who was well accustomed to bend to his will. She was glad of a prospect of a change, and far from insensible to the advantage the alliance presented; to be one of the first duchesses in the land, with riches and luxuries at command, to be courted on all sides,—why, these were the very things that must now be the objects of Constance's life; human love has crumbled away, and religion she does not think of, for in her own she has no faith, and that which she knows to be true she dare not profess. No wonder she wears a bright aspect as she walks to her nuptials.

The attendants of all the ladies staying at Apswell Court had assembled in conclave to admire the bride's dress, and they were quite unable to divine for what cause the serving-maiden of the Lady Constance wept so bitterly.

Was she, then, to lose her service by her mistress's marriage? No, indeed, she was raised to the dignity of first serving-maiden to a duchess: thereby her glory would be so much increased that many a knight's daughter might envy her; and her mistress was no sad damsel, forced to marry the man she hated, as was recorded in many a ballad and tale. She was as bright as the morning; what did Rose weep for? They gained no answer; nevertheless Rose's tears fell fast, as she bore her lady's train to the bridal.

Near the entrance to the chapel Constance met her father.

"All shines on us this day, my Constance," said he, gladly; "Regnier is returned in time to be present at your wedding."

Constance's face glowed with delight, as she received her brother's greeting, and together they passed into the chapel.

Viscount Regnier, the only son of the earl, was some eight or nine years older than his sister. He had been absent from home for more than a twelvemonth, holding a post of honor in a foreign embassy. Young as he was, he had already distinguished himself, and was a favorite of the queen's. There was a good deal of likeness between brother and sister. Regnier possessed the same chiselled features, the full dark eye, without the melting softness of Constance's; the short dark beard and moustache lent sternness to his face, and his look seemed to pierce you through, while determination was written on the brow and the compressed lips. There was something that attracted and yet repelled you at once in the viscount's face; but it is now all smiles, as he hastens to greet the various guests to whom his father presents him. His eye, accustomed to take in much at a glance, wonders who is that regal-looking damsel, to whom his father scarcely names him, and who returns his courtesy with so stately a gesture. Her robe of purple brocaded silk becomes her well, and the dazzling white of her throat and arms needs no jewels to set them off; not an ornament is to be seen, not even an edging on the border of her lace coif, under which is braided her luxuriant black hair. How she stands alone, amidst his father's guests, and how she seems to disdain their indifference! He marks all through the day, at what a distance she could keep the oldest and most privileged of the visitors. Regnier had seen many beautiful women, but never one to his fancy equalled the queenly Isabel, and the haughtiness with which she wore her charms added to them in his eyes.

"My lord," said Viscount Regnier to the earl, as they found themselves alone that evening on the terrace, the guests, weary of pleasure, being dispersed for a while, "you have oftentimes wished me to marry, and I would not comply. I have made my choice now, however, and I trust me you will dislike it not."

"Who is she?" exclaimed his father eagerly. "Yes, Ralph, it rejoices me, indeed, that you should marry, is it then possible—Juliet Daere?"

"Juliet Daere!" answered Regnier, scornfully; none of your lapdogs for me. No, it is yonder Mistress de Lisle, your fair ward. By my troth, and her face is bewitching."

The earl looked at his son as if fearing he was distraught. He was silent from astonishment.

"You congratulate me not, my lord."

"Ralph, I thought you wiser; but, be assured that is a game you cannot play at; Isabel is a steadfast Catholic, and would not wed the king of England to forswear her faith. Ah; smile as you like, I know what is on your tongue—a woman will sacrifice much for her love, and you may win Isabel's; but I know the de Lisle spirit better than you; I have proved it by—"

Lord Beauville stopped short; his eagerness had hurried him into an admission he would not have made; for, now that the affair was so well over, he had not intended to make his son a confidant in the history of his ill-fated attempt to unite the houses of de Lisle and Beauville. Now, however, Regnier insisted on hearing the whole. At the close of the tale his fury burst forth.

"And he dared—this beardless boy, to win my sister's love, and then cast it from him as a worthless thing! He, a beggar and a recusant, dared to offer such an insult to the house of Beauville, at the beck of those accursed priests, craven that he is! 'Tis well for him—'tis well he is beyond seas; let him but cross my path, and see what vengeance I will take."

"And yet you would wed the sister of this youth!" said the earl.

"Yes," said his son, turning round upon him, "I will wed her. Before I heard this tale I would have done it for her beauty and stately bearing; now I will do it for revenge. The de Lisles shall stoop to the Beauvilles."

"Did I," said the earl, calmly, "entertain the slightest idea of your success with Isabel, I would be displeased at your words; but I know well, that sooner would you turn the current from its course, than bend that steadfast will. If I failed with Walter, a boy of wild impulse and not over much piety, shall you succeed with a woman cold as very stone, whose soul is wrapped in her prayers and musing, whose one ambition is to see papistry restored in this land?"

"I am not saying," answered his son, "that 'tis an easy enterprise, for thereby I should dishonor my own skill; but it is seldom, very seldom, I fail, when I set in earnest about anything; and come weal, come woe, though man and angel should forbid me, I am resolved to win and to wear Isabel de Lisle."

Lord Beauville shook his head; but further speech was interrupted by the gathering of company in the grounds, and by tacit consent the subject was hereafter dropped between them.

CHAPTER X.

"One single flash of glad surprise
Just glanced from Isabel's dark eyes;
But vanish'd in the blush of shame
That, as its penance, instant came.
Oh, thought unworthy of my race!"

LORD OF THE ISLES.

The train of the Duke and Duchess of Bertram had departed, and the numerous array of guests had dispersed, and Apswell Court grew comparatively quiet,—comparatively only, for the silence and gloom that once hung over it seemed to have vanished. The earl was frequently absent, but Viscount Regnier pleaded that his long detention on foreign service gave him a right to be exempted from duty for a while, and that he should spend some time as he listed. So the castle grew gay under his government, and hawking and shooting, with many a mock tournament and trial of arms, went on. There were few ladies to witness the sports, for, now Constance was gone, few cared to travel any distance to visit the stiff and formal Lady Anne, who for her part was only too well pleased to be left in peace with her tapestry and her flowers.

How Viscount Regnier first persuaded Isabel to emerge from her retirement, she herself could hardly have told. She was won by his manner into friendliness, almost without her own will. The way in which he treated her was so different to any she was accustomed to meet with—the respectful distance, the distinguishing her from the rest of his father's guests, as though by right claiming greater attention; then, in a solitary walk, Isabel could not avoid overhearing a few sentences of admiration of her fall from Regnier's lips,—not the praise of her beauty, which Isabel was accustomed to, and disdained, but of that very haughtiness and cold reserve on which Isabel prided herself, but all the while had an uncomfortable feeling that Mary Thoresby and Walter might have been in the right in condemning. His delicate way of implying how strongly he condemned his father's treatment of her, was refreshing to Isabel. A request that she would assist him in tracing the various branches of the house of De Lisle was made and granted, and the employment naturally threw her almost daily in contact with him: and the days he did not come, and she did not see him, soon became heavy days to Isabel. Her spirits were oppressed, her heart felt a void. Isabel never paused to inquire its cause; alas! she had lost the habit of questioning; and schooling her own heart, and she was unwilling to resume the task.

When Lord Regnier went for a few days at a time to London, Apswell Court seemed to grow intolerably dull, and Isabel's heart rebounded when she heard the clatter in the courtyard which announced his return; and each return grew more pleasant, each bringing some new proof of the honor and respect in which she was held; something to give her pleasure was sure to arrive, some new book was laid upon her table, choice flowers were transplanted, that she might admire them. A palfrey was carefully trained for her use, and Isabel could not refuse to ride her, when she found that part of Lord Regnier's mornings were regularly spent in riding the animal, that he might be sure she was suitable for a lady; and when the choicest falcon was taught to fly from her wrist—Lord Regnier saying, as he presented it, "Rare bird needs rare mistress,"—could she refuse to join the hawking parties? And if she did stand back at first from acceptance of all these gifts, how humbly and mournfully the viscount would say, he deserved it,—he had offered them with all respect, as the rightful due of a deeply injured lady; but if she disdained them, there was no complaint that could be made.

So Isabel went on, and in the incense to her pride which she daily accepted, what wonder that her head grew dizzy and her eyes were blinded? And thus time passed, and another summer came.

Last summer, and coldly standing aloof to chide, Isabel had watched her brother at the feet of Constance! She had forgotten it now; she forgot to long for news from Walter, for her soul was absorbed in one wild passion.

One morning Isabel sat in the shade of the thick trees: the heavy fragrance of flowers, and the soft, lazy hum of a sultry summer day were wafted towards her—a step sounded on the greensward—that step which had gained the power to make Isabel's heart beat: the viscount stood by her side, but a different expression was on his face,—one of pain and disturbance.

"What has happened, my lord?" exclaimed she, hurriedly.

"A letter from my father," answered he, "bidding me to come speedily, since it is her majesty's pleasure that I again depart on foreign service."

It seemed to Isabel as if all her pulses stood still; she could make no answer, and though her lips unclosed, no sound came forth,—Regnier was kneeling by her.

"Isabel, you will not let me go alone! you have seen long since that I am a captive at your will,—I cannot live without you, Isabel!"

What boot's it to dwell on those burning words, or how Isabel's mute answer confessed her love? She slept that night the betrothed of Viscount Regnier.

The earl came home in a few days, and preparations were made for the viscount's departure. Isabel expressed a wish that there should be little festivity at her marriage, and the request was acceded to, and it was arranged that the rejoicing should only take place amongst the household. Though aware that there must be a Protestant public ceremony, Isabel was determined on having her marriage privately performed by a priest, and she expressed her intention to Lord Regnier, but it was overruled; it would be impossible to do it without observation, he said, and, just at this moment, would bring down disgrace on his head. He could not do it; it would endanger the priest's life as well. It was useless to insist on it, he continued,—it could not be done; and if that were the condition of their marriage, he must relinquish it, and go alone to a foreign shore,—alone to death, for he should never return. Isabel yielded, and stifled the conscience that tried to make itself heard.

Bright was the sunshine that gleamed through the painted window and fell on the pavement of the chapel, as a bridal train was once more gathered there. The bride to day looks pale—as white almost as her dress; still, calmly she plights her vows, and, for a life of weal or woe, is bound to Lord Regnier.

Isabel turned to receive the greeting of her father-in-law, but instead of embracing her, Lord Beauville suddenly stumbled forward, and fell on the ground, while blood gushed from his mouth and nostrils! They raised him up, and carried him from the chapel, followed by Isabel, clinging in terror to her husband's arm. At the chapel door were gathered some of the peasants on the estates.

"Blood on a bridal!" whispered one of them to her neighbor; "that bodes no good—see ye, see ye!"

Isabel heard; she looked down, and truly the spotless robe she had chosen for her wedding was sprinkled and spotted with the earl's blood! A shudder ran through her, unblest, unshriven, she had approached a holy sacrament—approached, perchance, to profane it. No time for musings now! They have reached the earl's chamber, and the physician is vainly endeavoring to stanch the blood, that, from the breaking of some internal vessel, was gushing forth. The man, an hour ago full of strength and energy, lay on his couch dying and unconscious. He opened his eyes at length, one wild stare around—then fixed them on the roof of the room. He struggled for speech, but the crimson tide flowing fast, forbade utterance. A few incoherent words were all the bystanders heard—

"Have mercy, Alice; I did it not—'twas her own choice. They were free—only one day—one hour! Dost hear, Alice?"

They were his last words, and with a groan of anguish, Lord Beauville died.

Isabel had heard all, standing petrified by; the child of Alice de Lisle, one who had watched her deathbed, had no word of consolation—no prayer for this; she could not bid him, even in that last moment, call upon his God for mercy. Her husband drew her away, and busy hands undid those blood-stained bridal garments, and laid her down to rest. But her brow throbbed, and her heart was sick with terror. There was no peace for her till her husband, after having seen the necessary offices towards his father discharged, came to her and clasped her fondly in his arms. She had not wondered to see him so composed and resolute through the sudden horror; but she expected to hear him now pour forth passionate regrets for the loss of a father who had never crossed him, but entertained for him the strongest affection. His first words were—

"And you, my fairest one, are countess already;" and he spoke gaily. "No foreign banishment for us now; you shall see your husband sitting in the queen's councils."

Isabel shuddered in his embrace. It was true, however. Strange chances of life! the house she once called her prison was her own—Isabel de Lisle was now Countess of Beauville.

PART THE SECOND.

CHAPTER I.

"Alive a queen, now dead I am a saint;
 Once Mary called, my name now Msrtyr is;
 From earthly reign debarred by restraint,
 In lieu whereof I reign in heavenly bliss.
 Rue not my death, rejoice at my repose;
 It was no death to me, but to my woe;
 The bud was open'd to let out the rose,
 The chains unloosed to let the captive go."
 POEMS BY FATHER SOUTHWELL.

FROM the broad Roman road which led from London to Chelmsford, a narrow lane turned off, and passed directly into the avenue of Thoresby Hall. The house was a large building, in the then modern style, such as we are wont to call Elizabethan. It formed three sides of a quadrangle, which enclosed a spacious courtyard. On one side of the hall were grassy slopes and beds of flowers and bushes, and these slopes ran down to a small piece of water, on the opposite side of which ran a grove of lime trees whose branches interlaced each other.

The window of one of the principal rooms in the hall was wide open, and near it sat a lady at work. Ever and anon she turned to speak to another lady, also sitting near the window, but in a different attitude. The chair in which this latter was placed was of curious construction, and well lined with cushions, and the fragile form that reclined in it was that of a cripple. The thin fingers, unnaturally long, hung down by her side, and the pale face and sunken eyes told of long and constant suffering. She spoke gently in answer to the anxious looks of her companions. "I am very comfortable, darling sister; do be at ease concerning me for a while."

Is it possible then that this is our old friend Mary Thoresby, and the sufferer Blanché, of whom we remember her speaking at Castle de Lisle.

The bright-looking Mary has changed considerably—she has passed into a calm, thoughtful woman, somewhat older than her years. We can trace that she has endured much—indeed she has had cause. Her mother has been dead for years, after a long illness, and the charge of the household has devolved on her, with the constant attendance on her sick sister.

Blanche had been just on the eve of quitting her father's house, to follow her earnest desire of entering religion. The day before, a priest having happened to arrive at the house, it was arranged a Mass should be said by him. At this Mass Blanche was more than usually anxious to assist, it being her last opportunity ere leaving the home of her childhood forever.

The Mass was said in a small chamber near the roof of the house, from whence an easy way of escape might be found, in case of an alarm. This room, or loft, was reached by two ladders, which led into different parts of the house. The Mass was just over, when an alarm was given, and a party of men, in search of the priest, rushed into the house. The priest and the other gentlemen instantly sought the roof, and Blanche felt that could she only remove the vessels and vestments which in the haste, were left on the temporary altar, the pursuers would be off their scent. She gathered them all up, and as the feet of the men were ascending one ladder, she left the room by the other. In her haste she missed her footing, and fell from an immense height. She was picked up by the terrified servants insensible, and, as they thought, dead, but still clasping close to her breast her sacred charge. Lady Thoresby was at the time ill, and Mary attending on her, which had been the reason why Blanche had been the only woman present at the Mass. The alarm hastened Lady Thoresby's death, and Mary went from her mother's death bed to what she supposed to be that of Blanche; but Blanche did not die. Her fall had rendered her an incurable cripple, and a life of continual suffering was her portion.

Not only was Mary compelled to witness the severe daily suffering of her sister, but a deeper shade had been thrown over her life, by the necessary postponement of her marriage with the Viscount Clinton, a young Catholic nobleman, to whom she had been just betrothed. During the last few months Blanche's general health had decidedly improved, and Lord Clinton had been earnestly pressing that their marriage should take place, and that Mary should not leave her home, but still remain the nurse and comforter of her helpless sister. To this Mary had consented; and the marriage would take place soon after the arrival of a priest who was expected at the hall.

—"Mary," said Blanche, softly, "while I slept this morning, saw you Clinton?"

"Yes, dear," answered Mary, blushing; "we were together in the lime-grove."

"That is a favorite spot of yours," said Blanche, smiling. "And did he tell you any news?"

"We were speaking of the old subject," answered Mary,—"the sorrows around. This act of the queen hath affrighted us all. To lay violent hands on an anointed sovereign and sister-queen betokens such virulence against our religion, we know not what will come next."

"Poor Mary Stuart!" answered Blanche; "'tis well for thee, at all events; the prison-bars are broken down, and the bird set free. But it must have been sad to die without the sacraments: that was such a frightful cruelty on Elizabeth's part."

"Ah," said Mary, "Clinton hath heard the particulars of her last hours; most touching and wonderful they are."

"When she found that her almoner, Le Preau, was to be kept from her (although he was in the castle), she wrote to him, begging him to keep vigil that night with her and for her, desiring to make her general confession to him thus, being prevented from doing it otherwise—declaring that she died innocent, and requesting absolution."

"But a joy beyond price was in store for her. Some time ago, the holy Father, seeing the malice of her enemies, and to what length they were tending, sent her the Blessed Sacrament. It was enclosed in a gold ciborium; richly jewelled, and with it he sent his permission that, if in the hour of death she were deprived of the assistance of a priest, she might communicate herself."

"Oh, how marvellous a privilege!" exclaimed Blanche; "beyond what has been granted even to the saints. I suppose a woman's hands have not ever touched the Blessed Sacrament since the blessed Clare defied the heathens. Go on, tell me all about it."

"So, on the morning of February the 8th, arising from her rest, during which she had continued to pray, she entered alone into her oratory. No one went with her, her loving servants were without. No eye save the adoring angels, no ear save the listening saints saw her awful act,* or heard her whispered prayer."

"Oh," said Blanche, "what must have been her feelings in that hour! Did not her thoughts wander back to her own Belle France, to the solemn hour when, perchance, in the royal chapel, and clothed in silvery robes, the child-queen made her first communion? Ah! Mary, how fair looked the world to her then, how proudly waved the banners of two broad kingdoms at her side, how lightly sat the crown on that brow of angel beauty, how gaily beat the heart in those days of guileless youth! What thought could have shadowed then her last communion?"

"Yes," returned Mary, "a heart-broken prisoner,—a woman aged in her prime,—a desolate widow, a forsaken mother, a betrayed queen. Gone were riches, crowns and friends; passed away the pomp of regal France, and the once fervent loyalty of false Scotland."

* See "Lives of the Queens of Scotland."

"But," said Blanche, looking out to the clear sky, "how blessed to think one thing was left, the same faith, the same God. Even when His priests were kept from her, He came Himself to absolve the sins of that sore-tried heart—t' feed the fainting soul with angels' bread. What wonder, then, if in the strength of that food, she went forth to die with a martyr's fortitude! What wonder, then that neither the insults of the Earl of Kent upon her dignity, nor those of the Dean of Peterborough upon her religion, moved her! Her spirit was in the hall of Caiaphas and upon the hill of Calvary. What wonder, then, that she forgot not for one instant the tenderness of the woman, the courage of the sov'ign, or the endurance of the saint! So died she; so went she to her crown. Mary Stuart, queen and martyr, pray for us!" *

Blanche lay back, exhausted by her sudden burst of feeling. Mary was in tears, and there was a short silence.

"I hear my father's step outside," said Mary. "Are you well enough to see him, dearest?"

"Oh yes!" said Blanche, opening her eyes.

Mary went to the door and admitted her father.

After gently kissing his suffering child, Sir Robert said—

"We have had news that a priest is to land on this coast immediately, and we have been in great tribulation, not knowing how to get any one to meet him."

"Could not Henry have gone?" said Blanche.

"Upon what horse, my child?" replied her father; "thou forgettest the state of a recusant's stables. Henry went forth instantly to try and borrow a horse of Arthur Leslie, but Arthur declares it is far safer if he go himself; he has friends along the coast, and, being well known as a Protestant, there will be no danger of question."

"A singular sort of Protestant is Arthur," remarked Mary.

"It is very noble of him to undertake such an office."

"Ay," said Sir Robert; "and we must hope and pray his charity may be rewarded by the gift of faith."

"How is it," said Blanche, "that he stays out of the Church?"

"Simply because," said Sir Robert, "he cannot relinquish the hopes of life at one glance. He is his uncle's heir to one of the finest properties in the country, with every prospect of advancement. He knows well that to become a Catholic is to become poor, and despised, and persecuted—Well, I must not tarry, to fatigue Blanche; I only came to tell you that perhaps to-morrow we may have a priest with us once more; and now, farewell, for here comes Henry to fetch me."

It was a beautiful sight to see the fine old gray-haired baronet leaning on his son's arm, a young man full of the strength of early manhood. Both one and the other maintained well the reputation of the Thoresby family, as producing the finest men in England, and their faces bore evidence, too, of the character of that same family—generous and noble-hearted, and brave and loyal, and kind to the poor; and yet these were the men who, in the glorious reign of good Queen Bess, held their lands, their homes, oftentimes their lives, in fear.

Note.—"No papist, or repented papist, so refusing or making default in making and subscribing the declaration as by the last-mentioned Act, shall have or keep in his possession any horse above the value of five pounds; and two justices by their warrant may authorize any person, with the assistance of a constable or his deputy, to search for and seize the same for the use of the king. But if any person shall conceal or be aiding in concealing any such horse, he shall be committed to prison by such warrant and Act for three months, and shall also forfeit treble the value of such horse."

CHAPTER II.

"They who call me to the work can shield me,
Or make me strong to suffer."—Ion.

"You seem to be watching that ship very narrowly," said a young and fine-looking gentleman on horseback to two * "Madam," interrupted the Earl of Kent, "your life would be the death of our religion, and your death will be its preservation." "Ah," exclaimed Mary, "I did not flatter myself with the thought I was worthy of such a death, and I humbly receive it as an earnest of my acceptance into the number of God's chosen servants."—Lives of the Queens of Scotland.

weather-beaten fisherman, who were mending their nets on the flat coast of Essex.

"Marry, and well we may, sir," answered one of them; "for she is actually putting off a boat."

"And you think it will not live in this sea?"

The sailor pointed for answer to the boiling surf that dashed upon the sand, and the distant foam of the billows. "Why, sir, the vessel herself is obliged to put to sea again, 'tis so dangerous on the coast; and some fools, I suppose, who want to land, choose to drown themselves. Why not go to London, I marvel?"

But Arthur Leslie did not wonder, and felt convinced that the adventurer in the boat was no other than the man he was in quest of; so he gazed with absorbed interest on the struggle. The little boat was tossed up and down, as if the proud waves toyed with its destruction. Now it was lost to view, and seemed engulfed for ever, then it rose again triumphantly upon the white crest of a billow.

"She nears the shore, by heaven!" cried one of the men.

"There must be some witchery about it," muttered the other; "for no mortal power could bring that boat to land."

"Could we not give help, now it is so near?" said Arthur, turning to the men.

"No, no," answered the last speaker; "I'll have naught to do with witchcraft; I'll not help them to land."

"Shame on you, then!" returned Arthur; "will you not?" addressing the other.

He was too intently watching the scene to answer; but suddenly rousing—

"By my halidome, but they are brave men!" he exclaimed.

"I'll down to the shore to see what I can do;" and he dashed down, followed by Arthur. The raging spray flew in their faces, and almost blinded them. The boat neared—it was amongst the breakers!

"There she goes!" said the sailor, as, amid the roar of the waves, the cracking sound was audible. "Now they must struggle for their lives!" and accordingly, getting free from the fragments of the boat, the two men who had been in her, breasted the waves bravely. No human help could avail!—the mighty waves tossed them back again and again, till at length one more kindly threw them, panting and exhausted, on the sand. Arthur and the sailor ran to them, and, lifting them from the ground, drew them into a place of safety. Arthur was quite certain his conjecture was correct, and the form he held in his arms was that of a priest. Presently the man revived a little, and his first act was to look up to heaven, and his first words were—"Thanks be to God!" Then, suddenly making an effort to rise, he exclaimed: "My poor companion, I trust me he hath not suffered."

"Be at ease, sir," answered Arthur; "he is nearly well, and less injured than you. He is, I trow, more accustomed to such feats than yourself."

"I have not, indeed, tried swimming for some years, and I did fee, as if I could struggle no longer, when suddenly the friendly waves dashed me on the beach. Thanks, good sir, for your courtesy; I can now rise."

"You must change your drenched clothing," returned Arthur; "there is a fisherman's hut hard by, and afterwards I trust you will let me conduct you on your journey, for I know this road well."

The stranger seemed embarrassed at the kind offer, and Arthur, desirous to put an end to the mystery, said—

"Perhaps it is you, sir, whom I am bid to seek. My good friend Sir Robert Thoresby, is expecting a friend from foreign parts."

There was the start he looked for.

"Sir Robert Thoresby, of Thoresby, in this county?"

"The same."

"Then," said the stranger; "I think I am the one you are looking for."

"I was sure of it," said Arthur, smiling, "when I saw that adventurous boat set forth. I have another horse waiting at a distance, will it please you to mount?"

"As soon as I have given the sailor who accompanied me the reward I promised him—for happily my purse has come safe to land also—then I am at your service."

With much eagerness did Sir Robert and Henry watch the approach of two horsemen who were riding up the avenue at sunset that evening. The foremost was Arthur Leslie, his open generous face flushed with long exercise and with the pleasure of having accomplished his mission.

"How young the other is!" remarked Sir Robert to his son; "it will be easy to disguise him. He will pass for a gallant cavalier any day."

And, as the gentleman dismounted and advanced towards them, they perceived that though his frame was thin from toil of some sort, a grace hung about it of which nothing could divest him. The face was pale and worn, but there was something so noble in the broad open brow, and so sweet in the full dark eyes, that it drew one instinctively towards him.

"Welcome, Arthur," said Sir Robert, "and welcome to you too, sir; I pray you enter my poor house."

And while Henry stood outside to hear Arthur's narration, Sir Robert led his guest into his private cabinet. Mary was there, anxious to receive the first blessing of the priest. On seeing him, however, she uttered a sort of stifled cry, and gazed in mute wonder.

"Yes, Mary," said he, coming towards her, "your memory deceives you not. At last I have fulfilled my words, and 'come to Thoresby.'"

"And you are a priest?"

"Yes, thanks be to God, and a member of the Society of Jesus."

Mary threw herself on her knees for his blessing, and Sir Robert knelt beside her. They were soon joined by Henry and Arthur, and the secret of Walter's relationship was entrusted to the latter. It was likewise agreed that it were safer he should not be known by his usual name, and should adopt that of Walters as a nom de guerre, and less likely to draw suspicion. This arranged, Arthur took leave.

"And now, father," said Sir Robert—"that is a title dearer to us than that of kinsman—after you have seen my poor Blanche, you must take the repose you so much require."

"O, Blanche!" said Mary, after Walter had gone to his room, "Is it possible?—he a priest!—he who seemed formed for a life of sunshine, to be a missionary here! Oh! suppose he is taken, and they slay him with that cruel death;" and Mary burst into tears.

"But think of the end, the glorious reward, the martyr's crown," said Blanche, soothingly. "Surely we may say, he hath left all to follow Christ."

"All, indeed," said Mary. "Was he not fitted rightly to be the head of his noble house?"

"You have never heard much of him since you parted at Apswell, have you, Mary?"

"Only in fragments. I heard he and Lord Beauville had disputed, and Walter had returned to Rheims; then, when I heard of the marriage of Lady Constance, I could not but marvel if that had aught to do with it. Then came Isabel's unhappy marriage, and I wondered not that Walter did not return to England, but I thought he would seek some foreign court, or take service in some army. I never dreamed to see him return a mission priest. Truly, God's ways are wonderful."

Walter de Lisle a mission priest! It is no wonder that Mary is surprised. Let us look awhile at him, our dear Walter, whom we parted from in his hour of trial, long years ago. Methinks any one who had known him well would have found him out under any disguise, for there is the same radiant smile, the same sparkling eyes as of yore. True, there are lines written on the face which tell of conflict and of suffering, and the vigorous frame is thin, worn with frequent penance and untiring labor. Walter's life since we left him may be briefly traced, for long years of suffering oft leave little mark behind them. It would not be interesting, even intelligible, if we had accompanied him through those heavy days and nights which followed his flight and his sacrifice. How his heart died within him, and he repented almost that he chose God instead of man; how life seemed quenched within him, and he wanted only to let time drift by him, and never to begin the struggle afresh. Constance Beauville had not been loved as many men love, as a vision sweet for the time, but soon forgotten when it passes away. Walter's love was but of one kind, strong as his whole nature, and deep as a torrent. He loved thus, or not at all. He would love God thus, or not at all. So Father Mordaunt saw, and thus he prayed; and the prayer was granted, the struggle was past; the vow spoken at Campian's feet became a reality. 'Twas the news of the martyrdom of this holy man that first aroused Walter from his slumber. He turned with his whole heart and energy to serve God, and he was rewarded even speedily. To him was given that call which even the angelic hosts may envy; and the low, still voice said to him, "Come and serve me, dearest of the sons of men. Come, speak in My name; hold My keys, and have jurisdiction over Me, your Lord and your God."

And so Walter became a priest, and then he prayed his superiors to send him on the English mission; for to die for the country he loved was his ambition. He was refused at first, and tried in various ways and by various toils, and at last his wish was granted; and strangely enough he was directed that the eastern coast should be the first scene of his labors, since no priest had been in those parts for long, and Sir Henry Thoresby had been advertised to meet a priest who would land on the coast. He had sent, little expecting to meet his own nephew.

Thoresby Hall was bright, indeed, now, for once more the Holy Sacrifice was offered, once more the fainting weary souls drew near, first to hear the words of pardon for sin, as they laid down their burden at the feet of Christ, then to nourish their souls with the Bread of Life. Then peace reigned around, and thanksgivings many and fervent rose up from the little band of confessors of the faith in Thoresby Hall.

"Alas, father," said Blanche Thoresby, one day as Walter sat by her couch, "I fear me I often murmur at the lot that renders me in these troublous time a burden upon all."

"You would rather," said he, "have fulfilled your early wishes, and consecrated yourself to God in the cloister."

"Oh, yes, father; and I aspired to join the convent where day and night they watch in lowly adoration before the Blessed Sacrament, and pray continually for sinners, and I could have prayed for my country, our own dear England, and offered up all I did for her. What are you smiling at, father, was it too presumptuous?"

"Not so, my dear child," he answered; "but I smiled when I thought how our hopes vanish, and our plans are blown away, even as the wind brushes off the leaves. Blanche I would rather choose the lot you have than the one you marked out. Yes," continued he, and his face lit up with a radiance which scarcely seemed of earth, "to lie still in His arms must be best for His creatures. If we work for Him, we mix up self with our best deeds; but to be called to give up the pure hopes and visions of youth at His call—to lay down life even, and that not in one quick moment of agony, but through long years of suffering, this is blessed indeed; for wherefore do you suffer? Because you bore in your arms the tokens of His suffering love, the tokens of His great humiliation in subjecting Himself to His creatures; by this means you saved the life of a priest; that priest lived perchance to offer once again the Adorable Sacrifice, to reconcile one more sinner to God. Was not that enough? Oh! believe me, my daughter, God took these pure hopes of yours to heaven, and sent them down again loaded with benedictions. You prayed to watch before Him day and night, and behold He bids you do it with the incense of willing suffering. You loved Him in His Sacrament; He asked your life to be given in that love. Fear not, Blanche, if life be long before you, if you lie here helpless while others hurry to and fro in their Master's service. Nay, if even never again on earth before your eyes shall be raised up on high the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world, from your heart shall ascend a perpetual sacrifice, a perpetual adoration, as true and as worthy as if you were in the convent of your choice."

There was a long silence. Blanche's face was hidden in her hands, for such words needed no answer; words from which she gathered strength for many years to come.

Mary entered the room, and seeing them both silent, she sat down beside Blanche.

"Mary," said Walter, suddenly raising his head, "do you ever hear from Isabel?" The word was spoken with an effort.

Mary had been expecting this question, and schooling herself to meet it, yet now it came she trembled.

"No," she answered; "but you know we seldom write letters in these days of danger."

"When did you last hear? Now, Mary, be open with me; it is true kindness to tell me all you know. I have heard nothing but the fact of her unhappy marriage."

"Her letters," answered Mary, "well nigh ceased some time before she married. When I heard of the event, I wrote to her, and begged that nothing might interrupt the love between us. Then came a few lines, saying it was impossible for her, as I must see, to keep up intercourse with her relations. There was that in the spirit of those few words which showed me, that though she was pained at parting from me, her whole soul was wrapped up in her husband. It was therefore no entrapping of the late earl's; indeed I never could credit he could have bent Isabel's will."

"No," said Walter; "in the one letter she wrote, in which she bade me not to write, she said 'twas her own free choice. And you have never seen her?"

"Yes, once; two years since I was in London for a while; and we stood one day on the pier at Greenwich to see the queen take boat for Westminster. I had never seen her majesty, and 'twas a grand pageant; many ladies of the court were there, among them Isabel. She has grown into such majestic beauty, she looked fitter than Elizabeth to be the queen, albeit her highness hath a stately presence."

"Did Isabel recognize you?"

"Oh, yes, and turned pale as death; then casting on me a look of deep affection, she hastened forward to take her place in the boat that was awaiting her. There was a sadness in her beauty; her eye had that wistful gaze as of those looking to something beyond and indistinct. I heard a good deal about her during my stay in London, for Rachel contrived to come to me. She told me Isabel sorrows deeply she has no children, for it is galling to her husband's pride to have no heir. The failure of a male heir in the direct line is unknown in the Beauville family, and the estates must now pass to a distant relation, one whom Beauville dislikes. Another of her sorrows is caused by her husband's neglect, to love a wife, and be a favorite with the queen, is impossible in England. Lord Beauville prefers the queen's favor, and, indeed, Rachel saith he seems to have ceased to care for the beautiful creature he hath wedded, while she loves him still more wildly."

"It is too much as I feared," answered Walter, sadly, "for I have heard much of Lord Beauville, as Viscount Regnier, abroad; such news as would not make one imagine a woman linked to him could be happy. My poor Isabel! little did she imagine how vile a man she was wedding. But her religion, Mary—he does not oppose that, I trust; I suppose she is able to gain admission to the ambassadors' chapels?"

There was no answer.

"Did Rachel say nothing about this?"

Mary shook like a leaf; she could not speak.

The truth flashed for an instant upon him. He started to his feet.

"Tell me quickly, Mary," said he, his voice trembling with anguish; "it is not possible she can have forsaken her faith?"

"Alas!" sobbed Mary, "I fear she hath. She attends the Protestant services, and never seeks the Sacraments; I tried for long not to believe it, but I fear me it is true."

Walter silently left the room. He shut himself up in his own chamber, and any who listened might have heard the sobs and groans that burst from a man in his agony, for if any soul was dear to the priest, how much more the one of his only sister!—the only tie he yet had to earth—an apostate! Oh, awful thought! unendurable to his ardent and loving soul. Yet, when he remembered his youth, and how once he had stood on the very brink of the precipice, Walter humbled himself exceedingly, and offered up his life as a sacrifice for this precious soul. And Walter, as he reviewed the past with the keen self-reproach of the holy, accused himself of neglect and coldness to his sister at Apswell Court. Had he kept free from that entanglement with Constance, and made Isabel the object of his affection, and resolutely broken down the icy barrier that she raised, a bond might have been cemented between them which Viscount Regnier would have no power to break. Perhaps together they might have gone abroad; perhaps to her, too, might have been given a priceless gift, and at this moment in some holy cloister she might be praying for him, in stead of his wrestling for her. Many hours passed ere the household at Thoresby saw Father de Lisle again, and many a night after that was spent in vigil and in penance, to atone, as far as might be, for the fault which seemed so grievous to the purified eye of the saint.

CHAPTER III.

"When he stood up in court and endured the contumely of upstart fanatics, the loss of his estate, the ruin of the prospects of his family, the filthy dungeon, the rack and the gallows, rather than renounce his religion, he did an act which the recording angel wrote down with an Alleluia on his lips."—Rambler, February, 1837.

For some weeks all went peacefully at Thoresby Hall, and Walter went backwards and forwards, seeking out Catholics, and enabling them to come to the Sacraments. Oftentimes, after having said Mass at Thoresby, and ere the sun had yet risen, he would go journeys of many miles to keep strange trysts with his flock. He always took with him the little pyx in which reposed the Adorable Sacrament; and often in the midst of great woods, far away from human habitation, he would give communion to some trembling and hunted Catholic.

"Are there any Catholics in Chelmsford jail?" inquired Walter, one night.

"Only Father Gerard, that I know of," answered Sir Robert, "if, indeed, he still lives."

"Oh! I must see him," exclaimed Walter.

"I fear me 'tis impossible; they are most savage in this county, and we have often tried, by bribes and otherwise, to gain a mission, but in vain. Louth, the jailer, is a perfect brute, and his wife, a noisy sort of good-natured woman, is far too afraid of him to venture on any risk, even though she loves good well."

"I must make the attempt," said Walter; "I shall go into Chelmsford, and reconnoitre."

* * * * *

"Now heshrew thee, Giles," exclaimed Mistress Margery Louth, the goodwife of the jailer of Chelmsford; "thou art enough to anger an archangel. What is the use of sending thee messages into town? Did I not tell thee again and again 'twas a green kirtle I wanted, and, behold, thou hast brought me brown taffety! and there thou standest, with thy great mouth wide open, staring at me as if I had made the mistake, and not thou; and now 'tis too late to send thee back again."

"Mistress," began Giles, "the master told me to saeep the prisoners' yard afore ever I did thy errands. I"—

"Hold thy tongue, sirrah," cried the lady; "prating 'o thy master, in ead, about my errands!—but it is the last time thou shalt go; take thy wage, and depart this very day,—go back to the pigs, and a fit companion, forsooth. And what may you want, young fellow?" said the lady sternly, as she perceived a man, dressed not only in the peasant's fustian, but with garments old and patched, and bearing evident marks of poverty, loitering near.

"Fair dame," answered the peasant, making a lowly reverence, "I am a stranger in these parts, and seek for work."

"And work you shall have, friend," exclaimed the lady greatly pleased at the respect with which she was addressed, "if you have a mind to take this idle varlet's place."

"And a precious hard one ye'll find it, too," muttered Giles, moving off.

"Now, get thee gone, sirrah," vociferated Mistress Louth, "and let me have no more of thy lying tongue." And then turning to the new applicant, she tried to soften down the disagreeables of the proffered situation, having a shrewd suspicion that the stranger would suit her purpose better than any other she could get.

The office of scavenger to the Chelmsford prison was not an office over and above desired by the good Essex people, entailing, as it did, hard and revolting labor, scanty fare, and coarse abuse from the jailer—a man of violent passions and petty tyranny.

Good cause had Mistress Louth to be pleased with her change. Joseph, as the new servant called himself, proved the most diligent and the most enduring, of any she ever had. After his long hours of work, he was ready to do her errands, and would execute them with a skill and patience which seemed to be unwearied. Neither did he ever murmur at the food—scarcely fit for a dog—that was often cast to him; the sauce of content and cheerfulness seemed always ready. So rapidly did Joseph rise in his mistress's esteem, and in the liking of his fellow-servants, the rough turnkeys of the prison, that it came to pass, that they required him, in addition to his own labors, to do part of their work, also, by going into the prisoners' cells, an office to which he appeared nothing loath.

"Joseph," cried Jack Nelgreave, the head turnkey, one day, swearing, according to his wont, a loud oath, "I am going to have a quart of ale along with my mate, and you can take the bread and water yonder to that old fool of a priest,—an old idiot, who might do as he lists if he would only go to church as the queen's grace doth direct, and, because he must be after his popish mummery, will get himself hung. Dost hear, varlet—wilt thou go?"

"Ay, Jack," quoth Joseph; "I have my work to do first. I reckon, if I go before night it will suffice?"

"Oh, ah, any time, so long as you give him the food, but we don't want him to die like a rat, to save friend Ralph the pleasure of hanging him." And Jack strode away to his supper.

Descending from the general court of the prison was a winding flight of steps, which led to the dungeons below. Each of these cells had a staircase leading from them, so that there was no communication one with the other. These stairs were long, and when Joseph arrived at the bottom, he gasped for breath. It took some minutes to accustom himself to the foul air he encountered; the torch he carried cast its wild glare on the thick stone walls down which the damp fell. A heavy-barred door, with massive lock, was the entrance.

With the key he bore, Joseph unlocked the door, entered the dungeon, and carefully locked himself in. He then gazed around. The cell was about twelve feet long, and six wide. One small aperture in the roof admitted all the light and air that reached the captive. There was no flooring, save the damp ground, a little straw thrown into a corner formed his only bed, and a few stones put together, his chair and table.

The occupant of the chamber was an old man. His face bore evidence of toil and disease, his hair and beard were both of silvery whiteness. When Joseph entered, the old man was kneeling; and accustomed generally to receive a few oaths from Jack with his daily provision, he did not move, but quietly prayed on.

"Father, bless me," said Joseph, kneeling before him.

The old man started.

"Are you a Catholic, my son?" said he, rising to his feet.

"Yes, father—a Catholic, and a priest; and, moreover, one you have known well—Walter de Lisle."

The sudden news was almost too much for Father Gerard. He staggered, and would have fallen, had not Walter caught him in his arms.

The silence of night fell on the prison. Some slept after their drunken revelry, some forgot their sorrows in slumber, some counted the weary hours as they passed, but to the two priests the time fled by, for they had much to say, and Father Gerard desired first to hear Walter's history since they parted.

"And you, father—still laboring, still suffering?"

"Yes," said the old priest. "About two years after your mother's death, I was apprehended and thrown into prison, but there were many others in the same case, and the governor and magistrate happened to be interested in some, and therefore they procured the banishment of all, and we went to France. There I stayed two years, till my health was strengthened; and my superiors at last, to my joy, allowed me to return on the English mission, and in it I labored till eight months since, when I was interrupted while saying Mass. Just as I had begun the Gloria in excelsis, the pursuivant rushed in, and took me in my vestments before the magistrate, and I was condemned to prison, and here I have remained, desiring but one thing, my dear son, to see a priest and have the sacraments; and that Christ has now granted me, praised be His name!"

"I perceive, father, you are not ironed," said Walter.

"I was to be," said the priest; "but whenever they attempted to put them on, they always fell off, so at last they gave up trying."

"You are cheerful under your cross, father," said Walter.

"Why should I not be?" said the priest. "My life draws to a close. If I am not called speedily to the gallows, I feel a fever in my veins, which I cannot survive; and it will not be long," continued he, looking up earnestly to the roof of his prison.

"What do you see, father?" said Walter.

The old man only smiled.

"Not when you are here; she only comes when I am alone."

"Who comes, father? tell me."

"The Mother with the Child," answered Father Gerard. "Oh! so glorious a vision; and this dark dungeon is full of heavenly light, and she bids me be of good cheer, and confess to the end the faith of her Son. My son," said he, turning towards him, "have you the Blessed Sacrament with you?"

"I have, father, all that is necessary to celebrate Mass. See, this stone in the wall will serve as our altar, and as soon as midnight chimes, I will begin."

Father Gerard sank back upon his straw, and Walter saw that he was dying. He hastened to give him a little of the wine he had brought with him, and the old man revived, and was able both to make his confession and hear that of Walter. Then Walter said his Mass. Soon after it was finished Father Gerard died.

No words can express the wrath and disappointment of Dame Louth when she found her new and pattern servant had, without staying to ask for wages, actually departed.

"No wonder she is wroth," said the other prison servants; "I warrant as 'twill be a long time ere she gets one like Joseph again."

Note.—The incident of the falling off of the irons and the vision of our Lady will be found in the "Life of Thomas Atkison, Priest."

CHAPTER IV.

"Yet gladness walks in sorrow's guise,
When mutual love the burden bears;
As sunbeams part the weeping skies,
And rainbows rise from misty tears."

GERDA FAX.

The soft moonlight was playing in gleams on the walls of Thoresby Hall, and the trees and bushes around stood out, some in silver brightness, some wrapped in gloom. The same beams fell strangely among the leaves of the lime-grove, with its interlacing branches, and the perfume from the blossoms, always so much more powerful at night, floated on the air. The sweet influence of the scene did not seem lost upon the two persons who were pacing up and down the avenue.

"You have no real objection, my Mary," said Lord Clinton, stooping to try and see the face half-hidden on his shoulder; "for if you have, even my eager love shall not be selfish; but I have waited long, have I not? almost as long as Jacob for Rachel. It is full six years since, in this very spot, you gave me that dear assurance which has brightened life since then."

"No, Edward," answered Mary Thoresby, in a low and trembling voice; "you have never been selfish. You know that such has been the state of Blanche's health I have scarcely looked for her to live from month to month. I think now there seems appearance that her life of suffering may be longer, and since my marriage is to make no difference, is not to lead me from my father nor my suffering sister, I can no longer refuse that which—which—" Mary's face was once more hidden, and the lover understood the unspoken words.

"Then, my own Mary, why a sort of shade of melancholy which hangs over you when the subject is mentioned? Forgive me, but I am too anxious, too fearful, lest there should be some secret cause of grief or anxiety I do not know."

"Oh, no, it is not that, Edward; but how can any woman's heart not quail to think of a bridal such as mine will be, in secret and in fear, with no festive gathering, no joyous looks, such as attend the brides of half England when they wed? and then it is so strange that the occasion of my cousin's arrival should give us the opportunity—he whose life has been so strangely mixed up with a romance of love and suffering. It is only, Edward, that when I think of all these things,—of the sorrow that is around us, of the clouds that hang over our heads, of the woe and persecution that attend our faith—a doubt crosses my mind whether or not it is a time for 'marrying and giving in marriage.'"

"Away with those fears, my own love," answered Clinton; "you cannot doubt the right of a union that has sanction and blessing from all we have been bound to consult—your cousin, last of all, you know. Did I tell you I had a long conference with him last night?"

"I saw you together," she answered, "and I was so glad, I wanted you to know him better. Is he not noble?"

"He is, indeed; one of those to whom one looks up as scarcely having a place on earth."

"And, Edward, then to think what a fate awaits him!"

"Surely there is little fear for one allied to Lord Beauville," returned Clinton; "but I confess to you my desire is to see him ere long in London; there, close to those he is allied to, he might be safe, and yet do his work; but if arrested here, and thrown into Chelmsford jail, to linger there for many months, the chances of an appeal—'tis a sad prospect."

Mary sighed deeply. "And I have a feeling—a warning, as the peasants call it—that there will be a search made here ere long. Oh, if we had (as I know they have at many Catholic houses) a hiding-place where he could go! Did you ever see the one at Clare Hall, Edward?"

"Never."

"It is a little chamber behind the great chimney in the hall; a few stones take in and out, and often and often have the pursuers passed it by; but here,"—and she looked wistfully towards the hall, as a break in the trees enabled her to have a free view—"here I see no possibility."

"And yet," rejoined Lord Clinton, looking also at the house, "those walls of mighty thickness ought to be able to shelter a fugitive."

A cry almost escaped from Mary's lips; Clinton looked at her with a sudden horror.

"No, I see nothing, hear nothing," she answered; "but 'tis a sudden thought. Thou knowest Blanche's chamber?"

"Certainly I do."

"There is between the further wall of it and the wall of my father's rooms a space; 'tis narrow, but high, and there would be air. Think you not it would do? In the very heart of the house no one could suspect."

"It seems likely," responded Clinton. "Blanche's room is the centre of the hall?"

"It is; at least, hers and my father's are both, and this division was put, I fancy, to correct some inequality in the building."

"How did you know of it?"

"When the house was repairing, it was such a nice dangerous place for us children to get into. Well do I remember how angry old Madge was with us, and how she said she would tell my mother, and the fear of alarming her made us promise good behavior for the future. Oh, I long to know if it is possible it can be used; we must wait till to-morrow morning for that, however, for I think Blanche by this time sleeps. We must go in now, dearest Edward." And they walked towards the house, the moonbeams shining full upon his manly form, supporting the fair and gentle girl whose fate had been cast in such rough circumstances. On reaching the hall they found Sir Robert, Henry, and Father de Lisle engaged in earnest conversation. Mary, blushing, would have passed by, and gone to her sister, but her father called her back.

"We have heard rumors from Arthur Leslie which warn us it is no longer safe for Father de Lisle to tarry amongst us," said Sir Robert; "and we must not seek to detain him, for now we have had the sacraments, for which we were well-nigh fainting; we must not selfishly endanger his safety, nor deprive others of his ministry, and so the day after to-morrow he purposes to go."

"But," said Walter, in his clear, sweet voice, "there is one more rite I would fain perform in this house, and if to-morrow night the next Mass I offer here could be that of your bridal, dear Mary, I should be very glad."

"To-morrow night!" almost gasped Mary, clinging to her father. "'Tis so sudden, so short."

"But it has been a long and sober wooing, my child," answered Sir Robert; and there are no bridal festivities to prepare, and you leave not your father's roof for another. I think you must consent, my Mary."

And Mary did consent, and then hastened to hide her confusion in her sister's arms.

Different, indeed, was the bridal of Mary Thoresby from the others which it has been our lot to describe.

It was just past midnight when the little household assembled in Blanche's chamber. Blanche, lying still on her couch, fixed her gaze lovingly on her sister. Mary wore a dress and veil of white, of the most simple kind, but old Madge's heart would have broken to have beheld her young mistress wedded in another color. A table, arranged as an altar, was placed at the foot of Blanche's couch, and the form of the crucified Master looked down upon the little group. The two altar-lights alone illuminated the room, for more display was deemed unwise; and so the rest of the large chamber, with the grim tapestry that hung its walls, remained in gloom. The lights shed their rays on the heads of the betrothed as they knelt before the priest,—that young priest, with his pale face and his glance of unearthly peace. Hushed was the silence while the low voices repeated their vows. No unmeaning words, and no perjured ones, were those which came from the lips of Mary and Clinton.

The long-tried and loving hearts were one at last, bound together in sacramental union. They were one now; hand clasped in hand, and heads bowed low, no power can part them now,—none save the angel of death can ever break that bond. The Mass goes on; and we, in these days of peace, who can scarce keep out distracting thoughts, who think the too frequent Mass almost wearisome, might almost envy those breathless worshippers while they follow every act of that stupendous mystery, might envy the rapt devotion of those communicants. The Mass was ended, the altar was removed, all trace was gone of the holy occupation, and Father de Lisle turned to give a short and parting exhortation to the little flock he was to leave on the morrow, when suddenly a violent knocking at the outer gate silenced them. There was a hasty glance around; each one knew well it was the coming of the pursuers. Then Mary, coming forward quickly, proposed her plan.

"It is the only hope," said Sir Robert, in despair.

The porter was sent out to prolong, as best he might, by excuses, the entrance of the unwelcome guests. Some of the servants hurried to bed, with the hope of having been supposed to be there all the time. The others trusted that the sudden alarm would itself form an excuse for their appearance. Mary's bridal dress was hastily dragged off, and she sat down by the side of Blanche. While this was going on, some planks of the flooring had been raised, and Father de Lisle at once sprang into the living grave that apparently yawned before him.

"Are you safe?" whispered Henry Thoresby from above.

"Yes, quite, thank you," answered Walter.

"Is there space enough?"

"Yes, just enough," he answered. "It is like a coffin, but it is high, and there is plenty of air. Think no more of me for the present."

The plank was laid down again, and Henry hurried after his father, who stood in the hall, ready to receive the visitors that were now entering.

"Ha! Sir Robert," said Mr. Sheriff Parker, "I am sorry to disturb you at this time; but, indeed, good sir, these infringements of the law must not be permitted; if you will persist in disobeying her Majesty's Privy Council's most excellent command—"

"We will not argue that point, good Mr. Sheriff," said Sir Robert, with his calm and dignified manner; "but let me inquire the cause of this unwonted disturbance at night. To a man in whose house there lies as you know well, a daughter ill as mine, it is truly a matter of serious annoyance."

"Well, well, Sir Robert," said the sheriff, drawing himself up, "if you will harbor Popish priests in your house, you must bear the penalty. Now, produce him at once, I pray you, my good sir."

"Nay, nay, Master Sheriff," said Sir Robert; "an' thou hast come with—let me see how many—three clerks and four pursuivants to find one man, it would be a pity to do their work. Search for him if ye want, good masters, with all the speed ye can."

Then ensued one of those scenes so frequent then, and for two centuries afterwards in Catholic houses; the pursuivants scattered themselves over the house, every chamber was entered, cupboards opened, tapestry rent aside; they struck their wands on the walls, in order to find out hidden panels, and stamped on the floor, to see if that too were hollow. When they reached the door of Blanche's chamber, Henry was there.

"I pray you, good sir, to enter gently, if you must enter the sick-chamber of my sister."

"Most certainly we must," returned the sheriff; "'tis the most likely place to find the rebel, we trow. The ladies are ever compassionate towards the unfortunate."

Henry's color rose at the taunt; but resistance being useless and suspicious, he suffered them to enter. The sight of Blanche's pale face and helpless form, and Mary, scarcely less pale, sitting by her side, moderated a little the fury of the searchers. Still they walked around the room, pulled aside the tapestry, looked under Blanche's bed, opened a closet that stood in one corner, and finally struck their staves against the wall, behind which Walter was sheltered. Each blow went like a sharp pain through the hearts of the listeners; but the good walls of Thoresby were true, and gave back no echo.

"Nothing there," said one of the men; "'tis an unlikely room, too, for tricks of that kind, for 'tis the very centre of the house. Up-stairs, nearer the roof, is the more likely place for that kind of animals to burrow. I have routed out two or three in my time."

The men withdrew from Blanche's chamber, and rushed up-stairs. For the next hour or two the most frightful riot ensued, shouting and hallooing to each other, turning to curses as they found their game was missing.

"I shall be under the necessity, Sir Robert," said the sheriff, pompously, "of leaving three men in your house in guard, for the information I received was too certain to be mistaken, that there is a Popish priest in your house, and we are determined he shall not escape."

"As you will, Mr. Sheriff," said Sir Robert indifferently; "'tis a heavy expense and trouble, but to that I must submit as best I may. You will find, however, your precautions useless."

The three men did stay, and kept so sharp a watch that during the whole day no communication could possibly be held with Walter, and the keenest anxiety was entertained on his account by his friends. It had a terrible effect on poor Blanche, and Mary was terrified at the burning fever that came on, and the restless starts of agony at every noise. At supper-time the servants contrived to drug the wine, taken in plentiful quantities by the sheriff's men, and their sleep in consequence was too sound to be easily broken.

The planks were again removed, and Henry, kneeling down, called for Walter.

"Father, are you alive?"

"Yes, and very happy," answered Walter, cheerfully.

"There is plenty of air; not much light, truly, but I can say my office by heart."

"Here is some food."

"Thank you, thank you; I should like some of that."

And a basket was lowered by a string.

"How are you all?" said the priest. "How is Blanche? Poor child! it is hard for her. Tell her to be of good courage, and to think of the days of old. It is not prudent to speak longer, I suppose. God bless you all, my children, and comfort you."

This miserable state of affairs lasted for several days, and at night only could a brief communication be held with Walter. At length, finding that the men slept so soundly at night, it was determined to attempt an escape, and so, one night, Walter, by cords put under his arms, was drawn up from his living grave. He was covered with dust, and presented a singular appearance. Blanche was extremely ill with fever, Walter would stay to pray awhile beside her, then blessing her and all the others of the sorrowing household, he quitted Thoresby in company with Arthur Leslie.

Note.—"The house was searched upon All Souls' Day, when Mr. Bavin was making a sermon. The next day the house where I remained was searched; but we both escaped by a secret place, which was made at the foot of the stairs where we lay, going into a hay-barn."—Life of Thomas Holford, Priest.

In the year 1577, in the month of June, the Bishop of Exeter, being in his visitation at Truro, was requested by Mr. Greenfield, the sheriff of the county, and other busy men, to aid and assist them to search Mr. Tregian's house, where Mr. Maine did lay. After some deliberation, it was concluded that the sheriff and the bishop's chancellor, with divers gentlemen and their servants, should take the matter in hand."—Life of Cuthbert Maine, Præst.

CHAPTER V.

"Grazed not on worldly wither'd wood,
It fitteth not thy taste;
The flowers of everlasting spring
Do grow for thy repast."

POEMS BY FATHER SOUTHWELL.

"Rose, Rose," cried a baby voice, "please take me to the lady my mother."

"Willingly, darling one," said Rose, cheerfully, as she lifted from the ground a lovely boy, scarcely two years old, and passed with him along the corridor to the apartment of her mistress.

She entered the room without ceremony. It was the dressing, or "tiring" chamber of the young Duchess of Bertram. A small looking-glass was affixed to the wall, and the apartment bore marks of a gay and varied fancy in its owner. Articles of dress were scattered about, various fashions had been tried on and were thrown aside; the perfume of flowers and scents mingled together, and before the glass was sitting the duchess herself, her sunny hair all let down over her white neck, and half shading her fair face, while she was busy in examining the workmanship of a curiously-carved ivory comb.

While Rose, with the child in her arms, steals in unobserved, we will take a glance at Constance, and see what ten years have done for her. They have left but little trace. She is more perfectly beautiful than before, though, perhaps, to our taste, time has robbed her of her early freshness. There is a wistfulness in the depth of her hazel eyes, but there are no lines on the smooth face which tell of care, of disappointment, or heartache. That look of secret grief, which, to a discerning eye, was visible under bridal smiles, is gone. Has the good Duke of Bertram, who in this space of time has grown stout and portly, more hospitable, more hearty, and more stupid than ever, succeeded, then, in winning his wife's depth of affection, and filling up the void in the yearning heart? Ah! no, but behold the secret is unravelled. Rose is close behind her now, and holding up the baby, his rosy face is reflected in the glass. With a cry of joy, the duchess turns.

"My boy! my beauty!"

He is in her arms, and in that sudden glow, and in that flood of joy, you learn the secret—Constance is a mother! Old dreams, old sorrows, pass her by and are gone.

"Well, Rose," said Constance, after having fondly caressed her child, "were you successful this morning? You stayed so long, I began to fear you have been disappointed."

"No, I was not disappointed, dear lady," said Rose; "I had all I wanted, and more; I had a strange joy—I suppose I may call it joy, though other feelings were mingled with it."

"What could it be?" exclaimed Constance.

"The priest to-day," said Rose, lowering her voice, "was my young lord, now Father de Lisle."

"Is it possible?" said the duchess; "and yet, after the first moment, I am not surprised. A priest's life, especially in these days, and here, is a life of such heroic self-sacrifice that it would well engage such a soul. Why do you wonder at it, Rose—you who admire all the things the saints did, which make me shudder?"

"No; I wondered only, in these days, when every Catholic family is of importance, that the last of the line of such an ancient house should have been suffered to give up all hope of perpetuating his."

"But the act of attainder has been passed."

"Has it? I did not know it, but even yet!"

"I know what you would say, Rose—another monarch would restore it; but trust me, Elizabeth Tudor will outlive you and me, Rose, even though we may not die young."

Rose half smiled.

"You don't believe me? You will see; death and our most mighty sovereign will have a tough battle together, I prophesy. But tell me more, Rose; I am hungry for news. Is Father de Lisle stationed in London?"

"Yes, till he is betrayed, I suppose," said Rose, sadly.

"Oh, no fear of that; his alliance with our house is a most powerful protection. Let him but be cautious, and he may stay here for a long time together. What rejoicing for you, Rose! you will be able to get so much that makes your happiness."

"The Sacrament?—yes," and Rose's hands were clasped and her eyes raised for a moment; then she perceived that Constance's eyes were full of tears. "Dearest lady," said Rose, kneeling down beside her, "would that they were joy to you also!"

The duchess shook her head. "I was never meant to be a martyr or confessor, Rose. Your faith is not for me, but one cannot help envying, sometimes, the peace, the joy, the certainty, you seem to possess. See, Rose," she added, pointing to her boy, who had fallen asleep on her shoulder, "there is something 'o envy, to be a child like that, sleeping in its mother's arms in perfect peace."

"And so we may be also, dearest lady—so may we sleep and rest in His arms, who remembereth better than a mother."

"Yes, yes," said Constance, wearily: "'tis a lovely vision.

but a vision only, to such as me. Well, 'tis something to muse on—Walter de Lisle a priest! Rose, I will lay down this boy on my bed, and thou wilt arrange my hair, for I have tarried too long at my toilet."

"Yes, truly, and it is my fault," said Rose, rising quickly; "now I will do my best with all possible dispatch."

For ten years had Rose Ford been the waiting-maid of Constance, and it may easily be conceived how the tie had ripened into friendship. In times of hollowness and deception, when spies were in almost every household, Constance knew how to value the fidelity and affection of her attendant. She prized Rose as one of her greatest treasures, and with the continual thoughtfulness for others which made so lovely a part of her character, she strove in every way to make Rose happy. There was but one thing she knew Rose valued—the exercises of her religion, and all Constance's wit and influence were exercised to procure this comfort for Rose. Very often did she gain for her admission into the chapels of the foreign embassies, which were closed against ordinary strangers with great vigilance; and whenever there was a secret meeting of the Catholics in some private house, which took place as often as a priest could be found, Rose generally was present, by her mistress's contrivance. It was from one of these gatherings that she had returned on the morning we have described. And by Rose's hands large alms were sent by Constance to many a hunted priest, and many a starving Catholic. Many a perishing one had been revived by Constance's care; and yet Constance was not a Catholic. She was, indeed, one in heart and belief. There was not a point of faith that yet remained a difficulty; first with Walter, afterwards with Rose, she had become satisfied and convinced. But Constance counted the cost. The world, though sometimes it wearied her, was still too sweet to be relinquished. She put the thought from her, and went on winning love from all, and scattering benefits round her on all sides. With assistance and help furnished by the duchess, Rose crept into many a miserable hole, and fed the hungry and clothed the naked; and the prayer of the poor and needy—that all-powerful prayer of gratitude—went up for Constance to the throne of God. Not yet was the gift of faith granted—or rather of strength to profess the faith. But there was a shield around Constance—a shield of angel's wings. In early youth, and of rare beauty, the wife of a man she loved not, and who was too indolent and simple to care for or watch over her, Constance found herself in the midst of the court of Elizabeth; a court which formed a strange contrast to the rigid purity of that of Mary Tudor—a court ruled by a queen endowed with a woman's weakness, without, apparently one instinct of her nature—a woman who had taken the hard and reasoning part of the masculine nature, without one spark of man's tenderness or the refinement so constantly found in the sternest characters. In the court of Elizabeth there were dangers without end or limit, and few were those who passed through it unscathed, at least in reputation. But one of those few was Constance; the fair name of the Duchess of Bertram was untouched. Fascinating and beloved, admired and sought after, she yet seemed to possess a clue which guided her through the maze. She did not know how it was herself; she often confessed to Rose her astonishment that her path was so smooth; but Rose, who knew with what might those secret prayers were rising up around her, wondered not; but she knew there must be an end—that the duchess could not flutter through the world for ever; sorrow must come at last, and death; and Rose prayed on.

CHAPTER VI.

Doctor.—What a sigh is there! The heart is sorely charged.

Gentlewoman.—I would not have such a heart in my bosom for the dignity of the whole body.—MAOBETH.

One of the finest houses in the Straud belonged to the Beauville family. It was kept up in state and splendor for under the present earl there was a far greater expenditure than under the former, though he had been considered liberal. The principal rooms in the mansion were those which looked out on the river, and the long garden, sloping down to the banks, where a boat-house and convenience for landing and embarking were to be found, as well as the barge in which the earl and countess were wont to sail. We need hardly have said the countess, for of late years she had borne little part in festivities, and withdrawn into a retirement which it seemed strange, indeed, should be the choice of a young and beautiful woman, possessed of rank and wealth. It was said by some that the disappointment of having no family preyed upon the countess's spirits. For the first time for many centuries had the house of Beauville failed in an heir, and the world said his mortification had done much to estrange the earl from his wife, and render him as he was, conspicuous for his gallantries, even in an age and in a court where the license was most free.

One large apartment in the house we speak of had been called for many years the countess's bower, and had been occupied by successive noble ladies of Beauville. In this chamber sat Isabel, Countess of Beauville. The aspect of the "bower" had changed under her reign. There was neither lace nor embroidery-frame, nor were there the young ladies of rank, who generally were companions of a noble lady's solitary hours. The present countess loved to be alone; and the quantities of books piled up against the wall, the large table, covered with writing materials, near which she was sitting, showed plainly a taste cast in different directions. It was true, Isabel devoted herself entirely to study, and endeavored in such a pursuit to find some solace for her great unhappiness.

Ten years have strangely altered this beautiful creature; for though her beauty has truly ripened since she has passed from girl to woman, there are lines on the countenance which tell of much endured; there is a depth of grief in those large and lustrous eyes, which speak of tears—hot, blinding tears. At the moment we are describing, the countess was sitting at her writing-table, and holding in her hands a manuscript, evidently of age and value. She was giving her whole attention to deciphering it; at length she laid it down, and looking around the room as if to relieve her eyes, sighed deeply; it was not merely the sigh of the overtasked student.

At this moment, the arras which formed the doorway was pushed aside, and Rachel entered; the same faithful Rachel, who looked more than ten years older, and whose face wore also a look of sadness; but it was of a different kind from that of her mistress,—there was peace and resignation mingled with the grief of the simple-minded and faithful servant.

"An' it please you my lady," said Rachel, "a gentleman without craves to speak to you."

"On what business, and who is he?" said Isabel, sharply.

"I do not know, my lady; but he is one of noble birth, I am certain, from his bearing;—as he did not give his name, I did not like to ask."

"Well, you must admit him, I suppose; perhaps," and she smiled scornfully, "he has a favor to beg of the earl, and seeks my intercession, poor soul!"

Rachel waited till her mistress had finished, and then departed. In another minute she returned, ushering in a gentleman whose dress, though plain, showed him of gentle blood. Isabel scarcely glanced at him; she had risen and bowed with a stiff and haughty manner, which had become habitual to her; now re-seating herself, she motioned her visitor also to a seat, and then said: "What would you of me, sir?"

The stranger's eyes were fixed on Isabel, and he answered in a voice whose gentle and clear tones made her heart give a sudden thrill.

"I am come, madam, to ask your alms toward the necessities of our poor persecuted fellow Catholics. You know well, I doubt not, the distress they endure for the sake of our holy faith."

Isabel felt her heart stop beating for a moment; but her face did not change.—her mask was worn too well. Her tone was more haughty and cold still, as she replied—

"You mistake, sir, and I marvel the times teach you not more caution. The Earls of Beauville have been for many years Protestants."

"Yes, madam," again replied the thrilling voice, "the earls, but not the countesses. Surely I mistake not now, in thinking I address a daughter of De Lisle, a line which has remained faithful to God!"

For a moment Isabel turned pale, but she recovered herself quickly. She rose from her seat—

"You are taking a liberty which I consider unwarrantable in a stranger. Your errand here will, however, be safe with me; but depart instantly, sir, I entreat you, and leave me in peace."

"In peace, Isabel," said the stranger, in a low and altered tone, as he rose and came nearer to her; "and could I leave you in it, I would go joyfully."

Isabel started; she looked up into his face with a sudden glance of recognition, which changed into agony, and then sank on the ground, crouching at his feet.

"Have pity on me," she gasped. "Walter, have pity."

"Pity!" said he, stooping over her, and speaking in tones of the utmost tenderness. "My sister, my Isabel, I have not come to speak harsh words, but to bid you look to peace, and hope, and life. Ah, how miserable are you, my Isabel! I see it written on your face, and hear it in your voice; the reed on which you leant has pierced your hand; come back, then, to Him who will never fail you; on whom if you lean He will carry you through all sorrow. Come to the Good Shepherd, Isabel."

"No, no, Walter," she answered, raising her head; "it is impossible; I am lost, I know it. I dare not face my husband's anger. I will not leave him; I will not tear myself away even from the mocking shadow of his love. No,"—her voice grew calm and hard,—"I have chosen; we both have chosen. You cast aside every hope of life to follow the Cross of Christ; I cast away faith and my hopes of heaven for earthly love; let us abide by our choice; verily we shall both have our reward."

"And our mother, Isabel," he answered,—"have you forgotten her? have you forgotten her dying bed, and her last words, and her burial-day, and Father Gerard? He is dead now, Isabel—dead for love of Christ; he died in my arms, praying for you. Have you forgotten Castle de Lisle and the days of your happy, holy youth?"

"No, I have not forgotten," she answered; "I can see each leaf on the rees that line the terraced walk; I can almost count the blades of grass; I can hear in the still night the ripple of the brook and the song of the passing bird. You have not recalled those memories—they haunt me ever, ever! Have pity on me, Walter; you have done your best; now leave me, for truly it is not safe for you to tarry long."

Walter drew back, and his face changed!—changed from the tender yearning with which he had looked on her, to the stern and yet sweet expression of one whose office is to rebuke.

"I have spoken to you," he said, "as brother to sister, as children of one mother, as those bound together with a tender human love; but I speak now as priest to sinner, as shepherd to a lost and wandering sheep. Not in ignorance have you sinned, but with the full light shining in your eyes. You sold your birthright for a mess of this world's miserable joys, and if you do not repent, great and awful will be the punishment. Oh, think you well, have you really chosen? When we sin wilfully, we say we are lost, 'tis a common speech; think you know what we mean? In flames forever; in unutterable torments; to have the face of God for ever turned in wrath upon us—God in whom we live, and move, and have our being. We fancy in this world we can hide from God. No such thing; He is around us, even the most sinful. His breath is our life. Isabel, do you choose death, eternal death, where the fire is not quenched?"

Isabel rose from the ground. Her face was pale but determined.

"You have done your duty, Walter, and now, farewell. I have chosen my own path, and will bear my own risks. Spare me the agony of seeing you again, or worse, bidding my servants turn you from my doors. We have chosen: you for heaven—I for earth. Let me at least enjoy, as best I may, my share of the compact."

She stood waiting for his answer—hard, cold, and resolute. Walter's eyes did not seek hers; they were raised to heaven. He said, as if speaking to himself, "Yes, it is the last time, for the way must be long." He roused himself. "Farewell, my poor sister! May God, in His great mercy, have pity on you ere it is too late."

He was gone, and Isabel threw herself on the ground, and gave full vent to a storm of passionate grief. There struggling, almost with convulsions, her husband found her an hour afterwards.

"Are you distraught, Countess of Beauville?" said he, angrily; "or deem you this the way to keep me at your side, as you often beseech me? Let me have no more of it—let me, at least find peace when I do come home. Verily I do not trouble you too much with my company!"

"Beauville," said Isabel, kneeling at his feet, "I have given up all for you—even heaven itself—and you spurn me as you would the very dogs from your footstool. This is not just. Give me either the love for which I sold my soul, or give me back that soul."

"Your soul!" said her husband, scornfully; "does every girl who falls in love lose her soul? I trow heaven will be an empty place!"

"Beauville, do not mock me; you know well my meaning. Let me be reconciled with the faith I have denied with my lips, (God knows, not with my heart.)"

"No, by Heaven," said the earl, "some recusant has been with thee this very day, in this house—my house! Who is it, woman? An' thou tellest me not, I will kill thee at my feet."

But the violence of threat and manner had no effect on Isabel. She answered not, and did not shudder in his grasp of iron.

"I know it," he said, starting " 'tis thy brother come hither—no other would have dared. Thou canst not deny it, Isabel."

The look of mute terror on the white face told him.

"Thou wilt not harm him?"

The earl grew cool directly.

"Tush, tush! I am not going to hurt the idiot; I have my hands too full for such employments. But one thing I must insist upon, that is, he comes hither no more, and that I have no more of these scenes with you in consequence.

"No, no!" said Isabel, eagerly; "you never shall. I will be still and will bear all, and he is not coming again; I bade him not. We have parted for aye."

"And a good thing too," said her husband carelessly. "Now, fair countess, if I were you, I would call my damsels to tire me afresh; for all these conflicts have disordered both dress and beauty."

And Isabel obeyed; and the earl, humming the air of a love song then in vogue, quitted the apartment.

CHAPTER VII.

"There's nothing in this world so sweet as love,
And, next to love, the sweetest thing is hate;
I've learn'd to hate, and therefore am revenged."

THE SPANISH STUDENT.

It was a bleak, cold day, and the east wind swept keenly along the streets, driving the clouds of dust before it, and making the passers-by shiver and hurry on more quickly. The streets were, indeed, almost empty and the few people in them all seemed those who were intent on business. Among them was one whose rapid step and the searching glances he cast around, marked him as evidently occupied upon some weighty matter. His cloak, of the finest cloth, and richly trimmed with sable was wrapped round him and drawn up close to his chin.

His long boots were lined and trimmed with the same fur. His hat was slouched over his face, as if he shrank from observation; while his whole appearance was that of one who would generally have sent others to do his bidding among the narrow and dirty streets along which he was winding his way. At length he reached his destination, when, on perceiving the tavern of the "Wild Boar," he at once entered the tap-room. It was crowded; loud talking and laughing were going on, and oaths and curses were flying in all directions. Near the fire was seated one group, consisting of about twelve or fifteen men. Most seemed to be of the lower ranks; some were half drunk, and each face displayed a variety only in vice and brutality. But on the outside of the group, his arm leaning on the back of his seat, his wine cup in his other hand, sat one whom a keen observer of human nature would at once detect to be a deeper sort of villain. He was slightly made, dressed better than his companions, and there were no marks of habitual intemperance on his somewhat pale face and deep-set glittering eyes. It was this man whom the eye of the stranger sought, and to him he advanced, and, laying his hand on his shoulder, said in a whisper, "A word with you in private, good master Eliot."

Eliot started from his seat, and, in an obsequious manner, led the gentleman into one of the small rooms that opened from the bar, closing the door after him. The parley lasted about ten minutes, and they came forth together, still conversing in whispers.

"The thing is easy enough," said Eliot, "now I understand your wishes, for, generally such of these fools that have relatives high in the state plume themselves on the privilege, and go on unmolested."

"See thou dost thy errand quickly, good master," returned the other, "and thy reward shall be ample."

"Well, well, my—sir, I would say, these things will take time. It is oftentimes a hard matter to hunt out these foxes from their lair; but you may depend on it, it is done at last."

"But I tell thee I cannot wait," replied the visitor. "Diest thou ever know what it is to be hungry for revenge?"

"Well, well," responded Eliot, with a look of diabolical malice darkening his face.

"Then," responded the other, "thou canst understand that it must be done at once, and I pay; but delay is fatal."

"I undertake it," answered Eliot, briefly, and with a hasty nod.

The stranger was about to depart, when the host, coming forward, exclaimed—

"Good, my masters; part ye not, surely, without tasting my good wine. Thou shalt pledge thy friend," continued he to the stranger.

He started for a moment in displeasure; some patrician blood was roused at the link between him and the low-born villain; but, controlling himself, he answered—

"Thou dost well to remind me, mine host. Fill us up two cups," and then taking one of them, he turned to Eliot, and said, "I pledge thee to the success of our enterprise." And after having drained the cup, he flung down a gold piece in payment, and strode out of the tavern.

Two days after this conversation, when the shades of evening were beginning to fall, Master Eliot was seen walking leisurely along the streets in the neighborhood of the "Wild Boar." He turned at last into a little court, where the houses were of the poorest kind. He entered one of them, and after ascending two pairs of stairs, he opened, without knocking, the door of a small and miserable room. In it Eliot—though not a tall man—could hardly stand upright. There was scarcely any furniture in the room; a heap of straw was in one corner, a large embroidery-frame, carefully covered over, stood in another, and near the hearth, upon which there were a few dying embers, sat, or half-crouched, a woman, attired in a cloak with a large hood, which was drawn partly over her head and face. She did not rise, or move, or start at Eliot's entrance. He seized a stool, which was near the work-frame, and sat down near her.

CHAPTER VIII.

"You have no welcome for me, Maud?"

There was no answer.

Eliot uttered an oath. "Then if you can't be civil, you must attend to me, for I have business with you, and desire not to tarry long in this accursed hole."

Maud raised her head, and displayed a face so pale and haggard, so marked and seamed with suffering, that it might have provoked pity in the most heartless. Eliot did seem for a moment staggered.

"How awfully ill thou lookest, Maud! Why wilt thou be so obstinate, and refuse the gold I would gladly give thee? Here, take!" and he put his hand in his pocket.

"No," said Maud, speaking for the first time, in a low and hollow voice. "We have settled that point before. No gold from thee. Better hunger, better death."

Eliot responded with another imprecation.

"Then starve, an' thou listest; and now harken. The Catholic serving-maiden of the Duchess of Bertram comes hither to-morrow"

A look of astonishment was visible on Maud's face.

"Ah, thinkest thou I do not know who comes hither? Never dream, Maud, to hide from me. I would follow thee and track thee to the land's end."

"Well," said Maud, bitterly, "supposing she does come hither, what harm is that? Surely the tiring-woman of the Protestant duchess is not an object of thy vengeance?"

"I desire that you find out from her to-morrow where a certain priest called De Lisle, a kinsman of her mistress, is staying."

"No," said Maud, "I will do no such thing. Thou shalt harm no one through me. Work thy devilish trade I never will.

Eliot's pale face was paler still with passion; he did not answer, but rising, and going towards the heap of straw, he lifted the coverings, and underneath there lay a child, a little girl of three years old.

"What dost thou there?" exclaimed Maud, springing after him frantically. "Wilt harm my child?"

"She must awake, and go with me."

"Whither?"

"Where I please. I shall do as I list; she is as my child, and I have absolute power over her. She goes with me, and you will look no more on her face."

"Monster! thou canst not—darest not do this crime."

"If thou refuse my request. Do my bidding, and you shall stay in peace together."

Maud fell on her knees and clasped her hands."

"It is like staining my hands with blood, and through her; deceit to her who has but just taught me to hope for mercy, has just led me back to God with her angel voice! Eliot! thou meanest death to this man?"

"Certainly not," returned he; "and I would have told thee so, an' thou hadst been reasonable. Is it likely the kinsman of the duchess, and the brother of Lady Beauville should die? But he will be fined heavily, and half, at least, will be the informer's. I want gold—must have it; that is the whole."

"Art thou deceiving me?" cried Maud. "If this be all, I could do it."

"Judge for yourself, fool," answered he. "What object can I have in deceiving thee? And judge quickly, or I take the child."

"I consent," said Maud, hastily; "I will do it. God forgive me! Now leave me, in mercy. To-morrow night, if thou wilt come, I will have the news ready."

Without another word, Eliot departed.

"Right manfully his cross he bore,
And ran his race of torments sore
For Thee he pour'd his life away,
With Thee he lives in endless day."

LYRA CATHOLICA.

It was scarcely light on a day in early summer, and the stillness which is peculiar to the hour before sunrise hung over the country. It was a bare and desolate-looking piece of ground, in the outskirts of London; the ground was flat and the trees were few, so that a lonely farm-house, which in itself was most insignificant, stood out as a remarkable object for some distance. This farm-house was indeed a lone one; the straggling outskirts of town ceased before Tyborne was reached, and the little villages of Fulham and Hammersmith were some miles distant.

Towards this house, at the early hour we have mentioned, several per ones were seen approaching. Each corner scrutinized the other with a somewhat searching glance, and each and all hesitated who should be the first to approach the door. At length a sturdy yeoman, who was accompanied by his wife and daughter, broke the spell. There was no instant admittance; the door was strongly barred and girded with iron; a small grating enabled those within to see and hold parley with the comers, and a man of strong and stalwart appearance was behind the grating."

"And who comes hither?" he said.

"Friends," was the answer.

"What is the pass?"

"In this I trust," was the reply; and the bolts were slowly withdrawn, and the party entered.

The same ceremony was gone through with each successive party, till at last a goodly number were assembled. It was observable that these visitors entered slowly and silently, and all ascended the stairs which led to a large room at the back of the house. A table at the end of this unfurnished room, with its white covering, its tapers and crucifix, told plainly that the Catholics round this part of London had come thither for the exercise of their proscribed religion. Through the door of an adjoining room could be dimly seen, half in shade, the figure of one in priestly robes, who was hearing the confessions of those who desired to make them before Mass. Almost every one in the congregation had this purpose, for the administration of the Sacraments being so rare, they were precious indeed to the fainting souls of the Catholics.

At length this duty was concluded and the priest began to put on his vestments for Mass. It was a feast of our Lady, and he was vested in white. They were not gorgeous, those vestments—not such as gleam with jewels or are rich with costly lace—they were poor and shabby; but the holy symbols which the Church has attached to each article worn by a priest at Mass, had a more awful significance in those days of dread and terror, and one might have judged from the expression on the face of Father de Lisle, that his thoughts were indeed with the Passion of his Lord, as he put on the amice in token of His blindfolding, and bound round his waist and neck the stole and girdle that were the shadows of the bonds of JESUS.

"Shall I ever forget," said Arthur Leslie, long years after—"shall I ever forget that Mass—the deep and profound silence in the room—the rapt devotion of each worshipper? How shall I describe the priest? He moved as one might fancy an angel would have done; and surely an almost angelic purity hung about him. His clear, melodious voice sounded as if from heaven; and I saw plainly—and many others with me—rays of light which played round his head.* Oh! with what gaze those eyes were fixed upon the Host at elevation. It seemed like faith dawning into vision! A secret warning told me this would be his last Mass; and my thoughts wandered for a moment to a description he had once given me of his first Mass. That was said in the Cathedral at Rheims, while Father Mordaunt guided his hands, and more than one bishop, with a vast concourse of clergy, were present. The high rank of the young priest, his future to be spent in bloodshedding England, excited much interest, and drew a large multitude. Triumphantly the Mass was sung, and at its close knights and ladies of noble rank, together with crowds of poor, came to kiss the anointed hands of the new priest. Such was his first Mass; now look upon his last.

"In an empty 'upper chamber,' in a desolate house, a few trembling and hunted people to assist, who held their breath with fear. But which was most like the first and last Mass of the First Priest? More like it still it grew. Communion was nearly over—the last circle of recipients were kneeling around the altar, waiting for the Bread of Life, when the sudden trampling of horses around the house, the thundering of staves against the door, and the loud cries of 'Open in the queen's name,' told that, like his Lord, the servant too was betrayed."

"Father, you must hide!" was hastily whispered; but Walter was as though he heard it not. He moved from one to the other, giving the Holy Communion, and then turned to finish the Mass. No one said any more; all felt it would be useless. Father de Lisle feared instant death far less than any profaning of the Holy Mysteries. It was useless, also, to contend with the armed force who were battling at the portal, or to enrage them with any further delay; so the heavy door swung back, and the party of pursuivants, headed by Eliot, entered.

"Some had better stay outside," said Eliot to the captain of the guard, "lest haply some foul play chance us in this hideous hole;" and he then rushed up stairs with frantic haste, as if endowed with the scent of a bloodhound.

Walter de Lisle was reading the last Gospel; so calm was his manner, so unmoved the tones of his voice, that Eliot even stood still. Walter turned from the altar and faced his foes,

"Seize him!" said Eliot; and two of the pursuivants laid hands on him.

"I shall not resist," said the priest, with dignity; "only suffer me, I pray you, to take off the garments of mine office, which are not seemly to wear save for the functions."

"Yes, let him take off those rags of papistry," said Eliot; "and, Will" (to one of the men), "where is that fool's coat thou despoiled that poor fool of as we rode hither? Thinkest thou not it would do marvellously well to attire this fool with?"

The men laughed coarsely, and the garment was produced. It was the fool's coat, made of patchwork of various gay colors, and of grotesque design, such as was worn by the jesters then attached to the household of each person of distinction.

"But before we do so," said Eliot "thou must be searched, Master de Lisle."

Then for the first time Arthur saw his friend's face change. He came eagerly forward to offer money, that the indignity might be omitted, but Eliot was roused.

"There is some secret then," he exclaimed; "search him instantly."

It was not the fear of insult that made the confessor's heart quail; but Walter, like most other priests of the times, obliged to travel from place to place, always carried on his breast a silver pyx, in which rested the Blessed Sacrament; and a pang of unutterable horror took possession of his mind at the thought of the profanation which would now be offered to the body of the Lord.

"Shame on my faithless heart!" said he afterwards to Arthur; "why did I not know that He who once passed through the midst of them, and went His way, could triumph again?"

They dragged Walter into another room, Arthur alone accompanying him, and they began the search, seasoning it with coarse jokes and ribaldry, excited by Eliot. Loud was the laugh when they discovered the hair shirt and the girdle of steel, with which the saint kept down the flesh; but though every garment was dragged from him, there was visible to no mortal eye save the priest's, the consecrated pyx. He felt its sweet weight on his bosom, and rude hands came close to it, and seemed as if they were laid upon it, and yet it was never discovered. At length the search was ended, and Walter resumed his clothes*. The soldiers arrayed him in the fool's coat,† and dragging him down stairs, prepared to tie him hand and foot across a horse.

"Thou art grateful for this kind of treatment, art thou not, master?" said Eliot, mockingly. "There is no hope left for me, after the grievous sin of thus handling thee!"

"Nay, Master Eliot," said Walter, "I forgive thee from my heart; and wouldst thou but do penance, and confess thy sin, I would that it were by my voice thou shouldst hear the words of absolution."‡

Eliot replied only by striking him, and ordering the men to hurry; and so, in this guise, the journey to Newgate was made.

As they advanced into town, a mob began to collect, and, swayed as they generally are by a wanton desire of mischief, amused themselves by hooting, shouting, and throwing mud and stones at Walter.

The gates of Newgate were reached, and here Arthur, who had followed his friend, was compelled to leave him.

Once again was the Countess Beauville sitting in her bower, but though it is not many days since we last saw her there, there is yet a change in her beautiful face—the sadness has deepened, and there is a shadow of despair mingled with it. Her hands elench, more than hold her books, and her feet taps against the floor with the nervous motion of those who suffer mentally. When she hears the slightest noise, she starts and trembles; and when, therefore, the arras was put aside with a hasty hand, she started to her feet in sudden terror; but on perceiving the intruder was only her sister-in-law, the Duchess of Bertram, she re-seated herself, and all her haughty composure came back in an instant. Her eyes did certain rest on Constance with surprise, for the appearance of the fair duchess was different from its wont. Her dress was disordered, and her manner perturbed, and there was a strange anxiety on the face of her who generally went smiling through life. She came up to Isabel, saying, "Do you know what I have come to speak about?" The countess had a touch of her old scorn in her voice, as she answered—

"Certainly not."

"Then I have painful news to tell you: your brother is in Newgate."

Isabel turned very pale, and gasped for breath.

"Dear Isabel," went on Constance, "do not be alarmed, 'tis but for a day; nor one word from Beauville is all-powerful with Walsingham. But there is now some frightful mistake, and it is about that I hurried to speak. On hearing of the sad event, I sent a message to Newgate, to tell the governor to whom Father de Lisle was allied, and to beg him to treat him with all courtesy till his kinsmen could procure his release; and the man came back to say the governor laughed, and said it was Lord Beauville himself who had put De Lisle into prison, and wished to pursue him to the uttermost."

"'Tis false; they lie foully," said Isabel, starting to her feet, her eyes glaring. "He never did this thing."

"I know it, I feel sure of it," answered Constance. "Be calm, dearest Isabel, and all will yet be well."

As she spoke, the arras was lifted and the earl entered. Isabel sprang towards him.

"Tell me, thou hast not done this thing! I know thou hast not, earnestly."

"What means this?" said the earl; "what is all this turmoil?"

"It is my fault, Beauville," said his sister; "I have roused Isabel to agony by news I have brought her of her brother, not only that he is in Newgate, but that by some strange mistake the governor asserts it is by thy contrivance."

"Thou hast not?" said Isabel, again grasping his hand.

The earl looked at her. "Yes, I have."

There was a moment's silence. Isabel gazed at him as if she did not comprehend; and the look of malice in his face made Constance turn faint. "I have," said the earl; "and hear me yet; this man is your brother, Isabel, but he is * A fact.

† See Chaucer.

‡ See "Life of Campian."

my enemy.—I hate him, and thou knowest not, perhaps, what means a Beauville's hate; and know it then now: every torture that law permits shall be executed upon that man, and at last a shameful death. If he recant, well,—the law saves him; but if not, as sure as Elizabeth is queen and Walsingham hath power, Walter de Lisle is doomed."

She listened, and she was still, quite still, her face pale and ghastly; she clasped her hands together, and looked up to heaven, and then she said, and the tones of her voice rang in Constance's ear for long years afterwards,—“O God, O God, my punishment is greater than I can bear!”

And in these words Constance discerned not only the anguish for Walter, but the breaking of the heart's idol, the snapping of a life's hope. She moved towards the door, but ere she reached it, she sank on the ground insensible. Lord Beauville called for Rachel, and without a word to his sister, left the room. Constance went home, bidding Rachel send word how her mistress was. Before night she heard the countess was raving in brain fever.

Note.—“It must be here observed that Mr. Nappier had his pix with him, and in it two consecrated Hosts; and as he owned to me several times, when he heard Sir Francis give the constable orders to search, he was under the greatest concern, for fear lest the Blessed Sacrament should fall into their hands, and be exposed to some profane or sacrilegious treatment. And he further assured me, not without tears in his eye, that, whereas the search was most strict, even so far that his shoes were pulled off in the presence of the justice, that nothing might escape them; and whereas, also in searching his pockets, the constable to his feeling, had his hands many times both upon the pix and a small reliquary yet neither of them were discovered, to the great surprise and no less joy of the good man”—Life of George Nappier, Priest.

“Here on the next day, Mr. Genings being at the consecration, Topcliffe, the arch priest-catcher, with other officers, came in and broke open the chamber door, where he was celebrating; . . . and the more to make him a scoff to the people, they vested him in a ridiculous fool's coat, which they found in Mr. Wells' house.”—Life of Edmund Genings, Priest.

CHAPTER IX.

“Oh, what a change hath the prison wrought,
Since we gazed upon him last;
And mournful the lessons his thin frame taught,
Of the sufferings he had pass'd.”

NEALE.

In Newgate, Walter was at first thrown into the common prison. The ward or dungeon in which he was placed, was full of prisoners accused of the most revolting crimes. They were pent up like a set of wild beasts, with hardly light or air, and the stench of the place was so insupportable, that Walter on his entrance almost fainted. He was heavily ironed, and left to find his place as he could. The appearance of such a stranger among them naturally excited the curiosity of the prisoners; and Walter seemed able from the first to exercise a sort of control over them, and the worst language was hushed in his presence, though enough that was horrible went on. The only sort of seat in the dungeon was a kind of bench in the wall, and this was assigned to Walter, who lay there at night, and when the prison was comparatively still, found time to pray; for his spirit, yearning for the salvation of others, was tortured by the sights and sounds of sin around him. In this dungeon he became an apostle, and when he preached to the poor wretches around him, all listened and none mocked; and during the ten or twelve days he was immured there, several were won by his words to change their lives. It was the rumor of this change that induced the governor to alter Walter's position. He was removed from his ward, his irons were struck off, and he was employed as one of the scavengers. From early morning until night, Walter was kept at work, and the most menial offices were his; and when, worn out with exhaustion, he would sometimes rest for a few minutes, a blow or a kick roused him.

“I will humble him somehow,” said the governor; and yet as the days went on, the pale face wore still its look of peace and of perfect serenity.

“Here, prisoner,” said one of the under-jailers, approaching him one day, “Here is other work for you; follow me.”

Walter followed him into a different part of the prison, along many passages, and down an immense flight of steps. At length Walter found himself in a dungeon, which he immediately recognized as the well-known torture chamber. Several executioners stood ready; while at a table sat the governor, and Eliot by his side, ready to take down in writing the prisoner's confessions.

“Ha! Master de Lisle!” said Eliot, “it is determined by the Privy Council to interrogate you concerning certain matters. They desire to know exactly at what houses you tarried during your stay in England, the names of the persons who at any time confessed to you, or who were by you reconciled to the Church of Rome.”

“All these questions,” answered Walter, “I decline to answer.”

“Put the prisoner on the rack,” said Eliot, coolly; and two men seized Walter, and after stripping off some of his upper clothing, placed him in the rack. It was a large frame of oak, raised three feet from the ground. Walter was laid on his back upon the floor, his wrists and ankles were then fastened by cords to rollers attached to each end of the frame.

Eliot now began to repeat his questions, and as Walter continued silent the rollers began to creak and turn. For some time the sufferer was quite still; but as the operation went on, the agony forced out words, but they were words only of prayer. The Name that is above every name was earnestly invoked, and the “Help of the afflicted” was appealed unto. At length Walter fainted, and was then released from his trial.

“Take him hence, jailer,” said Eliot. “Let him recover his strength, and then we will try the gauntlets and the scavenger's daughter. Ah, I deem we will break that haughty will at last, when we let torture do its worst.”

From this time Walter had a cell to himself, and better food. He was also allowed occasional intercourse with his friends; for Eliot hoped by this means to extract further information from him. Arthur Leslie, whose one employment was to endeavor, by every possible means, to procure a pardon for him, but as yet without success, came frequently.

No sooner was Walter recovered, than Eliot fulfilled his threat, and he again visited the torture-chamber. This time Walter was not taken by surprise, and he had been daily arming himself for the conflict. On his arrival at the door of the dungeon, he fell on his knees, and, looking up to heaven,* cried for help.

“Strengthen me, O, Lord, my God; by the remembrance of Thy scourging and Thy bitter passion, help me in this hour.”

“We will try thee to-day with the bracelets,” said Eliot, as Walter entered, “and see if they will not squeeze out the truth from thee, thou obstinate villain.”

“God forgive thee, Master Eliot,” said Walter, looking at him. “I pray that none may deal with thee as thou dost with me.”

“Do not answer me,” cried Eliot, furiously. “Ho! varlets there: let us not lose time.”

Walter was now led to one end of the room. From side to side of the ceiling stretched a long and heavy wooden beam. He was then made to mount three planks of wood, which brought him sufficiently near the beam to enable his hands to be thrust into iron rings, which thus attached him to it. By means of a screw, these gradually compressed the wrists. As soon as it was made fast, the men withdrew the lower piece of wood, causing a sudden jerk and a rush of blood through the whole body. The two other planks were then withdrawn, and Walter was suspended in the air. The anguish of this posture was past words to describe.

“Wilt thou come down from the cross?” was said, if not in words, in deed.

“Say but one word,” exclaimed Eliot; “name one of those who have confessed to thee, and thou art released.”

And the answer was, “Jesu, help! Lord Jesu, forsake me not! By Thy three hours on the tree, save Thy servant!”

“He has fainted, Master Eliot,” said one of the men; “will you that we let him down?”

* See “Life of Complan.”

"Replace the wood under his feet," said Eliot, "throw water over him."

It was done, and in a few minutes Walter recovered. He drank some of the water they offered him, and felt revived.

"Wilt thou speak now?" demanded Eliot.

Walter made no answer.

"Let the torture continue, then," said Eliot, coolly going back to his seat.

The wood was taken away, and the screws again began to work, till the gauntlets were literally buried in the flesh! Again and again the torture recommenced. It was five hours before Eliot was weary of his torturous work, and Walter was carried back to his cell. There was Arthur waiting for him, and tears flowed from his eyes as he beheld the bruised and worn frame of his friend.

"Nay, hush! my Arthur," said Walter, in answer to his words of burning indignation; "it pains me to hear thee rave thus. I thank God from my heart for permitting me to witness for His name. You know not how near it seems to bring me to the Cross; how it makes me realize in some sort the anguish of Calvary."

"But it is not witnessing for Christ," cried Arthur, indignantly; "think you not that in history it will be recorded only that ye died as traitors? Think ye not that Walsingham can cast a veil over the atrocities of Elizabeth's reign?"

"There is One stronger than an earthly governor," replied Walter. "In His own good time the truth shall be told, and England know for what cause we suffer. Give me some water, Arthur, an' it please you,—my thirst is burning. Ah, my friend, there was One who thirsted, and had no water to drink."

"I am determined to conquer him," said Eliot; "even if I kill him in the torture, I will do it."

And so, day after day, Walter was dragged forth—sometimes stretched on the rack, sometimes suspended by the gauntlets, till Eliot, wearied with his patience and endurance, resolved to resort to the fearful punishment known as the scavenger's daughter, which, being of so frightful a nature, was seldom used. The governor of Newgate shrank back when this design was mentioned, but De Lisle's torturing had been given into Eliot's hands, and he had no power to interfere.

Walter, who had been allowed some days' respite from torment, had partially recovered strength; moreover, by Arthur's contrivance, a disguised priest had gained admittance to him, and he had thus received consolation and communion, and his spirit was strengthened within him, and he went calmly when he was called, feeling sure something more cruel than usual was in prospect.

In the centre of the room there was a large hoop of iron, which opened and fastened with a hinge. Water was made to kneel on the pavement, and compress his body as much as possible. One executioner knelt upon his shoulders, while others passed the hoop under his legs. They then pressed the victim's body till they were able to fasten the hoop over the back. This done, they began to question the sufferer. "One word, one name," went on the tempter; and the reply was only in a low moan, and sometimes the words would come out, "Jesu, Jesu." The blood gushed plentifully from Walter's nostrils, and the governor turned away in horror. Eliot went on unconcernedly—

"'Tis thy own fault. Answer me but one word—the names of recusants whom thou hast received to confession—and thou art free."

"Dear Lord and Master," said the martyr, "remember me."

Near the entrance of the chamber stood a man wrapped in a cloak, who had hitherto passed for one of the prison attendants; he had been quivering with agony, and now came forward, and throwing himself by Walter, said, in a broken voice, "I can bear it no longer; speak, father, I entreat thee, and save thyself."

Walter's half-glaring eyes were turned upon him. "His rod and His staff, they comfort me. More pain, Lord, if thou wilt, and more patience," he said.

"Ah, who is this that dares interrupt the scene?" cried Eliot, furiously; "another recusant, I dare say. To prison with him!"

"An' by your leave, not so fast, Master Eliot," said the governor: "'tis a kinsman of mine, and a Protestant, but a young man of noble parts, who loves not to witness such hang-dog work. Is it your will the torture ceases? it hath lasted an hour, and it were too long, to my mind."

"The time allowed in extreme cases of obstinacy is an hour and a half," said Eliot, "and I shall insist on it to-day."

For another half hour the anguish went on. At its close Walter was taken out insensible, and with drops of blood trickling from his hands and feet; it was his last racking.

A few days afterwards the governor entered Walter's cell.

"To-morrow being Sunday, good Master de Lisle," said he, "some of our divines are anxious to hold a disputation with you on the doctrines of Popery, being desirous to convince you of the error of your ways. Doth it please you to attend?"

"At any other time, sir," returned Walter, "I will gladly do my poor best to defend our cause; but now I am so enfeebled, you perceive, I have scarce power of utterance."

"True, true," said the governor, compassionately; "I see it, and I am sorry, for it will be said, of course, that you fear to come."

"Nay, then," said Walter, "I will essay to be there, at all events, and when the good masters perceive my state, they will see clearly how unfit an antagonist I am. Where is the meeting to be?"

"In the chapel," answered the governor; "at one of the clock you shall be sent for."

The following day, at the appointed hour, Walter was conducted between two jailers. The chapel was crowded with people, and one minister was standing in the desk for prayer, while the others were seated near him. Close by them, and so conspicuously in sight of all, a chair was placed for Walter. He had hardly reached it when one minister began to read the "Service of Common Prayer." Instantly Walter perceived the trick, and, weak as he was, he endeavored to reach the door and escape: but it was closely shut, and his jailers held him by force in his seat. Then he began to recite aloud the Vespers for the day; and, much as the exertion cost him, his loud and melodious voice drowned that of the reader. There was great confusion; many rose to their feet, many whispered, some talked aloud; the minister raised his voice higher and higher; but, above it all, and through the din, rose up the clear words of triumph and faith—"Quis sicut Dominus Deus noster, qui in altis habitat, et humilia respicit in celo et in terra."*

At length the service, if it may be called so, was brought to a conclusion, and the minister in towering anger descended the stairs. The men released their hold on Walter; he instantly rose, and, getting on the chair, exclaimed in a loud voice—

"Hearken, good people; I call Almighty God and His holy angels to be my witness, I came not hither of my own will, but by stratagem; and when I would have departed, have been kept by force; I would rather die a thousand deaths than communicate in an heretical worship.†

"Thou art mad," said the governor, coming forward; "thou mightst have had life and liberty, hadst thou behaved quietly here to-day. Thy blood be on thy head; I wash my hands of thee, and can do no more;—get thee back to prison."

Note.—He was so cruelly torn and rent upon the torture, that he told a friend of his that he thought they meant to make away with him in that manner.—Life of Edmund Campian.

*Mr White, lying in Bridewell at the mercy of the inhuman Topliffe or Topcliffe besides other cruel treatment, was once hung up for eight hours together by the hands in iron manacles, to oblige him to confess in whose houses he had said Mass.—Life of Eustachius White.

†"Who is like the Lord our God, who dwelleth on high, and respecteth the lowly in heaven and on earth."

†See "Life of William Davies, Priest."

CHAPTER X.

"Campan I desired to imitate, whom only love for his country and zeal for the house of God consumed before his time. You shall not want priests. We were three hundred in England; you have put a hundred to death; the other two hundred are left. When they are gone, two hundred more are ready to come in their places; and for my part, I hope my death will do more good than ever my life could have done."—WILLIAM HARRINGTON, Priest.

On a certain sultry day in July, the court at King's Bench was crowded, for it was understood the trial of Walter de Lisle would come on that day, and the strong interest always felt at the trial of recusants was heightened in this case.

The gallery was occupied chiefly by ladies, and among them were two who sat forward so as to command a good view of the court, and those who knew the great ones of the time might have recognized them as being the French ambassadress and the Duchess of Bertram.

A cause was going on as they entered. A tall, fine-looking man was standing at the bar, and clinging to his arm was a lady, pale as death, whose suffering in the position she found herself was evidently extreme.

"Verily, Master Lydar," said the judge, "the charges have been proved against thee, both of obstinately refusing to go to church, and also of harboring a priest, one Master Paterson, now awaiting his trial in the prison of Bridewell; thou art certainly guilty, Master Lydar, and if I give sentence, thou must pay fines which will swallow up, if I mistake not, the whole of thy estate. But the queen is merciful; repent of thy recusancy, go to church, and all is forgiven."

A red flush burnt on Master Lydar's face; he looked at his wife, whose glance of anguish met his; he thought of his children, brought to beggary, and the lie trembled on his lips.

"Very well, my lord, I submit—I will go to church."

There was a moment's pause, and then, ere the judge could answer, the silence was broken by a clear thrilling voice, both powerful and sweet—

"John Lydar, what hast thou done?"

A sudden rustle ran through the court; every head was turned in one direction. Inside the bar, attended by two jailers, was a tall, graceful figure, of one fearfully emaciated, but who walked without sign of fear, while the fire that flashed from his sunken eyes spoke of undaunted resolution, and the peace written on every feature told of a strength which neither judge nor monarch could subdue.

The effect on John Lydar was electrical, while his wife started from his side, and the color came to her cheeks. The court was so taken by surprise, that no one spoke, and Walter continued—

"What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his soul?"

"My lord," said Lydar, turning to the judge, "I pray you let me have my word back again. I do confess before all men, it was through fear of punishment I yielded."

"Look well what thou dost, Master Lydar, and be not deceived; the penalty is hard to bear."

"I know it; nevertheless, I will bear it my lord. Give me back my word."

"Well," said the judge, "if thou be so earnest, thou shalt have thy word again, say what thou wilt."

While the judge was speaking, the Lord Mayor, the Recorder of the city, and the Bishop of London, were taking their places on the bench, in readiness for Walter's trial; and when Lydar had thus re-affirmed his faith, Walter stepped forward and laid his hand on Lydar's head.

"Hold, hold!" cried the Bishop of London; "look ye, my lord judge, he is recoucing a recusant in the open court."

"Separate the prisoners," said the judge—and his order was obeyed; but the deed was done—the words were spoken—and how calmly now did Lydar and his wife listen to their sentence, immediately after which they were removed from court, and Walter was placed at the bar.*

The names of the jury were then called over, in compliance with the form of giving the accused the right to object to any of them; but every one knew that it was only a form, and that such a jury as would obey the judge would alone be chosen. When, however, Walter was called upon to make the usual answer, he said—and the court was again thrilled by the sound of that clear sweet voice—

"My lord I object to be tried by any but my peers; I claim the right of my rank as Baron de Lisle, and altogether plead against being tried in this court, or by such a jury."

"No," said the judge, "a bill of attainder hath been long since passed against you, and you can be tried by no other tribunal than this. Let the jury be sworn, and then let the bill of indictment be read."

In a few minutes the clerk commenced—

"The jury present, on the part of our sovereign lady the queen, that Walter de Lisle, born within the kingdom of England, and made and ordained priest by authority derived and pretended from the see of Rome, not holding the fear of God before his eyes, and slighting the laws and statutes of this realm of England, without any regard to the penalty therein contained, on the twenty-fourth day of May, in the thirty-fourth year of the reign of our lady the queen, at Paddington, in the county of Middlesex, traitorously, and as a false traitor to our said lady the queen, was and remained, contrary to the form of the statute in such case set forth and provided, and contrary to the peace of our said lady the queen, her crown and dignities."

"Answer, prisoner at the bar, whether guilty or not guilty, and hold up thy hand."

Walter attempted to obey, and to raise his right hand as he proclaimed his innocence; but his arms were so numbed by the constant racking, that the effort was unavailing, and his hand would have fallen back had not Arthur Leslie, who was standing close beside the bar, leant over, and, taking the hand "so abused for the confession of Christ," reverently kissed it, and then raised his arm as high as possible.* "Not guilty," said Walter. "I protest before God and His holy angels, before heaven and earth, before the world and this bar whereat I stand, which is but a small resemblance of the terrible judgment of the next life, that I am not guilty of any act of any treason whatsoever."

"What!" said the Bishop of London, "wilt thou deny thou art a priest?"

"Oh, my lord," said Walter, looking at him, "surely it becomes not one, bound as you are to forward religion only, to interfere in a cause of life and death."

To this the bishop made no answer; but, turning to the judge, exclaimed, "A bag was found among the prisoner's effects; in it were a Roman breviary and a paper of faculties to hear confessions, and also to say Mass either above or below ground."

"Pray you, my lord," said Walter, "was my name mentioned in that paper you speak of; for if not, it surely is no argument against me?"

"That is nothing to the point," answered the bishop, hotly, "Say out at once, art thou a priest or no?"

"Suffer me, my lord," answered Walter, "to demand first one question of you: are you a priest?"

"No," said the bishop.

"No priest, no bishop," replied Father de Lisle.

"I am a priest," replied the bishop; "but not a massing priest."

